PREFACE.

THESE five books of Scripture which are contained in this Third Volume,* and which I have here endeavoured, according to the measure of the gift given to me, to explain and improve, for the use of those who desire to read them, not only with understanding, but to their edification—though they have the same Divine origin, design, and authority, as those that went before, yet, upon some accounts, are of a very different nature from them, and from the rest of the sacred writings, such variety of methods has Infinite Wisdom seen fit to take in conveying the light of Divine revelation to the children of men, that this heavenly food might have (as the Jews say of the manna,) something in it agreeable to every palate, and suited to every constitution. If every eye be not thus opened, every mouth will be stopped, and such as perish in their ignorance will be left without excuse. "We have piped unto you, and you have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and you have not lamented," Mat. xi. 17.

First. The books of Scripture have hitherto been, for the most part, very plain and easy, narratives of matter of fact, which he that runs may read and understand, and which are milk for babes, such as they can receive and digest, and both entertain and nourish themselves with. The waters of the sanctuary have hitherto been but to the ankles or to the knees, such as a lamb might wade in, to drink of and wash in; but here we are advanced to a higher form in God's school, and have books put into our hands wherein are many things "dark and hard to be understood," which we do not apprehend the meaning of so suddenly and so certainly as we could wish, the study of which requires a more close application of mind, a greater intenseness of thought, and the accomplishing of a diligent search, which yet the treasure hid in them, when it is found, will abundantly recompense. The waters of the sanctuary are here to the loins, and still as we go forward we shall find the waters still risen in the prophetical books, "waters to swim in," Eze. xlvii. 3—5; not fordable, nor otherwise to be passed over—depths in which an elephant will not find footing, "strong meat for strong men." The same method is observable in the New Testament, where we find the plain history of Christ and his Gospel placed first in the Evangelists, and the Acts of the Apostles; then the mystery of both in the Epistles, which are more difficult to be understood; and, lastly, the prophecies of things to come in the apocalyptic visions. This method, so exactly observed in both the Testaments, directs us in what order to proceed, both in studying the things of God ourselves and in teaching them to others; we must go in the order that the Scripture does; and where can we expect to find a better method of Divinity and a better method of preaching?

1. We must begin with those things that are most plain and easy, as, blessed be God, those things are which are most necessary to salvation and of the greatest use. We must lay our foundation firm, in a sound experimental knowledge of the principles of religion, and then the superstructure will be well reared, and will stand firmly. It is not safe to launch out into the deep at first, nor to venture into points difficult and controverted until we have first thoroughly digested the elements of the oracles of God and turned them in succum et sanguinem,—'into juice and blood.' Those that begin their Bible at the wrong end commonly use their knowledge of it in the wrong way. And, in training up others, we must be sure to ground them well at first in those truths of God which are plain, and in some measure level to their capacity, which we find they comprehend, and relish, and know how to make use of, and not amuse those that are weak with things above them, things of doubtful disputation, which they cannot apprehend any certainty of nor advantage by. Our Lord Jesus spoke the word to the people as they were able to hear it, Mar. iv. 33, and had many things to say to his disciples which he did not say, because as yet they could not bear them. Jno. xvi. 12, 13. And those whom St. Paul "could not speak to as unto spiritual"—though he blamed them for their backwardness, yet he accommodated himself to their weakness, and spoke to them "as unto babes in Christ," 1 Cor. iii. 1, 2.

2. Yet we must not rest in these things. We must not be always children that have need of milk, but nourished up with that, and gaining strength, we must go on to perfection, Heb. vi. 1; that having, by reason of use, our spiritual senses exercised, Heb. v. 14, we may come to full age, and put away childish things, and forgetting the things which are behind, that is, so well remembering them that we need not be still conning them, as those that are ever learning the same lesson, we may "reach forth to the things which are before," Phil. iii. 13. Though we must never think to learn above our Bible as long as we are here in this world, yet we must still be getting forward in it. "You have dwelt long enough in this mountain," now "turn you and take your journey" onward in the wilderness towards Canaan. Our motto must be plus ultra,—'onward.' And then shall we know, if thus by regular steps (Hos. vi. 3) we follow on to know the Lord, and what the mind of the Lord is.

Secondly. The books of Scripture have hitherto been mostly historical, but now the matter is of another nature; it is doctrinal and devotional, preaching and praying: and in this way of writing, as well as in the former, a great deal of excellent knowledge is conveyed, which serves very valuable purposes. It will be of good use to know not only what others did that went before us, and how they fared, but what their notions and sentiments were, what their thoughts and affections were; that we may, with the help of them, form our minds aright. Plutarch's Morals are reputed as useful a treasure in the commonwealth of learning as Plutarch's Lives, and the wise disquisitions and discourses of the philosophers as the records of the historians; nor is this Divine philosophy, (if I may so call it,) which we have in these books, less needful, nor less serviceable to the church, than the sacred history was. Blessed be God for both.

Thirdly. The Jews make these books to be given by a Divine inspiration somewhat different from that both of Moses and the prophets. They divided the books of the Old Testament into the law, the prophets, and the כתובים—'writings;' which Epiphanius emphatically translates, γραφεῖα—'things written;' and these books are more commonly called among the Greeks Ἁγιόγραφα,—'Holy Writings.' The Jews attribute them to that distinct kind of inspiration which they call רוח הקדש—'the Holy Spirit.' Moses they supposed to write by the Spirit in a way above all the other prophets, for with him God spoke mouth to mouth, even apparently, (Num. xii. 8,) knew him, that is, conversed with him face to face, Deu. xxxiv. 10. He was made partaker of Divine revelation (as Maimonides distinguishes, De Fund. Legis, c. 7,) per vigiliam,—'while awake,' whereas God manifested himself to all the other prophets in a dream or vision: see Mr. Smith's Discourse of Prophecy, ch. xi. And he adds that Moses understood the words of prophecy without any perturbation or astonishment of mind, whereas the other prophets commonly fainted and were troubled. But the writers of the Hagiographa they suppose to be inspired in a degree somewhat below that of the other prophets, and to receive Divine revelation, not as they did by dreams, and visions, and voices, but (as Maimonides describes it, More Nevochim, part 2, c. 45) they perceived some power to rise within them, and rest upon them, which urged and enabled them to write or speak far above their own natural ability, in psalms or hymns, or in history, or in rules of good living, still enjoying the ordinary vigour and use of their senses. Let David himself describe it: "The Spirit of the Lord spoke by me, and his word was in my tongue; the God of Israel said, the Rock of Israel spoke to me," 2 Sam. xxiii. 2, 3. This gives such a magnificent account of the inspiration by which David wrote, that I see not why it should be made inferior to that of the other prophets, for David is expressly called a prophet, Acts ii. 29, 30. But, since our hand is in with the Jewish masters, let us see what books they account Hagiographa. These five that are now before us come, without dispute, into this rank of sacred writers, and the book of the Lamentations is not unfitly added to them. Indeed the Jews, when they would speak critically, reckon all those songs which we meet with in the Old Testament among the Hagiographa; for though they were penned by prophets, and under the direction of the Holy Ghost, yet, because they were not the proper result of visum propheticum,—'prophetic vision,' they were not strictly prophecy. As to the historical books, they distinguish, (but I think it is a distinction without a difference;) some of them they assign to the prophets, calling them the prophetæ priores,—'the former prophets;' namely, Joshua, Judges, and the two books of the Kings; but others they rank among the Hagiographa, as the book of Ruth, (which yet is but an appendix to the book of Judges,) the two books of Chronicles, with Ezra, Nehemiah, and the book of Esther, which last the rabbin have a great value for, and think it is to be had in equal esteem with the law of Moses itself, that it shall last as long as that lasts, and shall survive the writings of the prophets. And, lastly, they reckon the book of Daniel among the Hagiographa, Hil. Megil. c. 2, § 18; for which no reason can be given, since he was not inferior to any of the prophets in the gift of prophecy. And, therefore, the learned Mr. Smith thinks that their placing him among the Hagiographical writers was fortuitous and by mistake. Vid. Hottinger. Thesaur. Philol., l. 2, c. 1, § 3. Mr. Smith, in his Discourse, before quoted, though he supposes this kind of Divine inspiration to be more 'pacate and serene than that which was strictly called prophecy, not acting so much upon the imagination, but seating itself in the higher and purer faculties of the soul, yet shews that it manifested itself to be of a Divine nature, not only as it always elevated pious souls into strains of devotion, or moved them strangely to dictate matters of true piety and goodness, but as it came in abruptly upon the minds of those holy men, and transported them from the temper of mind they were in before, so that they perceived themselves captivated by the power of some higher light than that which their own understanding commonly poured out upon them; and this, says he, was a kind of vital form to that light of Divine and sanctified reason which they were perpetually possessed of, and that constant frame of holiness and goodness which dwelt in their hallowed minds.' We have reason to "glorify the God of Israel who gave such power unto men," and has here transmitted to us the blessed products of that power.

MATTHEW HENRY'S third volume contains the Books of Job, the Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, or the Song of Solomon. In the course of his review of what he has already done, and his anticipation of what is to come, he brings forward the question of inspiration. The Jews, as he says, divided the Old Testament into The Law, The Prophets, and The Writings or Scriptures, which division is recognised in the New Testament. The Law comprised the five Books of Moses. The Prophets formed two classes: the former prophets consisted of the Books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings; the later prophets were Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets—Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah,

* To avoid confusion, it may be well to remind the reader that the edition of the COMMENTARY for which Matthew Henry prepared this Preface, and those prefixed to Vols. I. and III. (present edition), consisted of six volumes. This will explain the apparent inconsistencies in the allusions to the volumes of his work. Each volume of the present edition contains two of the editions referred to.

Fourthly. The style and composition of these books are different from those that go before and those that follow. Our Saviour divides the books of the Old Testament into the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms, (Lu. xxiv. 44,) and thereby teaches us to distinguish those books that are poetical, or metrical, from the Law and the Prophets; and such are all these that are now before us, except Ecclesiastes, which yet, having something restrained in its style, may well enough be reckoned among them. They are books in verse, according to the ancient rules of versifying, though not according to the Greek and Latin prosodies. Some of the ancients call these five books the second Pentateuch of the Old Testament, Damascen's Orthod. Fid. l. 4, c. 18; five sacred volumes which are as the satellites to the five books of the law of Moses. Gregory Nazianzen, vide Suicer. Thesaur. in στιχηρὰ, (Carm. 33, p. 98,) calls these αἱ στιχήραι πέντε,—'the five metrical books;' first Job, (so he reckons them up,) then David, then the three of Solomon—Ecclesiastes, the Song, and Proverbs. Amphilochius, bishop at Iconium, in his iambic poem to Seleucus, reckons them up particularly, and calls them στιχηράς πέντε Βίβλους,—'the five verse books.' Epiphanius, Lib. de Ponder. et Mensur., p. 533, πέντε στιχήρεις,—'the five verse books.' And Cyril. Hierosol. Collect. 4, p. 30, (mihi,—'in my copy,') calls these five books τὰ στιχηρὰ,—'books in verse.' Polychronius, in his prologue to Job. saith that as those that are without call their tragedies and comedies ποιητικα,—'poetics;' so, in sacred writ, those books which are composed in Hebrew metre, (of which he reckons Job the first,) we call στιχηρὰ βιβλια,—'books in verse,' written κατὰ στίχον,—'according to order.' What is written in metre, or rhythm, is so called from μέτρος,—'a measure,' and ἄριθμος,—'a number,' because regulated by certain measures, or numbers of syllables, which please the ear with their smoothness and cadency, and so insinuate the matter the more movingly and powerfully into the fancy. Sir William Temple, Miscell. part 2. in his essay upon poetry, thinks it is generally agreed to have been the first sort of writing that was used in the world; nay, that in several nations poetical compositions preceded the very invention or usage of letters. The Spaniards, he says, found in America many strains of poetry, and such as seemed to flow from a true poetic vein, before any letters were known in those regions. The same, says he, is probable of the Scythians and Grecians: the oracles of Apollo were delivered in verse—so were those of the Sibyls. And Tacitus says that the ancient Germans had no annals or records but what were in verse. Homer and Hesiod wrote their poems (the very Alcoran of the pagan dæmonology,) many ages before the appearing of any of the Greek philosophers or historians; and long before them, (if we may give credit to the antiquities of Greece,) even before the days of David, Orpheus and Linus were celebrated poets and musicians in Greece; and, at the same time, Carmenta, the mother of Evander, who was the first that introduced letters among the natives of Greece, was so called a carmine,—'from a song,' because she delivered herself in verse. And in such veneration was this way of writing among the ancients, that their poets were called vates,—'prophets,' and their muses were deified. But, which is more certain and considerable, the most ancient composure that we meet with in Scripture was the song of Moses at the Red Sea, Ex. xv., which we find before the very first mention of writing, for that occurs not until Ex. xvii. 14, when God bade Moses write a memorial of the war with Amalek. The first, and indeed the true and general end of writing, is the help of memory; and poetry doth in some measure answer that end, and even in the want of writing, much more with writing, helps to preserve the remembrance of ancient things. The book of the wars of the Lord, Num. xxi. 14; and the book of Jasher, Jos. x. 13; 2 Sam. i. 18; seem to have been both written in poetic measures. Many sacred songs we meet with in the Old Testament, scattered both in the historical and prophetical books, penned on particular occasions; which, in the opinion of very competent judges, 'have in them as true and noble strains of poetry and picture as are met with in any other language whatsoever, in spite of all disadvantages from translations into such different tongues and common prose,' Sir W. Temple, p. 329. 'Nay, are nobler examples of the true, sublime style of poetry than any that can be found in the pagan writers. The images are so strong, the thoughts so great, the expressions so divine, and the figures so admirable, bold, and moving, that the wonderful manner of these writers is quite inimitable.' Sir R. Blackmore's Preface to Job. It is fit that what is employed in the service of the sanctuary should be the best in its kind.

The books here put together are poetical. Job is an heroic poem, the book of Psalms a collection of divine odes or lyrics, Solomon's Song a pastoral and an epithalamium; they are poetical, and yet sacred and serious, grave and full of majesty. They have a poetic force and flame, without poetic fury and fiction, and strangely command and move the affections, without corrupting the imagination, or putting a cheat upon it; and while they gratify the ear they edify the mind, and profit the more by pleasing. It is therefore much to be lamented that so powerful an art, which was at first consecrated to the honour of God, and hath been so often employed in his service, should be debauched as it has been, and is at this day, into the service of his enemies—that his corn, and wine, and oil, should be prepared for Baal.

Fifthly. As the manner of the composition of these books is excellent and very proper to engage the attention, move the affections, and fix them in the memory, so the matter is highly useful, and such as will be every way serviceable to us. They have in them the very sum and substance of religion, and what they contain is more fitted to our hand, and made ready for use, than any part of the Old Testament; upon which account, if we may be allowed to compare one star with another in the firmament of the Scripture, these will be reckoned stars of the first magnitude. All Scripture is profitable, and this part of it in a special manner for instruction in doctrine, in devotion, and in the right ordering of the conversation. The book of Job directs us what we are to believe concerning God; the book of Psalms how we are to worship him, pay our homage to him, and maintain our communon with him. And then the book of the Proverbs very particularly shews how we are to govern ourselves, ἐν πάσῃ ἀναστροφῇ,—'in every turn of human life.' Thus shall the man of God, by a due attention to these lights, be perfect, "thoroughly furnished for every good work." And these are placed according to their natural order, as well as according to the order of time; for very fitly are we first led into the knowledge of God, our judgments

Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. The Writings or Scriptures were the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Solomon's Song, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles. We give the books in the order they occupy in ordinary Hebrew Bibles, but there are editions in which the order is somewhat different. Our arrangement of the books proceeds on a different principle. In the first rank we place the historical books according to their chronological position as nearly as possible. In the second place we put what are commonly called the poetical books, to which Mr. Henry's third volume is devoted. Last of all come the books which are substantially prophetical, although some of them were written earlier than some of the other books. It cannot be doubted that our arrangement is more appropriate and more convenient. In the Greek translation the books occupy positions corresponding with those in our Bibles, but with the apocryphal portions inserted at different places after the rightly formed concerning him, and our mistakes rectified; and then instructed how to worship him, and to choose the things that please him. We have here much of natural religion, its principles, its precepts, much of God, his infinite perfections, his relations to man, and his government both of the world and of the church. Here is much of Christ, who is the spring, and soul, and centre of revealed religion, and whom both Job and David were eminent types of, and had clear and happy prospects of. We have here that which will be of use to enlighten our understandings, and to acquaint us more and more with the things of God, with the deep things of God—speculations to entertain the most contemplative, and discoveries to satisfy the most inquisitive, and increase the knowledge of those that are most knowing. Here is that also which with a Divine light will bring into the soul the heat and influence of a Divine fire, will kindle and inflame pious and devout affections, on which wings we may soar upwards, until we enter into the holiest. We may here be in the mount with God, to behold his beauty; and when we come down from that mount, if we retain (as we ought) the impressions of our devotion upon our spirits, and make conscience of doing that good which the Lord our God here requires of us, our faces shall shine before all with whom we converse, who shall take occasion from thence to "glorify our Father which is in heaven," Mat. v. 16. Thus great, thus noble, thus truly excellent is the subject, and thus capable of being improved; which gives me the more reason to be ashamed of the meanness of my performance, that the comment breathes so little of the life and spirit of the text. We often wonder at those that are not at all affected with the great things of God, and have no taste or relish of them, because they know little of them; but perhaps we have more reason to wonder at ourselves, that conversing so frequently, so intimately, with them we are not more affected with them, so as even to be wholly taken up with them, and in a continual transport of delight in the contemplation of them. We hope to be so shortly. In the meantime, though, like the three disciples that were the witnesses of Christ's transfiguration upon the mount, we are but dull and sleepy, yet we can say, Master, "it is good to be here;" here "let us make tabernacles," Lu. ix. 32, 33.

I have nothing here to boast of—nothing at all, but a great deal to be humbled for, that I have not come up to what I have aimed at, in respect of fulness and exactness. In the review of it I find many defects, and those who are critical, perhaps, will meet with some mistakes in it; but I have done it with what care I could, and desire to be thankful to God who by his grace has carried me on in his work thus far: let that grace have all the glory, Phil. ii. 13, which "works in us both to will and to do" whatever we will or do that is good, or serves any good purpose. What is from God will, I trust, be to him, will be graciously accepted by him, "according to what a man has, and not according to what he has not," and will be of some use to his church; and what is from myself (that is, all the defects and errors,) will, I trust, be favourably passed by and pardoned. That prayer of St. Austin is mine, Domine Deus, quæcunque dixi in his libris de tuo, agnoscant et tui; et quæ de meo, et tu ignosce et tui,—'Lord God, whatever I have maintained in these books correspondent with what is contained in thine, grant that thy people may approve as well as thyself; whatever is but the doctrine of my book forgive thou, and grant that thy people may forgive it also.' I must beg likewise to own, to the honour of our great Master, that I have found the work to be its own wages, and that the more we converse with the word of God the more it is to us as the honey and the honeycomb, Ps. xix. 10. In gathering some gleanings of this harvest for others we may feast ourselves; and, when we are enabled by the grace of God to do so, we are best qualified to feed others. I was much pleased with a passage I lately met with of Erasmus, that great scholar and celebrated wit, in an epistle dedicatory before his book De Ratione Concionandi, where, as one weary of the world and the hurry of it, he expresses an earnest desire to spend the rest of his days in secret communion with Jesus Christ, encouraged by his gracious invitation to those who "labour and are heavy laden to come unto him for rest," Mat. xi. 28; and this alone is that which he thinks will yield him true satisfaction. I think his words worth transcribing, and such as deserve to be inserted among the testimonies of great men to serious godliness. Neque quisquam facile credat quam misere animus jamdudum affectet ab his laboribus in tranquillam otium secedere, quodque superest vitæ, (superest autem vix brevis palmus sive pugillus,) solum cum eo solo colloqui, qui clamavit olim, (nec hodie mutat vocem suam,) "Venite ad me, omnes qui laboratis et onerati estis, ego reficiam vos;" quandoquidem in tam turbulento, ne dicam furente, sæculo, in tot molestiis quas vel ipsa tempora publice invehunt, vel privatim adfert ætas ac valetudo, nihil reperio in quo mens mea libentius conquiescat quam in hoc arcano colloquio,—'No one will easily believe how anxiously, for a long time past, I have wished to retire from these labours into a scene of tranquillity, and, during the remainder of life, (dwindled, it is true, to the shortest span,) to converse only with him who once cried, (nor does he now retract,) "Come unto me, all you that labour and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you;" for in this turbulent, not to say furious, age, the many public sources of disquietude, connected with the infirmities of advancing age, leave no solace to my mind to be compared with this secret communion.' In the pleasing contemplation of the Divine beauty and benignity we hope to spend a blessed eternity, and therefore in this work it is good to spend as much as may be of our time.

One volume more, containing the prophetical books, will finish the Old Testament, if the Lord continue my life, and leisure, and ability of mind and body for this work. It is begun, and I find it will be larger than any of the other volumes, and longer in the doing; but, as God by his grace shall furnish me for it and assist me in it, (without which grace I am nothing, less than nothing, worse than nothing,) it shall be carried on with all convenient speed; and sat cito, si sat bene,—'if with sufficient ability, it will be with sufficient speed.' I desire the prayers of my friends that God would "minister seed to the sower," and "bread to the eaters," Isa. lv. 10; that he would "multiply the seed sown," and "increase the fruits of our righteousness," 2 Cor. ix. 10; that so he who "sows and those who reap may rejoice together," Jno. iv. 36; and the great Lord of the harvest shall have the glory of all.

Books of Chronicles. Of these apocrypha it is not needful to say much. They are not found in any copy of the Hebrew original. It is very doubtful when they found their way into the Greek Scriptures, and by whom they were added. The Jews agree with the Protestants in not accepting them as part of the Holy Scriptures.

Among the authors referred to in the foregoing Preface there are some respecting which the ordinary reader may be glad of the following data:—

Maimonides was a great Jewish writer, whose expositions of Hebrew laws, traditions, and customs are still held in very high esteem. He was born at Cordova in 1139, and died in Egypt in 1209.

John Smith, an able divine, who was born in 1618, studied at Cambridge, and died in 1652. His "Discourses" included one on prophecy, which was very much admired and translated into Latin.

John Henry Hottinger, a most learned Swiss divine, was born in 1620 and died in 1667. His fame rests chiefly on his Oriental scholarship.

John Gaspar Suicer, another learned Swiss Protestant, was born at Zurich in 1620, and died in 1684. His "Thesaurus," the text of which is Latin, is still very valuable to the expositor and controversialist.

Sir William Temple, famous in politics as well as in literature, was born in 1628 and died in 1698. His merits do not appear to be equal to his reputation, and his writings are now but little read.

Sir Richard Blackmore, who was once very much thought of, but whose poems have fallen into neglect, was born in 1668 and died in 1729.

Desiderius Erasmus, confessedly one of the most extraordinary and many-sided men of his age, was born at Rotterdam in 1467, and after an eventful life died at Basle in 1536. He never professed the Reformed faith. His Greek Testament, the first ever published, and many of his other literary labours, promoted in a very marked manner the views and aims of the Reformers. His little book, "De Ratione Concionandi," tended to introduce a higher style of preaching than had been sadly too common.

Joannes Damascenus died in or about the year 750 A.D. He wrote a good deal, engaged in controversy, and favoured image worship.

Gregory Nazianzen was born in Cappadocia, and died in A.D. 389. He was a great and excellent writer, one of the most important of the Greek Fathers.

Amphilochius of Iconium, another eminent Greek writer, died towards the end of the fourth century. His writings are mostly in prose.

Epiphanius, a learned Greek Christian of the fourth century, wrote various valuable books, some of which are useful to students even now.

Cyril of Jerusalem, so called because he became bishop of that city about A.D. 350, wrote some books which were principally for religious instruction.

Polychronius was a Syrian, of no great excellence as a writer, though he is praised as a man of wonderful virtue and a worker of miracles. He died about A.D. 440.

Austin, the great Augustin of Hippo, in Africa, who died in A.D. 430, is meant by Mr. Henry, and not the Romish missionary of the same name, 200 years later.

AN EXPOSITION

THE BOOK OF JOB,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

THIS book of Job stands by itself, is not connected with any other, and is, therefore, to be considered alone. Many copies of the Hebrew Bible place it after the book of Psalms, and some after the Proverbs, which, perhaps, has given occasion to some learned men to imagine it to be written by Isaiah, or some of the later prophets; but, as the subject appears to have been much more ancient, so we have no reason to think but the composure of the book was, and that, therefore, it is most fitly placed first in this collection of Divine morals: also, being doctrinal, it is proper to precede and introduce the book of Psalms, which is devotional, and the book of Proverbs, which is practical; for how shall we worship or obey a God we know not? As to this book,

I. We are sure it is given by inspiration of God, though we are not certain who was the penman of it. The Jews, though no friends to Job, because he was a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, yet, as faithful conservators of the oracles of God committed to them, always retained this book in their sacred canon. The history is referred to by one apostle, Jas. v. 11, and one passage, ch. v. 13, quoted by another apostle, with the usual form of quoting Scripture, "It is written," 1 Cor. iii. 19. It is the opinion of many of the ancients that this history was written by Moses himself, in Midian, and delivered to his suffering brethren in Egypt, for their support and comfort under their burthens, and the encouragement of their hope that God would in due time deliver and enrich them, as he did this patient sufferer. Some conjecture that it was written originally in Arabic, and afterwards translated into Hebrew, for the use of the Jewish church, by Solomon, (saith M. Jurieu,) or some other inspired writer. It seems most probable to me that Elihu was the penman of it, at least of the discourses, because, ch. xxxii. 15, 16, he mingles the words of an historian with those of a disputant. But Moses perhaps wrote the first two chapters and the last, to give light to the discourses, for in them God is frequently called Jehovah, but not in all the discourses, except once, ch. xii. 9, and that name was but little known to the patriarchs before Moses, Ex. vi. 3. If Job wrote it himself, some of the Jewish writers themselves own him a prophet among the Gentiles; if Elihu, we find he had a spirit of prophecy, which filled him with matter, and constrained him, ch. xxxii. 18.

II. We are sure it is, for the substance of it, a true history, and not a romance, though the dialogues be poetical. No doubt there was such a man as Job; the prophet Ezekiel names him with Noah and Daniel, Eze. xiv. 14. The narrative we have here of his prosperity and piety, his strange afflictions and exemplary patience, the substance of his conferences with his friends, and God's discourse with him out of the whirlwind, with his return at length to a very prosperous condition, no doubt, is exactly true, though the inspired penman be allowed the usual liberty of putting the matter of which Job and his friends discoursed into his own words.

III. We are sure it is very ancient, though we cannot fix the precise time, either when Job lived or when the book was written. So many, so evident, are its hoary hairs, the marks of its antiquity, that we have reason to think it of equal date with the book of Genesis itself, and that holy Job was contemporary with Isaac and Jacob; though not co-heir with them of the promise of the earthly Canaan, yet a joint-expectant with them of the better country, that is, the heavenly. Probably he was of the posterity of Nahor, Abraham's brother, whose firstborn was Uz, Gen. xxii. 21, and in whose family religion was for some ages kept up, as appears Gen. xxxi. 53, where God is called, not only the God of Abraham, but the God of Nahor. He lived before the age of man was shortened to seventy or eighty, as it was in Moses' time; before sacrifices were confined to one altar; before the general apostacy of the nations from the knowledge and worship of the true God, and while yet there was no other idolatry known but only the worship of the sun and moon, and that punished by the judges, ch. xxxi. 26, 28. He lived while God was known by the name of God Almighty more than by the name of Jehovah, for he is called Shaddai, the Almighty, above thirty times in this book. He lived while Divine knowledge was conveyed, not by writing, but by tradition, for to that appeals are here made, ch. v. 1; viii. 8; xv. 18; xxi. 29; and we have, therefore, reason to think he lived before Moses, because here is no mention at all of the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, or the giving of the law. There is indeed one passage which might be made to allude to the drowning of Pharaoh, ch. xxvi. 12, "He divideth the sea with his power, and by his understanding he smiteth through Rahab," which name Egypt is very frequently called by in Scripture, as Ps. lxxxvii. 4; lxxxix. 10; Isa. li. 9; but that may as well refer to the proud waves of the sea. We conclude, therefore that we are here got back to the patriarchal age, and, besides its authority, we receive this book with veneration for its antiquity.

Note.—The remarks made above may suffice rather to indicate the literary problems surrounding this book than to solve them. With regard to its author we know nothing beyond the many conjectures which have been made by men, but which leave us where we began. The book is anonymous, and we know neither who wrote it nor where it was written. An ancient opinion is that Moses wrote it, but a critical examination of the Hebrew shows that its author did not write the Pentateuch. Some have thought it was written before the time of Moses, and others place it in every following age down to the captivity of Babylon. Such diversity forbids us to be positive. With regard to the form of the book, it is mainly poetic, and altogether dramatic; its construction is exceedingly skilful, and yet easily traced. Speaking generally, we believe the book to be a very ancient one, and to have emanated from some one well acquainted with Arab modes of life.

i. 1. The following appears at the head of some of the copies of

IV. We are sure it is of great use to the church, and to every good Christian, though there are many passages in it dark and hard to be understood. We cannot, perhaps, be confident of the true meaning of every Arabic word and phrase we meet with in it. It is a book that finds a great deal of work for the critics; but enough is plain to make the whole profitable, and it was all written for our learning. This noble poem presents to us, in very clear and lively characters, these five things among others: 1. A monument of primitive theology. The first and great principles of the light of nature, on which natural religion is founded, are here, in a warm, and long, and learned dispute, not only taken for granted on all sides, and not the least doubt made of them, but, by common consent, plainly laid down as eternal truths, illustrated and urged as affecting, commanding truths. Was ever the being of God, his glorious attributes and perfections, his unsearchable wisdom, his irresistible power, his inconceivable glory, his inflexible justice, and his incontestable sovereignty, discoursed of with more clearness fulness, reverence, and Divine eloquence, than in this book? The creation of the world, and the government of it, are here admirably described, not as matters of nice speculation, but as laying most powerful obligations upon us to fear and serve, to submit to, and trust in, our Creator, Owner, Lord, and Ruler. Moral good and evil, virtue and vice, were never drawn more to the life,—the beauty of the one and the deformity of the other,—than in this book; nor the inviolable rule of God's judgment more plainly laid down, that happy are the righteous, it shall be well with them, and woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with them. These are not questions of the schools to keep the learned world in action, nor engines of state to keep the unlearned world in awe; no, it appears by this book they are sacred truths of undoubted certainty, and which all the wise and sober part of mankind have in every age subscribed and submitted to. 2. It presents us with a specimen of Gentile piety. This great saint descended probably, not from Abraham, but Nahor; or if from Abraham, not from Isaac, but from one of the sons of the concubines, that were sent into the east country, Gen. xxv. 6; or, if from Isaac, yet not from Jacob, but Esau; so that he was out of the pale of the covenant of peculiarity,—no Israelite, no proselyte,—and yet none like him for religion, nor such a favourite of Heaven upon this earth. It was a truth, therefore, before St. Peter perceived it, that "in every nation, he that fears God and works righteousness, is accepted of him," Acts x. 35. There were children of God scattered abroad, Jno. xi. 53, besides the incorporated children of the kingdom, Mat. viii. 11, 12. 3. It presents us with an exposition of the book of providence, and a clear and satisfactory solution of many of the difficult and obscure passages of it. The prosperity of the wicked, and the afflictions of the righteous, have always been reckoned two as hard chapters as any in that book; but they are here expounded, and reconciled with the Divine wisdom, purity, and goodness, by the end of these things. 4. It presents us with a great example of patience, and close adherence to God in the midst of the sorest calamities. Sir Richard Blackmore's most ingenious pen, in his excellent preface to his paraphrase on this book, makes Job a hero proper for an epic poem; for, saith he, 'he appears brave in distress and valiant in affliction, maintains his virtue, and, with that, his character, under the most exasperating provocations that the malice of hell could invent, and thereby gives a most noble example of passive fortitude, a character no way inferior to that of the active hero,' &c. 5. It presents us with an illustrious type of Christ, the particulars of which we shall endeavour to take notice of as we go along. In general, Job was a great sufferer, was emptied and humbled, but in order to his greater glory. So Christ abased himself that we might be exalted. The learned Bishop Patrick quotes St. Jerome more than once speaking of Job as a type of Christ, who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, who was persecuted for a time by men and devils, and seemed forsaken of God too, but was raised up to be an intercessor even for his friends that had added affliction to his misery. When the apostle speaks of the patience of Job, he immediately takes notice of the end of the Lord, that is, of the Lord Jesus (as some understand it) typified by Job, Jas. v. 11.

In the book we have, I. The history of Job's sufferings, and his patience under them, ch. i., ii., not without a mixture of human frailty, ch. iii. II. A dispute between him and his friends upon them, in which, 1. The opponents were Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar. 2. The respondent was Job. 3. The moderators were, 1st. Elihu, ch. xxxii.—xxxvii.; 2nd. God himself, ch. xxxviii.—xli. III. The issue of all in Job's honour and prosperity, ch. xlii. Upon the whole we learn, that many are the afflictions of the righteous, but when the Lord delivereth them out of all, the trial of their faith will be found to praise, and honour and glory.

CHAPTER I.

The history of Job begins here with an account, I. Of his great piety in general, ver. 1; and in a particular instance, ver. 5. II. Of his great prosperity, ver. 2—4. III. Of the malice of Satan against him, and the permission he obtained to try his constancy, ver. 6—12. IV. Of the surprising troubles that befel him, the ruin of his estate, ver. 13—17; and the death of his children, ver. 18, 19. V. Of his exemplary patience and piety under these troubles, ver. 20—22. In all which he is set forth for an example of suffering affliction, from which no prosperity can secure us, but through which integrity and uprightness will preserve us.

THERE was a man in the land of Uz, whose name was Job; and that man was perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and eschewed evil. 2 And there were born unto him seven sons and three daughters. 3 His substance also was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels, and five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she asses, and a very great household; so that this man was the greatest of all the men of the east.

Concerning Job we are here told,

First. That he was a man, therefore subject to like passions as we are; he was Ish, a worthy man, a man of note and eminency; a magistrate, a man in authority. The country he lived in was the land of Uz, in the eastern part of Arabia, which lay towards Chaldea, near Euphrates, probably not far from Ur of the Chaldees, whence Abram was called. When God called one good man out of that country, yet he left not himself without witness, but raised up another in it to be a preacher of righteousness. God has his remnant in all places, sealed ones out of every nation, as well as out of every tribe of Israel, Rev. vii. 9. It was the privilege of the land of Uz to have so good a man as Job in it; now it was Arabia the happy indeed; and it was the praise of Job that he was so eminently good in so bad a place. The worse others were round about him, the better he was. His name, Job, or Jjob, some say, signifies one hated, and counted as an enemy; others make it to signify one that grieves or groans. Thus the sorrow he carried in his name might be a check to his joy in his prosperity. Dr. Cave derives it from jaab, to love, or desire; intimating how welcome his birth was to his parents, and how much he was the desire of their eyes, and yet there was a time when he cursed the day of his birth. Who can tell what the day may prove which yet begins with a bright morning?

Secondly. That he was a very good man, eminently pious, and better than his neighbours. He "was perfect and upright." This is intended to shew us not only what reputation he had among men, that he was generally taken for an honest man, but what was really his character, for it is the judgment of God concerning him, and we are sure that is according to truth. 1. Job was a religious man, one that feared God; that is, worshipped him according to his will, and governed himself by the rules of the Divine law in every thing. 2. He was sincere in his religion. He was perfect, not sinless; he himself owns, ch. ix. 20, "If I say, I am perfect, I shall be proved perverse." But having a respect to all God's commandments, aiming at perfection, he was really as good as he seemed to be, and did not dissemble in his profession of piety; his heart was sound, and his eye single. Sincerity is gospel perfection; I know no religion without it. 3. He was upright in his dealings both with God and man; was faithful to his promises, steady in his counsels, true to every trust reposed in him, and made conscience of all he said and did: see Isa. xxxiii. 15. Though he was not of Israel, he was indeed an Israelite without guile. 4. The fear of God reigning in his heart was the principle that governed his whole conversation. That made him perfect and upright, inward and entire for God, universal and uniform in religion; that kept him close and constant to his duty. He feared God, had a reverence for his majesty, a regard to his authority, and a dread of his wrath. 5. He dreaded the thought of doing an ill thing. With the utmost abhorrence and detestation, and with a constant care and watchfulness, he eschewed evil, avoided all appearances of sin, and approaches to it, and this, "because of the fear of God," Neh. v. 15. "The fear of the Lord is to hate evil," Pr. viii. 13; and then "by the fear of the Lord men depart from evil," Pr. xvi. 6.

Thirdly. That he was a man who prospered greatly in this world, and made a mighty figure in his country. He was prosperous and yet pious. Though it is hard and rare, it is not impossible, for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven. With God even this is possible; and by his grace the temptations of worldly wealth are not insuperable. He was pious, and his piety was a friend to his prosperity; for godliness has the promise of the life that now is. He was prosperous, and his prosperity put a lustre upon his piety, and gave him that was so good so much greater opportunity of doing good. The acts of his piety were grateful returns to God for the instances of his prosperity; and in the abundance of the good things God gave him he served God the more cheerfully.

1. He had a numerous family. Eminent for religion, and yet not a hermit, not a recluse; but the father and master of a family. It is an instance of his prosperity, that his house was filled with children, which are a heritage of the Lord, and his reward, Ps. cxxvii. 3. He had seven sons and three daughters, ver. 2; some of each sex, and more of the more noble sex, in which the family is built up. Children must be looked upon as blessings, for so they are, especially to good people that will give them good instructions, and set them good examples, and put up good prayers for them. Job had many children, and yet he was neither oppressive nor uncharitable, but very liberal to the poor, ch. xxxi. 17, &c. Those that have great families to provide for ought to consider that which is prudently given in alms is set out to the best interest, and put into the best fund for their children's benefit.

2. He had a good estate for the support of his family. His substance was considerable, ver. 3. Riches are called substance, in conformity to the common form of speaking; otherwise, to the soul and another world, they are but shadows, things that are not, Pr. xxiii. 5. It is only in heavenly wisdom that we inherit substance, Pr. viii. 21. In those days, when the earth was not fully peopled, it was as now in some of the plantations, men might have land enough upon easy terms, if they had but wherewithal to stock it; and, therefore, Job's substance is described not by the acres of land he was lord of, but,

1st. By his cattle—sheep and camels, oxen and asses. The numbers of each are here set down, probably not the exact number, but thereabout, a very few under or over. The sheep are put first, because of most use in the family; as Solomon observes, Pr. xxvii. 23, 26, 27, lambs for thy clothing, and milk for the food of thy household. Job, it is likely, had silver and gold as well as Abraham, Gen. xiii. 2; but then men valued their own and their neighbours' estates by that which was for service and present use, more than by that which was for show and state, and fit only to be hoarded. As soon as God had made the Latin Vulgate:—"Job dwelt in the land of Ausitis, on the borders of Idumea and Arabia; and his name was aforetime Jobab. And he married a wife, an Arab woman, and had a son whom he called Ennon. Now he was himself the son of Zareth, a son of the sons of Esau, but his mother was Bosra; so that he was the fifth from Abraham. And these are the kings who reigned in Edom, wherein also he himself reigned; but Balach son of Beor first reigned therein, and the name of the city was Nachabe; after him Balach; after him Jobab, who is called Job; after Job was Cusram, a duke from the region of the Temanites; after him reigned Adar, son of Beath, who slew Midian in the plain of Moab, and the name of his city was Chetheavith." Similar traditions appear at the end of the Greek and Arabic versions, but their only value is as pointing to the popular belief that Job was a real character, lived at a remote date, and dwelt to the south-east or east of Judea. The popularity of this book may be inferred from the fact that it was not only read in mar., and provided for his maintenance by the herbs and fruits he made him rich and great, by giving him dominion over the creatures, Gen. i. 28; that, therefore, being still continued to man, notwithstanding his defection, Gen. ix. 2, is still to be reckoned one of the most considerable instances of men's wealth, honour, and power, Ps. viii. 6.

2nd. By his servants. He had a very great household, or husbandry; many that were employed for him, and maintained by him. And thus he both had honour and did good; yet thus he was involved in a great deal of care, and put to a great deal of charge. See the vanity of this world! "as goods are increased" they must be increased that tend them, and occupy them; and "they will be increased that eat them; and what good has the owner thereof save the beholding of them with his eyes?" Eccl. v. 11.

In a word, Job "was the greatest of all the men of the east," and they the richest in the world. Those were rich indeed who were replenished more than the east, Isa. ii. 6, margin. Job's wealth, with his wisdom, entitled him to that honour and power he h d in his country, which he describes, ch. xxix., and made him sit chief. Job was upright and honest, and yet grew rich, nay, therefore grew rich; for honesty is the best policy, and piety and charity ordinarily the surest ways of thriving. He had a great household, and much business, and yet kept up the fear and worship of God, and he and his house served the Lord. The account of Job's piety and prosperity comes before the history of his great afflictions, to shew that neither will secure us from the common, no, nor from the uncommon, calamities of human life. Piety will not secure us, as Job's mistaken friends thought; for all things come alike to all. Prosperity will not, as a careless world thinks, Isa. xlvii. 8; "I sit as a queen, and therefore shall see no sorrow."

4 And his sons went and feasted in their houses, every one his day; and sent and called for their three sisters to eat and to drink with them. 5 And it was so, when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them, and rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt offerings according to the number of them all: for Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. Thus did Job continually.

We have here a farther account of Job's prosperity, and his piety.

First. His great comfort in his children is taken notice of as an instance of his prosperity; for our temporal comforts are borrowed, depend upon others, and are as those about us are. Job himself mentions it as one of the greatest joys of his prosperous estate, that his children were about him, ch. xxix. 5. And they kept a circular feast at some certain times, ver. 4; they "went and feasted in their houses." It was a comfort to this good man, 1. To see his children grown up and settled in the world; all his sons were in houses of their own, probably married; and to each of them he had given a competent portion to set up with. They that had been olive plants round his table were removed to tables of their own. 2. To see them thrive in their affairs, and able to feast one another, as well as to feed themselves. Good parents desire, promote, and rejoice in their children's wealth and prosperity as their own. 3. To see them in health, no sickness in their houses: for that would have spoiled their feasting, and turned it into mourning. 4. Especially to see them live in love and unity, and mutual good affection; no jars or quarrels among them, no strangeness, no shyness one of another, no strait-handedness; but, though every one knew his own, they lived with as much freedom as if th y had had all in common. It is comfortable to the hearts of parents, and comely in the eyes of all, to see brethren thus knit together; "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is!" Ps. cxxxiii. 1. 5. It added to the comfort to see the brothers so kind to their sisters that they sent for them to feast with them; who were so modest that they would not have gone if they had not been sent for. Those brothers that slight their sisters, care not for their company, and have no concern for their comfort, are ill-bred and ill-natured, and very unlike Job's sons. It seems their feast was so sober and decent, that their sisters were good company for them at it. 6. They feasted in their own houses, not in public houses, where they would be more exposed to temptations, and which was not so creditable.

We do not find that Job himself feasted with them. Doubtless they invited him, and he would have been the most welcome guest at any of their tables; nor was it from any sourness or moroseness of temper, or for want of natural affection that he kept away, but he was old and dead to those things, like Barzillai, 2 Sam. xix. 35, and considered that the young people would be more free and pleasant if there were none but themselves. Yet he would not restrain his children from the diversion which he denied himself. Young people may be allowed a youthful liberty, provided they flee youthful lusts.

Secondly. His great care about his children is taken notice of, as an instance of his piety; for that we are really which we are relatively. Those that are good will be good to their children, and especially do what they can for the good of their souls. Observe, ver. 5, Job's pious concern for the spiritual welfare of his children.

1. He was jealous over them with a godly jealousy; and so we ought to be over ourselves, and those that are dearest to us, as far as is necessary to our care and endeavour for their good. Job had given his children good education; had comfort in them, and good hope concerning them, and yet he said, "It may be my sons have sinned" in the days of their feasting more than at other times, have been too merry, have taken too great a liberty in eating and drinking, "and have cursed God in their hearts;" that is, have entertained atheistical, profane thoughts in their minds, unworthy notions of God and his providence, and the exercises of religion. When they were full, they were ready to deny God, and to say, "Who is the Lord?" Pr. xxx. 9; to forget God, and to say, The power of our hand has gotten us this wealth, Deu. viii. 12, &c. Nothing alienates the mind more from God than the indulgence of the flesh.

2. As soon as the days of their feasting were over, he called them to the solemn exercises of religion; not while their feasting lasted,—let them take their time for that, there is a time for all things,—but when it was over, their good father minded them that they must know when to take up, and not think to fare sumptuously every day. Though they had their days of feasting the week round, they must not think to have them the year round; they had something else to do. Note, Those that are merry must find a time to be serious.

3. He sent to them to prepare for solemn ordinances,—sent and sanctified them; ordered them to examine their own consciences, and repent of what they had done amiss in their feasting; to lay aside their vanity, and compose themselves for religious exercises. Thus he kept his authority over them for their good, and they submitted to it, though they were got into houses of their own. Still he was the priest of the family; and at his altar they all attended, valuing their share in his prayers more than their share in his estate. Parents cannot give grace to their children, it is God that sanctifies; but they ought by seasonable admonitions and counsels to further their sanctification. In their baptism they were sanctified to God; let it be our desire and endeavour that they may be sanctified for him.

4. He offered sacrifice for them, both to atone for the sins he feared they had been guilty of in the days of their feasting, and to implore for them mercy to pardon, and grace to prevent the debauching of their minds, and corrupting of their manners by the liberty they had taken, and to preserve their piety and purity.

> For he with mournful eyes had often spied,
> Scatter'd on pleasure's smooth but treacherous tide,
> The spoils of virtue, overpower'd by sense,
> And floating wrecks of ruin'd innocence.—Sir R. Blackmore.

Job, like Abraham, had an altar for his family, on which, it is likely, he offered sacrifice daily; but on this extraordinary occasion he offered more sacrifices than usual, and with more solemnity, according to the number of them all,—one for each child. Parents should be particular in their addresses to God for the several branches of their family; "For this child I prayed," according to its particular temper, genius, and condition; to which the prayers, as well as the endeavours, must be accommodated.

When these sacrifices were to be offered, 1st. He rose early, as one in care that his children might not lie long under guilt, and as one whose heart was upon his work, and his desire toward it. 2nd. He required his children to attend the sacrifice, that they might join with him in the prayers he offered with the sacrifice; that the sight of the killing of the sacrifice might humble them much for their sins, for which they deserved to die, and the sight of the offering of it up might lead them to a Mediator. And this serious work would help to make them serious again after the days of their gaiety.

Lastly. This he did continually; not only whenever an occasion of this kind recurred,—for he that is washed needs to wash his feet, Jno. xiii. 10: the acts of repentance and faith must be often renewed, because we often repeat our transgressions,—but all days, every day, he offered up his sacrifices, was constant to his devotions, and did not omit them any day. The occasional exercises of religion will not excuse us from those that are stated. He that serves God uprightly will serve him continually.

6 Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the LORD, and Satan came also among them. 7 And the LORD said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the LORD, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it. 8 And the LORD said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil? 9 Then Satan answered the LORD, and said, Doth Job fear God for nought? 10 Hast not thou made an hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land. 11 But put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face. 12 And the LORD said unto Satan, Behold, all that he hath is in thy power; only upon himself put not forth thine hand. So Satan went forth from the presence of the LORD.

Job was not only so rich and great, but withal so wise and good, and had such an interest both in heaven and earth, that one would think the mountain of his prosperity stood so strong that it could not be moved; but here we have a thick cloud gathering over his head, pregnant with a horrible tempest. We must never think ourselves secure from storms while we are in this lower region.

Before we are told how his troubles surprised and seized him here in this visible world, we are here told how they were concerted in the world of spirits. That the devil, having a great enmity to Job for his eminent piety, begged and obtained leave to torment him. It doth not at all derogate from the credibility of Job's story in general, to allow that this discourse between God and Satan in these verses is parabolical, like that of Micaiah, 1 Kin. xxii. 19, and an allegory designed to represent the malice of the devil against good men, and the Divine check and restraint that malice is under; only thus much farther is intimated, that the affairs of this earth are very much the subject of the counsels of the unseen world. That world is dark to us, but we lie very open to it. Now here we have,

First. Satan among the sons of God, ver. 6; an adversary, so Satan signifies, to God, to men, to all good. He thrust into an assembly of the sons of God that came to present themselves before the Lord. This means either, 1. A meeting of the saints on earth; professors of religion in the patriarchal age were called sons of God, Gen. vi. 2; they had then religious assemblies and stated times for them. The king came in to see his guests; the eye of God was on all present. But there was a serpent in Paradise, a Satan among the sons of God; when they come together, he is among them to distract and disturb them, stands at their right hand to resist them; "The Lord rebuke thee, Satan!" Or, 2. A meeting of the angels in heaven; they are the sons of God, Job xxxviii. 7. They came to give an account of their negociations on earth, and to receive new instructions. Satan was one of them originally, but "How Hebrew and in Greek, but in Arabic and Syriac, and other languages, in the time of Jerome. With regard to the land of Uz, we have seen it called Ausitis in the above extract. Many have adopted the opinion of Gesenius that Uz was in the northern part of Arabia Deserta, and between Palestine and the Euphrates. Others again have thought Uz in Edom; and others, that it was in the neighbourhood of Damascus. We have not space to enumerate the arguments here, but the first-mentioned opinion seems the most probable.

i. 3. Job's wealth mainly consisted in cattle, as has always been the case in the regions in which he is supposed to have lived. The term "men of the east," literally "sons of the east," was employed as a general appellation for the Arab tribes and their neighbours.

i. 5. The offering of sacrifices by Job is indicative of patriarchal manners, when the head of the family officiated as its priest. The peculiar phrase for "cursed God" will be considered at chap. ii. 9.

art thou fallen, O Lucifer!" He shall no more stand in that congregation, yet he is here represented as coming among them, either summoned to appear as a criminal, or connived at for the present, though an intruder.

Secondly. His examination, how he came thither; ver. 7, "The Lord said unto Satan, Whence comest thou?" He knew very well whence he came, and with what design he came thither, that, as the good angels came to do good, he came for a permission to do hurt; but he would, by calling him to an account, shew him that he was under check and control. "Whence comest thou?" He asks this, 1. As wondering what brought him thither. "Is Saul among the prophets!" Satan among the sons of God! Yes; for he transforms himself into an angel of light, 2 Cor. xi. 13, 14, and would seem one of them. Note, It is possible a man may be a child of the devil, and yet be found in the assemblies of the sons of God in this world; and there may pass undiscovered by men, and yet be challenged by the all-seeing God; "Friend, how camest thou in hither?" Or, 2. As inquiring what he had been doing before he came thither. The same question was perhaps put to the rest of them that presented themselves before the Lord, Whence came you? We are accountable to God for all our haunts, and all the ways we traverse.

Thirdly. The account he gives of himself, and the tour he had made. I come, saith he, "from going to and fro in the earth." 1. He could not pretend he had been doing any good, could give no such account of himself as the sons of God could that presented themselves before the Lord, who came from executing his orders, serving the interests of his kingdom, and ministering to the heirs of salvation. 2. He would not own he had been doing any hurt; that he had been drawing men from their allegiance to God, deceiving and destroying souls; no, "I have done no wickedness," Pr. xxx. 20; "Thy servant went no whither." In saying he had walked to and fro through the earth he intimates that he had kept himself within the bounds allotted him, and had not transgressed his tether; for the dragon is cast out into the earth, Rev. xii. 9, and not yet confined to his place of torment. While we are on this earth we are within his reach; and with so much subtilty, swiftness, and industry, doth he penetrate into all the corners of it, that we cannot be in any place secure from his temptations. 3. He yet seems to give some representation of his own character. 1st. Perhaps it is spoken proudly, and with an air of haughtiness, as if he were indeed the prince of this world, as if the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them were his, Lu. iv. 6, and he had now been walking in circuit through his own territories. 2nd. Perhaps it is spoken fretfully, and with discontent. He had been walking to and fro and could find no rest, but was as much a fugitive and a vagabond as Cain in the land of Nod. 3rd. Perhaps it is spoken carefully; I have been hard at work, going to and fro; or, as some read it, searching about in the earth; really in quest of an opportunity to do mischief. He walks about seeking whom he may devour. It concerns us therefore to be sober and vigilant.

Fourthly. The question God puts to him concerning Job; ver. 8, "Hast thou considered my servant Job?" As when we meet with one that has been in a distant place, where we have a friend we dearly love, we are ready to ask, You have been in such a place, pray did you see my friend there? Observe,

1. How honourably God speaks of Job; He is my servant. Good men are God's servants; and he is pleased to reckon himself honoured in their services, and that they are to him for a name and a praise, Jer. xiii. 11; and a crown of glory, Isa. lxii. 3. Yonder is my servant Job, there is none like him, none I value like him of all the princes and potentates of the earth; one such saint as he is worth them all: none like him for uprightness and serious piety; many do well, but he excelleth them all; there is not to be found such great faith, no, not in Israel. Thus Christ long after boasted of the centurion, and the woman of Canaan, who were both of them, like Job, strangers to that commonwealth. The saints glory in God; Who is like thee among the gods? And he is pleased to glory in them; Who is like Israel among the people? So here, none like Job, none in earth, that state of imperfection. Those in heaven do indeed far outshine him; those who are least in that kingdom are greater than he. But on earth there is not his like; there is none like him in that land. So some good men are the glory of their country.

2. How closely he gives to Satan this good character of Job. "Hast thou set thy heart to my servant Job?" Designing hereby, 1st. To aggravate the apostacy and misery of that wicked spirit; How unlike him art thou? Note, The holiness and happiness of the saints is the shame and torment of the devil and the devil's children. 2nd. To answer the devil's seeming boasts of the interest he had in this earth; I have been walking to and fro in it, saith he, and it is all my own. All flesh have corrupted their way; they all sit still, and are at rest in their sins, Zec. i. 10, 11. Nay, hold, saith God; Job is my faithful servant. Satan may boast, but he shall not triumph. 3rd. To anticipate his accusations; as much as to say, Satan, I know thine errand, thou art come to inform against Job, but hast thou considered him? Doth not his unquestionable character give thee the lie? Note, God knows all the malice of the devil and his instruments against his servants; and we have an advocate ready to appear for us, even before we are accused.

Fifthly. The devil's base insinuation against Job, in answer to God's encomium of him. He cannot deny but that Job feared God, but suggests that he was mercenary in his religion, and therefore a hypocrite; ver. 9, "Doth Job fear God for nought?" Observe, 1. How impatient the devil was of hearing Job praised, though it was God himself that praised him. Those are like the devil who cannot endure any body should be praised but themselves, but grudge at the just share of reputation others have, as Saul, 1 Sam. xviii. 5, and the Pharisees, Mat. xxi. 5. 2. How far he was to seek for something to object against him; he could not accuse him of any thing that was ill, and therefore chargeth him with by-ends in doing good. Had the one half of that been true which his angry friends, in the heat of dispute, charged him with, ch. xv. 4; xxii. 5, Satan would no doubt have brought it against him now; but no such thing could be alleged, and therefore, 3. See how slily he censures him as a hypocrite, not asserting that he was so, but only asking, Is he not so? which is the common way of slanderers, to suggest that by way of query which yet they have no reason to think is true: whisperers, backbiters. Note, It is not strange if those that are approved and accepted of God be unjustly censured by the devil and his instruments; and if they are otherwise unexceptionable, it is easy to charge them with hypocrisy, as Satan charged Job, and they have no way to clear themselves, but patiently to wait for the judgment of God. As there is nothing we should dread more than being hypocrites, so there is nothing we need dread less than being called and counted so without cause. 4. How unjustly he accuseth him as mercenary, to prove him a hypocrite. It was a great truth that Job did not fear God for nought; he got well by it, for godliness is great gain: but it was a false lie that he would not have feared God if he had not got this by it, as the event proved. Job's friends charged him with hypocrisy because he was greatly afflicted; Satan, because he greatly prospered. It is no hard matter for those to calumniate that seek an occasion. It is not mercenary to look at the eternal recompence in our obedience; but to aim at temporal advantages in our religion, and to make it subservient to that, is spiritual idolatry, worshipping the creature more than the Creator, and is likely to end in a fatal apostacy. Men cannot long serve God and mammon.

Sixthly. The complaint Satan made of Job's prosperity, ver. 10. Observe, 1. What God had done for Job. He had protected him, made a hedge about him, for the defence of his person, his family, and all his possessions. Note, God's peculiar people are taken under his special protection, they, and all that belong to them; Divine grace makes a hedge about their spiritual life, and Divine providence about their natural life; so they are safe and easy. He had prospered him, not in idleness or injustice,—the devil could not accuse him of them; but in the way of honest diligence, "Thou hast blessed the work of his hands;" and without that blessing, be the hands never so strong, never so skilful, the work will not prosper; but with that his substance is wonderfully increased in the land. The blessing of the Lord makes rich; Satan himself owns it. 2. What notice the devil took of it, and how he improved it against him. The devil speaks of it with vexation; I see thou hast made a hedge about him, round about; as if he had walked it round, to see if he could spy ever a gap in it for him to enter in at, to do him a mischief; but he was disappointed, it was a complete hedge. The wicked one saw it and was grieved; and argued against Job that the only reason why he served God was because God prospered him. No thanks to him to be true to the government that prefers him, and to serve a master that pays him so well.

Seventhly. The proof Satan undertakes to give of the hypocrisy and mercenariness of Job's religion, if he might but have leave to strip him of his wealth. Let it be put to this issue, saith he, ver. 11, make him poor, frown upon him, turn thine hand against him, and then see where his religion will be; touch what he hath and it will appear what he is. If he curse thee not to thy face, let me never be believed, but posted for a liar and false accuser. Let me perish, or be damned, if he curse thee not. So some supply the imprecation, which the devil himself modestly concealed, but the profane swearers of our age impudently and daringly speak out. Observe, 1. How slightly he speaks of the affliction he desired that Job might be tried with. Do but touch all that he hath, do but begin with him, do but threaten to make him poor; a little cross will change his tune. 2. How spitefully he speaks of the impression it would make upon Job. He will not only let fall his devotion, but turn it into an open defiance; not only think hardly of thee, but even curse thee to thy face. The word translated curse is barac, the same that ordinarily and originally signifies to bless, but cursing God is so impious a thing that the holy language would not admit the name; but that, where the sense requires it, it must be so understood, is plain from 1 Kin. xxi. 10, 13, where the word is used concerning the crime charged on Naboth, that he did blaspheme God and the king.

Now, 1st. It is likely Satan did think that Job if impoverished would renounce his religion, and so disprove his profession, and if so, as a learned gentleman has observed in his Mount of Spirits, Satan had made out his own universal empire among the children of men. God declared Job the best man then living. Now, if Satan can prove him a hypocrite, it will follow that God had not one faithful servant among men, and that there was no such thing as true and sincere piety in the world; but religion was all a sham, and Satan was king de facto over all mankind. But it appeared that the Lord knows them that are his, and is not deceived in any. 2nd. However, if Job should retain his religion, Satan would have the satisfaction to see him sorely afflicted. He hates good men and delights in their griefs, as God has pleasure in their prosperity.

Eighthly. The permission God gave to Satan to afflict Job for the trial of his sincerity. Satan desired God to do it, "Put forth thy hand now;" God allowed him to do it, ver. 12, "All that he has is in thy hand," make the trial as sharp as thou canst; do thy worst at him. Now, 1. It is matter of wonder that God should give Satan such a permission as this, should deliver the soul of his turtle dove into the hand of the adversary, such a lamb to such a lion; but he did it for his own glory, the honour of Job, the explanation of providence, and the encouragement of his afflicted people in all ages; to make a case, which, being adjudged, might be a useful precedent. He suffered Job to be tried, as he suffered Peter to be sifted, but took care his faith should not fail, Lu. xxii. 32; and then the trial of it was found unto praise, and honour, and glory, 1 Pet. i. 7. But, 2. It is matter of comfort that God has the devil in a chain, a great chain, Rev. xx. 1. He could not afflict Job without leave from God first asked and obtained; and then no farther than he had leave: "only upon himself put not forth thine hand," meddle not with his body, but only with his estate. It is a limited power that the devil hath; he has no power to debauch men but what they give him themselves, nor power to afflict men but what is given him from above.

Lastly. Satan's departure from this meeting of the sons of God. Before they broke up Satan went forth (as Cain, Gen. iv. 16,) from the presence of the Lord; no longer detained before him (as Doeg was, 1 Sam. xxi. 7,) than until he had accomplished his malicious purpose. He went forth, 1. Glad that he had gained his point; proud of the permission he had to do mischief to a good man, and, 2. Resolved to lose no time, but speedily to put his project in execution. He went forth now, not to go to and fro, rambling through the earth, but with a direct course to fall upon poor Job, who is carefully going on in the way of his duty, and knows nothing of the matter. What passeth between good and bad spirits concerning us we are not aware.

13 And there was a day when his sons and his daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house: 14 And there came a messenger unto Job, and said, The oxen were plowing, and the asses feeding beside them: 15 And the Sabeans fell upon them, and took them away; yea, they have slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee. 16 While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, The fire of God is fallen from heaven, and hath burned up the sheep, and the servants, and consumed them; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee. 17 While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, The Chaldeans made out three bands, and fell upon the camels, and have carried them away, yea, and slain the servants

i. 6. The words, "now there was a day," are precisely "and it was the day," whence arose the idea that it was a sort of annual day of judgment, at which the conduct of even angels was passed under review. There is no ground for such an opinion, and the Hebrew only means that on a certain day such and such things came to pass. By "sons of God" here, God's angels must be understood.

i. 14. Oxen are occasionally used for ploughing in many countries, but in the East they have been almost exclusively employed in that work. The asses—literally, "she asses"—are represented as feeding, not ploughing: it was not customary to put them to such a task.

i. 15. The Sabeans were no doubt inhabitants of a portion of the Arabian peninsula; and we may infer, from the fact that they made an incursion upon Job's possessions, that the patriarch himself lived near the same region. The Syriac has "robbers" for Sabeans.

i. 17. The Chaldeans here mentioned must have lived upon the lower Euphrates. We cannot identify them with the Chaldeans of with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee. 18 While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, Thy sons and thy daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house: 19 And, behold, there came a great wind from the wilderness, and smote the four corners of the house, and it fell upon the young men, and they are dead; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

We have here a particular account of Job's troubles.

First. Satan brought them upon him on the very day that his children began their course of feasting at their eldest brother's house, ver. 13; where he having (we may suppose) the double portion, the entertainment was the most rich and plentiful. The whole family no doubt was in perfect repose, and all were easy, and under no apprehension of trouble, now when they revived this custom; and this time Satan chose, that the trouble coming now might be the more grievous; "The night of my pleasure has he turned into fear," Isa. xxi. 4.

Secondly. They all came upon him at once. While one messenger of evil tidings was speaking, another came; and before he had told his story, a third; and a fourth followed immediately. Thus Satan by the Divine permission ordered it, 1. That there might appear a more than ordinary displeasure of God against him in his troubles, and by that he might be exasperated against the Divine providence, as if it were resolved, right or wrong, to ruin him, and not give him time to speak for himself. 2. That he might not have leisure to consider and recollect himself, and reason himself into a gracious submission, but might be overwhelmed and overpowered by a complication of calamities. If he have not room to pause a little, he will be apt to speak in haste, and then, if ever, he will curse his God. Note, The children of God are often in heaviness, through manifold temptations: deep calls to deep, waves and billows, one upon the neck of another. Let one affliction therefore quicken and help us to prepare for another; for how deep soever we have drunk of the bitter cup, as long as we are in this world we cannot be sure that we have drunk our share, and that it will finally pass from us. 3. They took from him all that he had, and made a full end of his enjoyments. The detail of his losses answers to the foregoing inventory of his possessions.

1st. He had five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she asses, and a competent number of servants to attend them, and all those he lost at once, ver. 14, 15. The account he has of this lets him know, First. That it was not through any carelessness of his servants, for then his resentment might have spent itself upon them. The oxen were ploughing, not playing; and the asses, not suffered to stray, and so taken up as waifs, but feeding beside them, under the servants' eye, each in their place; and they that passed by, we may suppose, blessed them, and said, God speed the plough. Note, All our prudence, care, and diligence cannot secure us from affliction, no, not from those afflictions which are commonly owing to imprudence and negligence. "Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman," though never so wakeful, "wakes but in vain;" yet it is some comfort under a trouble if it found us in the way of our duty, and not in any by-path. Secondly. That it was through the wickedness of his neighbours the Sabeans, a sort of rapparees perhaps, that lived by spoil and plunder; they carried off the oxen and asses, and slew the servants that faithfully and bravely did their best to defend them; and one only escaped, not in kindness to him or his master, but that Job might have the certain intelligence of it by an eyewitness, before he heard it by a flying report, which would have brought it upon him gradually. We have no reason to suspect that either Job or his servants had given any provocation to these Sabeans to make this inroad; but Satan put it into their hearts to do it, to do it now, and so gained a double point, for he made both Job to suffer, and them to sin. Note, When Satan has God's permission to do mischief, he will not want mischievous men to be his instruments in doing it; for he is a spirit that works in the children of disobedience.

2nd. He had seven thousand sheep, and shepherds that kept them; and all those he lost at the same time by lightning, ver. 16. Job was perhaps in his own mind ready to reproach the Sabeans, and fly out against them for their injustice and cruelty, when the next news immediately directs him to look upward: "The fire of God is fallen from heaven." As thunder is his voice, so lightning is his fire. But this was such an extraordinary lightning, and levelled so directly against Job, that all his sheep and shepherds were not only killed, but consumed by it at once, and one shepherd only left alive to carry the news to poor Job. The devil, aiming to make him curse God and renounce his religion, managed this part of the trial very artfully, in order thereunto. First. His sheep, with which especially he used to honour God in sacrifice, were all taken from him, as if God were angry at his offerings, and would punish him in those very things which he had employed in his service. Having misrepresented Job to God as a false servant, in pursuance of his old design to set heaven and earth at variance, he here misrepresented God to Job as a hard master, who would not protect those flocks out of which he had had so many burnt offerings: this would tempt Job to say, It is vain to serve God. Secondly. The messenger called the lightning the fire of God, and innocently enough; but perhaps Satan thereby designed to strike into his mind this thought, that God was turned to be his enemy, and fought against him, which was much more grievous to him than all the insults of the Sabeans. He owns, ch. xxxi. 23, that destruction from God was a terror to him. How terrible then were the tidings of this destruction, which came immediately from the hand of God! Had the fire from heaven consumed the sheep upon the altar, he might have construed it a token of God's favour; but, consuming them in the pasture, he could not but look upon it as a token of God's displeasure. There had not been the like since Sodom was burned.

3rd. He had three thousand camels, and servants tending them; and he lost them all at the same time by the Chaldeans, who came in three bands, and drove them away, and slew the servants, ver. 17. If the fire of God which fell upon Job's honest servants, that were in the way of their duty, had fallen upon the Sabean and Chaldean robbers that were doing mischief, God's judgments therein would have been, like the great mountains, evident and conspicuous; but, when the way of the wicked prospers, and they carry off their booty, while just and good men are suddenly cut off, God's righteousness is like the great deeps, the bottom of which we cannot find, Ps. xxxvi. 6.

4th. His dearest and most valuable possessions were his ten children; and, to conclude the tragedy, news is brought him at the same time that they were killed, and buried in the ruins of the house in which they were feasting; and all the servants that waited on them, except one that came express with the tidings of it, ver. 18, 19. This was the greatest of all Job's losses, and which could not but go nearest him; and, therefore, the devil reserved it for the last, that, if the other provocations failed, this might make him curse God. Our children are pieces of ourselves; it is very hard to part with them, and touches a good man in as tender a part as any other. But to part with them all at once, and for them to be all cut off in a moment, who had been so many years his cares and hopes, went to the quick indeed. First. They all died together, and not one of them was left alive. David, though a wise and good man, was put very much off the hinges by the death of one son; how hard then did it bear upon poor Job, who lost them all, and in one moment was written childless? Secondly. They died suddenly. Had they been taken away by some lingering disease, he had had notice to expect their death, and prepare for the breach; but this came upon him without giving him any warning. Thirdly. They died when they were feasting and making merry. Had they died suddenly when they were praying, he might the better have borne it; he would have hoped that death had found them in a good frame, if their blood had been mingled with their sacrifices; but to have it mingled with their feast, where he himself used to be jealous of them that they had sinned, and cursed God in their hearts; to have that day come upon them at unawares, like a thief in the night, when perhaps their hearts were overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness; this could not but add much to his grief, considering what a tender concern he always had for his children's souls, and that they were now out of the reach of the sacrifices he used to offer, according to the number of them all. See how all things come alike to all. Job's children were constantly prayed for by their father; and lived in love one with another, and yet came to this untimely end. Fourthly. They died by a wind of the devil's raising, who is the prince of the power of the air, Eph. ii. 2; but which was looked upon to be an immediate hand of God, and a token of his wrath, so Bildad construed it; ch. viii. 4, "Thy children have sinned against him, and he has cast them away in their transgression." Fifthly. They were taken away when he had most need of them to comfort him under all his other losses. Such miserable comforters are all creatures; in God only we have a present help at all times.

20 Then Job arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, and worshipped, 21 And said, Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: the LORD gave, and the LORD hath taken away; blessed be the name of the LORD. 22 In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly.

The devil had done all he desired leave to do against Job, to provoke him to curse God; had touched all he had, touched it with a witness; he whom the rising sun saw the richest of all the men in the East, before night was poor to a proverb. If his riches had been, as Satan insinuated, the only principle of his religion, now he had lost his riches he had certainly lost his religion; but the account we have in these verses of his pious deportment under his affliction sufficiently proved the devil a liar and Job an honest man.

First. He carried himself like a man under his afflictions; not stupid and senseless, like a stock or stone, not unnatural and unaffected at the death of his children and servants; no, ver. 20, he "arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head;" which were the usual expressions of great sorrow, to shew that he was sensible of the hand of the Lord that was gone out against him; yet he did not break out into any indecencies, nor discover an extravagant passion; he did not faint away, but arose as a champion to the combat; did not in a heat throw off his clothes, but, very gravely, in conformity to the custom of the country, rent his mantle, his cloak, or outer garment; did not passionately tear his hair, but deliberately shaved his head. By all which it appeared that he kept his temper, and bravely maintained the possession and repose of his own soul in the midst of all these provocations. It is observable when he began to shew his resentment; not till he heard of the death of his children, and then he arose, then he rent his mantle. A worldly unbelieving heart would have said, Now the meat is gone, it is well the mouths are gone too; now there is no portion, it is well there are no children. But Job knew better things, and would have been thankful if Providence had spared his children, though he had had little or nothing for them; for "Jehovah-jireh, the Lord will provide." Some expositors, remembering that it was usual with the Jews to rend their clothes when they heard blasphemy, conjecture that Job rent his clothes in a holy indignation at the blasphemous thoughts which Satan now cast into his mind, tempting him to curse God.

Secondly. He carried himself like a wise and good man under his afflictions; like a perfect and upright man, and one that feared God, and eschewed the evil of sin more than that of outward trouble.

1. He humbled himself under the hand of God, and accommodated himself to the providences he was under; as one that knew how to want, as well as how to abound. When God called to weeping and mourning, he wept and mourned, rent his mantle, and shaved his head; and, as one that abased himself even to the dust before God, he fell down upon the ground, in a penitent sense of sin, and a patient submission to the will of God, accepting the punishment of his iniquity. Hereby he shewed his sincerity, for hypocrites cry not when God binds them, ch. xxxvi. 13. Hereby he disposed himself to get good by the affliction, for how can we improve the grief we will not feel?

2. He composed himself with quieting considerations, that he might not be disturbed and put out of the possession of his own soul by these events. He reasons from the common state of human life, which he describes with application to himself; "Naked came I," as others do, "out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither," into the lap of our common mother, the earth; as the child when it is sick or weary lays its head in its mother's bosom. Dust we were in our original, and to dust we return in our exit, Gen. iii. 19; to the earth as we were, Eccl. xii. 7; naked shall we return thither, whence we were taken, namely, to the clay, ch. xxxiii. 6. St. Paul refers to this of Job, 1 Tim. vi. 7, "We brought nothing" of this world's goods "into the world," but have them from others; "and it is certain we can carry nothing out," but must leave them to others. We come into the world naked, not only unarmed, but unclothed; helpless, shiftless, not so well covered and fenced as other creatures. The sin we are born in makes us naked to our shame in the eyes of the holy God. We go out of the world naked; the body doth, though the sanctified soul goes clothed, 2 Cor. v. 3. Death strips us of all our enjoyments; clothing can neither warm nor adorn a dead body. This consideration silenced Job under all his losses. 1st. He is but where he was at first; he looks upon himself but as naked, not maimed, not wounded, he was himself still, his own man, when nothing else was his own; and, therefore, but reduced to his first condition. Nemo tam pauper potest esse quam natus est,—'No one can be so poor as he was when born.'—Min. Felix. If we are impoverished we are not

Northern Mesopotamia, as some do. Therefore, without adopting the opinion of Professor Rawlinson, that Ur of the Chaldees was at Mugheir, near the junction of the Shat-el-Hie with the Euphrates, we may believe with him that the Chaldeans here named might easily have come from that locality. The reference to the Chaldeans as engaged in marauding expeditions suggests a very early date for the events here recorded. It was not until much later that the Chaldeans rose to power and eminence in arts and sciences.

i. 19. The "great wind from the wilderness" was a kind of tornado, which appears to have come sweeping across the wide plains, here called the wilderness. Mr. Barnes says, "On the ample plains of Arabia it would have the opportunity of accumulating its desolating power, and would sweep everything before it." The word rendered "wilderness" is not a synonym for desert, but a wild, uncultivated district, where myriads of flocks could find sufficient pasture.

i. 20. The word "mantle" means an outer robe, or garment, which wronged, nor much hurt, for we are but as we were born. 2nd. He is but where he must have been at last, and is only unclothed, or unloaded rather, a little sooner than he expected. If we put off our clothes before we go to bed it is some inconvenience, but it may be the better borne when it is near bedtime.

3. He gave glory to God, and expressed himself upon this occasion with a great veneration for the Divine providence, and an awful submission to the disposals of it; and we may well rejoice to find Job in this good frame, because this was the very thing upon which the trial of his integrity was put, though he did not know it. The devil said he would under his affliction curse God, but he blessed him, and so proved himself an honest man.

1st. He acknowledgeth the hand of God, both in the mercies he had formerly enjoyed, and in the afflictions he was now exercised with; "The Lord gave, and the Lord has taken away." We must own the Divine providence, First. In all our comforts. God gave us our being, made us, and not we ourselves; gave us our wealth, it was not our own ingenuity or industry that enriched us, but God's blessing on our cares and endeavours; he gave us power to get wealth; not only made the creatures for us, but bestowed upon us our share. Secondly. In all our crosses. The same that gave hath taken away; and may he not do what he will with his own? See how he looks above instruments, and keeps his eye upon the first cause. He doth not say, The Lord gave, and the Sabeans and Chaldeans have taken away; God made me rich, and the devil has made me poor; but, He that gave has taken; and for that reason he is dumb and has nothing to say, because God did it; he that gave all may take which, and when, and how much he pleaseth. Seneca could argue thus, Abstulit, sed et dedit,—'he took away, but he also gave;' and Epictetus excellently, cap. xv.: When thou art deprived of any comfort, suppose a child taken away by death, or a part of thy estate lost, say not ἀπώλεσα αὐτό, but ἀπέδωκα; not 'I have lost it,' but 'I have restored it, and returned it to the right owner;' but thou wilt object, saith he, 'He is an ill man that has robbed me;' κακὸς ὁ ἀφελόμενος, to which he answers, 'What is it to thee (τί δέ σοι μέλει) by what hand he that gives remands what he gave?'

2nd. He adores God in both; when all was gone, he fell down and worshipped. Note, Afflictions must not divert us from, but quicken us to, the exercises of religion. Weeping must not hinder sowing, not hinder worshipping. He eyed not only the hand of God, but the name of God in his afflictions, and gave glory to that: "Blessed be the name of the Lord." He hath still the same great and good thoughts of God that ever he had, and is as forward as ever to speak them forth to his praise, and can find in his heart to bless God even when he takes away as well as when he gives. Thus must we sing both of mercy and judgment, Ps. ci. 1. First. He blesseth God for what was given, though now it was taken away. When our comforts are removed from us, we must thank God that ever we had them, and had them so much longer than we deserved. Nay, Secondly. He adores God, even in taking away, and gives him honour by a willing submission; nay, he gives him thanks for good designed him by his afflictions, and gracious supports under his afflictions, and the believing hopes he had of a happy issue at last.

Lastly. Here is the honourable testimony which the Holy Ghost gives to Job's constancy, and good carriage under his afflictions. He passed his trials with applause, ver. 22; in all this Job did not miss it, for he did not attribute folly to God; nor in the least reflect upon his wisdom in what he had done. Discontent and impatience do in effect charge God with folly. Against the workings of these, therefore, Job carefully watched; and so must we, acknowledging that, as God has done right but we have done wickedly, so God has done wisely but we have done foolishly, very foolishly. They who not only keep their temper under crosses and provocations, but keep up good thoughts of God, and sweet communion with him, whether their praise be of men or no, it will be of God, as Job's here was.

CHAPTER II.

We left Job honourably acquitted upon a fair trial between God and Satan concerning him. Satan had leave to touch, to touch and take all he had, and was confident he would then curse God to his face; but, on the contrary, he blessed him, and so he was proved an honest man, and Satan a false accuser. Now one would have thought this had been conclusive, and that Job should never have had his reputation called in question again; but Job is known to be armour of proof, and therefore is here set up for a mark, and brought upon his trial a second time. I. Satan moved for another trial, which should touch his bone and his flesh, ver. 1—5. II. God for holy ends permits it, ver. 6. III. Satan smites him with a very painful and loathsome disease, ver. 7, 8. IV. His wife tempts him to curse God, but he resists the temptation, ver. 9, 10. V. His friends come to condole with him, and to comfort him, ver. 11—13. And in this that good man is set forth for an example of suffering affliction and of patience.

AGAIN there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the LORD, and Satan came also among them to present himself before the LORD. 2 And the LORD said unto Satan, From whence comest thou? And Satan answered the LORD, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it. 3 And the LORD said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil? and still he holdeth fast his integrity, although thou movedst me against him, to destroy him without cause. 4 And Satan answered the LORD, and said, Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life. 5 But put forth thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse thee to thy face. 6 And the LORD said unto Satan, Behold, he is in thine hand; but save his life.

Satan, that sworn enemy to God and all good men, is here pushing forward his malicious prosecution of Job, whom he hated because God loved him; and did all he could to separate between him and his God, to sow discord and make mischief between them; urging God to afflict him, and then urging him to blaspheme God. One would have thought he had had enough of his former attempt upon Job, in which he was so shamefully baffled and disappointed; but malice is restless, the devil and his instruments are so. They that calumniate good people, and accuse them falsely, will have their saying, though the evidence to the contrary be never so plain and full; and they have been cast in the issue which they themselves have put it upon. Satan will have Job's cause called over again. The malicious, unreasonable importunity of that great persecutor of the saints is represented, Rev. xii. 10, by his accusing them before our God day and night, still repeating and urging that against them which has been many a time answered. So did Satan here accuse Job day after day. Here is,

First. The court set, and the prosecutor or accuser making his appearance, ver. 1, 2, as before, ch. i. 6, 7. The angels attended God's throne, and Satan among them. One would have expected him to come and confess his malice against Job, and his mistake concerning him; to cry Peccavi, for belying one whom God spoke well of, and to beg pardon; but, instead of that, he comes with a farther design against Job. He is asked the same question as before, "Whence comest thou?" and answers as before, "From going to and fro in the earth;" as if he had been doing no harm, though he had been abusing that good man.

Secondly. The judge himself of counsel for the accused, and pleading for him; ver. 3, "Hast thou considered my servant Job" better than thou didst; and art thou now at length convinced that he is a faithful servant of mine, a perfect and an upright man, for thou seest he still holds fast his integrity? This is now added to his character, as a farther achievement; instead of letting go his religion, and cursing God, he holds it faster than ever, as that which he has now more than ordinary occasion for; he is the same in adversity that he was in prosperity, and rather better, and more hearty and lively in blessing God than ever he was, and takes root the faster for being thus shaken. See 1. How Satan is condemned for his allegations against Job; "Thou movedst me against him," as an accuser, "to destroy him without cause." Or, Thou in vain movedst me to destroy him, but I will never do that. Good men when they are cast down are not destroyed, 2 Cor. iv. 9. How well is it for us, that neither men nor devils are to be our judges; for perhaps they would destroy us right or wrong; but our judgment proceedeth from the Lord, whose judgment never errs, or is biassed. 2. How Job is commended for his constancy, notwithstanding the attacks made upon him; "Still he holds fast his integrity," as his weapon, and thou canst not disarm him; as his treasure, and thou canst not rob him of that; nay, thine endeavours to do it make him hold it the faster. Instead of losing ground by the temptation, he gets ground. God speaks of it with wonder and pleasure, and something of triumph in the power of his own grace; "still he holds fast his integrity." Thus the trial of Job's faith was found to his praise and honour, 1 Pet. i. 7. Constancy crowns integrity.

Thirdly. The accusation farther prosecuted, ver. 4. What excuse can Satan make for the successlessness of his former attempt? What can he say to palliate it, when he had been so very confident he should gain his point? Why truly he has this to say, "Skin for skin, and all that a man has will he give for his life." Something of truth there is in this, that self-love and self-preservation are very powerful commanding principles in the hearts of men. Men love themselves better than their nearest relations, even their children, that are pieces of themselves; will not only venture, but give their estates to save their lives. All account life sweet and precious; and, while they are themselves in health and at ease, they can keep trouble from their hearts, whatever they lose. And we ought to make a good use of this consideration, and while God continues to us our life and health, and the use of our limbs and senses, we should the more patiently bear the loss of other comforts: see Mat. vi. 25. But Satan grounds upon this an accusation of Job, slily representing him, 1. As unnatural to those about him, and one that laid not to heart the death of his children and servants, nor cared how many of them had their skins, as I may say, stripped over their ears, so long as he slept in a whole skin himself. As if he that was so tender of his children's souls could be careless of their bodies, and, like the ostrich, hardened against his young ones as though they were not his. 2. As wholly selfish, and minding nothing but his own ease and safety, as if his religion made him sour, and morose, and ill-natured. Thus are the ways and people of God often misrepresented by the devil and his agents.

Fourthly. A challenge given to make a farther trial of Job's integrity; ver. 5, "Put forth thine hand now," for I find my hand too short to reach him, and too weak to hurt him, "and touch his bone and his flesh," that is with him the only tender part; make him sick with smiting him, Mic. vi. 13; and then I dare say, "he will curse thee to thy face," and let go his integrity. Satan knew it, and we find it by experience, that nothing is more likely to ruffle the thoughts and put the mind into disorder than acute pain and distemper of body. There is no disputing against sense. St. Paul himself had much ado to bear a thorn in the flesh, nor could he have borne it without special grace from Christ, 2 Cor. xii. 7, 9.

Fifthly. A permission granted to Satan to make this trial, ver. 6. Satan would have God put forth his hand and do it; but he afflicts not willingly, nor takes any pleasure in grieving the children of men, much less his own children, Lam. iii. 33. And therefore, if it must be done, let Satan do it, who delights in such work, "He is in thine hand," do thy worst at him; but with a proviso and limitation, only save his life, or his soul; afflict him, but not to death. Satan hunted for the precious life, would have taken that, if he might, in hopes that dying agonies would have forced Job to curse his God; but God had mercy in store for Job after this trial, and therefore he must survive it, and however he is afflicted, must have his life given him for a prey. If God did not chain up the roaring lion, how soon would he devour us! As far as he permits the wrath of Satan and wicked men to proceed against his people, he will make it turn to his praise and theirs, and the remainder thereof he will restrain, Ps. lxxvi. 10. Save his soul, that is, his reason, so some; preserve to him the use of that, for otherwise it will be no fair trial. If, in his delirium, he should curse God, that will be no disproof of his integrity. It would not be the language of his heart, but of his distemper. Job, in being thus maligned by Satan was a type of Christ, the first prophecy of whom was, that Satan should bruise his heel, Gen. iii. 15; and so he was foiled, as in Job's case. Satan tempted him to let go his integrity, his adoption, Mat. iv. 4, "If thou be the Son of God." He entered into the heart of Judas that betrayed Christ, and, some think, with his terrors put Christ into his agony in the garden. He had permission to touch his bone and his flesh, without exception of his life, because by dying he was to do that which Job could not do, "destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil."

might be worn loose, or gathered up with a girdle. Both the rending of the mantle and the shaving of the head were Oriental methods of lamentation. Among the Egyptians the head was shaved as a matter of course, in the upper classes of society, who often supplied the place of the natural hair by a wig.

ii. 4. The phrase "skin for skin" has exercised the ingenuity of our critics. It seems to be a proverbial expression, meaning that a man would part with anything and everything to save his life. Some take it to mean that a man would give his limbs to save his life. Others, less probably, think it means that to save his own life a man would sacrifice the life of another, although that is true in fact. The saying very likely originated in ages when the skins of animals were exchanged for one another, and signified that to obtain the skin he liked best a man would part with the most valuable in his possession.

ii. 7. The sore boils of Job have been the subject of much discussion, but with no decisive results. They do not seem to have 7 So went Satan forth from the presence of the LORD, and smote Job with sore boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown. 8 And he took him a potsherd to scrape himself withal, and he sat down among the ashes. 9 Then said his wife unto him, Dost thou still retain thine integrity? curse God, and die. 10 But he said unto her, Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What? shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil? In all this did not Job sin with his lips.

The devil, having got leave to tear and worry poor Job, presently fell to work with him, as a tormenter first, and then a tempter. His own children he tempts first, and draws them to sin, and afterwards torments, when thereby he has brought them to ruin; but this child of God he tormented with affliction, and then tempted to make an ill use of his affliction. That which he aimed at was to make Job curse God. Now here we are told what course he took, both to move him to it, and to move it to him; both to give him the provocation, else it would be to no purpose to urge him to it, and to give him the information, else he would not have thought of it. Thus artfully is the temptation managed with all the subtilty of the old serpent, who is here playing the same game against Job that he played against our first parents, Gen. iii., aiming to seduce him from his allegiance to his God, and to rob him of his integrity.

First. He provokes him to curse God, by smiting him with sore boils, and so making him a burthen to himself, ver. 7, 8. The former attack was extremely violent, but Job kept his ground, bravely made good the pass, and carried the day. Yet he is still but girding on the harness, there is worse behind; the clouds return after the rain. Satan, by the Divine permission, follows his blow, and now deep calls unto deep.

1. The disease was very grievous with which Job was seized. Satan smote him with boils, sore boils, all over him, from head to foot; with an evil inflammation, so some render it; an erysipelas, perhaps, in a high degree. One boil, when it is gathering, is torment enough, and gives a man abundance of pain and uneasiness. What a condition was Job then in, that had boils all over him, and no part free, and those of as raging a heat as the devil could make them, and as it were set on fire of hell. The small-pox is a very grievous and painful disease, and would be much more terrible than it is, but that we know the extremity of it ordinarily lasts but a few days. How grievous then was Job's disease, who was smitten all over him, not with pocks, or pouks, as we call them, but with sore boils, or grievous ulcers, which made him sick at heart, put him to exquisite torture, and being overspread with them he could lay himself no way for any ease. If at any time we be exercised with sore and grievous distempers, let us not think ourselves dealt with any otherwise than as God has sometimes dealt with the best of his saints and servants. We know not how much Satan may have a hand, by Divine permission, in the diseases with which the children of men, and especially the children of God, are afflicted; what infections that prince of the air may spread; what inflammations may come from that fiery serpent. We read of one whom Satan had bound many years, Lu. xiii. 16. Should God suffer that roaring lion to have his will against any of us, how miserable would he soon make us!

2. His management of himself in this distemper was very strange, ver. 8. 1st. Instead of healing salves "he took a potsherd," a piece of a broken pitcher, "to scrape himself withal." A very sad pass this poor man was come to. When a man is sick and sore, he may bear it the better if he be well tended and carefully looked after. Many rich people have, with a soft and tender hand, charitably ministered to the poor in such a condition as this; even Lazarus had some ease from the tongues of the dogs that came and licked his sores; but poor Job has no help afforded him. First. Nothing is done at his sores but what he doth himself, with his own hands. His children and servants are all dead, his wife unkind, ch. xix. 17. He has not wherewithal to fee a physician or a surgeon, and, which is most sad of all, none of those he had formerly been kind to had so much sense of honour and gratitude as to minister to him in his distress, and lend him a hand to dress or wipe his running sores, either because the disease was loathsome and noisome, or because they apprehended it infectious. Thus it was in the former days, as it will be in the last days: men were lovers of their own selves, unthankful, and without natural affection. Secondly. Nothing is done at his sores but only to scrape them; they are not bound up with soft rags, nor mollified with ointment, not washed or kept clean, no healing plaisters laid on them, no opiates, no anodynes ministered to the poor patient, to alleviate the pain, and compose him to rest, nor any cordials to support his spirits; all the operation is the scraping of his ulcers, which, when they were come to a head and began to die, made his body all over like a scurf, as is usual in the end of the small-pox. It would have been an endless thing to dress his boils one by one, he therefore resolves thus to do it by wholesale; a remedy which one would think as bad as the disease. Thirdly. He has nothing to do this with but a potsherd, no surgeon's instrument proper for the purpose, but that which would rather rake into his wounds, and add to his pain, than give him any ease. People that are sick and sore have need to be under the discipline and direction of others, for many times they are but ill managers of themselves. 2nd. Instead of reposing himself in a soft and warm bed, "he sat down among the ashes." Probably he had a bed left him, for, though his fields were stripped, we do not find that his house was burnt or plundered; but he chose to sit in the ashes, either because he was weary of his bed, or because he would put himself into the place and posture of a penitent, who, in token of his self-abhorrence, lay in dust and ashes, ch. xlii. 6; Isa. lviii. 5; Jonah iii. 6. Thus did he humble himself under the mighty hand of God, and bring his mind to the meanness and poverty of his condition He complains, ch. vii. 5, that his flesh was clothed with worms and clods of dust, and therefore, Dust to dust, ashes to ashes. If God lay him among the ashes, there he will contentedly sit down. A low spirit becomes low circumstances, and will help to reconcile us to them. The Septuagint reads it, 'He sat down upon a dunghill without the city,' which is commonly said in mentioning this story; but the original saith no more but that he sat in the midst of the ashes, which he might do in his own house.

Secondly. He puts him in the head to curse God, by the persuasions of his own wife, ver. 9. The Jews, who covet much to be wise above what is written, say that Job's wife was Dinah, Jacob's daughter; so the Chaldee paraphrase. It is not likely she was; but, whoever it was, she was to him like Michal to David, a scoffer at his piety. She was spared to him, when the rest of his comforts were taken away, for this purpose, to be a troubler and tempter to him. If Satan leaves any thing that he has permission to take away, it is with a design of mischief. It is his policy to send his temptations by the hand of those that are dear to us, as he tempted Adam by Eve, and Christ by Peter. We must, therefore, carefully watch, that we be not drawn to say or do an ill thing by the influence, interest, or entreaty of any, no, not those for whose opinion and favour we have never so great a value. Observe how strong this temptation was.

1. She banters Job for his constancy in his religion: "Dost thou still retain thine integrity?" Art thou so very obstinate in thy religion that nothing will cure thee of it? So tame and sheepish as thus to truckle to a God that is so far from rewarding thy services with marks of his favour, that he seems to take a pleasure in making thee miserable, strips thee and whips thee without any provocation given? Is this a God to be still loved, and blessed, and served?

> 'Dost thou not see that thy devotion's vain?
> What have thy prayers procured but woe and pain?
> Hast thou not yet thine interest understood?
> Perversely righteous, and absurdly good?
> Those painful sores, and all thy losses shew
> How Heaven regards the foolish saint below:
> Incorrigibly pious! can't thy God

Thus Satan still endeavours to draw men from God, as he did our first parents, by suggesting hard thoughts of him, as one that envies the happiness, and delights in the misery of his creatures, than which nothing is more false. Another artifice he useth is, to drive men from their religion by loading them with scoffs and reproaches for their adherence to it. We have reason to expect it, but we are fools if we heed it; our Master himself has undergone it. We shall be abundantly recompensed for it, and with much more reason may we retort it upon the scoffers, Are ye such fools as still to retain your impiety, when you might bless God and live?

2. She urgeth him to renounce his religion, to blaspheme God, set him at defiance, and dare him to do his worst: "Curse God, and die;" live no longer in dependence upon God, wait not for relief from him, but be thine own deliverer by being thine own executioner; end thy troubles by ending thy life; better die once than be always dying thus; thou mayest now despair of having any help from thy God, even curse him and hang thyself. These are two of the blackest and most horrid of all Satan's temptations, and yet such as good men have sometimes been violently assaulted with. Nothing more contrary to natural conscience than blaspheming God, nor to natural sense than self-murder; therefore the suggestion of either of these may well be suspected to come immediately from Satan. Lord, lead us not into temptation, not into such, not into any temptation, but deliver us from the evil one.

Thirdly. He bravely resists and overcomes the temptation, ver. 10. He soon gave her an answer,—for Satan spared him the use of his tongue, in hopes he would curse God with it,—which shewed his constant resolution to cleave to God, to keep his good thoughts of him, and not to let go his integrity. See,

1. How he resented the temptation. He took it very heinously to have such a thing mentioned to him. What! curse God? I abhor the thought of it; "Get thee behind me, Satan." In other cases, Job reasoned with his wife with a great deal of mildness, even when she was unkind to him, ch. xix. 17, "I entreated her for the children's sake of my own body." But, when she persuaded him to curse God, he was much displeased; "Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh." He doth not call her a fool, and an atheist, nor break out into any indecent expressions of his displeasure, as those who are sick and sore are apt to do, and think they may be excused; but he shews her the evil of what she said, that she spoke the language of the infidels and idolaters, who when they are "hardly beset, fret themselves and curse their king, and their God," Isa. viii. 21. We have reason to suppose, in such a pious household as Job had, his wife was one that had been well affected to religion; yet now, when all their estate and comforts were gone, she could not bear the loss with that temper of mind that Job had; but that she should go about to infect his mind with the distemper of hers was a great provocation to him, and he could not forbear thus shewing his resentment. Note, 1st. Those are angry and sin not that are angry only at sin, and take a temptation as the greatest affront; who cannot bear them that are evil, Rev. ii. 2. When Peter was a Satan to Christ, he told him plainly, "Thou art an offence to me." 2nd. If those that we think wise and good at any time speak that which is foolish and bad, we ought to reprove them faithfully for it, and shew them the evil of what they say, that we suffer not sin upon them. 3rd. Temptations to curse God ought to be rejected with the greatest abhorrence, and not so much as to be parleyed with. Whoever persuades us to that must be looked upon as our enemy, to whom, if we yield, it is at our peril. Job did not curse God, and then think to come off with Adam's excuse, "The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she persuaded me to do it," Gen. iii. 12, which had in it a tacit reflection on God, his ordinance and providence; no, if thou scornest, if thou cursest thou alone shalt bear it.

2. How he reasoned against the temptation: "Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil also?" Those whom we reprove we must endeavour to convince; and it is no hard matter to give a reason why we should still hold fast our integrity, even when we are stripped of every thing else. He considers that, though good and evil are contraries, yet they do not come from contrary causes, but both from the hand of God, Isa. xlv. 7; Lam. iii. 37, and therefore in both we must have our eye up unto him, with thankfulness for the good he sends, and without fretfulness at the evil. Observe the force of his argument.

1st. What he argues for; not only the bearing, but the receiving of evil. "Shall we not receive evil?" that is, First. Shall we not expect to receive it? If God give us so many good things, shall we be surprised, or think it strange, if he sometimes afflict us, when he has told us that prosperity and adversity are set the one over against the other? 1 Pet. iv. 12. Secondly. Shall we not address ourselves to receive it aright? The word signifies to receive as a gift, and notes a pious affection and disposition of soul under our afflictions, neither despising them nor fainting under them, accounting them gifts, Phil. i. 29; accepting them as punishments of our iniquity, Lev. xxvi. 41; acquiescing in the will of God in them, Let him do with me as seemeth him good, and accommodating ourselves to them, as those that know how to want as well as how to abound, Phil. iv. 12. When the heart is humbled and weaned by humbling, weaning providences, then we receive correction, Zep. iii. 2, and take up our cross.

2nd. What he argues from. Shall we receive so much good as has come to us from the hand of God, during all those years of peace and prosperity that we have lived, and shall we not now receive evil, when God thinks fit to lay it on us? Note, The consideration of the mercies we receive from God, both past and present, should make us receive our afflictions with a suitable disposition of spirit. If we receive our share of the common good in the seven years of plenty, shall we not receive our share of the common evil in the years of famine? Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus,—'He who feels the privilege should prepare for the privation.' If we have so much that pleaseth been boils in the ordinary sense, because Job went to scrape himself, which is the last thing a man with boils would do. At a certain stage of the small-pox men have been known to tear off the skin from the face; and there are other diseases in which the itching is so excessive, that the sufferers are prompted to lacerate themselves in hope of relief. It is a common opinion that Job's disease was one kind of leprosy. Perhaps the precise name of his affliction will never be determined, although its distressing character is plainly indicated.

ii. 9. "Curse God, and die," is a phrase which has also excited much attention, mainly because the word used here and elsewhere in the early chapters of the book is closely akin to the one for "bless." Dr. Good rendered the expression, "blessing God and dying;" Noyes, "renounce God, and die;" others, "bid farewell to God, and die;" Castellio, "thank God, and die." The ancient versions may be referred to. The Syriac is, "reproach thy God, and die;" the Arabic is the same; the Chaldee is, "bless the word of the Lord, and us, why should we not be content with that which pleaseth God? If we receive so many comforts, shall we not receive some afflictions, which will serve as foils to our comforts, to make them the more valuable?—we are taught the worth of mercies by being made to want them sometimes; and as allays to our comforts, to make them the less dangerous, to keep the balance even, and to prevent our being lifted up above measure, 2 Cor. xii. 7. If we receive so much good for the body, shall we not receive some good for the soul? that is, some affliction, by which we partake of God's holiness, Heb. xii. 10; something which, by saddening the countenance, makes the heart better. Let murmuring, therefore, as well as boasting, be for ever excluded.

Fourthly. Thus in a good measure Job still held fast his integrity, and Satan's design against him was defeated; "in all this did not Job sin with his lips." He not only said this well, but all he said at this time was under the government of religion and right reason. In the midst of all these grievances he did not speak a word amiss; and we have no reason to think but that he also preserved a good temper of mind, so that, though there might be some stirrings and risings of corruption in his heart, yet grace got the upper hand, and he took care that the root of bitterness might not spring up to trouble him, Heb. xii. 15. The abundance of his heart was for God, produced good things, and suppressed the evil that was there, which was out-voted by the better side. If he did think any evil, yet he laid his hand upon his mouth, (Pr. xxx. 32,) stifled the evil thought, and let it go no farther; by which it appeared, not only that he had true grace, but that it was strong and victorious; in short, that he had not forfeited the character of a perfect and upright man, for so he appears to be, who, in the midst of such temptations, offends not in word, Jas. iii. 2; Ps. xvii. 3.

11 Now when Job's three friends heard of all this evil that was come upon him, they came every one from his own place; Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite: for they had made an appointment together to come to mourn with him and to comfort him. 12 And when they lifted up their eyes afar off, and knew him not, they lifted up their voice, and wept; and they rent every one his mantle, and sprinkled dust upon their heads toward heaven. 13 So they sat down with him upon the ground seven days and seven nights, and none spake a word unto him: for they saw that his grief was very great.

We have here an account of the kind visit which Job's three friends made him in his affliction. The news of his extraordinary troubles spread into all parts, he being an eminent man both for greatness and goodness, and the circumstances of his troubles being very uncommon. Some that were his enemies triumphed in his calamities, ch. xvi. 10; xix. 18; xxx. 1, &c,—perhaps they made ballads of him; but his friends concerned themselves for him, and endeavoured to comfort him; "a friend loveth at all times, and a brother is born for adversity." Three of them are here named, ver. 11, Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar. We shall meet with a fourth after, who, it should seem, was present at the whole conference, namely, Elihu; whether he came as a friend of Job, or only as an auditor, doth not appear. These three are said to be his friends, his intimate acquaintance, as David and Solomon had each of them one in their court that was called the king's friend. These three were eminently wise and good men, as appears by their discourses; they were old men, very old, and had a great reputation for knowledge, and a mighty deference was paid to their judgment, ch. xxxii. 6. It is probable they were men of figure in their country,—princes, or heads of houses. Now observe,

First. That Job in his prosperity had contracted a friendship with them. If they were his equals, yet he had not that jealousy of them,—if his inferiors, yet he had not that disdain of them, which was any hindrance to an intimate converse and correspondence with them; and to have such friends adds more to his happiness in the day of his prosperity than all the head of cattle he was master of. Much of the comfort of this life lies in acquaintance and friendship with those that are prudent and virtuous; and he that has a few such friends ought to be choice of them. Job's three friends are supposed to be all of them of the posterity of Abraham, which for some descents, even in the families that were shut out from the covenant of peculiarity, retained some good fruits of that pious education which the father of the faithful gave to those under his charge. Eliphaz descended from Teman, the grandson of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 11; Bildad, it is probable, from Shuah, Abraham's son by Keturah, Gen. xxv. 2; Zophar is thought by some to be the same with Zepho, a descendant from Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 11. The preserving of so much wisdom and piety among those that were strangers to the covenant of promise was a happy presage of God's grace to the Gentiles, when the partition wall should in the latter days be taken down. Esau was rejected, yet many that came from him inherited some of the best blessings.

Secondly. That they continued their friendship with Job in his adversity, when most of his friends had forsaken him, ch. xix. 14. Two ways they shewed their friendship:

1. By the kind visit they made him in his affliction, to mourn with him, and to comfort him, ver. 11. Probably they had been wont to visit him in his prosperity, not to hunt or hawk with him, not to dance or play at cards with him, but to entertain and edify themselves with his learned and pious converse; and now he was in adversity they come to share with him in his griefs, as formerly they had come to share with him in his comforts. These were wise men, whose heart was in the house of mourning, Eccl. vii. 4. Visiting the afflicted, sick or sore, fatherless or childless in their sorrow, is made a branch of pure religion and undefiled, Jas. i. 27; and, if done from a good principle, will be abundantly recompensed shortly, Mat. xxv. 36. By visiting the sons and daughters of affliction we may contribute to the improvement, 1st. Of our own graces; for many a good lesson is to be learned from the troubles of others; we may look upon them and receive instruction, and be made wise and serious. 2nd. Of their comforts. By putting a respect upon them we encourage them, and some good word may be spoken to them which may help to make them easy. Job's friends came, not to satisfy their curiosity with an account of his troubles, and the strangeness of the circumstances of them,—much less, as David's false friends, to make invidious remarks upon him, Ps. xli. 6-8,—but to mourn with him,—to mingle their tears with his, and so to comfort him. It is much more pleasant to visit those in affliction, to whom comfort belongs, than those to whom we must first speak conviction.

Concerning these visitants observe, First. That they were not sent for, but came of their own accord, ch. vi. 22; whence Mr. Caryl observes, that 'it is good manners to be an unbidden guest at the house of mourning,' and in comforting our friends to prevent their invitations. Secondly. That they made an appointment to come. Note, Good people should make appointments among themselves for doing good, so exciting and obliging one another to it, and assisting and encouraging one another in it. For the carrying on of any pious design, let hand join in hand. Thirdly. That they came with a design (and we have reason to think it was a sincere design) to comfort him, and yet proved miserable comforters, through their unskilful management of his case Many that aim well by mistake come short of their aim.

2. By their tender sympathy with him, and concern for him in his affliction. When they saw him at some distance he was so disfigured and deformed with his sores that they knew him not, ver. 12. His face was foul with weeping, ch. xvi. 16, like Jerusalem's Nazarites that had been ruddy as the rubies, but were now blacker than a coal, Lam. iv. 7, 8. What a change will a sore disease, or, without that, an oppressing care and grief, make in the countenance in a little time. Is this Naomi? Ru. i. 19; so, Is this Job? How art thou fallen! How is thy glory stained and sullied, and all thine honour laid in the dust! God fit us for such changes. Observing him thus miserably altered, they did not leave him in a fright, or loathing, but expressed so much the more tenderness towards him.

1st. Coming to mourn with him, they vented their undissembled grief in all the then usual expressions of that passion. They wept aloud. The sight of them, as is usual, revived Job's grief, and set him a weeping afresh, which fetched floods of tears from their eyes. They rent their clothes, and sprinkled dust upon their heads, as men that would strip themselves, and abase themselves, with their friend that was stripped and abased.

2nd. Coming to comfort him they sat down with him upon the ground; for so he received visits; and they, not in compliment to him, but in true compassion, put themselves into the same humble and uneasy place and posture. They had many a time, it is likely, sat with him on his couches and at his table, in his prosperity, and were therefore willing to share with him in his grief and poverty, because they had shared with him in his joy and plenty. It was not a modish, short visit that they made him, just to look upon him and be gone; but, as those that could have no enjoyment of themselves if they had returned to their place while their friend was in so much misery, they resolved to stay with him till they saw him mend or end, and therefore took lodgings near him, though he was not now able to entertain them as he had done, and they must therefore lie at their own charges. Every day, for seven days together, at the hours in which he admitted company, they came and sat with him as his companions in tribulation, and exceptions from that rule, Nullus ad amissas ibit amicus opes,—'Those that have lost their wealth are not to expect the visits of their friends.' They that are poor have few friends. They sat with him, but none spake a word to him, only they all attended to the particular narratives he gave of his troubles. They were silent, as men astonished and amazed. Curæ leves loquuntur, ingentes stupent,—'Our lighter griefs have a voice; those which are more oppressive are mute.'

'So long a time they held their peace, to shew

They spake not a word to him, whatever they said one to another, by way of instruction, for the improvement of the present providence. They said nothing to that purpose that afterwards they spoke a great deal; nothing to grieve him, ch. iv. 2; because they saw his grief was very great already, and they were loath at first to add affliction to the afflicted. There is a time to keep silence, when either the wicked is before us, and by speaking we may harden them, Ps. xxxix. 1, or when by speaking we may offend the generation of God's children, Ps. lxxiii. 15. Their not entering upon the following solemn discourses till the seventh day, may perhaps intimate that it was the sabbath day, which doubtless was observed in the patriarchal age, and to that day they adjourned the intended conference, because probably then company resorted, as usual, to Job's house, to join with him in his devotions, who might be edified by the discourse. Or rather, by their silence so long they would intimate, that what they afterwards said was well considered and digested, and the result of many thoughts; "The heart of the wise studies to answer." We should think twice before we speak once, especially in such a case as this; think long, and we shall be the better able to speak short and to the purpose.

CHAPTER III.

"Ye have heard of the patience of Job," saith the apostle, Jas. v. 11. So we have, and of his impatience too. We admired that a man should be so patient as he was, ch. i., ii.; but we admire that a good man should be so impatient as he is here in this chapter, where we find him cursing his day, and, in passion, I. Complaining that he was born, ver. 1—10. II. Complaining that he did not die as soon as he was born, ver. 11—19. III. Complaining that his life was now continued when he was in misery, ver. 20—26. In this it must be owned that Job sinned with his lips, and it is written, not for our imitation, but our admonition, that he who thinks he stands may take heed lest he fall.

AFTER this opened Job his mouth, and cursed his day.
2 And Job spake, and said,
3 Let the day perish wherein I was born, [conceived.
And the night in which it was said, There is a man child
4 Let that day be darkness;
Let not God regard it from above,
Neither let the light shine upon it.
5 Let darkness and the shadow of death stain it;
Let a cloud dwell upon it;
Let the blackness of the day terrify it.
6 As for that night, let darkness seize upon it;
Let it not be joined unto the days of the year,
Let it not come into the number of the months.
7 Lo, let that night be solitary,
Let no joyful voice come therein.

die;" the Vulgate, "bless God, and die;" the Greek, "Now after much time his wife said unto him, How long wilt thou endure, saying, Behold I continue yet a little time, expecting the hope of my deliverance? For behold, the memory of thee has disappeared from the earth, sons and daughters, the pangs and pains of my womb, whom in vain I toiled in labour for; and thou thyself sittest in the corruption of worms, passing the night in the open air, and I, a wanderer and a drudge from place to place, and from house to house, wait for the sun when he shall set, that I may rest from my labours, and the sorrows which now take hold on me. But say some word to the Lord, and die." The origin of this remarkable addition is unknown. Our translation conveys the true idea; and the expression is probably due to the custom of bidding farewell by blessing, whence the word to bless, to say good-bye to, came to denote to renounce, and eventually, to execrate; the valediction became a malediction.

8 Let them curse it that curse the day,
Who are ready to raise up their mourning.
9 Let the stars of the twilight thereof be dark;
Let it look for light, but have none;
Neither let it see the dawning of the day:
1 Because it shut not up the doors of my mother's womb,
Nor hid sorrow from mine eyes

Long was Job's heart hot within him; and while he was musing the fire burned, and the more for being stifled and suppressed; and at the length he spake with his tongue, but not such a good word as David spake after a long pause: "Lord, make me to know my end," Ps. xxxix. 3, 4. Seven days the prophet Ezekiel sat down astonied with the captives, and then (probably on the sabbath day) the word of the Lord came to him, Eze. iii. 15, 16. So long Job and his friends sat thinking, but said nothing; they were afraid of speaking what they thought, lest they should grieve him, and he durst not give vent to his thoughts, lest he should offend them. They came to comfort him, but, finding his afflictions so very extraordinary, they began to think comfort did not belong to him, suspecting him a hypocrite, and therefore said nothing. But losers think they may have leave to speak, and therefore Job gives vent first to his thoughts, and, unless they had been better, it had been well if he had kept them to himself. In short, he cursed his day, the day of his birth; wished he had never been born, could not think or speak of his own birth without regret and vexation. Whereas men usually observe the annual return of their birth-day with rejoicing, he looked upon it as the unhappiest day of the year, because the unhappiest of his life, being the inlet into all this woe. Now,

First. This was bad enough. The extremity of his trouble, and the discomposure of his spirits, may excuse it in part, but he can by no means be justified in it. Now he has forgotten the good he was born to; the lean kine have eaten up the fat ones; and he is filled with thoughts of the evil only, and wishes he had never been born. The prophet Jeremiah himself expressed his resentment of his calamities in language not much unlike this; not only, "Woe is me, my mother, that thou hast borne me!" Jer. xv. 10, but "Cursed be the day wherein I was born," Jer. xx. 14, &c. We may suppose that Job in his prosperity had many a time blessed God for the day of his birth, and reckoned it a happy day, yet now he brands it with all possible marks of infamy. When we consider the iniquity in which we were conceived and born, we have reason enough to reflect with sorrow and shame upon the day of our birth, and to say that the day of our death, by which we are freed from sin, (Rom. vii. 7,) is far better, Eccl. vii. 1. But to curse the day of our birth, because then we entered upon the calamitous scene of life, is to quarrel with the God of nature, to despise the dignity of our being, and to indulge a passion which our own calm and sober thoughts will make us ashamed of. Certainly there is no condition of life a man can be in in this world, but he may in it (if it be not his own fault) so honour God and work out his own salvation, and make sure a happiness for himself in a better world, that he will have no reason at all to wish he had never been born, but a great deal of reason to say he had his being to good purpose. Yet it must be owned, if there were not another life after this, and Divine consolations to support us in the prospects of it, so many are the sorrows and troubles of this, that we might sometimes be tempted to say we were made in vain, Ps. lxxxix. 47, and to wish we had never been. There are those in hell that, with good reason, wish they had never been born, as Judas, Mat. xxvi. 24; but on this side hell there can be no reason for so vain and ungrateful a wish. It was Job's folly and weakness to curse his day; we must say of it, This was his infirmity; but good men have sometimes failed in the exercise of those graces they have been most eminent for, that we may understand that when they are said to be perfect it is meant they were upright, not that they were sinless. Lastly. Let us observe it, to the honour of the spiritual life above the natural, that, though many have cursed the day of their first birth, never any cursed the day of their new birth, nor wished they never had had grace and the Spirit of grace given them. Those are the most excellent gifts, above life and being itself, and which will never be a burthen.

Secondly. Yet it was not so bad as Satan promised himself. He cursed his day, but he did not curse his God; was weary of his life, and would gladly have parted with that, but not weary of his religion; he resolutely cleaves to that, and will never let it go. The dispute between God and Satan, concerning Job, was not whether Job had his infirmities, and whether he was subject to like passions as we are, that was granted, but whether he was a hypocrite, and secretly hated God, and if he were provoked would shew it; and upon trial it proved he was no such man. Nay, all this may consist with his being a pattern of patience; for, though he did thus speak unadvisedly with his lips, yet both before and after he expressed great submission and resignation to the holy will of God, and repented of his impatience. He condemned himself for it, and therefore God did not condemn him; nor must we, but watch the more carefully over ourselves, lest we sin after the similitude of this transgression.

The particular expressions which Job useth in cursing his day, are full of poetical fancy, flame, and rapture; and create as much difficulty to the critics as the thing itself doth to the divines. We need not be particular in our observations upon them. When he would express his passionate wish that he had never been, he falls foul upon the day, and,

1. He wisheth that earth might forget it; Let it perish, ver. 3; "Let it not be joined to the days of the year," ver. 6. Let it be not only not inserted in the calendar in red letters, as the day of the king's nativity used to be, (and Job was a king, ch. xxix. 25,) but let it be erased and blotted out, and buried in oblivion. Let not the world know that ever such a man as I was born into it, and lived in it, who am made such a spectacle of misery.

2. That Heaven might frown upon it; "Let not God regard it from above," ver. 4. Every thing is indeed as it is with God; that day is honourable on which he puts honour, and which he distinguishes and crowns with his favour and blessing, as he did the seventh day of the week; but let my birth-day never be so honoured, let it be nigro carbone notandus,—'marked as with a black coal,'—marked for an evil day, by him that determines the times before appointed. The Father and Fountain of light appointed the greater light to rule the day and lesser lights to rule the night, but let that want the benefit of both. 1st. "Let that day be darkness," ver. 4; and if the light of the day be darkness, how great is that darkness! how terrible, because then we look for light. Let the gloominess of the day represent Job's condition, whose sun went down at noon. 2nd. "As for that night" too, let it want the benefit of moon and stars, and "let darkness seize upon it," thick darkness, darkness that may be felt, which will not befriend the repose of the night by its silence, but rather disturb it with its terrors.

3. That all joy might forsake it. Let it be a melancholy night, solitary, and not a merry night of music or dancing; "let no joyful voice come therein," ver. 7; let it be a long night, and not "see the eyelids of the morning," ver. 9 which bring joy with them.

4. That all curses might follow it, ver. 8. Let none ever desire to see it, or bid it welcome when it comes; but, on the contrary, "Let them curse it that curse the day." Whatever day any are tempted to curse, let them at the same time bestow one curse upon my birth-day, particularly those that make it their trade to raise up mourning at funerals with their ditties of lamentation. Let them that curse the day of others' death in the same breath curse the day of my birth; or, those who are so fierce and daring as to be ready to raise up the leviathan, for that is the word here, who being about to strike the whale, or crocodile, curse it with the bitterest curse they can invent, hoping by those incantations to weaken it, and so to make themselves masters of it. Probably some such custom might there be used to which our divine poet alludes. Let it be as odious as 'the day wherein men bewail the greatest misfortune, or the time wherein they see the most dreadful apparition;' so Bishop Patrick: I suppose, taking the leviathan here to signify the devil, as others do who understand it of the curses used by conjurers and magicians in raising the devil, or, when they have raised a devil that they cannot lay.

But what is the ground of Job's quarrel with the day and night of his birth? It is "because it shut not up the doors of his mother's womb," ver. 10. See the folly and madness of a passionate discontent, and how absurdly and extravagantly it talks when the reins are laid in the neck of it. Is this Job, who was so much admired for his wisdom, that "unto him men gave ear, and kept silence at his counsel, and after his words they spake not again?" ch. xxix. 21, 22. Sure his wisdom failed him, 1st. When he took so much pains to express his desire that he had never been born, which, at the best, was a vain wish, for it is impossible to make that which has been not to have been. 2nd. When he was so liberal of his curses upon a day and a night that could not be hurt, or made ever the worse for his curses. 3rd. When he wished a thing so very barbarous to his own mother, as that she might not have brought him forth when her full time was come, which must inevitably have been her death, and a miserable death. 4th. When he despised the goodness of God to him in giving him a being, such a being, so noble and excellent a life, such a life, so far above that of any other creature in this lower world, and undervalued the gift as not worth the acceptance, only because transit cum onere,—'it was clogged with a proviso of trouble,' which now at length came upon him after many years' enjoyment of its pleasures. What a foolish thing it was to wish that his eyes had never seen the light, that so they might not have seen sorrow, which yet he might hope to see through, and beyond which he might see joy. Did Job believe and hope that he should in his flesh see God at the latter day, ch. xix. 26, and yet would he wish he never had had a being capable of such a bliss, only because for the present he had sorrow in the flesh? God, by his grace, arm us against this foolish and hurtful lust of impatience!

11 Why died I not from the womb? [belly?
Why did I not give up the ghost when I came out of the 12 Why did the knees prevent me?
Or why the breasts that I should suck?
13 For now should I have lain still and been quiet,
I should have slept: then had I been at rest,
14 With kings and counsellors of the earth,
Which built desolate places for themselves;

PETRA.

15 Or with princes that had gold,
Who filled their houses with silver:
16 Or as an hidden untimely birth I had not been;
As infants which never saw light.
17 There the wicked cease from troubling;
And there the weary be at rest.
18 There the prisoners rest together;
They hear not the voice of the oppressor.
19 The small and great are there;
And the servant is free from his master.

ii. 11. Teman is thought by some, as Rosenmüller, to have been a part of Edom, but others think it was to the east of Edom. The word Teman means to the right hand, that is, the south, which is to the right hand of a person who faces the east. The Shuhites must have been another Arab tribe, and Gesenius supposes that Shuah may be identified with the Saccæa of Ptolemy, to the east of Batanea. The Naamathites, or inhabitants of Naamah, are called Minæans in the Greek. Some think Zophar came from Naamah in Judah, but this is improbable, and we prefer to believe it was from a district adjacent to Shuah and Teman.

ii. 13. The seven days and seven nights here must be understood to mean, that for a week, or simply seven days, Job's friends mourned with him in silence. Mourning often continued seven days among the Orientals, as shown by Gen. l. 10, 1 Sam. xxxi. 13, and Ecclesiasticus xxii. 12.

iii. 1—8. In the first and last of these verses we find three Job, perhaps, reflecting upon himself for his folly in wishing he had never been born, follows it, and thinks to mend it with another, little better, that he had died as soon as he was born, which he enlargeth upon in these verses. When our Saviour would set forth a very calamitous state of things he seems to allow such a saying as this, "Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, and the paps which never gave suck," Lu. xxiii. 29: but blessing the barren womb is one thing, and cursing the fruitful womb is another. It is good to make the best of afflictions, but it is not good to make the worst of mercies. Our rule is, "Bless, and curse not." Life is often put for all good, and death for all evil; yet Job here very absurdly complains of life and its supports as a curse and a plague to him, and envies death and the grave as the greatest and most desirable bliss. Surely Satan was deceived in Job when he applied that maxim to him, "all that a man has will he give for his life;" for never any man valued life at a lower rate than he did.

First. He ungratefully quarrels with life, and is angry that his was not taken from him as soon as it was given him; ver. 11, 12, "Why died I not from the womb?" See here, 1. What a weak and helpless creature man is when he comes into the world, and how slender the thread of life is when it is first drawn. We are ready to die from the womb, and to breathe our last as soon as we breathe at all. We can do nothing for ourselves as other creatures can, but should drop into the grave if the knees did not prevent us; and the lamp of life when first lighted would go out of itself, if the breasts given us that we should suck did not supply it with fresh oil. 2. What a merciful and tender care Divine providence took of us at our entrance into the world. It was owing to this that we died not from the womb, and did not give up the ghost when we came out of the belly. Why were we not cut off as soon as we were born? Not because we did not deserve it; justly might such weeds have been plucked up as soon as they appeared, justly might such cockatrices have been crushed in the egg. Not because we did or could take any care of ourselves, and our own safety: no creature comes into the world so shiftless as man. It was not our might, or the power of our hand that preserved us these beings; but God's power and providence upheld our frail lives, and his pity and patience spared our forfeited lives. It was owing to this that the knees prevented us. Natural affection is put into parents' hearts by the hand of the God of nature; and hence it was that the blessings of the breast attended those of the womb. 3. What a great deal of vanity and vexation of spirit attends human life! If we had not a God to serve in this world, and better things to hope for in another world, considering the faculties we are endued with, and the troubles we are surrounded with, we should be strongly tempted to wish that we had died from the womb, which had prevented a great deal both of sin and misery.

'He that is born to day, and dies to morrow,
Loses some hours of joy, but months of sorrow.'

4. The evil of impatience, fretfulness, and discontent. When it thus prevails, it is unreasonable and absurd, it is impious and ungrateful, it is slighting and undervaluing God's favour. How much soever life is embittered, we must say it was of the Lord's mercies that we died not from the womb, that we were not consumed. It is contradicting the common sense and sentiments of mankind, and our own at another time. Let discontented people declaim never so much against life, they will be loath to part with it when it comes to the setting to. When the old man in the fable, being tired with his burthen, threw it down in discontent, and called for Death, and Death came to him and asked what he would, have with him, he then answered, 'Nothing, but help me up with my burthen.

Secondly. He passionately applauds death and the grave, and seems hugely in love with them. To desire to die that we may be with Christ, that we may be free from sin, and that we may be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven, is the effect and evidence of grace; but to desire to die only that we may be quiet in the grave, and delivered from the troubles of this life, savours of corruption. Job's considerations here may be of good use to reconcile us to death when it comes, and to make us easy under the arrests of it, but they ought not to be made use of as a pretence to quarrel with life while it is continued, or to make us uneasy under the burthens of it. It is our wisdom and duty to make the best of that which is, be it living or dying, and so to live to the Lord, and die to the Lord, and to be his in both, Rom. xiv. 8. Job here frets himself with thinking that if he had but died as soon as he was born, and been carried from the womb to the tomb,

1. His condition would have been as good as that of the best. "I should have been," saith he, ver. 14, "with kings and counsellors of the earth," whose pomp, power, and policy cannot set them out of the reach of death, nor secure them from the grave, nor distinguish theirs from common dust in the grave. Even princes that had gold in abundance could not with it bribe death to overlook them when he came with commission; and, though they filled their houses with silver, yet they were forced to leave it all behind them, no more to return to it. Some, by the desolate places which the kings and counsellors are here said to build for themselves, understand the sepulchres or monuments they prepared for themselves in their lifetime; as Shebna, Isa. xxii. 16, hewed him out a sepulchre; and by the gold which the princes had, and the silver with which they filled their houses, they understand the treasures which, they say, it was usual to deposit in the graves of great men. Such arts have men used to preserve their dignity, if possible, on the other side death, and to keep themselves from lying even with those of inferior rank; but it will not do, death is and will be an irresistible leveller. Mors sceptra ligonibus æquat,—'Death mingles sceptres with spades.' Rich and poor meet together in the grave; and there a hidden untimely birth, ver. 16, a child that either never saw light, or but just opened its eyes, and peeped into the world, and, not liking it, closed them again, and hastened out of it, lies as soft and easy, lies as high and safe, as kings and counsellors, and princes that had gold; and, therefore, saith Job, would I had lain there in the dust, rather than live to lie here in the ashes.

2. His condition would have been much better than now it was; ver. 13, "Then should I have lain still and been quiet," which now I cannot do, I cannot be, but am still tossing and unquiet; then I should have slept, whereas now sleep departeth from mine eyes; then had I been at rest, whereas now I am restless. Now life and immortality are brought to a much clearer light by the Gospel than before they were placed in, good Christians can give a better account than this of the gain of death; Then should I have been present with the Lord, then should I have seen his glory face to face, and no longer through a glass darkly; but all that poor Job dreamed of was rest and quietness in the grave, out of the fear of evil tidings, and out of the feeling of sore boils. Then should I have been quiet; and, had he kept his temper, his even, easy temper still, which he was in in the two foregoing chapters, entirely resigned to the holy will of God, and acquiescing in it, he might have been quiet now; his soul at least might have dwelt at ease, even when his body lay in pain, Ps. xxv. 13. Observe how finely he describes the repose of the grave, which, provided the soul also be at rest in God, may much assist our triumphs over it.

1st. Those that now are troubled will there be out of the reach of trouble; ver. 17, "there the wicked cease from troubling." When persecutors die they can no longer persecute; their hatred and envy is now perished. Herod had vexed the church, but when he became a prey for worms he ceased from troubling. When the persecuted die, they are out of the danger of being any farther troubled. Had Job been at rest in his grave, he had had no disturbance from the Sabeans and Chaldeans; none of all his enemies had created him any trouble.

2nd. Those that are now toiled will there see the period of their toils; "there the weary are at rest." Heaven is more than a rest to the souls of saints, but the grave is a rest to their bodies; their pilgrimage is a weary pilgrimage; sin and the world they are weary of; their services, sufferings, and expectations they are wearied with, but in the grave they rest from all their labours, Rev. xiv. 13; Isa. lvii. 2. They are easy there, and make no complaints; there believers sleep in Jesus.

3rd. Those that were here enslaved are there at liberty. Death is the prisoner's discharge, the relief of the oppressed, and the servant's manumission, ver. 18. There the prisoners, though they walk not at large, yet they rest together, and are not put to work to grind in that prison house. They are no more insulted and trampled upon, menaced, and terrified by their cruel taskmasters; "they hear not the voice of the oppressor." They that were here doomed to perpetual servitude, that could call nothing their own, no, not their own bodies, are there no longer under command or control; there "the servant is free from his master," which is a good reason why those that have power should use it moderately, and those that are in subjection should bear it patiently,—yet a little while.

4th. Those that were at a vast distance from all other, there are upon a level; ver. 19, "the small and great are there;" there the same, there all one, all alike free among the dead. The tedious pomp and state which attends the great is at an end there, all the inconveniences of a poor and low condition are likewise over; death and the grave know no difference.

'Levell'd by death, the conqueror and the slave,
The wise and foolish, cowards and the brave,
Lie mix'd and undistinguish'd in the grave.'—Sir R. Blackmore.

20 Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery,
And life unto the bitter in soul;
21 Which long for death, but it cometh not;
And dig for it more than for hid treasures;
22 Which rejoice exceedingly,
And are glad, when they can find the grave?
23 Why is light given to a man whose way is hid,
And whom God hath hedged in?
24 For my sighing cometh before I eat,
And my roarings are poured out like the waters.
25 For the thing which I greatly feared is come upon me,
And that which I was afraid of is come unto me.
26 I was not in safety, neither had I rest, neither was I
Yet trouble came. [quiet;

Job, finding it to no purpose to wish either that he had not been born, or had died as soon as he was born, here complains that his life was now continued, and not cut off. When men are set on quarrelling, there is no end of it; the corrupt heart will carry on the humour. Having cursed the day of his birth, here he courts the day of his death. The beginning of this strife and impatience is as the letting forth of water.

First. He thinks it hard in general that miserable lives should be prolonged; ver. 20—22, "Wherefore is light in life given to them that are bitter in soul?" Bitterness of soul, through spiritual grievances, makes life itself bitter. 'Why doth he give light?' so it is in the original. He means God, yet doth not name him, though the devil had said, "He will curse thee to thy face;" but he tacitly reflects on the Divine providence as unjust and unkind in continuing life when the comforts of life are removed. Life is called light, because pleasant and serviceable for walking and working: it is candle light, the longer it burns the shorter it goes, and the nearer the socket. This light is said to be given us; for, if it were not daily renewed to us by a fresh gift, it would be lost. But Job reckons to those that are in misery, it is δῶρον ἄδωρον,—'a gift and no gift,' a gift that they had better be without, while the light only serves them to see their own misery by. Such is the vanity of human life that even it sometimes becomes a vexation of spirit; and so alterable is the property of death, that, though dreadful to nature, even it may become desirable to nature itself. He speaks of those here, 1. Who long for death when they have outlived their comforts and usefulness, are burthened with age and infirmities, with pain or sickness, poverty or disgrace, and yet it comes not; while at the same time it comes to many that dread it, and would put it far from them. The continuance and period of life must be according to God's will, not according to ours. It is not fit we should be consulted how long we would live, and when we would die; our times are in a better hand than our own. 2. Who dig for it as for hid treasures; that is, would give any thing for a fair dismission out of this world, which supposeth that then the thought of men's being their own executioners was not so much as entertained or suggested, else those that longed for it needed not take much pains for it; they might soon come at it, (as Seneca tells them,) if they pleased. 3. Who bid it welcome, and are glad when they can find the grave, and see themselves stepping into it. If the miseries of this life can prevail, contrary to nature, to make death itself desirable, shall not much more the hopes and prospects of a better life, to which death is our passage, make it so, and set us quite above the fear of it? It may be a sin to long for death, but I am sure it is no sin to long for heaven.

Secondly. He thinks himself in particular hardly dealt with, that he might not be eased of his pain and misery by death, when he could not get ease any other way. To be thus impatient of life for the sake of the troubles we meet with, is not only unnatural in itself, but ungrateful to the Giver of life, and argues a sinful indulgence of our own passion, and a sinful inconsideration of our future state. Let it be our great and constant care to get ready for another world, and then let us leave it to God to order the circumstances of our removal thither as he thinks fit; Lord, when and how thou pleasest; and this with such an indifferency, that, if he should refer it to us, we would refer it to him again. Grace teaches us in the midst of life's greatest comforts to be willing to die, and in the midst of its greatest crosses to be willing to live. Job, to excuse himself in this mighty desire he had to die, pleads the little comfort and satisfaction he had in life.

1. In his present afflicted state, troubles were continually felt, and were likely to be so. He thought he had cause enough to be weary of living; for, 1st. He had no comfort of his life; "My sighing comes before I eat," ver. 24. The sorrows of life prevented and anticipated the supports of life; nay, they took away his stomach, and spoiled his appetite to his necessary food. His griefs returned as duly as his meals, and affliction was his daily bread. Nay, so different words translated 'curse," and none of them the same as the one previously so rendered, but all properly meaning "to curse." For "their mourning," in verse 8, the margin has "leviathan," and so it is in the Hebrew, the Syriac, and the Latin. There are several difficulties in the passage, upon which critics are divided in opinion, but which cannot here be examined in detail.

iii. 14. In ancient times the sepulchres of the great were often in deserted localities, away from towns and cities; and perhaps the reference here is to the monuments which kings and counsellors built for themselves during their lifetime in such places, or which were built for them by others. The custom of preparing their own tombs was not at all uncommon. Delitzsch says the desolate places or ruins here are "such as are from the first intended to remain uninhabited and desolate, consequently sepulchres, mausoleums:" and he thinks the pyramids may be alluded to. Renan also understands the mausoleums built for themselves by the persons mentioned.

great was the extremity of his pain and anguish, that he did not only sigh, but roar, and his roarings were poured out like the waters in a full and constant stream. Our Master was acquainted with grief, and we must expect to be so too. 2nd. He had no prospect of bettering his condition; his way was hid, and God had hedged him in, ver. 23. He saw no way open of deliverance, nor knew he what course to take; his way was hedged up with thorns that he could not find his path: see ch. xxiii. 8; Lam. iii. 7.

2. Even in his former prosperous state troubles were continually feared; so that then he was never easy, ver. 25, 26. He knew so much of the vanity of the world, and the troubles to which of course he was born, that he was not in safety, neither had he rest then. That which made his grief now the more grievous was, that he was not conscious to himself of any great degree either of negligence or security in the day of his prosperity, which might provoke God thus to chastise him. 1st. He had not been negligent and mindless of his affairs, but kept up such a fear of trouble as was necessary to the maintaining of his guard. He was afraid for his children when they were feasting, lest they should offend God, ch. i. 5; afraid for his servants, lest they should offend his neighbours; he took all the care he could of his own health, and managed himself and his affairs with all possible precaution; yet all would not do. 2nd. He had not been secure, nor indulged himself in ease and softness, had not trusted in his wealth, nor flattered himself with the hopes of the perpetuity of his mirth, yet trouble came, to convince and mind him of the vanity of the world, which yet he had not forgot when he lived at ease. Thus his way was hid, for he knew not wherefore God contended with him. Now this consideration, instead of aggravating his grief, might rather serve to alleviate it. Nothing will make trouble easy so much as the testimony of our consciences for us, that in some measure we did our duty in a day of prosperity; and an expectation of trouble will make it sit the lighter when it comes. The less it is a surprise, the less it is a terror.

CHAPTER IV.

Job having warmly given vent to his passion, and so broken the ice, his friends here come gravely to give vent to their judgment upon his case, which perhaps they had communicated to one another apart, compared notes upon it, and talked it over among themselves, and found they were all agreed in their verdict, that Job's afflictions certainly proved him to have been a hypocrite; but they did not attack Job with this high charge till, by the expressions of his discontent and impatience, in which they thought he reflected on God himself, he had confirmed them in the ill opinion they had before conceived of him and his character. Now they set upon him with great fear. The dispute begins, and it begins to be hot presently: the opponents are Job's three friends; Job himself is respondent; Elihu appears first as moderator, and at length God himself gives judgment upon the controversy, and the management of it. The question in dispute is, Whether Job was an honest man or no? the same question that was in dispute between God and Satan in the first two chapters. Satan had yielded it, and durst not pretend that his cursing of his day was a constructive cursing of his God; no, he cannot deny but that Job still holds fast his integrity. But Job's friends will needs have that if Job were an honest man he would not have been thus sorely and thus tediously afflicted; and therefore urge him to confess himself a hypocrite in the profession he made of religion. No, saith Job, that I will never do; I have offended God, but my heart, notwithstanding, has been upright with him; and still he holds fast the comfort of his integrity. Eliphaz, who it is likely was the senior, or of the best quality, begins with him in this chapter. In which, I. He bespeaks a patient hearing, ver. 2. II. He compliments Job with an acknowledgment of the eminency and usefulness of the profession he had made of religion, ver. 3, 4. III. He charges him with hypocrisy in his profession, grounding his charge upon his present troubles and his carriage under them, ver. 5, 6. IV. To make good the inference, he maintains that man's wickedness is that which always brings God's judgment, ver. 7—11. V. He corroborates his assertion by a vision which he had, in which he was minded of the incontestable purity and justice of God, and the meanness, and weakness, and sinfulness of man, ver. 12—21. By all this he aims to bring down Job's spirit, and to make him both penitent and patient under his afflictions.

THEN Eliphaz the Temanite answered and said,
2 If we assay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved?
But who can withhold himself from speaking?
3 Behold, thou hast instructed many,
And thou hast strengthened the weak hands.
4 Thy words have upholden him that was falling,
And thou hast strengthened the feeble knees.
5 But now it is come upon thee, and thou faintest;
It toucheth thee, and thou art troubled.
6 Is not this thy fear, thy confidence,
Thy hope, and the uprightness of thy ways?

In these verses,

First. Eliphaz excuses the trouble he is now about to give to Job by his discourse; ver. 2, 'If we assay a word with thee, offer a word of reproof and counsel, wilt thou be grieved and take it ill? we have reason to fear thou wilt; but there is no remedy, who can refrain from words?' Observe, 1. With what modesty he speaks of himself and his own attempt. He will not undertake the management of the cause alone, but very humbly joins his friends with him; We will commune with thee. They that plead God's cause must be glad of help, lest it suffer through their weakness. He will not promise much, but begs leave to assay, or attempt, and try if he could propose any thing that might be pertinent, and suit Job's case. In difficult matters it becomes us to pretend no farther, but only to try what may be said or done. Many excellent discourses have gone under the modest title of essays. 2. With what tenderness he speaks of Job, and his present afflicted condition; 'If we tell thee our mind, wilt thou be grieved? Wilt thou take it ill? Wilt thou lay it to thine own heart, as thine affliction, or to our charge, as our fault? Shall we be reckoned unkind and cruel if we deal plainly and faithfully with thee? We desire we may not, we hope we shall not, and should be sorry if that should be ill resented which is well intended.' Note, We ought to be afraid of grieving any, especially those that are already in grief, lest we add affliction to the afflicted, as David's enemies, Ps. lxix. 26. We should shew ourselves backward to say that which we foresee will be grievous, though never so necessary. God himself, though he afflicts justly, yet he doth not afflict willingly, Lam. iii. 33. 3. With what assurance he speaks of the truth and pertinency of what he was about to say, "Who can withhold himself from speaking?" Surely it was a pious zeal for God's honour, and the spiritual welfare of Job, that laid him under this necessity of speaking. Who can forbear speaking in vindication of God's honour which we hear reproved, in love to thy soul which we see endangered? Note, It is foolish pity not to reprove our friends, even our friends in affliction, for what they say or do amiss, only for fear of offending them. Whether men take it well or ill, we must with wisdom and meekness do our duty, and discharge a good conscience.

Secondly. He exhibits a twofold charge against Job:

1. As to his particular carriage under this affliction, he chargeth him with weakness and faint-heartedness; and that article of his charge there was too much ground for, ver. 3—5. And here,

1st. He takes notice of Job's former serviceableness to the comfort of others. He owns that Job had instructed many, not only his own children and servants, but many others, his neighbours and friends, as many as fell within the sphere of his activity. He did not only encourage those who were teachers by office, and countenance them, and pay for the teaching of those that were poor, but he did himself instruct many. Though a great man, he did not think it below him; king Solomon was a preacher. Though a man of business he found time to do it, went among his neighbours, talked to them about their souls, and gave them good counsel. Oh that this example of Job were imitated by our great men! If he met with those that were ready to fall into sin, or sink under their troubles, his words upheld them. A wonderful dexterity he had in offering that which was proper to fortify persons against temptations, to support them under their burthens, and to comfort afflicted consciences. He had and used the tongue of the learned, knew how to speak a word in season to them that were weary, and employed himself much in that good work. With suitable counsels and comforts he strengthened the weak hands for work and service, and the spiritual warfare; and the feeble knees for the bearing up the man in his journey, and under his load. It is our duty not only to lift up our own hands that hang down, by quickening and encouraging ourselves in the way of duty, Heb. xii. 12, but we must also strengthen the weak hands of others, as there is occasion, and do what we can to confirm their feeble knees, by saying to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, Isa. xxxv. 3, 4. The expressions seem to be borrowed from hence. Note, They that have abundance of spiritual riches should abound in spiritual charity. A good word well and wisely spoken may do more good than perhaps we think of.

But why doth Eliphaz mention this here? First. Perhaps he praiseth him thus for the good he had done, that he might make the intended reproof the more passable with him. Just commendation is a good preface to a just reprehension, will help to remove prejudices, and will shew that the reproof comes not from ill-will. Paul praised the Corinthians before he chid them, 1 Cor. xi. 7. Secondly. He remembers how Job had comforted others, as a reason why he might justly expect to be himself comforted, and yet if conviction was necessary in order to comfort, they must be excused if they applied themselves to that first; the Comforter shall reprove, Jno. xvi. 8. Thirdly. He speaks this perhaps in a way of pity, lamenting it, that through the extremity of his affliction he could not apply those comforts to himself which he had formerly administered to others. It is easier to give good counsel than to take it, to preach meekness and patience than to practise them; Facile omnes cum valemus rectum concilium ægrotis damus,—'We all find it easy, when in health, to give good advice to the sick.'—Terent. Fourthly. Most think he mentions it as an aggravation of his present discontent, upbraiding him with his knowledge, and the good offices he had done for others; as if he had said, Thou that hast taught others, why dost thou not teach thyself? Is not this an evidence of thine hypocrisy, that thou hast prescribed that medicine to others which thou wilt not now take thyself, and so contradictest thyself, and actest against thy own known principles? Thou that teachest another not to faint, dost thou faint? Rom. ii. 12; physician, heal thyself. They who have rebuked others, must expect to hear of it if they themselves become obnoxious to rebuke.

2nd. He upbraids him with his present low-spiritedness, ver. 5. "Now it is come upon thee," now it is thy turn to be afflicted, and the bitter cup that goes round is put into thy hand, "now it toucheth thee, thou faintest, thou art troubled." First. He makes too light of Job's afflictions; "it toucheth thee." The very word that Satan himself had used, ch. i. 11; ii. 5. Had Eliphaz felt but the one half of Job's affliction he would have said, It smites me, it wounds me; but, speaking of Job's afflictions, he makes but a fleabite of it, It touches thee, and thou canst not bear to be touched: noli me tangere,—'Touch me not.' Secondly. He makes too much of Job's resentments, and aggravates them; "Thou faintest," or, thou art beside thyself, thou ravest, and knowest not what thou sayest. Men in deep distress must have grains of allowance, and a favourable construction put upon what they say. When we make the worst of every word, we do not as we would be done by.

2. As to his general character before this affliction, he chargeth him with wickedness and false-heartedness, and that article of his charge was utterly groundless and unjust. How unkindly doth he banter him, and upbraid him with the great profession of religion he had made, as if it were all now come to nothing, and proved a sham; ver. 6, "Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, thy hope, and the uprightness of thy ways?" Doth it not all appear now to be a mere pretence? for, hadst thou been sincere in it, God would not thus have afflicted thee, nor wouldest thou have carried thyself thus under the affliction. This was the very thing Satan aimed at, to prove Job a hypocrite, and disprove the character God had given of him. When he could not himself do this to God, but he still saw and said, Job is perfect and upright, then he endeavoured by his friends to do it to Job himself, and to persuade him to confess himself a hypocrite. Could he have gained that point, he would have triumphed, Habet confitentem reum,—'Out of thy own mouth will I condemn thee.' But by the grace of God Job was enabled to hold his own, and would not bear false witness against himself. Note, Those that pass rash and uncharitable censures upon their brethren, and condemn them for hypocrites, do Satan's work, and serve his interest more than they are aware of. I know not how it comes to pass that this verse is differently read in several editions of our common English Bibles. The original, and all ancient versions, put "thy hope" before "the uprightness of thy ways." So doth the Geneva, and most of the editions of the last translation; but I find one of the first, in 1612, has it, "Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, the uprightness of thy ways and thy hope?" Both the Assembly's Annotations and Mr. Poole's have that reading. And an edition in 1660 reads it, "Is not thy fear thy confidence; and the uprightness of thy ways thy hope?" Doth it not appear now that all the religion, both of thy devotion and of thy conversation, was only in hope and confidence that thou shouldest grow rich by it? Was it not all mercenary? The very thing that Satan suggested. "Is not thy religion thy hope, and thy right ways thy confidence?" so Mr. Broughton. Or, Was it not? Didst thou not think that would have been thy protection? but thou art deceived. Or, Would it not have been so? If it had been sincere, would it not have kept thee from this despair? It is true, "If thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength," thy grace, "is small," Pr. xxiv. 10; but it doth not there follow, thou hast no grace, no strength at all. A man's character is not to be taken from a single act.

7 Remember, I pray thee, who ever perished, being innocent?
Or where were the righteous cut off?

iii. 15. The wealthy dead, who collected riches and passed into oblivion. Others suppose the reference may be to the burying of treasures with rich men, but this is improbable.

iii. 24. Our translation means that Job began the day with sighing, that he began to sigh before he began to eat; and it is a probable explanation. Others, however, as Dr. Good, understand that the sighing of Job took the place of his food; while Dr. Noyes interprets it, "My sighing comes on when I begin to eat, and prevents my taking my daily nourishment." The idea may be thus expressed: he was choked with grief, and unable to swallow his food. The clause, "my roarings are poured out like the waters," signifies that his lamentations were incessant and unrestrained. When water once finds a vent, it is not easily stopped; and when grief once gets the upper hand, it is not readily controlled.

iv. 2. For "if we assay to commune with thee," the Hebrew is, "if one attempt a word with thee." Dr. Bernard translates, "Hath

8 Even as I have seen, they that plow iniquity,
And sow wickedness, reap the same.
9 By the blast of God they perish,
And by the breath of his nostrils are they consumed.
10 The roaring of the lion, and the voice of the fierce lion,
And the teeth of the young lions, are broken.
11 The old lion perisheth for lack of prey,
And the stout lion's whelps are scattered abroad.

Eliphaz here advanceth another argument to prove Job a hypocrite, and will have not only his impatience under his afflictions to be evidence against him, but even his afflictions themselves, being so very great and extraordinary, and there being no prospect at all of his deliverance out of them. To strengthen this argument he here lays down these two principles, which seem plausible enough:

First. That good men were never thus ruined. And for the proof of this he appeals to Job's own observation; ver. 7, "Remember, I pray thee;" recollect all that thou hast seen, heard, or read, and give me an instance of any one that was innocent and righteous, and yet perished as thou dost, and was cut off as thou art. If we understand it of a final and eternal destruction, his principle is true; none that are innocent and righteous perish for ever. It is only a man of sin that is a son of perdition, 2 Thes. ii. 3. But then it is ill applied to Job; he did not thus perish, nor was he cut off. A man is never undone till he is in hell. But, if we understand it of any temporal calamity, his principle is not true. "The righteous perish," Isa. lvii. 1; "there is one event both to the righteous and to the wicked," Eccl. ix. 2, both in life and death; the great and certain difference is after death. Even before Job's time, as early as it was, there were instances sufficient to contradict this principle. Did not righteous Abel perish being innocent; and was not he cut off in the beginning of his days? Was not righteous Lot burnt out of house and harbour, and forced to retire to a melancholy cave? Was not righteous Jacob, a Syrian, ready to perish? Deu. xxvi. 5. And other such instances no doubt there were, which are not on record.

Secondly. That wicked men were often thus ruined; and for the proof of this he voucheth his own observation; ver. 8, "Even as I have seen," many a time, "they that plow iniquity, and sow wickedness, by the blast of God they perish," ver. 9. We have daily instances of that; and therefore, since thou dost thus perish and art consumed, we have reason to think that, whatever profession of religion thou hast made, thou hast but ploughed iniquity and sown wickedness. Even as I have seen in others, so I do see in thee.

1. He speaks of sinners in general, politic busy sinners, that take pains in sin, for they plough iniquity; and expect gain by sin, for they sow wickedness. They that plough, plough in hope; but what is the issue? They reap the same; they shall of the flesh reap corruption and ruin, Gal. vi. 7, 8. The harvest will be a heap in the day of grief and desperate sorrow, Isa. xvii. 11. He shall reap the same, that is, the proper product of that seedness. That which the sinner sows, he sows not that body that shall be; but God will give it a body, a body of death, the end of those things, Rom. vi. 21. Some, by iniquity and wickedness, understand wrong and injury done to others; they who plough and sow that shall reap the same, that is, they shall be paid in their own coin. They that are troublesome shall be troubled, 2 Thes. i. 6; Jos. vii. 25. The spoilers spoiled, Isa. xxxiii. 1; and those that led captive shall go captive, Rev. xiii. 10. He farther describes their destruction, ver. 9, "By the blast of God they perish." The projects they take so much pains in are defeated, God cuts in sunder the cords of these ploughers, Ps. cxxix. 3, 4. They themselves are destroyed, which is the just punishment of their iniquity. They perish, that is, they are destroyed utterly; they are consumed, that is, they are destroyed gradually; and this by the blast and breath of God; that is, 1st. By his wrath. His anger is the ruin of sinners, who are therefore called vessels of wrath, and his breath is said to kindle Tophet, Isa. xxx. 33; "Who knows the power of his anger?" Ps. xc. 8. 2nd. By his word. He speaks and it is done, easily and effectually. The Spirit of God in the Word consumes sinners; with that he slays them, Hos. vi. 5. Saying and doing are not two things with God. The man of sin is said to be consumed with the breath of Christ's mouth, 2 Thes. ii. 8: compare Isa. xi. 4; Rev. xix. 21. Some think, in attributing the destruction of sinners to the blast of God, and the breath of his nostrils, he refers to the wind which blew the house down upon Job's children, as if they were therefore sinners above all men, because they suffered such things, Lu. xiii. 2.

2. He speaks particularly of tyrants and cruel oppressors, under the similitude of lions, ver. 10, 11. Observe, 1st. How he describes their cruelty and oppression. The Hebrew tongue has five several names for lions, and they are all here used, to set forth the terrible tearing power, fierceness, and cruelty of proud oppressors; they roar, and rend, and prey upon all about them, and bring up their young ones to do so too, Eze. xix. 3. The devil is a roaring lion, and they partake of his nature, and do his lusts. They are strong as lions, and subtle, Ps. x. 9; xvii. 12; and as far as they prevail lay all desolate about them. 2nd. How he describes their destruction; the destruction both of their power and of their persons. They shall be restrained from doing farther hurt, and reckoned with for the hurt they have done. An effectual course shall be taken, First. That they shall not terrify; the voice of their roaring shall be stopped. Secondly. That they shall not tear; God will disarm them, will take away their power to do hurt. The teeth of the young lions are broken, Ps. iii. 7. Thus shall the remainder of wrath be restrained. Thirdly. That they shall not enrich themselves with the spoil of their neighbours. Even the old lion is famished, and perisheth for lack of prey. They that have surfeited on spoil and rapine are perhaps reduced to such straits as to die for hunger at last. Fourthly. That they shall not, as they promised themselves, leave a succession. The stout lions' whelps are scattered abroad, to seek for food themselves, which the old ones used to bring in for them; Nah. ii. 12, "The lion did tear in pieces for his whelps," but now they must shift for themselves. Perhaps Eliphaz intended in this to reflect upon Job, as if he, being "the greatest of all the men of the east," had got his estate by spoil, and used his power in oppressing his neighbours; but now his power and estate were gone, and his family scattered. If so, it was pity a man whom God praised should be thus abused.

12 Now a thing was secretly brought to me,
And mine ear received a little thereof.
13 In thoughts from the visions of the night,
When deep sleep falleth on men,
14 Fear came upon me, and trembling,
Which made all my bones to shake.
15 Then a spirit passed before my face;
The hair of my flesh stood up:
16 It stood still, but I could not discern the form thereof.
An image was before mine eyes,
There was silence, and I heard a voice, saying,
17 Shall mortal man be more just than God?
Shall a man be more pure than his maker?
18 Behold, he put no trust in his servants;
And his angels he charged with folly:
19 How much less in them that dwell in houses of clay,
Whose foundation is in the dust,
Which are crushed before the moth?
20 They are destroyed from morning to evening:
They perish for ever without any regarding it.
21 Doth not their excellency which is in them go away?
They die, even without wisdom.

Eliphaz, having undertaken to convince Job of the sin and folly of his discontent and impatience, here vouches a vision he had been favoured with, which he relates to Job for his conviction. What comes immediately from God all men will pay a particular deference to, and Job no doubt as much as any. Some think Eliphaz had this vision now lately, since he came to Job, putting words into his mouth wherewith to reason with him; and it had been well if he had kept to the purport of this vision, which would serve for a ground on which to reprove Job for his murmuring, but not to condemn him for a hypocrite. Others think he had it formerly; for God did in this way often communicate himself to the children of men in those first ages of the world, ch. xxxiii. 15. Probably God had sent Eliphaz this messenger and message some time or other when he was himself in an unquiet, discontented frame, to calm and pacify him. Note, As we should comfort others with that wherewith we have been comforted, (2 Cor. i. 4,) so we should endeavour to convince others with that which has been powerful to convince us. The people of God had not then any written Word to quote, and therefore God sometimes notified to them even common truths by the extraordinary ways of revelation. We that have Bibles have there (thanks be to God!) a more sure Word to depend upon than even visions and voices, 2 Pet. i. 19. Observe,

First. The manner how this message was sent to Eliphaz, and the circumstances of the conveyance of it to him. 1. It was brought him secretly, or by stealth. Some of the sweetest communion gracious souls have with God is in secret, where no eye sees but his that is all eye. God has ways of bringing conviction, counsel, and comfort to his people, unobserved by the world; by private whispers, as powerfully and effectually as by the public ministry. His secret is with them, Ps. xxv. 14. As the evil spirit often steals good words out of the heart, Mat. xiii. 19, so the good Spirit sometimes steals good words into the heart, or ever we are aware. 2. He received a little thereof, ver. 12; and it is but little of Divine knowledge that the best receive in this world. We know little in comparison with what is to be known, and with what we shall know when we come to heaven. "How little a portion is heard of God!" ch. xxvi. 14; "We know but in part," 1 Cor. xiii. 12. See his humility and modesty: he pretends not to have understood it fully, but something of it he perceived. 3. It was brought him in the visions of the night, ver. 13, when he was retired from the world, and the hurry of it, and all about him was composed and quiet. Note, The more we are withdrawn from the world, and the things of it, the fitter we are for communion with God. When we are communing with our own hearts, and are still, (Ps. iv. 4,) then is a proper time for the Holy Spirit to commune with us. When others were asleep Eliphaz was ready to receive this visit from Heaven, and probably, like David, was meditating upon God in the night watches. In the midst of those good thoughts this thing was brought to him. We should hear more from God if we thought more of him; yet some are surprised with convictions in the night, ch. xxxiii. 14, 15. 4. It was prefaced with terrors; fear came upon him and trembling, ver. 14. It should seem, before he either heard or saw any thing, he was seized with this trembling, which shook his bones, and perhaps the bed under him. A holy awe and reverence of God and his majesty being struck upon his spirit, he was thereby prepared for a Divine visit. Whom God intends to honour, he first humbles and lays low, and will have us all to serve him with holy fear, and to rejoice with trembling.

Secondly. The messenger by whom it was sent. A spirit, one of the good angels, who are employed not only as the ministers of God's providence, but sometimes as the ministers of his Word. Concerning this apparition which Eliphaz saw, we are here told, ver. 15, 16, 1. That it was real, and not a dream, not a fancy. An image was before his eyes, he plainly saw it: at first it passed and repassed before his face, moved up and down; but at length it stood still, to speak to him. If some have been so knavish as to impose false visions on others, and some so foolish as to be themselves imposed upon, it doth not therefore follow but that there have been apparitions of spirits, both good and bad. 2. That it was indistinct, and somewhat confused. He could not discern the form thereof, so as to frame any exact idea of it in his own mind, much less to give a description of it. His conscience was to be awakened and informed, not his curiosity gratified. We know little of spirits, we are not capable of knowing much of them, nor is it fit we should. All in good time; we must shortly remove to the world of spirits, and shall then be better acquainted with them. 3. That it put him into a mighty consternation, so that his hair stood on end. Ever since man sinned it has been terrible to him to receive an express from Heaven, as conscious to himself that he can expect no good tidings thence; apparitions therefore, even of good spirits, have always made deep impressions of fear, even upon good men. How well is it for us that God sends us his messages not by spirits, but by men like ourselves, whose terror shall not make us afraid: see Dan. vii. 28; x. 8, 9.

Thirdly. The message itself. Before it was delivered there was silence, profound silence, ver. 16. When we are to speak, either from God or to him, it becomes us to address ourselves to it with a solemn pause, and so to set bounds about the mount on which God is to come down, and not be hasty to utter any thing. It was in a still small voice that the message was delivered, and this was it, ver. 17, "Shall mortal man be more just than God," the immortal God?

one ever tried a word with thee?" Barnes calls it "a gentle and polite apology at the beginning of his speech—an inquiry whether he would take it as unkind, if one should adventure on a remark in the way of argument."

iv. 6. Expositors have differed considerably about the sense of this verse. The words may be rendered very literally, "Is not thy fear thy confidence, thy hope, and the integrity of thy ways?" By "fear" many understand reverence, piety, or the fear of God, and they suppose Eliphaz asks Job whether his religion is not his ground of confidence. To this there is no serious objection, although the Greek has, "Is not thy fear founded on folly, and thy hope, and the evil of thy way?" Not a few would in effect transpose the members of the second clause, and put it thus: "And is not the integrity of thy ways thy hope?" Others again follow the English version, and they may be correct.

iv. 8. This is proverbial: bad beginnings make bad endings.

"Shall a man be" thought to be, or pretend to be, "more pure than his Maker?" Away with such a thought! 1. Some think Eliphaz aims hereby to prove that Job's great afflictions were a certain evidence of his being a wicked man. A mortal man would be thought unjust, and very impure, if he should thus correct and punish a servant or subject, unless he had been guilty of some very great crime; if, therefore, there were not some great crimes for which God thus punisheth thee, man would be more just than God, which is not to be imagined. 2. I rather think it is only a reproof of Job's murmuring and discontent. Shall a man pretend to be more just and pure than God? more truly to understand, and more strictly to observe, the rules and laws of equity than God? Shall Enosh,—'mortal, miserable man,' be so insolent, nay, shall Geber,—'the strongest, and most eminent man,' man at his best estate, pretend to compare with God, or stand in competition with him! Note, It is most impious and absurd to think either others or ourselves more just and pure than God. Those that quarrel and find fault with the directions of the Divine law, the dispensations of the Divine grace, or the disposals of the Divine providence, make themselves more just and pure than God; and they who thus reprove God, let them answer it. What? sinful man, (for he had not been mortal if he had not been sinful,) shortsighted man, shall he pretend to be more just, more pure than God, who, being his Maker, is his Lord and owner? Shall the clay contend with the potter? What justice and purity there is in man, God is the author of it, and therefore is himself more just and pure: see Ps. xciv. 9, 10.

Fourthly. The comment which Eliphaz makes upon this, for so it seems to be; yet some take all the following verses to be spoken in vision. It comes all to one.

1. He shews how little the angels themselves are in comparison with God, ver. 18. Angels are God's servants, waiting servants, working servants, they are his ministers, Ps. civ. 4. Bright and blessed beings they are; but God neither needs them, nor is benefited by them, and is himself infinitely above them; and therefore, 1st. He put no trust in them, did not repose a confidence in them, as we do in those we cannot live without; there is no service in which he employs them but, if he pleased, he could have it done as well without them. He never made them his confidants, or of his cabinet council, Mat. xxiv. 36. He doth not leave his business wholly to them; but his own eyes run to and fro through the earth, 2 Chr. xvi. 9: see this phrase, ch. xxxix. 11. Some give this sense of it: So mutable is even the angelical nature, that God would not trust them with their own integrity; if he had, they would all have done as some did, left their first estate; but he saw it necessary to give them a supernatural grace to confirm them. 2nd. He chargeth them with folly, vanity, weakness, infirmity, and imperfection, in comparison with God. If the world were left to the government of the angels, and they were trusted with the sole management of affairs, they would take false steps, and every thing would not be done for the best, as now it is. Angels are intelligences, but finite ones; though not chargeable with iniquity, yet with imprudence. This last clause is variously rendered by the critics; I think it would bear this reading, repeating the negation, which is very common: "He will put no trust in his saints, nor will he glory in his angels, (in angelis suis non ponet gloriationem,) or make his boast" of them, as if their praises or services added any thing to him. It is his glory that he is infinitely happy without them.

2. Thence he infers how much less man is, how much less to be trusted in, or gloried in. If there be such a distance between God and angels, what is there between God and man! See how man is represented here in his meanness.

1st. Look upon man in his life, and he is very mean, ver. 19. Take man in his best estate, and he is a very despicable creature in comparison with the holy angels, though honourable if compared with the brutes. It is true angels are spirits, and the souls of men are spirits; but, First. Angels are pure spirits; the souls of men dwell in houses of clay: such the bodies of men are. Angels are free; human souls are housed, and the body is a cloud, a clog to it, it is its cage, it is its prison. It is a house of clay, mean, and mouldering; an earthen vessel, soon broken, as it was first formed, according to the good pleasure of the potter. It is a cottage; not a house of cedar, or a house of ivory, but of clay, which would soon be in ruins if not kept in constant repair. Secondly. Angels are fixed; but the very foundation of that house of clay in which man dwells is in the dust. A house of clay, if built upon a rock, might stand long; but if founded in the dust the uncertainty of the foundation will hasten its fall, and it will sink with its own weight. As man was made out of the earth, so he is maintained and supported by that which comes out of the earth. Take away that, and his body returns to its earth. We stand but upon the dust; some have a higher heap of dust to stand upon than others; but still it is the earth that stays us up, and will shortly swallow us up. Thirdly. Angels are immortal; but man is soon crushed. The earthly house of his tabernacle dissolved, he dies and wastes away; is crushed like a moth between one's fingers, as easily, as quickly: one may almost as soon kill a man as kill a moth; a little thing will do it,—he is crushed before the face of the moth, so the word is. If some lingering distemper, which consumes like a moth, be commissioned to destroy him, he can no more resist it than he can resist an acute distemper that comes roaring upon him like a lion: see Hos. v. 12, 14. Is such a creature as this to be trusted in, or can any service be expected from him, by that God who puts no trust in angels themselves?

2nd. Look upon him in his death, and he appears yet more despicable and unfit to be trusted. Men are mortal, and dying, ver. 20, 21. First. In death they are destroyed, and perish for ever, as to this world. It is the final period of their lives, and all their employments and enjoyments here; their place will know them no more. Secondly. They are dying daily, and continually wasting; destroyed from morning to evening. Death is still working in us, like a mole, digging our grave at each remove; and we so continually lie exposed, that we are killed all the day long. Thirdly. Their life is short, and in a little time they are cut off; it lasts perhaps but from morning to evening. It is but a day, (so some understand it;) their birth and death are but the sunrise and sunset of the same day. Fourthly. In death all their excellency passeth away; beauty, strength, learning, not only cannot secure them from death, but dies with them; nor shall their pomp, their wealth, or power, descend after them. Fifthly. Their wisdom cannot save them from death; they die without wisdom, die for want of wisdom, by their own foolish management of themselves, digging their graves with their own teeth. Sixthly. It is so common a thing that nobody heeds it, or takes any notice of it; they perish without any regarding it, or laying it to heart. The deaths of others are much the subject of common talk, but little the subject of serious thought.

Some think the eternal damnation of sinners is here spoken of, as well as their temporal death. 'They are destroyed, or broken to pieces, by death from morning to evening, and if they repent not they perish for ever,' so some read it, ver. 20; they perish for ever because they regard not God and their duty, they consider not their latter end, Lam. i. 9. They have no excellency but that which death takes away; and they die, they die the second death, for want of wisdom to lay hold on eternal life. Shall such a mean, weak, foolish, sinful, dying creature as this pretend to be more just than God, and more pure than his Maker? No; instead of quarrelling with his afflictions, let him admire he is out of hell.

CHAPTER V.

Eliphaz in the foregoing chapter, for the making good of his charge against Job, had vouched a word from heaven, sent him in a vision. In this chapter he appeals to those that bear record on earth, to the saints, the faithful witnesses of God's truths in all ages, ver. 1. They will testify, I. That the sin of sinners is their ruin, ver. 2—5. II. That yet affliction is the common lot of mankind, ver. 6, 7. III. That when we are in affliction it is our wisdom and duty to apply ourselves to God, for he is able and ready to help us, ver. 8—16. IV. That the afflictions which are borne well will end well; and Job particularly, if he would come to a better temper, might assure himself that God had great mercy in store for him, ver. 17—27. So that he concludes his discourse in somewhat a better humour than he began it.

CALL now, if there be any that will answer thee;
And to which of the saints wilt thou turn?
2 For wrath killeth the foolish man,
And envy slayeth the silly one.
3 I have seen the foolish taking root:
But suddenly I cursed his habitation
4 His children are far from safety,
And they are crushed in the gate,
Neither is there any to deliver them.
5 Whose harvest the hungry eateth up,
And taketh it even out of the thorns,
And the robber swalloweth up their substance.

A very warm dispute being began between Job and his friends, Eliphaz here makes a fair motion to put the matter to a reference; and in all debates perhaps the sooner that is done the better, if the contenders cannot end it between themselves. And so well assured is Eliphaz of the goodness of his own cause, that he moves Job himself to choose the arbitrators; ver. 1, "Call now, if there be any that will answer thee;" that is, 1. If there be any that suffer as thou sufferest. Canst thou produce an instance of any one that was really a saint that was reduced to such extremity as thou art now reduced to? God never dealt with any that love his name so as he deals with thee; and, therefore, sure thou art none of them. 2. If there be any that say as thou sayest; did ever any good man curse his day as thou dost? Or, will any of the saints justify thee in these heats, or passions, or say that these are the spots of God's children? Thou wilt find none of the saints that will be either thine advocates or mine antagonists; "to which of the saints wilt thou turn?" Turn to which thou wilt, and thou wilt find they are all of my mind; I have the communis sensus fidelium,—'the unanimous vote of all the saints on my side,' they will all subscribe to what I am going to say: see ch. xxxiv. 8.

Observe, 1st. Good people are called saints even in the Old Testament; and, therefore, I know not why we should in common speaking, (unless because we must, loqui cum vulgo,—'speak as our neighbours,') appropriate the title to those of the New Testament; and not say St. Abraham, and St. Moses, and St. Isaiah, as well as St. Matthew, and St. Mark; and St. David, the psalmist, as well as St. David, the British bishop. Aaron is expressly called the saint of the Lord. 2nd. All that are themselves saints will turn to those that are so; will choose them for their friends, and converse with them; will choose them for their judges, and consult with them: see Ps. cxix. 79. The saints shall judge the world, 1 Cor. vi. 1, 2. Walk in the way of good men, Pr. ii. 20: the old way, the footsteps of the flock. Every one chooseth some sort of people or other to whom he studies to recommend himself, and by whose sentiments he reckons honour and dishonour. Now all true saints endeavour to recommend themselves to those that are so, and to stand right in their opinion. 3rd. There are some truths so plain, and so universally known and believed, that one may venture to appeal to any of the saints concerning them. However there are some things about which they unhappily differ, there are many more, and more considerable, in which they are agreed; as the evil of sin, the vanity of the world, the worth of the soul, the necessity of a holy life, and the like. Though they do not all live up as they should to their belief of these truths, yet they are all ready to bear their testimony to them.

Now there are two things which Eliphaz here maintains, and doubts not but all the saints concur with him:

First. That the sin of sinners directly tends to their own ruin; ver. 2, "Wrath kills the foolish man," his own wrath doth it, and, therefore, he is foolish for indulging it. It is a fire in his bones, in his blood, enough to put him into a fever; and envy is the rottenness of the bones, and so slays the silly one, that frets himself with it. So it is with thee, saith Eliphaz; while thou quarrellest with God, thou dost thyself the greatest mischief; thine anger at thine own troubles, and thine envy at our prosperity, doth but add to thy pain and misery. Turn to the saints, and thou wilt find they understand themselves better. Job had told his wife she spake as the foolish women; now Eliphaz tells him he acted as the foolish men, the silly ones; or, it may be meant thus: If men are ruined and undone, it is always their own folly that ruins and undoes them. They kill themselves by some lust or other; therefore, no doubt, (Job,) thou hast done some foolish thing by which thou hast brought thyself into this calamitous condition. Many understand it of God's wrath and jealousy. Job needed not be uneasy at the prosperity of the wicked; for the world's smiles can never shelter them from God's frowns: they are foolish and silly, if they think they will. God's anger and indignation will be the death, the eternal death, of those on whom it fastens. What is hell but that, without mixture or period?

Secondly. That their prosperity is short, and their destruction certain, ver. 3—5. He seems here to parallel Job's case with that which is commonly the case of wicked people.

1. Job had prospered for a time, seemed confirmed, and was secure in his prosperity; and it is common for foolish, wicked men to do so. "I have seen them taking root," planted, and, in their own and others' apprehension, fixed, and likely to continue: see Jer. xii. 2; Ps. xxxvii. 35, 36. We see worldly men taking root in the earth; on earthly things they fix the standing of their hopes, and from them they draw the sap of their comforts. The outward estate may be flourishing, but the soul cannot prosper that takes root in the earth.

2. Job's prosperity was now at an end, and so has the prosperity of other wicked people quickly been.

1st. Eliphaz foresaw their ruin with an eye of faith. They who looked only at present things blessed their habitation, and thought them happy, blessed it long, and wished themselves in their condition. But Eliphaz cursed it, suddenly cursed it, as soon as he saw them begin to take root, that is, he plainly iv. 12—21. We are not to suppose that Eliphaz really saw the vision here set forth, but that he introduced the passage as an additional illustration and confirmation of his argument. The words in verse 15, "Then a spirit passed," or glided, "before my face," are understood by many as the personal spirit of a man or of an angel, but by others of a breath or wind. The word ruach certainly has both meanings, and it is impossible to say confidently to which the speaker refers. At the same time the descriptive allusions of verse 16 strongly favour the idea that it was a personal spirit, and not merely a breath of air. Barnes translates, "It stood, but its form I could not discern; a spectre was before mine eyes." The word "spectre" is perhaps too definite, and we may render the words, "It stood, and I discerned not its appearance; a form was before mine eyes." No doubt an indistinct, ethereal manifestation is intended. In verse 19, "crushed before the moth," the meaning is either "by moths," "sooner than moths," or "like moths," probably the latter.

foresaw and foretold their ruin; not that he prayed for it, "I have not desired the woful day," but he prognosticated it. He went into the sanctuary, and there understood their end, and heard their doom read, Ps. lxxiii. 17, 18, that the prosperity of fools will destroy them, Pr. i. 32. They who believe the Word of God can see a curse in the house of the wicked, Pr. iii. 33, though it be never so finely and firmly built, and never so full of all good things; and can foresee that it will in time fufallibly consume it, with the timber thereof, and the stones thereof, Zec. v. 4.

2nd. He saw at length what he had foreseen. He was not disappointed in his expectation concerning him, the event answered it; his family was undone, and his estate ruined: in which particulars he plainly and very invidiously reflects on Job's calamities. First. His children were crushed, ver. 4. They thought themselves safe in their eldest brother's house, but were far from safety, for they were crushed in the gate; perhaps the door or gate of the house was highest built, and fell heaviest upon them, and there was none to deliver them from perishing in the ruins. This is commonly understood of the destruction of the families of wicked men, by the execution of justice upon them to oblige them to restore what they have ill gotten. They leave it to their children, but the descent shall not bar the entry of the rightful owners, who will crush their children, and cast them by due course of law, and there shall be none to help them; or, perhaps, by oppression, Ps. cix. 9, &c. Secondly. His estate was plundered, ver. 5. Job's was so; the hungry robbers, the Sabeans and Chaldeans ran away with it, and swallowed it, and this, saith he, I have often observed in others. What has been got by spoil and rapine has been lost the same way. The careful owner hedged it about with thorns, and then thought it safe, but the fence proved insignificant against the greediness of the spoilers,—if hunger will break through stone walls, much more through thorn hedges—and against the Divine curse, which will go through the thorns and briars, and burn them together, Isa. xxvii. 4.

6 Although affliction cometh not forth of the dust,
Neither doth trouble spring out of the ground;
7 Yet man is born unto trouble,
As the sparks fly upward.
8 I would seek unto God,
And unto God would I commit my cause:
9 Which doeth great things and unsearchable;
Marvellous things without number:
10 Who giveth rain upon the earth,
And sendeth waters upon the fields:
11 To set up on high those that be low;
That those which mourn may be exalted to safety.
12 He disappointeth the devices of the crafty,
So that their hands cannot perform their enterprise.
13 He taketh the wise in their own craftiness:
And the counsel of the froward is carried headlong.
14 They meet with darkness in the daytime,
And grope in the noonday as in the night.
15 But he saveth the poor from the sword,
From their mouth, and from the hand of the mighty 16 So the poor hath hope,
And iniquity stoppeth her mouth.

Eliphaz, having touched Job in a very tender part, in mentioning both the loss of his estate and the death of his children, as the just punishment of his sin, that he might not drive him to despair, here begins to encourage him, and puts him in a way to make himself easy. Now he doth very much change his voice, (Gal. iv. 20,) and speaks Job fair, as if he would atone for the hard words he had given him.

First. He minds him, that no affliction comes by chance, nor is to be attributed to second causes. It doth not come forth of the dust, nor spring out of the ground, as the grass doth, ver. 6; it doth not come of course at certain seasons of the year, as natural productions do, by a chain of second causes. The proportion between prosperity and adversity is not so exactly observed by Providence as that between day and night, summer and winter, but according to the will and counsel of God, when and as he thinks fit; some read it, 'sin comes not forth of the dust, nor iniquity out of the ground.' If men be bad, they must not lay the blame upon the soil, the climate, or the stars, but on themselves: "If thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it." We must not attribute our afflictions to fortune, for they are from God; nor our sins to fate, for they are from ourselves. So that, whatever trouble we are in, we must own that God sends it upon us, and we procure it to ourselves. The former is a reason why we should be very patient, the latter why we should be very penitent, when we are afflicted.

Secondly. He minds him that trouble and affliction is what we have all reason to expect in this world. "Man is born to trouble," ver. 7, not as man,—had he kept his innocency he had been born to pleasure; but as sinful man, as born of a woman, ch xiv. 1, who was in the transgression. Man is born in sin, and therefore born to trouble. Even those that are born to honour and estate, yet are born to trouble in the flesh. In our fallen state, it is become natural to us to sin, and the natural consequence of that is affliction, Rom. v. 12. There is nothing in this world we are born to, and can truly call our own, but sin and trouble; both are as the sparks that fly upward. Actual transgressions are the sparks that fly out of the furnace of original corruption; and, being called transgressors from the womb, no wonder that we deal very treacherously, Isa. xlviii. 8. And such is the frailty of our bodies, and the vanity of all our enjoyments, that our troubles also thence arise as naturally as the sparks fly upward: so many are they, so thick and so fast doth one follow another. Why then should we be surprised at our afflictions as strange, or quarrel with them as hard, when they are but what we are born to? 'Man is born to labour,' so it is in the margin, is sentenced to eat his bread in the sweat of his face, which should inure him to hardness, and make him bear his afflictions the better.

Thirdly. He directs him how to behave himself under his affliction; ver. 8, "I would seek unto God;" 'surely I would,' so it is in the original. Here is,

1. A tacit reproof to Job for not seeking to God, but quarrelling with him. Job, if I had been in thy case, I would not have been so peevish and passionate as thou art, I would have acquiesced in the will of God. It is easy to say what we would do if we were in such a one's case; but, when it comes to the trial, perhaps it will be found not so easy to do as we say. 2. Very good and seasonable advice to him, which Eliphaz transfers to himself in a figure; For my part, the best way I should think I could take, if I were in thy condition, would be to apply myself to God. Note, We should give our friends no other counsel but what we would take ourselves if we were in their case, that we may be easy under our afflictions, may get good by them, and may see a good issue of them. 1st. We must by prayer fetch in mercy and grace from God; seek to him as a Father and Friend, though he contend with us, as one who is alone able to support and succour us. His favour we must seek when we have lost all we have in the world; to him we must address ourselves as the fountain and Father of all good, all consolation. "Is any afflicted, let him pray." It is heart's ease, a salve for every sore. 2nd. We must by patience refer ourselves and our case to him; "To God would I commit my cause," having spread it before him, I would leave it with him; having laid it at his feet, I would lodge it in his hand. "Here I am, let the Lord do with me as seemeth him good." If our cause be indeed a good cause, we need not fear committing it to God, for he is both just and kind. They that would seek so as to speed must refer themselves to God.

Fourthly. He encourageth him thus to seek to God, and commit his cause to him. It will not be in vain to do so, for he is one in whom we shall find effectual help. Two things in God he recommends to his consideration:

1. God's almighty power and sovereign dominion. In general, he doth great things, ver. 9; great indeed, for he can do any thing, he doth do every thing; and all according to the counsel of his own will. Great indeed, for the operations of his power are, 1st. Unsearchable, and such as can never be fathomed, can never be found out, from the beginning to the end, Eccl. iii. 11. The works of nature are mysteries; the most curious searches come far short of full discoveries, and the wisest philosophers have owned themselves at a loss. The designs of Providence are much more deep and unaccountable, Rom. xi. 33. 2nd. Numerous, and such as can never be reckoned up. He doth great things without number; his power is never exhausted, nor will all his purposes ever be fulfilled till the end of time. 3rd. They are marvellous, and such as can never be sufficiently admired. Eternity itself will be short enough to be spent in the admiration of them. Now, by the consideration of this, Eliphaz intends, First. To convince Job of his fault and folly in quarrelling with God. We must not pretend to pass a judgment upon his works, for they are unsearchable, and above our inquiries; nor must we strive with our Maker, for he will certainly be too hard for us, and is able to crush us in a moment. Secondly. To encourage Job to seek unto God, and to refer himself to him. What more encouraging than to see that he is one to whom power belongs? He can do great things and marvellous for our relief, when we are brought never so low.

2. He gives some instances of God's dominion and power. 1st. God doth great things in the kingdom of nature; he gives rain upon the earth, ver. 10; put here for all the gifts of common Providence, all the fruitful seasons by which he filleth our hearts with food and gladness, Acts xiv. 17. Observe, when he would shew what great things God doth, he speaks of his giving rain, which, because it is a common thing, we are apt to look upon as a little thing; but, if we duly consider both how it is produced and what is produced by it, we shall see it to be a great work, both of power and goodness. 2nd. He doth great things in the affairs of the children of men. Not only enricheth the poor, and comforts the needy by the rain he sends, ver. 10; but, in order to the advancing of those that be low, he disappoints the devices of the crafty, for ver. 11 is to be joined to ver. 12, and compared with Lu. i. 51—53, "He hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts," and so hath "exalted them of low degree," and "filled the hungry with good things." See,

First. How he frustrates the counsels of the proud and politic, ver. 12—14. There is a supreme power that manageth and overruleth men that think themselves free and absolute; and fulfils its own purposes, in despite of their projects. Observe, 1*st.* The froward that walk contrary to God, and the interests of his kingdom, are often very crafty: for they are the seed of the old serpent, that was noted for his subtilty. They think themselves wise, but at their end will be fools. 2*nd.* The froward enemies of God's kingdom have their devices, their enterprises, and their counsels against it, and against the loyal faithful subjects of it. They are restless and unwearied in their designs, close in their consultations, high in their hopes, deep in their politics, and fast linked in their confederacies, Ps. ii. 1, 2. 3*rd.* God easily can, and (as far as is for his glory) certainly will, blast and defeat all the designs of his and his people's enemies. How were the plots of Ahithophel, Sanballat, and Haman baffled! the confederacies of Syria and Ephraim against Judah—of Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek, against God's Israel—the kings of the earth and the princes against the Lord and against his Anointed, broken! The hands that have been stretched out against God and his church have not performed their enterprise, nor have the weapons formed against Zion prospered. 4*th.* That which enemies have designed for the ruin of the church has often turned to their own ruin; ver. 13, "He taketh the wise in their own craftiness, and snares them in the work of their own hands;" Ps. vii. 15; xvi. 9, 15, 16. This is quoted by the apostle, 1 Cor. iii. 19, to shew how the learned men of the heathen were befooled by their own vain philosophy. 5*th.* When God infatuates men they are perplexed, and at a loss, even in those things that seem most plain and easy; ver. 14, "They meet with darkness even in the daytime;" nay, as it is in the margin, 'they run themselves into darkness' by the violence and precipitation of their own counsels: see ch. xii. 20, 24, 25.

Secondly. How he favours the cause of the poor and humble, and espouseth that. 1*st.* He exalteth the humble, ver. 11. Those whom proud men contrive to crush, he raiseth from under their feet, and sets them in safety, Ps. xii. 5. The lowly in heart, and those that mourn, he advanceth, he comforteth, and makes them to dwell on high, in the munitions of rocks, Isa. xxxiii. 16. Zion's mourners are the sealed ones, marked for safety, Eze. ix. 4. 2*nd.* He delivereth the oppressed, ver. 15. The designs of the crafty were to ruin the poor; tongue, and hand, and sword, and all are at work in order to this, but God takes them under his special protection, who being poor and unable to help themselves, being his poor, and devoted to his praise, have committed themselves to him. He saves them from the mouth that speaks hard things against them, and the hand that doth hard things against them; for he can, when he pleases, tie the tongue, and wither the hand.

And the effect of this is, ver. 16, 1. That weak and timorous saints are comforted; "So the poor hath hope," that began to despair. The experiences of some are encouragements to others to hope the best in the worst of times; for it is the glory of God to send help to the helpless, and hope to the hopeless. 2. That daring, threatening sinners are confounded; "Iniquity stoppeth her mouth," being surprised at the strangeness of the deliverance, ashamed of its enmity against those who appear to be the favourites of Heaven, mortified at the disappointment, and compelled to acknowledge the justice of God's proceedings, having nothing to object against them. Those that hectored

v. 1. It is true that good men are called "saints," or holy ones, in the Old Testament, but it is the common opinion of the moderns that in the verse before us the angels are intended. Some, however, understand the word of good men; thus Bishop Wilson: "Canst thou give any instance of holy men afflicted as thou art?"

v. 5. The words "taketh it even out of the thorns" are obscure. Delitzsch says, "The hungry fall so eagerly upon what the father of those now orphans has reaped, that even the thorny fence does not hold them back." Barnes, "The famished robber seizes the whole of the harvest. He takes it all away, even to the thistles, and chaff, and cockle, and whatever impure substances there may be growing with the grain." Bernard, "His harvest will be so scanty, that he will be compelled to go and gather from among the thorns what few ears it may have produced." Houbigant, "Armed men have taken away their corn." Among these opinions we prefer those to which the names of Delitzsch and Bernard are attached.

God's poor, that frighted them, menaced them, and falsely accused them, will have not a word to say against them when God appears for them; see Ps. lxxvi. 8, 9; Isa. xxvi. 11; Mic. vii. 16.

Therefore despise not thou the chastening of the

He woundeth, and his hands make whole.

And in war from the power of the sword.

Neither shalt thou be afraid of destruction when it cometh.

Neither shalt thou be afraid of the beasts of the earth.
23 For thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field:
And the beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee.
24 And thou shalt know that thy tabernacle shall be in peace;
And thou shalt visit thy habitation, and shalt not sin.
25 Thou shalt know also that thy seed shall be great,
And thine offspring as the grass of the earth.
26 Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age,
Like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season

Hear it, and know thou it for thy good.

Eliphaz, in this concluding paragraph of his discourse, gives Job (what he himself knew not how to take) a comfortable prospect of the issue of his afflictions, if he did but recover his temper, and accommodate himself to them. Observe,

First. The seasonable word of caution and exhortation that he gives him; ver. 17, "Despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty." Call it a chastening which comes from the Father's love, and is designed for the child's good; call it the chastening of the Almighty, with whom it is madness to contend, to whom it is wisdom and duty to submit, and who will be a God all-sufficient (for so the word signifies) to all those that trust in him; do not despise it;—it is a copious word in the original. 1. Be not averse to it; let grace conquer the antipathy which nature has to suffering, and reconcile thyself to the will of God in it. We need the rod, and we deserve it, and therefore we ought not to think it either strange or hard if we feel the smart of it. Let not the heart rise against a bitter pill or potion, when it is prescribed us for our good. 2. Do not think ill of it; do not put it from you, as that which is either hurtful, or at least not useful,—which there is no occasion for, nor advantage by,—only because for the present it is not joyous, but grievous. We must never scorn to stoop to God, nor think it a thing below us to come under his discipline; but reckon, on the contrary, that God really magnifies a man when he thus visits and tries him, ch. vii. 17, 18. 3. Do not overlook and disregard it, as if it were only a chance, and the product of second causes; but take great notice of it as the voice of God, and a messenger from heaven. More is implied than is expressed. 'Reverence the chastening of the Lord;' have an humble awful regard to his correcting hand, and tremble when the lion roars, Amos iii. 8. Submit to the chastening, and study to answer the calls, to answer the end of it; and then you reverence it. When God, by an affliction, draws upon us for some of the effects he has intrusted us with, we must honour his bill, by accepting it, and subscribing it, resigning him his own when he calls for it.

Secondly. The comfortable words of encouragement which he gives him, thus to accommodate himself to his condition, and, as he himself had expressed it, to receive evil from the hand of God, and not despise it as a gift not worth the accepting. If his affliction was thus borne,

1. The nature and property of it would be altered. Though it looked like a man's misery, it would really be his bliss. "Happy is the man whom God correcteth," if he make but a due improvement of the correction A good man is happy, though he be afflicted; for, whatever he has lost, he has not lost his enjoyment of God, nor his title to heaven; nay, he is happy, because he is afflicted. Correction is an evidence of his sonship, and a means of his sanctification; it mortifies his corruptions, weans his heart from the world, draws him nearer to God, brings him to his Bible, brings him to his knees, works him for, and so is working for him, a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. "Happy, therefore, is the man whom God correcteth," Jas. i. 12.

2. The issue and consequent of it would be very good, ver. 18. 1st. Though he maketh sore the body with sore boils, the mind with sad thoughts, yet he bindeth up at the same time, as the skilful, tender surgeon binds up the wounds he had occasion to make with his incision knife. When God makes sore by the rebukes of his providence, he binds up by the consolations of his Spirit, which oftentimes abound most as afflictions do abound, and balance them to the unspeakable satisfaction of the patient sufferers. 2nd. Though he wounds, yet his hands make whole in due time; as he supports his people, and makes them easy under their afflictions, so in due time he delivers them, and makes a way for them to escape. All is well again; and he comforts them according to the time wherein he afflicted them. God's usual method is first to wound and then to heal, first to convince and then to comfort, first to humble and then to exalt; and, as Mr. Caryl observes, he never makes a wound too great, too deep for his own cure. Una eademque manus vulnus opemque tulit,—'The hand that inflicts the wound applies the cure.' God tears the wicked and goes away,—let them heal that will, if they can, Hos. v. 14; but the humble and penitent may say, "He has torn and he will heal us," Hos. vi. 1.

This is general; but in the following verses he applies himself directly to Job, and gives him many precious promises of great and kind things which God would do for him, if he did but humble himself under his hand. Though then they had no Bibles that we know of, yet Eliphaz had sufficient warrant to give Job these assurances from the general discoveries God had made of his good will to his people. And though in every thing which Job's friends said they were not directed by the Spirit of God, for they spake both of God and Job some things that were not right, yet the general doctrines they laid down, spake the pious sense of the patriarchal age; and as St. Paul quoted ver. 13 for canonical scripture, and the command, ver. 17, is no doubt binding to us, so these promises here may be and must be received and applied as Divine promises, and we may, through patience and comfort of this part of Scripture, have hope. Let us therefore give diligence to make sure our interest in these promises, and then view the particulars of them, and take the comfort of them.

1st. It is here promised that, as afflictions and troubles do recur, supports and deliverances shall be graciously repeated, be it never so often. In six troubles he shall be ready to deliver thee; yea, and in seven. This intimates that as long as we are here in this world we must expect a succession of troubles, that the clouds will return after the rain. After six troubles may come a seventh. After many, look for more; but out of them all will God deliver those that are his, 2 Tim. iii. 11; Ps. xxxiv. 19. Former deliverances are earnests of,—not, as among men, excuses from,—farther deliverances, Pr. xix. 19.

2nd. That, whatever troubles good men may be in, there shall no evil touch them. They shall do them no real harm; the malignity of them shall be taken out; they shall be unstung, they may hiss, they cannot hurt, Ps. xci. 10. The evil one toucheth not God's children, 1 Jno. v. 18. Being kept from sin, they are kept from the evil of every trouble.

3rd. That, when desolating judgments are abroad, they shall be take nunder special protection, ver. 20. Do many perish about them for want of the necessary supports of life, they shall be supplied; "In famine he shall redeem thee from death;" whatever becomes of others, thou shalt be "kept alive," Ps. xxxiii. 19. "Verily thou shalt be fed," nay, even "in the days of famine thou shalt be satisfied," Ps. xxxvii. 3, 19. In time of war, when thousands fall on thy right and left hand, he shall "redeem thee from the power of the sword." If God pleaseth, it shall not touch thee, or if it wound thee, if it kill thee, it shall not hurt thee; it can but kill the body, nor has it power to do that unless it be given from above.

4th. That, whatever is maliciously said against them, it shall not affect them to do them any hurt, ver. 21. Thou shalt not only be protected from the killing sword of war, but shalt be hid from the scourge of the tongue, which, like a scourge, is vexing and painful, though not mortal. The best men and the most inoffensive cannot, even with their innocency, secure themselves from calumny, reproach, and false accusation; from these a man cannot hide himself, but God can hide him, so that the most malicious slanders shall be so little heeded by him as not to disturb his peace, and so little heeded by others as not to blemish his reputation. And the remainder of his wrath God can and doth restrain; for it is owing to the hold he hath of the consciences of bad men that the scourge of the tongue is not the ruin of all the comforts of good men in this world.

5th. That they shall have a holy security, and serenity of mind arising from their hope and confidence in God, even in the worst of times. When dangers are most threatening, they shall be easy, believing themselves safe; and shall not be afraid of destruction, no, not when they see it coming, ver. 21; nor of the beasts of the field when they set upon them, or of men as cruel as beasts; nay, "at destruction and famine thou shalt laugh," ver. 22, not so as to despise any of God's chastenings, or make a jest of his judgments, but so as to triumph in God and his power and goodness, and therein to triumph over the world and all its grievances; to be not only easy, but cheerful and joyful in tribulation. Blessed Paul laughed at destruction, when he said, "O death! where is thy sting?" when, in the name of all the saints, he defied all the calamities of this present time to separate us from the love of God, concluding that "in all these things we are more than conquerors," Rom. viii. 35, &c.: see Isa. xxxvii. 22.

6th. That, being at peace with God, there shall be a covenant of friendship between them and the whole creation, ver. 23. When thou walkest thy grounds thou shalt not need to fear stumbling, for thou shalt be at league with the stones of the field not to dash thy foot against any of them; nor shalt thou be in danger from the beasts of the field, for they all shall be at peace with thee: compare Hos. ii. 18, "I will make a covenant for them with the beasts of the field." This implies that, while man is at enmity with his Maker, the inferior creatures are at war with him, but tranquillus Deus tranquillat omnia,—'a reconciled God reconciles all things.' Our covenant with God is a covenant with all the creatures that they shall do us no hurt, but be ready to serve us and do us good.

7th. That their houses and families shall be comfortable to them, ver. 24. Peace and piety in the family will make it so. Thou shalt know and be assured that thy tabernacle is and shall be in peace; mayest be confident both of the present and future prosperity of it; 'that peace is thy tabernacle,' so the word is. They that dwell in God, and are at home in him, peace is the house in which they dwell. "Thou shalt visit," that is, inquire into the affairs of, "thy habitation," and take a review of them, "and shalt not sin." First. God will provide a settlement for his people, mean, perhaps, and moveable, a cottage, a tabernacle, but a fixed and quiet habitation. "Thou shalt not sin," or wander; that is, as some understand it, thou shalt not be a fugitive and a vagabond, Cain's curse, but shalt dwell in the land, and verily, not uncertainly, as vagrants, shalt thou be fed. Secondly. Their families shall be taken under the special protection of the Divine providence, and shall prosper as far as is for their good. Thirdly. They shall be assured of peace, and of the continuance and entail of it. Thou shalt know to thine unspeakable satisfaction, that peace is sure to thee and thine, having the word of God for it. Providence may change, but the promise cannot. Fourthly. They shall have wisdom to govern their families aright, to order their affairs with discretion, and to look well to the ways of their household, which is here called visiting their habitation. Masters of families must not be strangers at home, but have a watchful eye over what they have, and what their servants do. Fifthly. They shall have grace to manage the concerns of their families after a godly sort, and not to sin in the management of them. They shall call their servants to account without pride, passion, covetousness, worldliness, or the like; look into their affairs without discontent at what is, or distrust of what shall be. Family piety crowns family peace and prosperity. The greatest blessing, both in our employments and in our enjoyments, is to be kept from sin in them. When we are abroad, it is comfortable to hear that our tabernacle is in peace; and when we return home, to visit our habitation with satisfaction in our success, that we have not miscarried in our business, and with a good conscience that we have not offended God.

8th. That their posterity shall be numerous and prosperous. Job had lost all his children; but, saith Eliphaz, if thou return to God, he will again build up thy family, and thy seed shall be many, and as great as ever thou wast, and thine offspring increasing and flourishing as the grass of the earth, ver. 25, and thou shalt know it. God has blessings in store for the seed of the faithful, which they shall have if they do not stand in their own light, and forfeit them by their folly. It is a comfort to parents to see the prosperity, especially the

v. 6—8. The relation of these three verses is not well shown by our translators, but may be thus exhibited: "Although affliction cometh not forth of the dust,—although man is born unto trouble,—yet I would seek unto God." In the Hebrew, verse 7 begins with the same word as verse 6, and verse 8 begins with the word for "yet," which our version omits. With verse 7 compare Tibullus: "The human race is born to cares." For "sparks fly upward," which in Hebrew is "sons of fire fly up on high," some have thought birds of prey are meant; but that idea cannot be justified, still less can the notion of angels.

v. 15. Several explanations of this verse have been proposed. The words are, literally, "He delivereth from the sword, from their mouth, and from the hand of the strong man, the poor man." If taken in its simple and obvious meaning, the authorised version here need not be altered, though some would understand the "sword" to signify the mouth of the enemy.

9th. That their death shall be seasonable, and they shall finish their course at length with joy and honour, ver. 26. It is a great mercy, First. To live to a full age, and not to have the number of our months cut off in the midst. If the providence of God do not give us long life, if the grace of God gives us to be satisfied with the time allotted us, we may be said to come to a full age. That man lives long enough that has done his work, and is fit for another world. Secondly. To be willing to die, to come cheerfully to the grave, and not to be forced thither, as he whose soul was required of him. Thirdly. To die seasonably, as the corn is cut and housed when it is full ripe; not till then, but then not suffered to stand a day longer, lest it shed. Our times are in God's hand; it is well they are so, for he will take care that those who are his die in the best time; however their death may seem to us untimely, it will be found not unseasonable.

In the last verse he recommends those promises to Job, 1*st*. As faithful sayings, which he might be confident of the truth of; "Lo, this we have searched, and so it is." We have, indeed, received these things by tradition from our fathers, but we have not taken them upon trust; we have carefully searched them, have compared spiritual things with spiritual, have diligently studied them, and been confirmed in our belief of them from our own observation and experience; and we are all of a mind that so it is. Truth is a treasure that is well worth digging for, diving for; and then we shall know both how to value it ourselves, and how to communicate it to others, when we have taken pains in searching it. 2*nd*. As well worthy of all acceptation, which he might improve to his great advantage; "Hear it, and know thou it for thy good." It is not enough to hear and know the truth, but we must improve it, and be made wiser and better by it, receive the impressions of it, and submit to the commanding power of it. 'Know it for thyself,' so the word is; with application to thyself and thy own case; not only this is true, but this is true concerning me. That which we thus hear and know for ourselves, we hear and know for our good; as the meat we digest we are nourished by. And that is indeed a good sermon that doth us good.

CHAPTER VI.

Eliphaz concluded his discourse with an air of assurance; very confident he was that what he had said was so plain, and so pertinent, that nothing could be objected in answer to it. But though he that is first in his own cause seemeth just, yet his neighbour comes and searcheth him. Job is not convinced by all he had said, but still justifies himself in his complaints, and condemns him for the weakness of his arguing. I. He shews that he had just cause to complain as he did of his troubles, and so it would appear to any impartial judge, ver. 2—7. II. He continues his passionate wish, that he might speedily be cut off by the stroke of death, and so be eased of all his miseries, ver. 8—13. III. He reproves his friends for their uncharitable censures of him, and the unkind treatment they gave him, ver. 14—30. It must be owned that Job in all this spoke a deal of reason, but with a mixture of passion and human infirmity; and in this contest, and indeed in most contests, there was fault on both sides.

BUT Job answered and said,

2 Oh that my grief were throughly weighed,
And my calamity laid in the balances together!
3 For now it would be heavier than the sand of the sea:
Therefore my words are swallowed up
4 For the arrows of the Almighty are within me,
The poison whereof drinketh up my spirit:
The terrors of God do set themselves in array against me.
5 Doth the wild ass bray when he hath grass?
Or loweth the ox over his fodder?
6 Can that which is unsavoury be eaten without salt?
Or is there any taste in the white of an egg?
7 The things that my soul refused to touch
Are as my sorrowful meat.

Eliphaz, in the beginning of his discourse, had been very sharp upon Job, and yet it doth not appear that Job gave him any interruption, but heard him patiently until he had said all he had to say. They that would make an impartial judgment of a discourse must hear it out, and take it entire. But when he had concluded, he makes his reply, in which he speaks very feelingly.

First. He represents his calamity in general as much heavier than either he had expressed it, or they had apprehended it, ver. 2, 3. He could not fully describe it, they would not fully apprehend it, or at least not own that they did. And therefore he would gladly appeal to a third person, that had but just weights and just balances with which to weigh his grief and calamity, and would do it with an impartial hand. He wisheth that they would set his grief in one scale, and all the expressions of it, his calamity in the other, and all the particulars of it; and, though he would not altogether justify himself in his grief, yet they would find as he saith, ch. xxiii. 2, that his stroke was heavier than his groaning; for, whatever his grief was, his calamity was heavier than the sand of the sea; it was complicated, it was aggravated, every grievance weighty, and altogether numerous as the sand; "Therefore," saith he, "my words are swallowed up;" that is, Therefore you must excuse both the brokenness and the bitterness of my expressions; therefore, do not think it strange if my speech be not so fine and polite as that of an eloquent orator, or so grave and regular as that of a morose philosopher. No, in these circumstances I can pretend neither to the one nor to the other, my words are, as I am, quite swallowed up.

Now, 1. He hereby complains of it as his unhappiness, that his friends undertook to administer spiritual physic to him before they thoroughly understood his case, and knew the worst of it. It is seldom that those who are at ease themselves rightly weigh the afflictions of the afflicted; every one feels most from his own burthen, few feel from other people's. 2. He excuseth the passionate expressions he had used when he cursed his day. Though he could not himself justify all he had said, yet he thought his friends should not thus violently condemn it, for really the case was extraordinary; and that might be connived at in such a man of sorrow as he now was, which in any common grief would by no means be allowed of. 3. He bespeaks the charitable and compassionate sympathy of his friends with him, and hopes, by representing the greatness of his calamity, to bring them to a better temper towards him. To those that are pained it is some ease to be pitied.

Secondly. He complains of the trouble and terror of mind he was in, as the sorest part of his calamity, ver. 4. Herein he was a type of Christ, who in his sufferings complained most of the sufferings of his soul; "Now is my soul troubled," Jno. xii. 27; "My soul is exceeding sorrowful," Mat. xxvi. 37, 38; "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Mat. xxvii. 46. Poor Job sadly complains here, 1. Of what he felt; "The arrows of the Almighty are within me." It was not so much the troubles themselves he was under that put him into this confusion, his poverty, disgrace, and bodily pain, but that which cut him to the heart, and put him into this mighty toss, was, to think that the God he loved and served had brought all this upon him, and laid him under these marks of his displeasure. Note, Trouble of mind is the sorest trouble; "a wounded spirit, who can bear?" Whatever burthen of affliction in body or estate God is pleased to lay upon us, we may well afford to submit to it as long as he continues to us the use of our reason, and the peace of our consciences; but if in either of these we be disturbed, our case is sad indeed, and very piteous. The way to prevent God's fiery darts of trouble is with the shield of faith to quench Satan's fiery darts of temptation. Observe, He calls them "the arrows of the Almighty;" for it is an instance of the power of God above that of any man, that he can with his arrows reach the soul. He that made it can make his sword to approach to it. The poison or heat of these arrows is said to drink up his spirit, because it disturbed his reason, shook his resolution, exhausted his vigour, and threatened his life; and therefore his passionate expressions, though they could not be justified, yet might be excused. 2. Of what he feared. He saw himself charged by the terrors of God, as by an army set in battle array, and surrounded by them. God, by his terrors, fought against him. As he had no comfort when he retired inward into his own bosom, so he had none when he looked upward towards heaven. He that used to be encouraged with the consolations of God, not only wanted those, but was amazed with the terrors of God.

Thirdly. He reflects upon his friends for their severe censures of his complaints, and their unskilful management of his case. 1. Their reproofs were causeless. He complained, it is true, now he was in this affliction; but he never used to complain, as those do who are of a fretful, unquiet spirit, when he was in prosperity. He did not bray when he had grass, nor low over his fodder, ver. 5. But, now he was utterly deprived of all his comforts, he must be a stock or a stone, and not have the sense of an ox or a wild ass, if he did not give some vent to his grief. He was forced to eat unsavoury meats, and was so poor he had not a grain of salt wherewith to relish them, nor to give a little taste to the white of an egg, which was now the choicest dish he had at his table, ver. 6; and even that food which, when time was, he would have scorned to touch, now he was glad of, and it was his sorrowful meat, ver. 7. Note, It is wisdom not to use ourselves or our children to be nice and dainty about meat and drink, because we know not how we or they may be reduced, nor how that which we now disdain may be made acceptable by necessity. 2. Their comforts were sapless and insipid; so some understand, ver. 6, 7. He complains he had nothing now offered him for his relief that was proper for him, no cordial, nothing to revive and cheer his spirits; what they had afforded was in itself as tasteless as the white of an egg, and, when applied to him, as loathsome and burthensome as the most sorrowful meat. I am sorry he should say thus of what Eliphaz had excellently well said, ch. v. 8, &c.; but peevish spirits are too apt thus to abuse their comforters.

8 Oh that I might have my request;
And that God would grant me the thing that I long for!
9 Even that it would please God to destroy me;
That he would let loose his hand, and cut me off!
10 Then should I yet have comfort;
Yea, I would harden myself in sorrow: let him not spare;
For I have not concealed the words of the Holy One.
11 What is my strength, that I should hope?
And what is mine end, that I should prolong my life?
12 Is my strength the strength of stones?
Or is my flesh of brass?
13 Is not my help in me?
And is wisdom driven quite from me?

Ungoverned passion often grows more violent when it meets with some rebuke and check. The troubled sea rages most when it dasheth to a rock. Job had been courting death, as that which would be the happy period of his miseries, ch. iii. For this Eliphaz had gravely reproved him; but he, instead of unsaying it, saith it here again with more vehemence than before, and it is as ill said as almost any thing we meet with in all his discourses; and is recorded for our admonition, not our imitation.

First. He is still most passionately desirous to die; as if it were not possible that he should ever see good days again in this world, or that, by the exercise of grace and devotion, he might make even these days of affliction good days. He could see no end of his trouble but death, and had not patience to wait the time appointed for that. He has a request to make; there is a thing he longs for, ver. 8, and what is that? One would think it should be, 'That it would please God to deliver me, and restore me to my prosperity again.' No, "That it would please God to destroy me," ver. 9. As once he let loose his hand to make me poor, and then to make me sick, let him loose it once more to put an end to my life. Let him give the fatal stroke, it shall be to me the coup de grace,—'the stroke of favour,' as in France they call the last blow which despatches them that are broken on the wheel. There was a time when destruction from the Almighty was a terror to Job, ch. xxxi. 23; yet now he courts the destruction of the flesh, but in hope that the spirit should be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. Observe, Though Job was extremely desirous of death, and very angry at its delays, yet he did not offer to destroy himself, nor to take away his own life; only he begged that it would please God to destroy him. Seneca's morals, which recommend self-murder as the lawful redress of insupportable grievances, were not then known, nor will ever be entertained by any that have the least regard to the law of God and nature. How uneasy soever the soul's confinement in the body may be, it must by no means break prison, but wait for a fair discharge.

Secondly. He puts this desire into a prayer, that God would grant him this request; that it would please God to do this for him. It was his sin so passionately to desire the hastening of his own death, and offering up that desire to God made it no better; nay, what looked ill in his wish, looked worse in his prayer; for we ought not to ask any thing of God but what we can ask in v. 24. "Thou shalt visit thy habitation, and shalt not sin." These words have a wrong direction given to them by an oversight of the translators. For "shalt not sin," we must either put "shalt not miss it," or "shalt not miss anything;" in either case it points to security rather than moral integrity. The whole of the context from verse 9 is curiously associated with the Hebrews by the Chaldee paraphrast. The "earth" in verse 10 is "the land of Israel;" the "crafty" in verse 12 are the Egyptians; the "wise" in verse 13 are the wise men of Pharaoh, and the "froward" are his astrologers; the "famine" in verse 20 is that of Egypt, and the "war" is that with Amalek; the "tongue" in verse 21 is Balaam's, and the "destruction" is that threatened by Midian; the "destruction" of verse 22 is that of Sihon, the "famine" that of the wilderness, and the "beasts of the earth" symbolise the camp of Og; the "beasts of the field" in verse 23 are the Canaanites. All this is rather more ingenious than accurate.

faith, and we cannot ask any thing in faith but what is agreeable to the will of God. Passionate prayers are the worst of passionate expressions; for we should lift up pure hands without wrath.

Thirdly. He promiseth himself effectual relief, and the redress of all his grievances by the stroke of death; ver. 10, "Then should I yet have comfort," which now I have not, nor ever expect till then. See, 1. The vanity of human life. So uncertain a good is it, that oftentimes it proves men's greatest burthen, and nothing so desirable as to get clear of it. Let grace make us willing to part with it whenever God calls; for it may so happen that even sense may make us desirous to part with it before he calls. 2. The hope which the righteous have in their death. If Job had not had a good conscience, he could not have spoken with this assurance of comfort on the other side death, which turns the tables between the rich man and Lazarus, "Now he is comforted, and thou art tormented."

Fourthly. He challengeth death to do its worst. If he could not die without the dreadful prefaces of bitter pains, and agonies, and strong convulsions,—if he must be racked before he be executed,—yet, in prospect of dying at last, he would make nothing of dying pains. "I would harden myself in sorrow," would open my breast to receive death's darts, and not shrink from them; "let him not spare;" I desire no mitigation of that pain which will put a happy period to all my pains. Rather than not die, let me die so as to feel myself die. These are passionate words, which might better have been spared. We should soften ourselves in sorrow, that we may receive the good impressions of it; and by the sadness of the countenance, our hearts being made tender, may be made better: but, if we harden ourselves, we provoke God to proceed in his controversy; for when he judgeth he will overcome. And it is great presumption to dare the Almighty, and to say, "Let him not spare; for are we stronger than he?" 1 Cor. x. 22. We are much indebted to sparing mercy: it is bad indeed with us when we are sick of that. Let us rather say with David, "O spare me a little."

Fifthly. He grounds his comfort upon the testimony of his conscience for him, that he had been faithful and firm to his profession of religion, and some way useful and serviceable to the glory of God in his generation; "I have not concealed the words of the Holy One." Observe, 1. Job had the words of the Holy One committed to him. The people of God were at that time blessed with Divine revelation. 2. It was his comfort that he had not concealed them, had not received the grace of God therein in vain. 1st. He had not kept them from himself, but had given them full scope to operate upon him, and in every thing to guide and govern him. He had not stifled his convictions, imprisoned the truth in unrighteousness, nor done any thing to hinder the digestion of this spiritual food, and the operation of this spiritual physic. Let us never conceal God's Word from ourselves, but always receive it in the light of it. 2nd. He had not kept them to himself, but had been ready on all occasions to communicate his knowledge for the good of others; was never ashamed or afraid to own the Word of God to be his rule, nor remiss in his endeavours to bring others into an acquaintance with it. Note, Those, and those only, may promise themselves comfort in death who are good and do good while they live.

Sixthly. He justifies himself, in this extreme desire of death, from the deplorable condition he was now in, ver. 11, 12. Eliphaz, in the close of his discourse, had put him in hopes that he should yet see a good issue of his troubles; but poor Job puts these cordials away from him, refuseth to be comforted, abandons himself to despair, and very ingeniously, yet perversely, argues against the encouragements that were given him. Disconsolate spirits will reason strangely against themselves. In answer to the pleasing prospects Eliphaz had flattered him with, he here intimates,

1. That he had no reason to expect any such thing; "What is my strength that I should hope?" You see how I am weakened and brought low, how unable I am to grapple with my distempers, and therefore what reason have I to hope that I should outlive them, and see better days? "Is my strength the strength of stones?" Are my muscles brass, and sinews steel? No, they are not; and therefore I cannot hold out always in this pain and misery, but must needs sink under the load. Had I strength to grapple with my distemper, I might hope to look through it; but, alas! I have not. The weakening of my strength in the way will certainly be the shortening of my days, Ps. cii. 23. Note, All things considered, we have no reason to count upon the long continuance of life in this world. What is our strength? It is depending strength; we have no more strength than God gives us, for in him we live and move. It is decaying strength; we are daily spending upon the quick stock of it, and by degrees it will be exhausted. It is disproportionable to the encounters we may meet with; what is our strength to be depended upon, when two or three days' sickness will make us weak as water? Instead of expecting a long life, we have reason to admire that we have lived hitherto, and to see ourselves hastening off apace.

2. That he had no reason to desire any such thing. "What is my end that I should desire to prolong my life?" What comfort can I promise myself in life comparable to the comfort I promise myself in death? Note, Those that, through grace, are ready for another world, cannot see much to invite their stay in this world, or to make them fond of it. That, if it be God's will, we may do him more service, and may get to be fitter and riper for heaven, is an end for which we may wish the prolonging of life, in subserviency to our chief end; but, otherwise, what can we propose to ourselves in desiring to tarry here? The burthens of life will be ever the longer the more grievous, Eccl. xii. 1: and the delights of life will be ever the longer the less pleasant, 2 Sam. xix. 34. We have already seen the best of this world; but we are not sure that we have seen the worst of it.

Seventhly. He obviates the suspicion of his being delirious; ver. 13, "Is not my help in me?" that is, Have I not the use of my reason, with which, I thank God, I can help myself, though you do not help me? Do you think wisdom is driven quite from me, and that I am gone distracted? No, I am not mad, most noble Eliphaz, but speak the words of truth and soberness. Note, Those who have grace in them, who have the evidence of it, and have it in exercise, have wisdom in them, which will be their help in the worst of times. Sat lucis intus,—'they have light within.'

14 To him that is afflicted pity should be shewed from his friend;
But he forsaketh the fear of the Almighty
15 My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook,
And as the stream of brooks they pass away;
16 Which are blackish by reason of the ice,
And wherein the snow is hid:
17 What time they wax warm, they vanish:
When it is hot, they are consumed out of their place.
18 The paths of their way are turned aside;
They go to nothing, and perish
19 The troops of Tema looked,
The companies of Sheba waited for them
20 They were confounded because they had hoped;
They came thither, and were ashamed.
21 For now ye are nothing;
Ye see my casting down, and are afraid.

Eliphaz had been very severe in his censures of Job; and his companions, though as yet they had said little, yet had intimated their concurrence with him. Their unkindness therein poor Job here complains of, as an aggravation of his calamity, and a farther excuse of his desire to die; for what satisfaction could he ever expect in this world, when those that should be his comforters thus proved his tormentors?

First. He shews what reason he had to expect kindness from them. His expectation was grounded upon the common principles of humanity; ver. 14, "To him that is afflicted," and that is wasting and melting under his affliction, "pity should be shewed from his friend," and he that doth not shew that pity "forsaketh the fear of the Almighty." Note, 1. Compassion is a debt owing to those that are in affliction. The least which those that are at ease can do for those that are pained and in anguish is to pity them; to manifest the sincerity of a tender concern for them, and sympathy with them; to take cognizance of their case, inquire into their grievances, hear their complaints, and mingle our tears with theirs; to comfort them, and do all we can to help and relieve them. This well becomes the members of the same body, who should feel for the grievances of their fellow members, not knowing how soon the same may be their own. 2. Inhumanity is impiety and irreligion. 'He that withholds compassion from his friend forsakes the fear of the Almighty,' so the Chaldee. "How dwells the love of God in this man?" 1 Jno. iii. 17. Surely those have no fear of the rod of God upon themselves who have no compassion for those that feel the smart of it: see Jas. i. 27. 3. Troubles are the trials of friendship. When a man is afflicted, he will see who are his friends indeed, and who are but pretenders, for a brother is born for adversity, Pr. xvii. 17; xviii. 24.

Secondly. He shews how wretchedly he was disappointed in his expectations from them; ver. 15, "My brethren," who should have helped me, "have dealt deceitfully as a brook." They came by appointment, with a great deal of ceremony, to mourn with him, and to comfort him, ch. ii. 11; and some mighty things were expected from such great men, such good men, such wise, learned, knowing men, and Job's particular friends. None questioned but that the drift of their discourses would be to comfort Job with the remembrance of his former piety, the assurance of God's favour to him, and the prospect of a glorious issue; but, instead of this, they most barbarously fall upon him with their reproaches and censures, condemn him as a hypocrite, insult over his calamities, and pour vinegar instead of oil into his wounds; and thus they dealt deceitfully with him. Note, 1. It is fraud and deceit, not only to violate our engagements to our friends, but to frustrate their just expectations from us; especially the expectations we have raised. 2. It is our wisdom to cease from man; we cannot expect too little from the creature, nor too much from the Creator. It is no new thing even for brethren to deal deceitfully, Jer. ix. 4, 5; Mic. vii. 5; let us therefore put our confidence in the Rock of ages, not in broken reeds,—in the Fountain of life, not in broken cisterns. God will outdo our hopes as much as men come short of them. This disappointment which he met with he here illustrates by the failing of the brooks in summer.

1st. The similitude is very elegant, ver. 15—20. First. Their pretensions are fitly compared to the great show which the brooks make when they are swelled with the waters of a land flood, by the melting of the ice and snow, which makes them blackish or muddy, ver. 16. Secondly. His expectations from them, which their coming so solemnly to comfort him had raised, he compares to the expectation which the weary, thirsty travellers have of finding water in the summer there where they have often seen it in great abundance in the winter: ver. 19, "The troops of Tema and Sheba," the caravans of the merchants of those countries, whose road lay through the deserts of Arabia, looked and waited for supply of water from those brooks. Hard by here, saith one a little farther, saith another; when I last travelled this way there was water enough, we shall have that to refresh us. Where we have met with relief and comfort we are apt to expect it again, and yet it doth not follow. For, Thirdly. The disappointment of his expectation is here compared to the confusion which seizeth the poor travellers when they find heaps of sand where they expected floods of water. In the winter, when they were not thirsty, there was water enough. Every one will applaud and admire those that are full and in prosperity, but in the heat of summer, when they needed water, then it failed them, was consumed, ver. 17; it was turned aside, ver. 18. When those that are rich and high are sunk and impoverished, and stand in need of comfort, then those that before gathered about them stand aloof from them; that before commended them, are forward to run them down. Thus they that raise their expectations high from the creature will find it fail them then when it should help them; whereas they that make God their confidence have help in the time of need, Heb. iv. 16. They that make gold their hope sooner or later will be ashamed of it, and of their confidence in it, Eze. vii. 19; and the greater their confidence was the greater their shame will be; "They were confounded, because they had hoped," ver. 20. We prepare confusion for ourselves by our vain hopes; the reeds break under us, because we lean upon them. If we build a house upon the sand, we shall certainly be confounded; for it will fall in the storm; and we must thank ourselves for being such fools as to expect it would stand. We are not deceived, unless we deceive ourselves.

2nd. The application is very close; ver. 21, "For now ye are nothing." They seemed to be somewhat, but in conference they added nothing to him: compare Gal. ii. 6. He was never the wiser, never the better, for the visit they made him. Note, Whatever complacency we may take, or whatever confidence we may put, in creatures, how great soever they may seem, and how dear soever they may be to us, one time or other we shall say of them, "Now ye are nothing." When Job was in prosperity, his friends were something to him, he took complacency in them and their society; But now ye are nothing, now I can find no comfort but in God. It were well for us if we had always such convictions of the vanity of the creature, and its insufficiency to make us happy, as we have sometimes had, or shall have, on a sick-bed, a death-bed, or in trouble of conscience. "Now ye are nothing;" you are not what you have been, what you should be, what you pretend to be, what I thought you would have been, for "you see my casting down, and are afraid." When you saw me in my elevation, you caressed me, but now you see me in my dejection you are shy of me,—are afraid of shewing yourselves kind, lest I should take the boldness from thence to beg something of you, or to borrow. Compare

vi. 1—4. Job believes that he has not been fairly judged, either in regard to his position or his words. The phrase, "my words are swallowed up," is accompanied by a note in reference Bibles—"that is, I want words to express my grief;" but this is an uncertain explanation, and critics are still unsettled as to the true rendering. Gesenius has "my words are rash;" Fürst is doubtful whether the idea of "fretful" or of our version should be received; Castellio gives "my words fail," and the old translations also vary. The Greek and Latin seem to have read the verb differently; for the former has "my words seem to be evil," and the latter, "my words are full of grief;" the Syriac is, "my words are restrained." On the whole, we would adopt the position of Fürst.

vi. 6. The words rendered "white of an egg" are variously explained. Some think "curdled milk" is meant, others suppose "purslain broth," but our translation is preferred by very good authorities.

ver. 22; are afraid lest, if you own me, you should be obliged to keep me. Perhaps they were afraid of catching his distemper, or of coming within smell of the noisomeness of it. It is not good, either out of pride or niceness, for love of our purses or of our bodies, to be shy of those in distress, and afraid of coming near them. Their case may soon be our own.

22 Did I say, Bring unto me?
Or, Give a reward for me of your substance?
23 Or, Deliver me from the enemy's hand?
Or, Redeem me from the hand of the mighty?
24 Teach me, and I will hold my tongue:
And cause me to understand wherein I have erred.
25 How forcible are right words!
But what doth your arguing reprove?
26 Do ye imagine to reprove words, [wind?
And the speeches of one that is desperate, which are as 27 Yea, ye overwhelm the fatherless,
And ye dig a pit for your friend.
28 Now therefore be content, look upon me;
For it is evident unto you if I lie.
29 Return, I pray you, let it not be iniquity;
Yea, return again, my righteousness is in it.
30 Is there iniquity in my tongue?
Cannot my taste discern perverse things?

Poor Job goes on here to upbraid his friends with their unkindness, and the hard usage they gave him. He here appeals to themselves concerning several things which tended both to justify him and condemn them. If they would but think impartially, and speak as they thought, they could not but own,

First. That, though he was necessitous, yet he was not craving, nor burthensome to his friends. Those that are so, whose troubles serve them to beg by, are commonly less pitied than the silent poor. Job would be glad to see his friends, but he did not say, "Bring unto me," ver. 22, or, "Deliver me," ver. 23. He did not desire to put them to any expense, did not send abroad to urge his friends either, 1st. To make a collection for him, to set him up again in the world, though he could plead that his losses came upon him by the hand of God, and not by any fault or folly of his own; that he was utterly ruined and impoverished; that he had lived in good fashion, and when he had wherewithal was charitable, and ready to help those that were in distress; that his friends were rich, and able to help him; yet he did not say, "Give me of your substance." Note, A good man, when troubled himself, is afraid of being troublesome to his friends. Or, 2nd. To raise the country for him, to help him to recover his cattle out of the hands of the Sabeans and Chaldeans, or to make reprisals upon them. Did I send for you to deliver me out of the hand of the mighty? No; I never expected you should either expose yourselves to any danger or put yourselves to any charge upon my account; I will rather sit down content under my affliction, and make the best of it, than spunge upon my friends. St. Paul worked with his hands that he might not be burthensome to any. Job's not asking their help did not excuse them from offering it when he needed it, and it was in the power of their hands to give it; but it much aggravated their unkindness, when he desired no more from them but a good look and a good word, and yet could not obtain that. From man oftentimes, even when we expect little, yet we have less, but from God, even when expect much, yet we have more, Eph. iii. 20.

Secondly. That, though he differed in opinion from them, yet he was not obstinate, but ready to yield to conviction, and to strike sail to truth as soon as ever it was made to appear to him that he was in an error, ver. 24, 25. If, instead of invidious reflections, and uncharitable insinuations, you will give me plain instructions and solid arguments, that shall carry their own evidence along with them, I am ready to acknowledge my error, and own myself in a fault; "Teach me, and I will hold my tongue;" for I have often found with pleasure and wonder how forcible right words are. But the method you take will never make proselytes; "what doth your arguing reprove?" Your hypothesis is false, your surmises groundless, your management weak, and your application peevish and uncharitable. Note, 1. Fair reasoning has a commanding power; and it is a wonder if men are not conquered by it; but railing and foul language is impotent and foolish, and it is no wonder if men are exasperated and hardened by it. 2. It is the undoubted character of every honest man, that he is truly desirous to have his mistakes rectified, and to be made to understand wherein he has erred; and that right words, when they appear to him to be so, though contrary to his former sentiments, are both forcible and acceptable.

Thirdly. That, though he had been indeed in a fault, yet they ought not to have given him such hard usage; ver. 26, 27, "Do you imagine," or contrive with a great deal of art, (for so the word signifies,) "to reprove words," some passionate expressions of mine, in this desperate condition, as if they were certain indications of reigning impiety and atheism? A little candour and charity would have served to excuse them, and to put a better construction upon them. Shall a man's spiritual state be judged of by some rash and hasty words, which a surprising trouble extorts from him? Is it fair, is it kind, is it just, to criticise in such a case? Would you yourselves be served thus? Two things aggravated their unkind treatment of him: 1. That they took advantage of his weakness, and the helpless condition he was in; "Ye overwhelm the fatherless," a proverbial expression, speaking that which is most barbarous and inhuman. The fatherless cannot secure themselves from insults, which emboldens men of base and sordid spirits to insult them, and trample upon them, and you do so by me. Job being a childless father, thought himself as much exposed to injury as a fatherless child, Ps. cxxvii. 5, and had reason to take it ill at those who therefore triumphed over him. Let those who overwhelm and overpower them that upon any account may be looked upon as fatherless, know that therein they not only put off the compassions of man, but fight against the compassions of God, who is, and will be, a father of the fatherless, and a helper of the helpless. 2. That they made pretence of kindness; "You dig a pit for your friend;" not only you are unkind to me, who am your friend, but under colour of friendship you ensnare me. When they came to see him, and sit with him, he thought he might speak his mind freely to them, and that the more bitter his complaints to them were, the more they would have endeavoured to comfort him. This made him take a greater liberty than otherwise he would have done. David, though he smothered his resentments when the wicked were before him, it is likely would have given vent to them if none had been by but friends, Ps. xxxix. 1. But this freedom of speech, which their professions of concern for him made him use, had exposed him to their censures, and so they might be said to dig a pit for him. Thus, when our hearts are hot within us, what is ill done we are apt to misrepresent as if done designedly.

Fourthly. That, though he had let fall some passionate expressions, yet for the main he was in the right, and that his afflictions, though very extraordinary did not prove him to be a hypocrite, or wicked man. His righteousness he holds fast, and will not let it go. For the evincing of it he here appeals,

1. To what they saw in him; ver. 28, Be content, and look upon me, what do you see in me that speaks me either a mad man or an ill man? Nay, look in my face, and you may discern there the indications of a patient and submissive spirit, for all this. Let the show of my countenance witness for me that, though I have cursed my day, I do not curse my God. Or rather, Look upon my ulcers, and sore boils, and by them it will be evident to you that I do not lie; that is, that I do not complain without cause. Let your own eyes convince you that my condition is very sad, and I do not quarrel with God by making it worse than it is.

2. To what they heard from him; ver. 30, You hear what I have to say now, "is there iniquity in my tongue?" that iniquity that you charge me with? have I blasphemed God, or renounced him? Are not my present arguings right? Do not you perceive by what I say that I can discern perverse things? I can discover your fallacies and mistakes; and if I were myself in an error I could perceive it. Whatever you think of me, I know what I say.

3. To their own second and sober thoughts; ver. 29, "Return, I pray you," consider the thing over again, without prejudice and partiality, and let not the result be iniquity, let it not be an unrighteous sentence; and you will find my righteousness is in it, that is, I am in the right in this matter; and that, though I cannot keep my temper as I should, I keep my integrity, and have not said, or done, or suffered any thing which will prove me other than an honest man. A just cause desires nothing more but a just hearing, and, if need be, a rehearing.

CHAPTER VII.

Job in this chapter goes on expressing the bitter sense he had of his calamities; and, to justify himself in his desire of death, I. He complains to himself and his friends of his troubles, and the constant toss he was in, ver. 1—6. II. He turns to God and expostulates with him, ver. 7 to the end. In which, 1. He pleads the final period which death puts to our present state, ver. 7—10. 2. He passionately complains of the miserable condition he was now in, ver. 11—16. 3. He wonders God will thus contend with him, and begs for the pardon of his sins, and a speedy release out of his miseries, ver. 17—21. It is hard to methodize the speeches of one who owned himself almost desperate, ch. vi. 26.

IS there not an appointed time to man upon earth?
Are not his days also like the days of an hireling?
2 As a servant earnestly desireth the shadow,
And as an hireling looketh for the reward of his work:
3 So am I made to possess months of vanity,
And wearisome nights are appointed to me.
4 When I lie down, I say,
When shall I arise, and the night be gone?
And I am full of tossings to and fro unto the dawning of the day.
5 My flesh is clothed with worms and clods of dust;
My skin is broken, and become loathsome.
6 My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle,
And are spent without hope.

Job is here excusing what he could not justify, even his inordinate desire of death. Why should he not wish for that period of life which would be the period of his miseries? To enforce this reason he argues,

First. From the general condition of man upon earth, ver. 1. He is of few days, and full of trouble. Every man must die quickly, and every man has some reason, more or less, to desire to die quickly, and therefore why should you impute it to me as so heinous a crime, that I wish to die quickly? Or thus: Pray mistake not my desire of death, as if I thought the time appointed of God could be anticipated. No, I know very well that is fixed; only in such language as that I take the liberty to express my present uneasiness. "Is there not an appointed time" ('a warfare,' so the word is,) "to man upon earth? and are not his days here like the days of an hireling?" Observe,

1. Man's present place. He is upon earth, which God has given to the children of men, Ps. cxv. 16. This speaks man's meanness and inferiority. How much below the inhabitants of yonder elevated and refined regions above is he situated! It also speaks God's mercy to him. He is yet upon the earth, not under it,—on earth, not in hell. Our time on earth is limited and short, according to the narrow bounds of this earth; but heaven cannot be measured, nor the days of heaven numbered.

2. His continuance in that place. "Is there not a time appointed" for his abode here? Yes, certainly there is: and it is easy to say by whom the appointment is made, even by him that made us and set us here. We are not to be on this earth always, nor long, but for a certain time, which is determined by him in whose hand our times are. We are not to think that we are governed by the blind fate of the Stoics, or by the blind fortune of the Epicureans, but by the wise, holy, and sovereign counsel of God.

3. His condition during that continuance. Man's life is a warfare, and as the days of a hireling. We are every one of us to look upon ourselves in this world, 1st. As soldiers, exposed to hardship, and in the midst of enemies; must serve and be under command; and, when our warfare is accomplished, we must be cashiered and disbanded,—dismissed either with shame or honour, according to what we have done in the body. 2nd. As day labourers, that have the work of the day to do in its day, and must make up their account at night.

Secondly. From his own condition at this time. He had as much reason he thought to wish for death as a poor servant or hireling that is tired with his work has to wish for the shadows of the evening, when he shall receive his penny, and go to rest, ver. 2: as welcome as the light of the morning is to the watchman, Ps. cxxx. 6, the darkness of the night is to the labourer. The God of nature has provided for the repose of labourers, and no wonder they desire vi. 7. There are many texts in which, as here, the words "my soul" simply mean "myself" and "I."

vi. 9. "Cut me off:" a metaphor from the practice of the weaver, who cuts off his work from his loom; hence, cutting off the thread of life. The verb occurs in Isa. xxxviii. 12.

vi. 10. For "I would harden myself in sorrow," several critics would substitute, "I would exult in my pain," while Dr. Good has, "I will leap for joy." Job may mean he should be glad to die.

vi. 13. The word here rendered "wisdom" is translated "enterprise" in chap. v. 12. It probably comes near in meaning to our term "resources," and hence, aid, assistance, or help.

vi. 15—18. Winter torrents are of brief continuance; we find them full and foaming one day, and dry another. The melting snow and ice swell them and render their waters muddy; and the warm weather dries them up, and after a short course they disappear.

vi. 19. Tema is the same as Teman (see chap. ii. 11).

it; "The sleep of the labouring man is sweet," Eccl. v. 12. No pleasure more grateful, more relishing to the luxurious than rest to the laborious; nor can any rich man take so much satisfaction in the return of his rent-days as the hireling in his day's wages. The comparison is plain, the reddition is concise and somewhat obscure; but we must supply a word or two, and then it is easy,—exactness of language is not to be expected from one in Job's condition; "As a servant earnestly desires the shadow, so," and for the same reason, I earnestly desire death, for I am made to possess &c. Hear his complaint.

1 His days were useless, and had been so a great while; he was wholly taken off from business, and utterly unfit for it. Every day was a burthen to him, because he was in no capacity of doing good, or of spending it to any purpose; et vitæ partem non attigit ullam,—' he could not fill up his time with any thing that would turn to account,' and this he calls possessing months of vanity, ver. 3. It very much increaseth the affliction of sickness and age to a good man, that he is thereby forced from his usefulness. He insists not so much upon it that they are days in which he has no pleasure, as that they are days in which he doth no good; on that account they are months of vanity. But when we are disabled to work for God, if we will but sit still quietly for him, it is all one; we shall be accepted.

2. His nights were restless, ver. 3, 4. The night relieves the toil and fatigue of the day, not only to the labourers, but to the sufferers. If a sick man can but get a little sleep in the night it helps nature, and it is hoped he shall do well, Jno. xi. 12. However, be the trouble what it will, sleep gives some intermission to the cares, and pains, and griefs that afflict us; it is the parenthesis of our sorrows: but poor Job could not gain this relief. 1st. His nights were wearisome, and, instead of taking any rest, he did but tire himself more with tossing to and fro until morning. Those that are in great uneasiness through pain of body, or anguish of mind, think by changing sides, changing places, changing postures, to get some ease; but, while the cause is the same within, it is all to no purpose. It is but a resemblance of a fretful, discontented spirit, that is ever shifting, but never easy. This made him dread the night as much as the servant desires it; and, when he lay down, to say, When will the night be gone? 2nd. These wearisome nights were appointed to him; God, who determines the times before appointed, had allotted him such nights as these. Whatever is at any time grievous to us it is good to see it appointed for us, that we may acquiesce in the event, not only as unavoidable, because appointed, but as therefore designed for some holy end. When we have comfortable nights we must see them also appointed to us, and be thankful for them; many better than we have wearisome nights.

3. His body was noisome, ver. 5. His sores bred worms, the scabs were like clods of dust, and his skin was broken: so evil was the disease which cleaved fast unto him. See what vile bodies we have, and what little reason we have to pamper them, or be proud of them; they have in themselves the principles of their own corruption. As fond as we are of them now, the time may come when we may loathe them, and long to get rid of them. Modern searches have discovered multitudes of worms in human bodies.

4. His life was hastening apace towards a period, ver. 6. He thought he had no reason to expect a long life, for he found himself declining fast; ver. 6, "My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle," that is, my time is now but short, and there are but few sands more in my glass, which will speedily run out. Natural motions are most swift near the centre; Job thought his days ran swiftly, because he thought he should soon be at his journey's end; he looked upon them as good as spent already, and he was therefore without hope of being restored to his former prosperity. It is applicable to man's life in general. Our days are like a weaver's shuttle, thrown from one side of the web to the other in the twinkling of an eye, and then back again, to and fro, until at length it is quite exhausted of the thread it carried, and then we cut off, like a weaver, our life, Isa. xxxviii. 12. Time hastens on apace, the motion of it cannot be stopped, and when it is past it cannot be recalled. While we are living, as we are sowing, (Gal. vi. 8,) so we are weaving; every day, like the shuttle, leaves a thread behind it; many weave the spider's web, which will fail them, ch. viii. 14. If we are weaving to ourselves holy garments, and robes of righteousness, we shall have the benefit of them when our work comes to be reviewed, and every man shall reap as he sowed, and wear as he wove.

7 O remember that my life is wind:
Mine eye shall no more see good.
8 The eye of him that hath seen me shall see me no more:
Thine eyes are upon me, and I am not.
9 As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away:
So he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no 10 He shall return no more to his house, [more.
Neither shall his place know him any more 11 Therefore I will not refrain my mouth;
I will speak in the anguish of my spirit;
I will complain in the bitterness of my soul
12 Am I a sea, or a whale,
That thou settest a watch over me?
13 When I say, My bed shall comfort me,
My couch shall ease my complaint;
14 Then thou scarest me with dreams,
And terrifiest me through visions:
15 So that my soul chooseth strangling,
And death rather than my life.
16 I loathe it; I would not live alway:
Let me alone; for my days are vanity.

Job, observing perhaps that his friends, though they would not interrupt him in his discourse, yet began to grow weary, and not to heed much what he said, here turns to God, and speaks to him. If men will not hear us, God will; if men cannot help us, he can; for his arm is not shortened, neither is his ear heavy. Yet we may not go to school to Job here to learn how to speak to God, for it must be confessed there is a great mixture of passion and corruption in what he here saith. But, if God be not extreme to mark what his people say amiss, let us also make the best of it. Job is here begging of God either ease him or end him. He here represents himself to God,

First. As a dying man, surely and speedily dying. It is good for us, when we are sick, to think and speak of death, for sickness is sent on purpose to put us in mind of it; and, if we be duly mindful of it ourselves, we may in faith put God in mind of it, as Job doth here, ver. 7, "O remember that my life is wind." He recommends himself to God, as an object of his pity and compassion, with this consideration, that he was a very weak, frail creature, his abode in this world short and uncertain, his removal out of it sure and speedy, and his return to it again impossible, and never to be expected; that his life was wind, as the lives of all men are, noisy perhaps and bustling like the wind, but vain and empty, soon gone, and when gone, past recall. God had compassion on Israel, remembering that they were but flesh, a wind that passeth away and cometh not again, Ps. lxxviii. 38, 39. Observe,

1. The pious reflections Job makes upon his own life and death. Such plain truths as these, concerning the shortness and vanity of life, the unavoidableness and irrecoverableness of death, then do us good when we think and speak of them with application to ourselves. Let us consider then,

1st. That we must shortly take our leave of all the things that are seen, that are temporal. The eye of the body must be closed, and shall no more see good, the good which the most of men set their hearts upon, for their cry is, Who will make us to see good? Ps. iv. 6. If we be such fools as to place our happiness in visible good things, what will become of us when they shall be for ever hid from our eyes, and we shall no more see good? Let us therefore live by that faith which is the substance and evidence of things not seen.

2nd. That we must then remove to an invisible world. "The eye of him that hath here seen me shall see me no more" there. It is ἀόρ.— an unseen state,' ver. 8. Death removes our lovers and friends into darkness, Ps. lxxxviii. 18 and will shortly remove us out of their sight; when we go hence we shall be seen no more, Ps. xxxix. 13, but go to converse with the things that are not seen, that are eternal.

3rd. That God can easily, and in a moment, put an end to our lives, and send us to another world; ver. 8, "Thine eyes are upon me, and I am not." Thou canst look me into eternity, frown me into the grave, when thou pleasest.

'Shouldst thou displeased give me a frowning look,
I sink, I die, as if with lightning struck.'—Sir R. Blackmore.

He takes away our breath, and we die; nay, he but looks on the earth and it trembleth, Ps. civ. 29, 32.

4th. That when we are once removed to another world we must never return to this. There is constant passing from this world to the other, but vestigia nulla retrorsum,—' there is no repassing.' Therefore, Lord, shew me kindness when I am here, for I shall return no more to receive kindness in this world. Or, Therefore, Lord, be so kind as to ease me by death; for that will be a perpetual ease. I shall return no more to the calamities of this life. When we are dead we are gone to return no more, First. From our house under ground; ver. 9, "He that goes down to the grave shall come up no more," until the general resurrection; shall come up no more to his place in this world. Dying is work that is to be done but once, and therefore it had need be well done; an error there is past retrieve. This is illustrated by the blotting out and scattering of a cloud: it is consumed and vanisheth away, is resolved into air, and never knits again. Other clouds arise, but the same cloud never returns; so a new generation of the children of men is raised up, but the former generation is quite consumed, and vanisheth away. When we see a cloud which looks great, as if it would eclipse the sun and drown the earth, of a sudden dispersed and disappearing, say, Just such a thing is the life of man; it is "a vapour that appeareth for a little while and then vanisheth away." Secondly. To return no more to our house above ground; ver. 10, "He shall return no more to his house," to the possession and enjoyment of it, to the business and delights of it. Others will take possession and keep it, until they also resign to another generation. The rich man in hell desired Lazarus might be sent to his house, knowing it was to no purpose to ask that he might have leave to go himself. Glorified saints shall return no more to the cares, and burthens, and sorrows of their house; nor damned sinners to the gaieties and pleasures of their house. Their place shall no more know them, no more own them, have no more acquaintance with them, nor be any more under their influence. It concerns us to secure a better place when we die, for this will no more own us.

2. The passionate inference he draws from it. From these premises he might have drawn a better conclusion than he doth; ver. 11, "Therefore I will not refrain my mouth, I will speak, I will complain." Holy David, when he had been meditating on the frailty of human life, made a contrary use of it, Ps. xxxix. 9, "I was dumb, and opened not my mouth;" but Job, finding himself near expiring, hastens as much to make his complaint as if he had been to make his last will and testament, or as if he could not die in peace till he had given vent to his passion. When we have but a few breaths to draw, we should spend them in the holy, gracious breathings of faith and prayer; not in the noisome, noxious breathings of sin and corruption. Better die praying and praising, than die complaining and quarrelling.

Secondly. As a distempered man, sorely and grievously distempered, both in body and mind. In this part of his representation he is very peevish, as if God dealt hardly with him, and laid upon him more than was meet: "Am I a sea, or a whale?" ver. 12. A raging sea, that must be kept within bounds, to check its proud waves; or an unruly whale, that must be restrained by force from devouring all the fishes of the sea? Am I so strong that there needs so much ado to hold me? so boisterous, that no less than all these mighty bonds of affliction will serve to tame me, and keep me within compass? We are very apt when we are in affliction to complain of God and his providence, as if he laid more restraint upon us than there is occasion for; whereas we are never in heaviness but when there is need, nor more than, upon some account or other, there is need.

1. He complains that he could not rest in his bed, ver. 13, 14. There we promise ourselves some repose when we are fatigued with labour, pain, or travail; "My bed shall comfort me, and my couch shall ease my complaint;" sleep will for a time give me some relief; it useth to do so; it is appointed for that end; many a time it hath eased us, and we have awaked refreshed, and with new vigour. When it is so we have great reason to be thankful; but it was not so with poor Job. His bed, instead of comforting him, terrified him, and his couch, instead of easing his complaint, added to it; for, if he dropped asleep, he was disturbed with his frightful dreams, and when those awaked him still he was haunted with dreadful apparitions. This was it that made the night so unwelcome and wearisome to him as it was; ver. 4, "When shall I arise?" Note, God can when he pleaseth meet us with terror there where we promise ourselves ease and repose. Nay, he can make us a terror to ourselves; and, as we have often contracted guilt by the rovings of an unsanctified fancy, he can likewise by the power of our own imagination create us a great deal of grief, and so make that our punishment which has often been our sin. Job's dreams, though they might partly arise from his distemper,—in fevers, or small-pox, when the body is all over sore, it is common for the sleep to be unquiet,—yet we have reason to think Satan had a hand in them, who delights to terrify those whom it is out of his reach to destroy; but Job looked up to God, who permitted Satan to do this, "Thou scarest me," and mistook Satan's mormos and bugbears for the terrors of

vi. 20. "Confounded" and "ashamed" often convey very much the sense of "bitterly disappointed."

vii. 1. As indicated in the margin, this verse may be rendered, "Is there not a warfare to man upon earth?"

vii. 2. For "shadow" we may understand shade; as a servant toiling in the sun, longing for shade and the end and reward of his work, is not happy, so Job was wretched, and longed for the end.

vii. 12. A few expositors have thought that "sea" in this verse means some wild beast, but there is no real ground for such an opinion. The word is applied to any large body of water—a sea properly, a lake, or a river—but never to any animal. The word tannin, however, translated "whale," may mean any marine monster or amphibious animal; hence some have inferred that Job here has in mind the Nile and the crocodile, which is the most probable explanation, especially as the movements of crocodiles are carefully observed with a view to their capture.

and setting themselves in array against him. We have reason to pray to God that our dreams may neither defile nor disquiet us, neither tempt us to sin, nor torment us with fear; that he who keeps Israel, and neither slumbers nor sleeps, will keep us when we slumber and sleep, that the devil may not then do us a mischief, either as an insinuating serpent, or as a roaring lion; and to bless God if we lie down and our sleep is sweet, and we are not thus scared.

2. He covets to rest in his grave; that bed where there are no tossings to and fro, nor any frightful dreams, ver. 15, 16. 1st. He was sick of life, and hated the thoughts of it: "I loathe it," I have had enough of it, "I would not live alway." Not only not live alway in this condition, in pain and misery, but not live alway in the most easy and prosperous condition, to be continually in danger of being thus reduced: "My days are vanity" at the best, empty of solid comfort, exposed to real griefs, and I would not be for ever tied to such uncertainty. Note, A good man would not (if he might) live always in this world, no, not though it smile upon him; because it is a world of sin and temptation, and he hath a better world in prospect. 2nd. He was fond of death, and pleased himself with the thoughts of it. His soul (his judgment, he thought, but really it was his passion,) chose strangling and death rather; any death rather than such a life as this. Doubtless this was Job's infirmity; for, though a good man would not wish to live alway in this world, and would choose strangling and death rather than sin, as the martyrs did, yet he will be content to live as long as pleaseth God,—not choose them rather than life, because life is our opportunity of glorifying God, and getting ready for heaven.

17 What is man, that thou shouldest magnify him?
And that thou shouldest set thine heart upon him?
18 And that thou shouldest visit him every morning,
And try him every moment?
19 How long wilt thou not depart from me,
Nor let me alone till I swallow down my spittle?
20 I have sinned; what shall I do unto thee, O thou preserver of men?
Why hast thou set me as a mark against thee,
So that I am a burden to myself?
21 And why dost thou not pardon my transgression,
And take away mine iniquity?
For now shall I sleep in the dust; [not be.
And thou shalt seek me in the morning, but I shall

Job here reasons with God,

First. Concerning his dealings with man in general; ver. 17, 18, "What is man, that thou shouldest magnify him?" This may be looked upon either, 1. As a passionate reflection upon the proceedings of Divine justice; as if the great God did diminish and disparage himself in contending with man. Great men think it below them to take cognizance of those who are much their inferiors, so far as to reprove and correct their follies and indecencies; why then doth God magnify man, by visiting him and trying him, and making so much ado about him? Why will he thus pour all his forces upon one that is such an unequal match for him? why will he visit him with afflictions, which, like a quotidian ague, return as duly and constantly as the morning light, and try every moment what he can bear? We mistake God, and the nature of his providence, if we think it any lessening to him to take notice of the meanest of his creatures. Or, 2. As a pious admiration of the condescensions of Divine grace, like that, Ps. viii. 4; cxliv. 3. He owns God's favour to man in general, even then when he complains of his own particular troubles. What is man, miserable man, a poor, mean, weak creature, that thou, the great and glorious God, shouldst deal with him as thou dost? What is man, 1st. That thou shouldst put such honour upon him; shouldst magnify him by taking him into covenant and communion with thyself? 2nd. That thou shouldst concern thyself so much about him, shouldst set thine heart upon him as dear to thee, and one thou hast a kindness for? 3rd. That thou shouldst visit him with thy compassions every morning, as we daily visit a particular friend, or as the physician visits his patients every morning to help them? 4th. That thou shouldst try him, shouldst feel his pulse, and observe his motions every moment, as in care about him, and jealous over him? That such a worm of the earth as man is should be the darling and favourite of Heaven is what we have reason for ever to admire.

Secondly. Concerning his dealings with him in particular. Observe,

1. The complaint he makes of his afflictions; which he here aggravates, and (as we are all too apt to do) makes the worst of in three expressions: 1st. That he was the butt to God's arrows. "Thou hast set me as a mark against thee," ver. 20. My case is singular, and none is shot at so as I am. 2nd. That he was a burthen to himself, ready to sink under the load of his own life. How much delight soever we take in ourselves, God can, when he pleaseth, make us burthens to ourselves. What comfort can we take in ourselves, if God appear against us as an enemy, and we have not comfort in him? 3rd. That he had no intermission of his griefs, ver. 19. How long will it be ere thou cause thy rod to depart from me, or abate the rigour of the correction, at least, for so long as that I may swallow down my spittle? It should seem Job's distemper lay much in his throat, stopped him up, and almost choked him, so that he could not swallow his spittle. He complains, ch. xxx. 18, that it bound him about like the collar of his coat. Lord, saith he, wilt not thou give me some respite, some breathing time? ch. ix. 18.

2. The concern he is in about his sins. The best men have sin to complain of, and the better they are the more they will complain of it.

1st. He ingenuously owns himself guilty before God; "I have sinned." God had said of him, that he was a perfect and an upright man; yet, he saith of himself, "I have sinned." Those may be upright who yet are not sinless; and those who are sincerely penitent are accepted through a Mediator as evangelically perfect. Job maintained against his friends that he was not a hypocrite, not a wicked man; and yet owns to his God that he had sinned. If we have been kept from gross acts of sin, it doth not therefore follow that we are innocent. The best must acknowledge before God that they have sinned. His calling God the observer, or preserver of men, may be looked upon as designed for an aggravation of his sin. Though God has had his eye upon me, his eye upon me for good, yet I have sinned against him. When we are in affliction, it is seasonable to confess sin, as the procuring cause of our affliction. Penitent confessions would drown and silence passionate complaints.

2nd. He seriously inquires how he might make his peace with God. "What shall I do unto thee," having done so much against thee? Are we convinced that we have sinned, and are we brought to own it? we cannot but conclude that something must be done to prevent the fatal consequences of it. The matter must not rest as it is, but some course must be taken to undo what has been ill done; and if we are truly sensible of the danger we have run ourselves into, we will be willing to do any thing, to take a pardon upon any terms, and therefore will be inquisitive what we shall do, Mic. vi. 6, 7; what we shall do to God, not to satisfy the demands of his justice, (that is done only by the Mediator,) but to qualify ourselves for the tokens of his favour, according to the tenor of the Gospel covenant. And, in making this inquiry, it is good to eye God as the preserver, or Saviour, of men, not their destroyer. In our repentance we must keep up good thoughts of God, as one that delights not in the ruin of his creatures, but would rather they should turn and live. Thou art the Saviour of men; be my Saviour, for I cast myself upon thy mercy.

3rd. He earnestly begs for the forgiveness of his sins, ver. 21. The heat of his spirit, as on the one hand it made his complaints the more bitter, so, on the other hand, it made his prayers the more lively and importunate; as here, "Why dost not thou pardon my transgression?" Art thou not a God of infinite mercy, that art ready to forgive? Hast not thou wrought repentance in me? Why then dost thou not give me the pardon of my sin, and make me to hear the voice of that joy and gladness? Surely he means more than barely the removing of his outward trouble, and is herein earnest for the return of God's favour, which he complained of the want of, ch. vi. 4. Lord, pardon my sins, and give me the comfort of that pardon, and then I can easily bear my afflictions, Mat. ix. 2; Isa. xxxiii. 24. When the mercy of God pardons the transgression that is committed by us, the grace of God takes away the iniquity that reigns in us. Wherever God removes the guilt of sin, he breaks the power of sin.

4th. To enforce his prayer for pardon he pleads the prospect he had of dying quickly; "For now shall I sleep in the dust." Death will lay us in the dust, will lay us to sleep there; and perhaps presently, now in a little time. Job had been complaining of restless nights, and that sleep departed from his eyes, ver. 3, 4, 13, 14; but those who cannot sleep on a bed of down will shortly sleep in a bed of dust; and not be scared with dreams, nor tossed to and fro. "And thou shalt seek me in the morning" to shew me favour, "but I shall not be;" it will be too late then. If my sins be not pardoned while I live, I am lost and undone for ever. Note, The consideration of this, that we must shortly die, and perhaps may die suddenly, should make us all very solicitous to get our sins pardoned, and our iniquity taken away.

CHAPTER VIII.

Job's friends are like Job's messengers: those followed one another close with evil tidings, these with harsh censures: both unawares served Satan's design; those to drive him from his integrity, these to drive him from the comfort of it. Eliphaz did not reply to what Job had said in answer to him, but left it to Bildad, whom he knew to be of the same mind with himself in this affair. Those are not the wisest of the company, but the weakest rather, who covet to have all the talk. Let others speak in their turn, and let the first keep silence, 1 Cor. xiv. 30, 31. Eliphaz had undertaken to shew that, because Job was sorely afflicted, he was certainly a wicked man; Bildad is much of the same mind, and will conclude Job a wicked man unless God do speedily appear for his relief. In this chapter he endeavours to convince Job, I. That he had spoken too passionately, ver. 2. II. That he and his children had suffered justly, ver. 3, 4. III. That if he were a true penitent God would soon turn his captivity, ver. 5—7. IV. That it was a usual thing for Providence to extinguish the joys and hopes of wicked men as his were extinguished, and therefore they had reason to suspect him for a hypocrite, ver. 8—19. V. That they should be abundantly confirmed in their suspicion, unless God did speedily appear for his relief, ver. 20—22.

THEN answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said,
2 How long wilt thou speak these things?
And how long shall the words of thy mouth be like a
3 Doth God pervert judgment? [strong wind?
Or doth the Almighty pervert justice?
4 If thy children have sinned against him,
And he have cast them away for their transgression;
5 If thou wouldest seek unto God betimes,
And make thy supplication to the Almighty;
6 If thou wert pure and upright;
Surely now he would awake for thee,
And make the habitation of thy righteousness prosperous.
7 Though thy beginning was small,
Yet thy latter end should greatly increase.

Here, First. Bildad reproves Job for what he had said, ver. 2; checks his passion, but perhaps (as is too common) with greater passion. We thought Job spoke a great deal of good sense, and much to the purpose, and that he had reason and right on his side; but Bildad, like an eager, angry disputant, turns it all off with this "How long wilt thou speak these things?" taking it for granted that Eliphaz had said enough to silence him, and that, therefore, all he said was impertinent. Thus, as Caryl observes, 'Reproofs are often grounded upon mistakes.' Men's meaning is not taken aright, and then they are gravely rebuked, as if they were evil-doers. Bildad compares Job's discourse to a strong wind; Job had excused himself with this, that his speeches were but as wind, ch. vi. 26; and, therefore, they should not make such ado about them Yea, but, saith Bildad, they are as a strong wind, blustering and threatening, boisterous and dangerous, and therefore we are concerned to fence against them.

Secondly. He justifies God in what he had done. This he had no occasion to do at this time; for Job did not condemn God, as he would have it thought he did. And this he might have done without reflecting upon Job's children, as he doth here. Could not he be an advocate for God, but he must be an accuser of the brethren?

1. He is right in general, that God doth not pervert judgment, nor ever go contrary to any settled rule of justice, ver. 2. Far be it from him that he should, and from us that we should suspect him. He never oppresseth the innocent, nor lays more load on the guilty than they deserve. He is God, the Judge, and "shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Gen. xviii. 25. If there should be unrighteousness with God, how should he judge the world? Rom. iii. 5, 6. He is Almighty, Shaddai,—'all-sufficient.' Men pervert justice sometimes for fear of the power of others,—but God is Almighty, and stands in awe of none; sometimes to obtain the favour of others,—but God is all-

vii. 14. The mention of dreams and visions here has been taken as indicating that the disease of Job was elephantiasis, of which they are a frequent accompaniment.

vii. 15. As shown in the margin, the Hebrew has "bones" for "life;" wherefore some understand that Job was reduced to a skeleton, and translate accordingly.

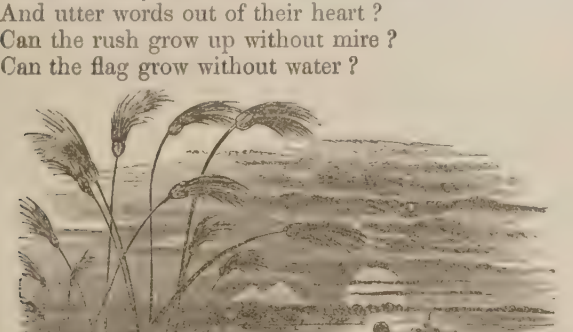
vii. 17. For some reason not apparent, the Syriac version is, "What is man, that thou shouldest destroy him?"

vii. 19. The saying, "till I swallow down my spittle," means "till I fetch breath," in which sense it is still used among the Arabs, denoting a very short interval.

vii. 20. Instead of "I have sinned," we may translate "Have I sinned?" or "If I have sinned," as some of the old and new versions express it.

vii. 21. For "Thou shalt seek me in the morning," we should render, "Thou shalt diligently seek for me."

sufficient, and cannot be benefited by the favour of any. It is man's weakness and impotency that he often is unjust; it is God's omnipotence that he cannot be so.



2. Yet he is not fair and candid in the application. He takes it for granted that Job's children (the death of whom was one of the greatest of his afflictions) had been guilty of some notorious wickedness; and that the unhappy circumstances of their death were sufficient evidence that they were sinners above all the children of the East, ver. 4. Job readily owned that God did not pervert judgment; and yet it did not therefore follow either that his children were castaways, or that they died for some great transgression. It is true that we and our children have sinned against God; and we ought to justify him in all he brings upon us and ours; but extraordinary afflictions are not always the punishment of extraordinary sins, but sometimes the trial of extraordinary graces; and in our judgment of another's case (unless the contrary appears) we ought to take the more favourable side, as our Saviour directs, Lu. xiii. 2, 4. Here Bildad missed it.

Thirdly. He put Job in hope that if he were indeed upright, as he said he was, he should yet see a good issue of his present troubles. "Although thy children have sinned against him, and are cast away in their transgression," they have died in their own sin; yet, if thou be pure and upright thyself, and, as an evidence of that, wilt now seek unto God, and submit to him, all shall be well yet, ver. 5—7. This may be taken two ways; either,

1. As designed to prove Job a hypocrite, and a wicked man; though not by the greatness, yet by the continuance of his afflictions. When thou wast impoverished, and thy children killed, if thou hadst been pure and upright, and approved thyself so in the trial, God would before now have returned in mercy to thee, and comforted thee according to the time of thine affliction; but, because he doth not so, we have reason to conclude thou art not so pure and upright as thou pretendest to be. If thou hadst carried thyself well under the former affliction, thou hadst not been struck with the latter. Herein Bildad was not in the right; for a good man may be afflicted for his trial, not only very sorely, but very long; and yet if for life, in comparison with eternity it is but for a moment. But since Bildad put it to this issue, God was pleased to join issue with him, and proved his servant Job an honest man by Bildad's own argument, for soon after he blessed his latter end more than his beginning. Or,

2. As designed to direct and encourage Job, that he might not thus run himself into despair, and give up all for gone; yet there might be hope if he would take the right course. I am apt to think Bildad here intended to condemn Job, yet would be thought to counsel and comfort him. 1st. He gives him good counsel, yet perhaps not expecting he would take it; the same that Eliphaz had given him, ch. v. 8, to seek unto God, and that betimes, that is, speedily and seriously; and not to be dilatory and trifling in his return and repentance. He adviseth him not to complain, but to petition, and to make his supplication to the Almighty with humility and faith. And to see that there was (what he feared had hitherto been wanting) sincerity in heart,—thou must be pure and upright; and honesty in his house, that must be the habitation of thy righteousness, and not filled with ill-gotten goods; else God will not hear thy prayers, Ps. lxvi. 18. It is only the prayer of the upright that is the acceptable and prevailing prayer, Pr. xv. 8. 2nd He gives him good hopes that he should yet again see good days, yet secretly suspecting he was not qualified to see them. He assures him that, if he would be early in seeking God, God would awake for his relief, would remember him and return to him; though now he seemed to forget him, and forsake him. That if his habitation were righteous it should be prosperous; for honesty is the best policy, and inward piety a sure friend to outward prosperity. When we return to God in a way of duty, we have reason to hope that he will return to us in a way of mercy. Let not Job object that he had so little left to begin the world with again, that it was impossible he should ever prosper as he had done; no, though thy beginning should be never so small, a little meal in the barrel, and a little oil in the cruise, God's blessing shall multiply that to a great increase. This is God's way of enriching the souls of his people with graces and comforts, not per saltum—'as by a bound,' but per gradum—'step by step.' The beginning is small, but the progress is to perfection. Dawning light grows to noonday; a grain of mustard seed to a great tree. Let us not, therefore, despise the day of small things, but hope for the day of great things.

8 For enquire, I pray thee, of the former age,
And prepare thyself to the search of their fathers:
9 (For we are but of yesterday, and know nothing, Because our days upon earth are a shadow:)
10 Shall not they teach thee, and tell thee,
And utter words out of their heart?
1 Can the rush grow up without mire?
Can the flag grow without water?

EGYPTIAN PAPYRUS.

12 Whilst it is yet in his greenness, and not cut down,
It withereth before any other herb.
13 So are the paths of all that forget God;
And the hypocrite's hope shall perish:
14 Whose hope shall be cut off,
And whose trust shall be a spider's web.
15 He shall lean upon his house, but it shall not stand:
He shall hold it fast, but it shall not endure.
16 He is green before the sun,
And his branch shooteth forth in his garden.
17 His roots are wrapped about the heap,
And seeth the place of stones.
18 If he destroy him from his place,
Then it shall deny him, saying, I have not seen thee.
19 Behold, this is the joy of his way,
And out of the earth shall others grow.

Bildad here discourseth very well of the sad catastrophe of hypocrites and evil-doers, and the fatal period of all their hopes and joys. He will not be so bold as to say with Eliphaz, that none that were righteous were ever cut off thus, ch. iv. 7; yet he takes it for universally granted, that God in the course of his providence doth ordinarily bring wicked men, who seemed pious, and were prosperous, to shame and ruin in this world; and, by making their prosperity short, he discovers their piety to be counterfeit. Whether this will certainly prove that all who are thus ruined must be concluded to have been hypocrites he will not say, but rather suspect, and thinks the application is easy.

First. He proves this truth, of the certain destruction of all the hopes and joys of hypocrites, by an appeal to antiquity, and the concurring sentiment and observation of all wise and good men. And an undoubted truth it is, if we take in the other world, that, if not in this life, yet in the life to come, hypocrites will be deprived of all their trusts and all their triumphs; whether Bildad so meant or no, we must so take it. Let us observe the method of his proof, ver. 8—10.

1. He insists not on his own judgment, and that of his companions; "We are but of yesterday, and know nothing," ver. 9. He perceived Job had no opinion of their abilities; he thought they knew little. Saith Bildad, We will own that we know nothing, are as ready to confess our ignorance as thou art to condemn it; for we are but of yesterday in comparison, and our days upon earth are short and transient, and hastening away as a shadow. And, therefore, 1st. We are not so near the fountain-head of Divine revelation (which then, for aught appears, was conveyed by tradition) as the former age was; and, therefore, we must inquire what they said, and recount what we have been told of their sentiments. Blessed be God, now we have the Word of God in writing, and are directed to search that, we need not inquire of the former age, nor prepare ourselves to the search of their fathers; for, though we ourselves are but of yesterday, the Word of God in the Scripture is as nigh us as them, Rom. x. 8 And it is the more sure word of prophecy to which we must take heed. If we study and keep God's precepts, we may by them understand more than the ancients, Ps. cxix. 99, 100. 2nd. We do not live so long as they of the former age did to make observations upon the methods of Divine providence; and, therefore, cannot be such competent judges as they in a cause of this nature. Note, The shortness of our lives is a great hindrance to the improvement of our knowledge, and so is the frailty and weakness of our bodies. Vita brevis, ars longa,—'life is short, the progress of art boundless.'

2. He refers himself to the testimony of the ancients, and to the knowledge which Job himself had of their sentiments. Do thou inquire of the former age, and let them tell thee not only their own judgment in this matter, but also of their fathers, ver. 8. They will teach thee, and inform thee, (ver. 10,) that all along in their time the judgments of God followed wicked men. This they will utter out of their hearts, that is, as that which they firmly believe themselves, which they are greatly affected with, and desirous to acquaint and affect others with. Note, 1st. For the right understanding of Divine providence, and the unfolding of the difficulties of it, it will be of use to compare the observations and experiences of former ages with the events of our own day; and, in order thereunto, to consult history, especially the sacred history, which is the most ancient, infallibly true, and written designedly for our learning. 2nd. They that would fetch knowledge from the former ages must search diligently, prepare for the search, and take pains in the search. 3rd. Those words are most likely to reach to the hearts of the learners that come from the hearts of the teachers. They shall teach thee best that utter words out of their heart, that speak by experience, and not by rote, of spiritual and Divine things. The learned Bishop Patrick suggests that, Bildad being a Shuhite, descended from Shuah, one of Abraham's sons by Keturah, Gen. xxv. 2, in this appeal he makes to history he has a particular respect to the rewards which then remained of God's blessings upon the posterity of faithful Abraham, who hitherto, and long after, continued in his religion; and of the extirpation of those Eastern people (neighbours to Job) in whose country they were settled, for their wickedness. Whence he infers, that it is God's usual way to prosper the just, and root out the wicked, though for awhile they may flourish.

Secondly. He illustrates this truth by some similitudes.

1. The hopes and joys of the hypocrite are here compared to a rush or flag, ver. 11—13. 1st. It grows up out of the mire and water. The hypocrite cannot gain his hope without some false, rotten ground or other out of which to raise it, and with which to support it and keep it alive, no more than the rush can grow without mire. He grounds it on his worldly prosperity, the plausible profession he makes of religion, the good opinion of his neighbours, and his own good conceit of himself, which are no solid foundation on which to build his confidence; it is all but mire and water, and the hope that grows out of it is but rush and flag. 2nd. It may look green and gay for a while. The rush outgrows the grass, but it is light, and hollow, and empty, and good for nothing; it is green for show, but of no use. 3rd. It withers presently, before any other herb, ver. 12; even while it is in its greenness it is dried away and gone in a little time. Note, The best state of hypocrites and evil-doers borders upon withering; even when it is green it is going. The grass is cut down and withered, Ps. xc. 6; but the rush is not cut down, and yet withers before it grows up, Ps. cxxix. 6; as it has no use, so it has no continuance. And, ver. 13, "So are the paths of all that forget God," they take the same way that the rush doth, for "the hypocrite's hope shall perish." Note, First. Forgetfulness of God is at the bottom of men's hypocrisy, and of the vain hopes with which they flatter and deceive themselves in their hypocrisy. Men would not be hypocrites if they did not forget that the God with whom they have to do viii. 11. The rush here mentioned is correctly called the papyrus in the Greek version. It is a kind of rush, of which extensive use was made by the Egyptians for the manufacture of gloves, garments, baskets, and small boats, but it is far more celebrated as the material from which the papyrus or ancient paper was made. The other plant, called the flag, is in the original achu, which is an Egyptian word, and which, Jerome says, they told him denoted anything which grew in a pool; it may therefore include marsh plants in general, or plants which grow in watery places. It is thought that this verse introduces a quotation, which some regard as closed with verse 13, while others think it continued to verse 18 or 19.

viii. 14. Some render the first clause, "whom his confidence shall cut off;" the Latin is, "his folly shall not please him;" and the Greek, "his house shall be uninhabitable." Barnes translates, "his hope shall rot." We prefer the authorised version, which is at least as well supported as the others.

searcheth the heart, and requires truth there, that he is a Spirit, and has his eye on our spirits. And hypocrites could have no hope if they did not forget that God is righteous, and will not be mocked with the torn and the lame. Secondly. The hope of hypocrites is a great cheat upon themselves; and, though it may flourish awhile, it will certainly perish at last, and they with it.

2. They are here compared to a spider's web, or a spider's house, as it is in the margin; a cobweb, ver. 14, 15. The hope of the hypocrite, 1st. Is woven out of his own bowels; it is the creature of his own fancy, and ariseth purely from a conceit of his own merit and sufficiency. There is a great deal of difference between the work of the bee and that of the spider. A diligent Christian, like the laborious bee, fetcheth in all his comfort from the heavenly dews of God's Word; but the hypocrite, like the subtle spider, weaves his out of a false hypothesis of his own concerning God, as if he were altogether such a one as himself. 2nd. He is very fond of it, as the spider of her web; pleaseth himself with it, wraps himself in it, calls it his house, leans upon it, and holds it fast. It is said of the spider, that "she takes hold with her hands, and is in king's palaces," Pr. xxx. 28. So doth a carnal worldling hug himself in the fulness and firmness of his outward prosperity; he prides himself in that house as his palace, and fortifies himself in it as his castle, and makes use of it as the spider of her web, to ensnare those he has a mind to prey upon. So doth a formal professor; he flatters himself in his own eyes, doubts not of his salvation, is secure of heaven, and cheats the world with his vain confidences. 3rd. It will easily and certainly be swept away, as the cobweb with the besom, when God shall come to purge his house. The prosperity of worldly people will fail them when they expect to find safety and happiness in it. They seek to hold fast their estates, but God is plucking them out of their hands; and whose shall those things be which they have provided, or what the better will they be for them? The confidences of hypocrites will fail them: "I tell you I know you not." The house built on the sand will fall in the storm when the builder most needed it, and promised himself the benefit of it. "When a wicked man dies, his expectation perisheth." The ground of his hopes will prove false; he will be disappointed of the thing he hoped for, and his foolish hope with which he buoyed himself up will be turned into endless despair; and thus his hope will be cut off, his web, that refuge of lies, swept away, and he crushed in it.

3. They are here compared to a flourishing and well rooted tree, which, though it do not wither of itself, yet will easily be cut down, and its place know it no more. The secure and prosperous sinner may think himself wronged when he is compared to a rush and a flag; he thinks he has a better bottom than so, and we will allow him his conceit, saith Bildad, and give him all the advantage he can desire, and yet bring him in suddenly cut off. He is here represented as Nebuchadnezzar was, in his own dream, (Dan. iv. 10,) by a great tree.

1st. See this tree fair and flourishing, ver. 16, "like a green bay tree," Ps. xxxvii. 35, "green before the sun," that keeps its greenness in defiance of the scorching sunbeams, and "his branch shooteth forth" under the protection of his garden wall, and with the benefit of his garden soil. See it fixed, and taking deep root, never likely to be overthrown by stormy winds, for his roots are interwoven with the stones, ver. 17; it grows in firm ground, not as the rush, in mire and water. Thus doth a wicked man, when he prospers in the world, think himself secure; his wealth is a high wall in his own conceit.

2nd. See this tree felled and forgotten, notwithstanding; "destroyed from his place," ver. 18, and so wholly extirpated that there shall remain no sign nor token where it grew; the very place shall say, "I have not seen thee," and the standers by shall say the same, "I sought him, but he could not be found," Ps. xxxvii. 36. He made a great show and a great noise for a time, but he is gone of a sudden, and neither root nor branch left him, Mal. iv. 1. "This is the joy" (that is, this is the end and conclusion) "of the wicked man's way," ver. 19; this is that which all his joy comes to: "the way of the ungodly shall perish," Ps. i. 6. His hope, he thought, would in the issue be turned into joy; but this is the issue, this is the joy, "the harvest shall be a heap in the day of grief and of desperate sorrow," Isa. xvii. 11. This is the best of it, and what then is the worst of it? But shall he not leave a family behind him to enjoy what he has? No, "out of the earth," not out of his roots, "shall others grow," that are nothing akin to him, and shall fill up his place, and rule over that for which he laboured. Others, namely, of the same spirit and disposition, shall grow up in his place, and be as secure as ever he was, not warned by his fall. The way of worldlings is their folly, and yet there is a race of them that approve their sayings, Ps. xlix. 13.

20 Behold, God will not cast away a perfect man,
Neither will he help the evil doers:
21 Till he fill thy mouth with laughing, and thy lips with [rejoicing.
22 They that hate thee shall be clothed with shame;
And the dwelling place of the wicked shall come to nought.

Bildad here, in the close of his discourse, sums up what he had to say in a few words, setting before Job life and death, the blessing and the curse; assuring him, that as he was so he should fare, and therefore they might conclude that as he fared so he was.

First. On the one hand, if he were a perfect upright man, God would not cast him away, ver. 20. Though now he seemed forsaken of God, he would yet return to him, and by degrees would turn his mourning into dancing, Ps. xxx. 11; and comforts should flow in upon him so plentifully, that his mouth should be filled with laughing, ver. 21; so affecting should the happy change be, Ps. cxxvi. 2. They that loved him would rejoice with him; but they that hated him, and had triumphed in his fall, would be ashamed of their insolence when they see him restored to his former prosperity. Now it is true that "God will not cast away an upright man;" he may be cast down for a time, but he shall not be cast away for ever. It is true that, if not in this world yet in another, the mouth of the righteous shall be filled with rejoicing. Though their sun should set under a cloud, yet it shall rise again clear, never more to be clouded; though they go mourning to the grave, that shall not hinder their entrance into the joy of their Lord. It is true that the enemies of the saints will be clothed with shame when they see them crowned with honour. But it doth not, therefore, follow that, if Job were not perfectly restored to his former prosperity, he forfeited the character of a perfect man.

Secondly. On the other hand, if he were a wicked man, and an evil-doer, God would not help him, but leave him to perish in his present distresses, ver. 20; and his dwelling-place should come to nought, ver. 22. And here also it is true, that God will not help the evil-doers, they throw themselves out of his protection, and forfeit his favour; 'he will not take the ungodly by the hand,' so it is in the margin, will not have fellowship and communion with them; for what communion between light and darkness? He will not lend them his hand to pull them out of the miseries, the eternal miseries, into which they have plunged themselves. They will then stretch out their hand to him for help; but it is too late, he will not take them by the hand: "Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed." It is true that the dwelling-place of the wicked, sooner or later, will come to nought. Those only that make God their dwelling-place are safe for ever, Ps. xc. 1; xci. 1. They who make other things their refuge will be disappointed. Sin brings ruin on persons and families; yet to argue (as Bildad, I doubt, slily doth) that because Job's family was sunk, and he himself at present seemed helpless, therefore he certainly was an ungodly, wicked man, was neither just nor charitable, as long as there appeared no other evidence of his wickedness and ungodliness. Let us judge nothing before the time, but wait till the secrets of all hearts shall be made manifest; and the present difficulties of Providence be solved to universal and everlasting satisfaction, when the mystery of God shall be finished.

CHAPTER IX.

In this and the following chapter we have Job's answer to Bildad's discourse, wherein he speaks honourably of God, humbly of himself, and feelingly of his troubles; but not one word by way of reflection upon his friends, or their unkindness to him, nor in direct reply to what Bildad had said. He wisely keeps to the merits of the cause, and makes no remarks upon the person that managed it, nor seeks occasion against him. In this chapter we have, I. The doctrine of God's justice laid down, ver. 2. II. The proof of it, from his wisdom, and power, and sovereign dominion, ver. 3—13. III. The application of it, in which, 1. He condemns himself, as not able to contend with God, neither in law nor battle, ver. 14—21; 2. He maintains his point, that we cannot judge of men's character by their outward condition, ver. 22—24; 3. He complains of the greatness of his troubles, the confusion he was in, and the loss he was at what to say or do, ver. 25—35.

THEN Job answered and said,
2 I know it is so of a truth:
But how should man be just with God?
3 If he will contend with him,
He cannot answer him one of a thousand.
4 He is wise in heart, and mighty in strength:
Who hath hardened himself against him, and hath prospered?
5 Which removeth the mountains, and they know not:
Which overturneth them in his anger.
6 Which shaketh the earth out of her place,
And the pillars thereof tremble.
7 Which commandeth the sun, and it riseth not;
And sealeth up the stars.
8 Which alone spreadeth out the heavens,
And treadeth upon the waves of the sea.
9 Which maketh Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades,
And the chambers of the south.
10 Which doeth great things past finding out;
Yea, and wonders without number.
11 Lo, he goeth by me, and I see him not:
He passeth on also, but I perceive him not 12 Behold, he taketh away, who can hinder him?
Who will say unto him, What doest thou?
13 If God will not withdraw his anger,
The proud helpers do stoop under him.

Bildad began with a rebuke to Job for talking so much, ch. viii. 2. Job makes no answer to that, though it had been easy enough to retort it upon himself; but what he next lays down as his principle, that God never perverts judgment, Job agrees with him in, "I know it is so of a truth," ver. 2. Note, Those we dispute with we should be ready to own how far we agree with, and not slight, much less resist a truth, though produced by an adversary, and urged against us; but receive it in the light and love of it, though it has been misapplied. "It is so of a truth," that wickedness brings men to ruin, and the godly are taken under God's special protection. These are truths which I subscribe to; but how can any man make his part good with God? "In his sight shall no flesh living be justified," Ps. cxliii. 2. "How should man be just with God?" Some understand this as a passionate complaint of God's strictness and severity, that he is a God there is no dealing with; and it cannot be denied that there are in this chapter some peevish expressions which seem to speak such language as that; but I take this rather as a pious confession of man's sinfulness, and his own in particular,—that, if God should deal with any of us according to the desert of our iniquities, we were certainly undone.

First. He lays this down for a truth, that man is an unequal match for his Maker, either in dispute or combat.

1. In dispute; ver. 3, "If he will contend with him," either at law or at an argument, "he cannot answer him one of a thousand." 1st. God can ask a thousand puzzling questions, which those that quarrel with him, and arraign his proceedings, cannot give an answer to. When God spoke to Job out of the whirlwind, he asked him a great many questions: Dost thou know this? and Canst thou do that? to none of which Job could give an answer, ch. xxxviii., xxxix. God can easily manifest the folly of the greatest pretenders to wisdom. 2nd. God can lay to our charge a thousand offences, can draw up against us a thousand articles of impeachment, and we cannot answer him so as to acquit ourselves from the imputation of any of them; but must by silence give consent that they are all true. We cannot set aside one as foreign, another as frivolous, and another as false; we cannot as to one deny the fact, and plead not guilty, and as to another deny the fault, confess and justify; no, we are not able to answer him, but must lay our hand upon our mouth, as Job did, ch. xl. 4, 5, and cry, Guilty, guilty.

2. In combat; ver. 4, "Who hath hardened himself against him, and hath prospered?" The answer is very easy; you cannot produce any instance, from the

ix. 5—5. The language of these verses is highly figurative, and not meant as a literal description of the Divine operations, so much as a declaration of their vastness and reality. God is the great ruler and controller of what men call nature. The expression in verse 6, where the "pillars" of the earth are mentioned, seems to be a bold metaphor, because, according to chap. xxvi. 7, the earth is unsupported.

ix. 9. The words rendered Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades no doubt signify constellations of stars. The first is that called the Great Bear or Ursa Major, and Charles's Wain, wherein the pole-star is conspicuous. The second, or Orion, was known as the Giant among some nations, and is visible especially through the winter months. The Pleiades, or seven stars, called in Hebrew kimah, or "a heap," are a well-known cluster, consisting of a number of stars much greater than can be seen by the naked eye. "The chambers of the south" may be those regions of space which are invisible, hence the constellations of the southern hemisphere then unknown.

beginning of the world to this day, of any daring sinner that has hardened himself against God, hath obstinately persisted in rebellion against him, but he found God too hard for him, and paid dear for his folly. They have not prospered, or had peace; they have had no comfort in it, nor success. What did ever any man get by trials of skill, or trials of titles, with his Maker? All the opposition given to God is but setting briars and thorns before a consuming fire, so foolish, so fruitless, so destructive is the attempt, Isa. xxvii. 4; Eze. xxvii. 14; 1 Cor x. 22. Apostate angels hardened themselves against God, but did not prosper, 2 Pet. ii. 4. The dragon fights, but is cast out, Rev. xii. 8. Wicked men harden themselves against God, dispute his wisdom, disobey his laws, are impenitent for their sins, and incorrigible under their afflictions; they reject the offers of his grace, and resist the strivings of his Spirit; they make nothing of his threatenings, and make head against his interest in the world; but have they prospered? Can they prosper? No, they are but treasuring up against themselves wrath against the day of wrath. They that roll this stone, it will return upon them.

Secondly. He proves it by shewing what a God he is with whom we have to do. "He is wise in heart," and therefore we cannot answer him at law; he is "mighty in strength," and therefore we cannot fight it out with him. It is the greatest madness that can be, to think to contend with a God of infinite wisdom and power, who knows every thing, and can do every thing; who can be neither outwitted nor overpowered. The devil promised himself that Job, in the day of his affliction, would curse God, and speak ill of him; but, instead of that, he sets himself to honour God, and to speak highly of him. As ill pained as he is, and as much taken up with his own miseries, when he has occasion to mention the wisdom and power of God, he forgets his complaints, dwells with delight, and expatiates with a flood of eloquence, upon that noble, useful subject. Evidences of the wisdom and power of God he fetcheth,

1. From the kingdom of nature, in which the God of nature acts with an uncontrollable power, and doth what he pleaseth; for all the orders and all the powers of nature are derived from him, and depend upon him.

1st. When he pleaseth he alters the course of nature, and turns back its streams, ver. 5—7. By the common law of nature the mountains are settled, and are, therefore, called everlasting mountains; the earth is established, and cannot be removed, Ps. xciii. 1, and the pillars thereof are immoveably fixed; the sun riseth in its season, and the stars shed their influences on this lower world; but when God pleaseth he can not only drive out of the common track, but invert the order and change the law of nature. First. Nothing more firm than the mountains; when we speak of removing mountains, we mean that which is impossible; yet the Divine power can make them change their seat. "He removeth them and they know not," removes them whether they will or no; he can make them lower their heads, level them, and overturn them in his anger; can spread the mountains as easily as the husbandman spreads the mole-hills, be they never so high, and large, and rocky; men have much ado to pass them over, but God, when he pleaseth, can pass them off. He made Sinai shake, Ps. lxviii. 8; the hills skipped, Ps. cxiv. 4; the everlasting mountains were scattered, Hab. iii. 6. Secondly. Nothing more fixed than the earth on its axletree; yet God can, when he pleaseth, shake that out of its place, and heave it off its centre, and make even its pillars to tremble; what seemed to support it will itself need support, when God gives it a shock. See how much we are indebted to God's patience. God has power enough to shake the earth from under that guilty race of mankind which makes it groan under the burthen of sin, and so to shake the wicked out of it, ch. xxxviii. 13; yet he continues the earth, and man upon it, and makes it not still, as once, to swallow up the rebels. Thirdly. Nothing more constant than the rising sun; it never misseth its appointed time, yet God, when he pleaseth, can suspend it; he that at first commanded it to rise can countermand it. Once the sun was bidden to stand, and another time to retreat, to shew that it is still under the check of its great Creator. Thus great is God's power: and how great, then, is his goodness, which causeth his sun to shine even upon the evil and unthankful, though he could withhold it! He that made the stars also can, if he pleaseth, seal them up, and hide them from our eyes. By earthquakes and subterraneous fires, mountains have sometimes been removed, and the earth shaken. In very dark and cloudy days and nights it seems to us as if the sun were forbidden to rise, and the stars were sealed up, Acts xxvii. 20. It is sufficient to say that Job here speaks of what God can do; but, if we must understand it of what he has done in fact, all these verses may, perhaps, be applied to Noah's flood, when the earth, even its mountains, were shaken, and the sun and stars were darkened; and the world that now is, we believe to be reserved for that fire which will consume the mountains, and melt the earth with its fervent heat, and which will turn the sun into darkness.

2nd. As long as he pleaseth he preserves the settled course and order of nature, and this is a continued creation. He himself alone, by his own power, and without the assistance of any other, First. "Spreads out the heavens," ver. 8, not only did spread them out at first, but still spreads them out; that is, keeps them spread out, for otherwise they would of themselves roll together like a scroll of parchment. Secondly. He "treads upon the waves of the sea;" that is, he suppresseth them and keepeth them under, that they return not to deluge the earth, Ps. civ. 9, which is given as a reason why we should all fear God, and stand in awe of him, Jer. v. 22. He is mightier than the proud waves, Ps. xciii. 4; lxv. 7. Thirdly. He makes the constellations. Three are named for all the rest, ver. 9, "Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and" in general "the chambers of the south." The stars of which these are composed he made at first, and put into that order, and he still makes them, preserves them in being, and guides their motions; he makes them to be what they are to man, and inclines the hearts of men to observe them, which the beasts are not capable of doing. Not only those stars which we see and give names to, but those also in the other hemisphere, about the antarctic pole, which never come in our sight, called here "the chambers of the south," are under the Divine direction and dominion. How wise is he then, and how mighty!

2. Evidences are here fetched from the kingdom of providence, that special providence which is conversant about the affairs of the children of men. Consider what God doth in the government of the world, and you will say, "he is wise in heart, and mighty in strength."

1st. He doth many things and great; many and great to admiration, ver. 10. Job here saith the same that Eliphaz had said, ch. v. 9, and in the original in the very same words, not declining to speak after him, though now his antagonist. God is a great God, and doth great things, a wonder-working God, his works of wonder are so many that we cannot number them, and so mysterious that we cannot find them out. Oh, the depth of his counsels!

2nd. He acts invisibly and undiscerned; ver. 11, "He goes by me" in his operations, "and I see him not," I perceive him not; his way is in the sea, Ps. lxxvii. 19. The operations of second causes are commonly obvious to sense, but God doth all about us, and yet we see him not, Acts xvii. 23. Our finite understandings cannot fathom his counsels, apprehend his motions, or comprehend the measures he takes; we are, therefore, incompetent judges of God's proceedings, because we know not what he doth, or what he drives at. The ar ana imperii,—'secrets of government,' are things above us, which, therefore, we must not pretend to expound or comment upon.

3rd. He acts with an incontestable sovereignty, ver. 12. He takes away our creature comforts and confidences when and as he pleaseth, takes away health, estate, relations, friends, takes away life itself, whatever goes it is he that takes it, by what hand soever it is removed, his hand must be acknowledged in it: the Lord taketh away, and "who can hinder him?" 'who can turn him away?' margin. 'Who shall make him restore?' so some. Who can dissuade him, or alter his counsels? Who can resist him, or oppose his operations? Who can control him, or call him to an account for it? What action can be brought against him? or, "Who will say unto him, What dost thou?" or, Why dost thou so? Dan. iv. 35. God is not obliged to give us a reason of what he doth. The meaning of his proceedings we know not now; it will be time enough to know hereafter, when it will appear that what seemed now to be done by prerogative was done in infinite wisdom, and for the best.

4th. He acts with an irresistible power, which no creature can resist; ver. 13, "If God will not withdraw his anger," which he can do when he pleaseth, for he is Lord of his anger, lets it out or calls it in as he will, "the proud helpers do stoop under him;" that is, he certainly breaks and crusheth those that proudly help one another against him. Proud men set themselves against God and his proceedings. In this opposition they join hand in hand. "The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together," to throw off his yoke, to run down his truths, and to persecute his people. "Men of Israel, help," Acts xxi. 28; Ps. lxxxiii. 8. If one enemy of God's kingdom fall under his judgment, the rest come proudly to help that, and think to deliver that out of his hand: but in vain; unless he pleaseth to withdraw his anger, which he often doth, for it is the day of his patience, "the proud helpers stoop under him," and fall with those whom they designed to help. "Who knows the power of God's anger?" They who think they have strength enough to help others, will not be able to help themselves again

14 How much less shall I answer him,
And choose out my words to reason with him?
15 Whom, though I were righteous, yet would I not answer,
But I would make supplication to my judge.
16 If I had called, and he had answered me; [voice
Yet would I not believe that he had hearkened unto my 17 For he breaketh me with a tempest,
And multiplieth my wounds without cause
18 He will not suffer me to take my breath,
But filleth me with bitterness.
19 If I speak of strength, lo, he is strong:
And if of judgment, who shall set me a time to plead?
20 If I justify myself, mine own mouth shall condemn me:
If I say, I am perfect, it shall also prove me perverse.
21 Though I were perfect, yet would I not know my soul:
I would despise my life.

What Job had said of man's utter inability to contend with God he here applies to himself, and in effect despairs of gaining his favour; which some think, ariseth from the hard thoughts he had of God, as one that, having set himself against him, right or wrong, would be too hard for him. I rather think it ariseth from the sense he had of the imperfection of his own righteousness, and the dark and cloudy apprehensions which at present he had of God's displeasure against him.

First. He dares not dispute with God; ver. 14. If "the proud helpers do stoop under him, how much less shall I," a poor, weak creature, so far from being a helper that I am very helpless, how "shall I answer him?" What can I say against that which God doth? If I go about to reason with him, he will certainly be too hard for me. If the potter make the clay into a vessel of dishonour, or break in pieces the vessel he has made, shall the clay or the broken vessel reason with him? So absurd is the man that replieth against God, or thinks to talk it out with him. No, let all flesh be silent before him.

Secondly. He dares not insist upon his own justification before God. Though he vindicated his own integrity to his friends, and would not yield that he was a hypocrite and a wicked man, as they suggested, yet he would never plead it as his righteousness before God. I will never venture upon the covenant of innocency, nor think to come off by virtue of that. Job knew so much of God, and knew so much of himself, that he durst not insist upon his own justification before God.

1. He knew so much of God that he durst not stand a trial with him, ver. 15—19. He knew how to make his part good with his friends, and thought himself able to deal with them; but, though his cause were better than it was, he knew it was to no purpose to debate it with God.

1st. God knew him better than he knew himself, and therefore, ver. 15, "Though I were righteous" in my own apprehension, and my own heart did not condemn me, yet God is greater than my heart, and knows those secret faults and errors of mine which I do not and cannot understand, and is able to charge me with them; and therefore "I will not answer." St. Paul speaks to the same purpose: "I know nothing by myself," am not conscious to myself of any reigning wickedness, and "yet I am not hereby justified," 1 Cor. iv. 4. I dare not put myself upon that issue, lest God charge that upon me which I did not discover in myself. Job will, therefore, waive that plea, and make supplication to his Judge; that is, would cast himself upon God's mercy, and not think to come off by his own merit.

2nd. He had no reason to think that there was any thing in his prayers to recommend them to the Divine acceptance, or to fetch in an answer of peace, no worth or worthiness at all to which to ascribe their success; but it must be attributed purely to the grace and compassion of God, who answers before we call, and not because we call, and gives gracious answers to our prayers, but not for our prayers; ver. 16, "If I had called, and he had answered," had given the thing I called to him for, "yet," so weak and defective are my best prayers, that "I would not believe he had" therein "hearkened to my voice." I could not say he had saved with his right hand, and answered me, Ps. lx. 5, but that he did it purely for his own name's sake. Bishop Patrick expounds it thus: If I had made supplication, and he had granted my desire, I would not think my prayer had done the business. "Not for your sakes, be it known to you."

3rd. His present miseries which God had brought him into, notwithstanding his integrity, gave him too sensible a conviction that in the ordering and disposing of men's outward condition in this world God acts by sovereignty, ix. 13. For "the proud helpers do stoop under him," the Douay, following the Vulgate, has, "Under whom they stoop that carry the world." Upon this erroneous version this note is given: "Angels move the spheres of heaven." Dr. Delitzsch gives, "The helpers of Rahab stoop under him," understanding by Rahab Egypt, as in chap. xxvi. 12. The Greek translator thought "whales" were meant. It is very doubtful whether our version should be altered, but, if there is room for a change, the rendering of Delitzsch must be adopted. The only question which can fairly be raised is, whether Rahab is a name for Egypt, as it sometimes is, or whether it has its proper signification of pride.

ix. 16. Barnes says, "It is remarked by Schultens that the expressions in these verses are all taken from courts of justice." This is perhaps not exactly the case; but it is evident that the language takes a form which indicates that the writer had judicial proceedings in his mind. More than this we would not say.

and though he never doth wrong to any, yet he doth not ever give full right to all; that is, the best do not always fare best, nor the worst fare worst in this life, because he reserves the full and exact distribution of rewards and punishments for the future state. Job was not conscious to himself of any extraordinary guilt, and yet fell under extraordinary afflictions, ver. 17, 18. Every man must expect the wind to blow upon him and ruffle him; but Job was broken with a tempest. Every man, in the midst of these thorns and briars, must expect to be scratched, but Job was wounded, and his wounds multiplied. Every man must expect a cross daily, and to taste sometimes of the bitter cup; but poor Job's troubles came so thick upon him that he had no breathing time, and he was filled with bitterness; and he presumes to say all this was without cause, without any great provocation given. We have made the best of what Job said hitherto, though contrary to the judgment of many good interpreters; but here, no doubt, he spake unadvisedly with his lips. He reflected on God's goodness in saying he was not suffered to take his breath, while yet he had such good use of his reason and speech as to be able to talk thus; and on his justice in saying it was without cause. And yet it is true, that as, on the one hand, there are many who are chargeable with more sin than the common infirmities of the human nature, and yet feel no more sorrow than that of the common calamities of human life; so, on the other hand, there are many who feel more than the common calamities of human life, and yet are conscious to themselves of no more but the common infirmities of human nature.

4th. He was in no capacity at all to make his part good with God, ver. 19. First. Not by force of arms. I dare not enter the lists with the Almighty, for "if I speak of strength," and think to come off by that, "lo, he is strong," stronger than I, and will certainly overpower me. There is no disputing, said one once to Cæsar, with him that commands legions, much less with him that has legions of angels at command. "Can thine heart endure," thy courage and presence of mind, "or can thine hands be strong" to defend thyself, "in the days that I shall deal with thee?" Eze. xxii. 14. Secondly. Not by force of arguments. I dare not try the merits of the cause. "If I speak of judgment," and insist upon my right, "who will set me a time to plead?" There is no higher power to which I may appeal, no superior court to appoint a hearing of the cause; for he is supreme, and from him every man's judgment proceeds, which he must abide by.

2. He knew so much of himself that he durst not stand a trial; ver. 20, 21, "If I" go about to "justify myself" and to plead a righteousness of my own, my defence will be my offence, and "mine own mouth shall condemn me," even when it goes about to acquit me. A good man, that knows the deceitfulness of his own heart, and is jealous over it with a godly jealousy, and hath often discovered that amiss there which had long lain undiscovered, is suspicious of more evil in himself than he is really conscious of, and therefore will by no means think of justifying himself before God. "If we say we have no sin, we" not only "deceive ourselves," but we affront God; for we sin in saying so, and give the lie to the Scripture, which has concluded all under sin. "If I say, I am perfect," I am sinless. God has nothing to lay to my charge, my very saying so "shall prove me perverse," proud, ignorant, and presumptuous. Nay, "though I were perfect," though God should pronounce me just, "yet would I not know my soul," I would not be in care about the prolonging of my life, while it is loaded with all these miseries. Or, Though I were free from gross sins, though my conscience did not charge me with any enormous crime, yet would I not believe my own heart so far as to insist upon my innocency, nor think my life worth striving for with God. In short, it is folly to contend with God, and our wisdom, as well as duty, to submit to him, and throw ourselves at his feet.

22 This is one thing, therefore I said it,
He destroyeth the perfect and the wicked
23 If the scourge slay suddenly,
He will laugh at the trial of the innocent.
24 The earth is given into the hand of the wicked:
He covereth the faces of the judges thereof;
If not, where, and who is he?

Here Job toucheth briefly upon the main point now in dispute between him and his friends. They maintained that those who are righteous and good always prosper in this world, and none but the wicked are in misery and distress. He asserted, on the contrary, that it is a common thing for the wicked to prosper, and the righteous to be greatly afflicted. This is the one thing, the chief thing, wherein he and his friends differed; and they had not proved their assertion, therefore he abides by his. I said it, and say it again, that all things come alike to all. Now it must be owned,

First. That there is very much truth in what Job here means; that temporal judgments, when they are sent abroad, fall both upon good and bad; and the destroying angel seldom distinguisheth, though once he did, between the houses of Israelites and the houses of Egyptians.

In the judgment of Sodom indeed, which is called "the vengeance of eternal fire," Jude 7, far be it from God to "slay the righteous with the wicked, and that the righteous should be as the wicked," Gen. xviii. 25; but, in judgments merely temporal, the righteous have their share, and sometimes the greatest share. "The sword devours one as well as another," Josiah as well as Ahab. Thus God destroys the perfect and the wicked, involves them both in the same common ruin; good and bad were sent together into Babylon, Jer. xxiv. 5, 9. If the scourge slay suddenly, and sweep down all before it, God will be well pleased to see how the same scourge which is the perdition of the wicked is the trial of the innocent, and of their faith, which will be found unto praise, and honour, and glory, 1 Pet. i. 7; Ps. lxvi. 10.

'Against the just the Almighty's arrows fly,
For he delights the innocent to try;
To shew their constant and their Godlike mind,
Not by afflictions broken, but refined.'—Sir R. Blackmore.

Let this reconcile God's children to their troubles. They are but trials, designed for their honour and benefit; and if God be pleased with them, let not them be displeased. If "he laugh at the trial of the innocent," knowing how glorious the issue of it will be, at destruction and famine let them also laugh, ch. v. 22, and triumph over them, saying, "O death, where is thy sting?"

On the other hand, the wicked are so far from being made the marks of God's judgments, that "the earth is given into their hand," ver. 24. They enjoy large possessions and great power; have what they will, and do what they will. "Into the hand of the wicked" one; in the original it is singular: the devil, that wicked one, is called the god of this world, and boasts that into his hand it is delivered, Lu. iv. 6. Or, 'into the hand of a wicked man,' meaning, as Bishop Patrick and the Assembly's Annotations conjecture, some noted tyrant then living in those parts, whose great wickedness and great prosperity were well known both to Job and his friends. The wicked have the earth given them; but the righteous have heaven given them; and which is better, heaven without earth, or earth without heaven? God, in his providence, advanceth wicked men, while he covers the faces of those who are fit to be judges, who are wise and good, and qualified for government, and buries them alive in obscurity; perhaps suffers them to be run down and condemned, and to have their faces covered as criminals by those wicked ones into whose hand the earth is given. We daily see this done; if it be not God that doth it, where and who is he that doth? To whom can it be ascribed but to him that rules in the kingdoms of men, and gives them to whom he will? Dan. iv. 32.

Secondly. Yet it must be owned that there is too much passion in what Job here saith. The manner of expression is peevish. When he meant that God afflicts, he ought not to have said he destroys both the perfect and the wicked. When he meant that God pleaseth himself with the trial of the innocent, he ought not to have said he laughs at it, for he doth not afflict willingly. When the spirit is heated, either with dispute or with discontent, we have need to set a watch before the door of our lips, that we may observe a good decorum in speaking of Divine things.

25 Now my days are swifter than a post:
They flee away, they see no good

POST CAMEL.

26 They are passed away as the swift ships:
As the eagle that hasteth to the prey.
27 If I say, I will forget my complaint,
I will leave off my heaviness, and comfort myself:
28 I am afraid of all my sorrows,
I know that thou wilt not hold me innocent.
29 If I be wicked, why then labour I in vain?
30 If I wash myself with snow water,
And make my hands never so clean;
31 Yet shalt thou plunge me in the ditch,
And mine own clothes shall abhor me.
32 For he is not a man, as I am, that I should answer him,
And we should come together in judgment
33 Neither is there any daysman betwixt us,
That might lay his hand upon us both.
34 Let him take his rod away from me,
And let not his fear terrify me:
35 Then would I speak, and not fear him;
But it is not so with me.

Job here grows more and more querulous, and doth not conclude this chapter with such awful expressions of God's wisdom and justice as he began it. They that indulge a complaining humour know not to what indecencies, nay, to what impieties, it will hurry them. The beginning of that strife with God is as the letting forth of water; therefore leave it off before it be meddled with. When we are in trouble, we are allowed to complain to God, as the psalmist often, but must by no means complain of God, as Job here.

First. His complaint here of the passing away of the days of his prosperity is well enough, ver. 25, 26. My days, that is, all my good days, are gone, never to return,—gone of a sudden, gone ere I was aware. Never did any courier that went express, like Cushi and Ahimaaz, with good tidings, make such haste as all my comforts did from me; never did ship sail to its port,—never did eagle fly upon his prey,—with such incredible swiftness; nor doth there remain any footsteps of my prosperity, no more than there doth of an eagle in the air, or a ship in the sea, Pr. xxx. 19. See here, 1. How swift the motion of time is; it is always upon the wing, hastening to its period; it stays for no man. What little need have we of pastimes, and what great need to redeem time, when time runs out, runs on so fast towards eternity, which comes as time goes. 2. How vain the enjoyments of time are, which we may be quite deprived of while yet time continues. Our day may be longer than the sunshine of our prosperity; and when that is gone it is as if it had not been. The remembrance of having done our duty will be pleasing afterwards, so will not the remembrance of our having got a great deal of worldly wealth, when it is all lost and gone. They flee away past recall; they see no good, and leave none behind them.

Secondly. His complaint of his present uneasiness is excusable, ver. 27, 28. 1. It should seem he did his endeavour to quiet and compose himself, as his ix. 21. The Hebrew is here very abrupt: "I perfect, I should not know my soul, I should abhor my life." Many turns have been given to the words, which probably mean, "If I claimed perfection, I should be ignorant of myself, and degrade and dishonour my life." Compare what St. Paul says in Phil. iii. 12—14. Another explanation is, "If I am perfect, I do not know myself; I loathe my life."

ix. 25. "A post" here, as elsewhere, is a courier, or swift bearer of letters and messages.

ix. 26. The versions here vary. The Syriac is, "They pass away with many thousands of enemies, like an eagle which flieth after its food;" the Douay, after the Latin, "They have passed by as ships carrying fruits, as an eagle flying to meat;" the Greek, "Or is there any track (left) by ships on their path, or by an eagle flying to seek food?" The marginal note in our version, "ships of desire, or ships of Ebeh," shows the doubts of our translators. Perhaps the word ebeh, in which the real difficulty lies, means some sort of reed or cane friends advised him. That was the good he would do. He would fain forget his complaints, and praise God; would leave off his heaviness, and comfort himself, that he might be fit for converse, both with God and man. But, 2. He found he could not do it; "I am afraid of all my sorrows;" then when I strive most against my trouble, it prevails most over me, and proves too hard for me. It is easier in such a case to know what we should do than to do it; to know what temper we should be in than to get into that temper, and keep in it. It is easy to preach patience to those that are in trouble, and to tell them they must forget their complaints, and comfort themselves; but it is not so soon done as said. Fear and sorrow are tyrannizing things, not easily brought into the subjection they ought to be kept in to religion and right reason.

Thirdly. But his complaint of God, as implacable and inexorable, was by no means to be excused. It was the language of his corruption. He knew better things; and at another time would have been far from harbouring any such hard thoughts of God as now broke in upon his spirit, and broke out in these passionate complaints. Good men do not always speak like themselves; but God considers their frame, and the strength of their temptations, gives them leave afterwards to unsay it by repentance, and will not lay it to their charge. Job seems to speak here,

1. As if he despaired of obtaining from God any relief or redress of his grievances, though he should produce never so good proofs of his integrity. "I know thou wilt not hold me innocent;" my afflictions have continued so long upon me, and increased so fast, that I do not expect thou wilt ever clear up my innocency, by delivering me out of them, and restoring me to a prosperous condition. Right or wrong I must be treated as a wicked man; my friends will continue to think so of me, and God will continue upon me the afflictions which give them occasion to think so, and why then do I labour in vain to clear myself, and maintain my own integrity? ver. 29. It is to no purpose to speak in a cause that is already prejudged. With men it is often labour in vain for the most innocent to go about to clear themselves; they must be adjudged guilty, though the evidence be never so plain for them. But it is not so in our dealings with God, who is the patron of oppressed innocency, and to whom it was never in vain to commit a righteous cause.

Nay, he not only despairs of relief, but expects that his endeavour to clear himself would render him yet more obnoxious; ver. 30, 31, "If I wash myself with snow water," and make my integrity never so evident, it will be all to no purpose, judgment must go against me; "Thou shalt plunge me in the ditch," the pit of destruction, so some; or rather, the filthy kennel, or sewer, which will make me stink so in the nostrils of all about me, that "my own clothes shall abhor me," and I shall even loathe to touch myself. He saw his afflictions coming from God; those were the things that blackened him in the eye of his friends, and upon that score he complained of them, and of the continuance of them, not only as the ruin of his comfort, but as the ruin of his reputation. Yet these words are capable of a good construction. If we be never so industrious to justify ourselves before men, and to preserve our credit with them,—if we keep our hands never so clean from the pollutions of gross sin, which fall under the eye of the world,—yet God, who knows our hearts, can charge us with so much secret sin as will for ever take off all our pretensions to purity and innocency, and make us see ourselves odious in the sight of the holy God. Paul, while a Pharisee, made his hands very clean, but when the commandment came, and discovered to him his heart sins, made him know lust, that plunged him in the ditch.

2. As if he despaired to have so much as a fair hearing with God; and that were hard indeed.

1st. He complains that he was not upon even terms with God; ver. 32, "He is not a man as I am." I could venture to dispute with a man like myself; the potsherds may strive with the potsherds of the earth, but he is infinitely above me, and therefore I dare not enter the lists with him; I shall certainly be cast if I contend with him. Note, First. God is not a man as we are. Of the greatest princes we may say, they are men as we are, but not of the great God. His thoughts and ways are infinitely above ours; and we must not measure him by ourselves. Man is foolish and weak, frail and fickle; but God is neither so nor so. We are depending, dying creatures; he the independent and immortal Creator. Secondly. The consideration of this should keep us very low, and very silent before God. Let us not make ourselves equal with God, but always eye him as infinitely above us.

2nd. That there was no arbitrator or umpire to adjust the differences between him and God, and to determine the controversy; ver. 33, "Neither is there any daysman." This complaint, that there was not, is in effect a wish that there were, and so the Seventy read it: 'O that there were a mediator between us!' Job would gladly refer the matter, but no creature was capable of being a referee; and, therefore, he must even refer it still to God himself, and resolve to acquiesce in his judgment. Our Lord Jesus is the blessed daysman, who has mediated between heaven and earth; has laid his hand upon us both; to him the Father has committed all judgment, and we must. But this matter was not then brought to so clear a light as it is now by the Gospel, which leaves no room for such a complaint as this.

3rd. That the terrors of God, which set themselves in array against him, put him into such confusion, that he knew not how to address himself to God with the confidence with which he was formerly wont to approach him, ver. 34, 35. Besides the distance which I am kept at by his infinite transcendency, his present dealings with me are very discouraging. "Let him take his rod away from me;" he means not so much his outward afflictions as the load which lay upon his spirit, from the apprehensions of God's wrath; that was his fear which terrified him. Let that be removed,—let me recover the sight of his mercy,—and not be amazed with the sight of nothing but his terrors; and then I would speak, and order my cause before him. But it is not so with me; the cloud doth not at all scatter; the wrath of God still fastens upon me, and preys on my spirits as much as ever; and what to do I know not.

From all this let us take occasion, First. To stand in awe of God, and to fear the power of his wrath. If good men have been put into such consternation by it, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear? Secondly. To pity those that are wounded in spirit, and pray earnestly for them, because in that condition they know not how to pray for themselves. Thirdly. Carefully to keep up good thoughts of God always in our minds, for hard thoughts of him are the inlets of much mischief. Fourthly. To bless God that we are not in such a disconsolate condition as poor Job was here in, that we walk in the light of the Lord; let us rejoice therein, but rejoice with trembling.

CHAPTER X.

Job owns here that he was full of confusion, ver. 15, and as he was so was his discourse: he knew not what to say, and perhaps sometimes scarce knew what he said. In this chapter, I. He complains of the hardships he was under, ver. 1—7; and then comforts himself with this, that he was in the hand of the God that made him, and pleads that, ver. 8—13. II. He complains again of the severity of God's dealings with him, ver. 14—17; and then comforts himself with this that death would put an end to his troubles, ver. 18—22.

MY soul is weary of my life;
I will leave my complaint upon myself;
I will speak in the bitterness of my soul.
2 I will say unto God, Do not condemn me;
Shew me wherefore thou contendest with me.
3 Is it good unto thee that thou shouldest oppress,
That thou shouldest despise the work of thine hands,
And shine upon the counsel of the wicked?
4 Hast thou eyes of flesh?
Or seest thou as man seeth?
5 Are thy days as the days of man?
Are thy years as man's days,
6 That thou enquirest after mine iniquity,
And searchest after my sin?
7 Thou knowest that I am not wicked;
And there is none that can deliver out of thine hand

Here is, First. A passionate resolution to persist in his complaint, ver. 1. Being daunted with the dread of God's majesty, so that he could not plead his cause with him, he resolves to give himself some ease by giving vent to his resentments. He begins with a hot word; "My soul is weary of my life," weary of this body, and impatient to get clear of it, fallen out with life, and displeased at it,—sick of it, and longing for death. Through the weakness of grace he went contrary to the dictates even of nature itself. We should act more like men, did we act more like saints. Faith and patience would keep us from being weary of our lives, (and cruel to them, as some read it,) even then when Providence has made them most wearisome to us; for that is to be weary of God's correction. Job, being weary of his life, and having ease no other way, resolves to complain,—resolves to speak. He will not give vent to his soul by violent hands, but he will give vent to the bitterness of his soul by violent words. Losers think they may have leave to speak; and unbridled passions, as well as unbridled appetites, are apt to think it an excuse for their excursions, that they cannot help it. But what have we wisdom and grace for, but to keep the mouth as with a bridle? Job's corruption speaks here, yet grace puts in a word. 1. He will complain, but he will leave his complaint upon himself. He would not impeach God, nor charge him with unrighteousness or unkindness; but, though he knew not particularly the ground of God's controversy with him, and the cause of action, yet in the general he would suppose it to be in himself, and willingly bear all the blame. 2. He will speak, but it shall be the bitterness of his soul that he will express, not his settled judgment. If I speak amiss, it is not I, but sin that dwells in me; not my soul, but its bitterness.

Secondly. An humble petition to God. He will speak, but the first word shall be a prayer; and, as I am willing to understand it, it is a good prayer, ver. 2. 1. That he might be delivered from the sting of his afflictions, which is sin; "Do not condemn me," do not separate me for ever from thee. Though I lie under the cross, let me not lie under the curse. Though I smart by the rod of a father, let me not be cut off by the sword of a judge. Thou dost correct me, I will bear that as well as I can, but, O do not condemn me! It is the comfort of those who are in Christ Jesus, that, though they are in affliction, there is no condemnation to them, Rom. viii. 1; nay, "they are chastened of the Lord, that they may not be condemned with the world," 1 Cor. xi. 32. This, therefore, we should deprecate above any thing else when we are in affliction; However thou art pleased to deal with me, Lord, do not condemn me; my friends condemn me, but do not thou. 2. That he might be made acquainted with the true cause of his afflictions, and that is sin too; "Lord, shew me wherefore thou contendest with me." When God afflicts us he contends with us; when he contends with us there is always a reason why and wherefore. He is never angry without cause, though we are; and it is desirable to know what the reason is, that we may repent of, mortify, and forsake the sin for which God hath a controversy with us. In inquiring it out, let conscience have leave to do its office, and to deal faithfully with us, as Gen. xlii. 21.

Thirdly. A peevish expostulation with God concerning his dealings with him. Now he speaks in the bitterness of his soul indeed, not without some ill-natured reflections upon the righteousness of his God.

1. He thinks it unbecoming the goodness of God, and the mercifulness of his nature, to deal so hardly with his creature, as to lay upon him more than he could bear; ver. 3, "Is it good unto thee that thou shouldst oppress?" No, certainly it is not. What he approves not in men, Lam. iii. 34—36, he will not act himself. Lord, in dealing with me, thou seemest to oppress thy subject,—to despise thy workmanship, and to countenance thine enemies. Now, Lord, what is the meaning of this? Such is thy nature, that this cannot be a pleasure to thee; and such is thy name, that it cannot be an honour to thee; why, then, dealest thou thus with me? "what profit is there in my blood?" Far be it from Job to think that God did him wrong, but he is quite at a loss how to reconcile his providences with his justice, as good men have often been, and must wait till the day shall declare it. Let us, therefore, now harbour no hard thoughts of God, because we shall then see there was no hard cause for them.

2. He thinks it unbecoming the infinite knowledge of God to put his prisoner thus upon the rack, as it were by torture to extort a confession from him, ver. 4—6.

1st. He is sure God doth not discover things, nor judge of them, as men do. He has not eyes of flesh, ver. 4; for he is a Spirit. Eyes of flesh cannot see in the dark, but darkness hideth not from God. Eyes of flesh are but in one place at a time, and can see but a little way, but "the eyes of the Lord are in every place, and run to and fro through the whole earth." Many things are hid from eyes of flesh, the most curious and piercing; "there is a path which even the vulture's eye has not seen." But nothing is, or can be, hid from the eye of God, to which all things are naked and open. Eyes of flesh see the outward appearance only, and may be imposed upon by a deceptio visus,—'an illusion of the senses,' but God sees every thing truly; his sight cannot be deceived, for he trieth the heart, and is a witness to the thoughts and intents of that. Eyes of flesh discover things gradually, and when we gain the sight of one thing we lose the sight of another, but God sees every thing at one view. Eyes of flesh are soon tired, must be closed every night that they may be refreshed, and will shortly be darkened by age, and shut up by death; but the Keeper of Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps, nor doth his sight ever decay. God sees

ix. 33. The old word "daysman," meaning an arbiter, or umpire, was based on the idea that the question of the day was decided by him. Bishop Patrick paraphrases the verse, "Nor is there anybody above us both to compose our differences and command silence when either of us exceeds our bounds." The Syriac is, "But, oh, that there was a censor between us, to place his hand upon the mouth of both!"

x. 1. For "I will leave my complaint upon myself," Rodwell translates, "I will give way to my complaint;" Delitzsch, "I will freely utter my complaint;" A. B. Davidson, "I will give loose rein to my complaint." The words may be literally rendered, "I will let loose my complaint upon me," and mean "I will not restrain my complainings." Bishop Patrick paraphrases the verse, "And since life is a burthen to me, which can find no ease but only in complaining, I will take that liberty (for it is in vain to contend against it, ix. 27), though no words can express my anguish and misery."

x. 9. For "Thou hast made me as the clay," Rodwell renders, not as man sees, that is, he doth not judge as mar judgeth,—at the best, secundum allegata et probata,—'according to what is alleged and proved,' as the thing appears, rather than as it is, and too often according to the bias of the affections, passions, prejudices and interest; but "we are sure that the judgment of God is according to truth," and that truth he knows not by information, but by his own inspection. Men discover secret things by search, and examination of witnesses; comparing evidence and giving conjectures upon it, wheedling or forcing the parties concerned to confess. But God needs not any of these ways of discovery; he sees not as man sees.

2nd. He is sure that, as God is not short-sighted like man, so he is not short-lived; ver. 5, "Are thy days as the days of man," few and evil? Do they roll on in succession, or are they subject to change like the days of man? No, by no means. Men grow wiser by experience, and more knowing by daily observation; with them truth is the daughter of time, and therefore they must take time for their searches, and if one experiment fail must try another; but it is not so with God. To him nothing is past, nothing future, but every thing present. The days of time, by which the life of man is measured, are nothing to the years of eternity in which the life of God is wrapt up.

3rd. He therefore thinks it strange that God should thus prolong his torture, and continue him under the confinement of this affliction, and neither bring him to a trial, nor grant him a release; as if he must take time to inquire after his iniquity, and use means to search after his sin, ver. 6. Not as if Job thought God did thus torment him that he might find occasion against him; but his dealings with him had such an aspect, which was dishonourable to God, and would tempt men to think him a hard master. Now, Lord, if thou wilt not consult my comfort, consult thine own honour; do something for thy great name, and do not disgrace the throne of thy glory, Jer. xiv. 21.

3. He thinks it looked like an abuse of his omnipotence, to keep a poor prisoner in custody whom he knew to be innocent, only because there was none that could deliver him out of his hand; ver. 7, "Thou knowest that I am not wicked." He had already owned himself a sinner, and guilty before God; but he here stands to it that he was not wicked, not devoted to sin, not an enemy to God, not a dissembler in his religion, that he had not wickedly departed from his God; Ps. xviii. 21, "But there is none that can deliver out of thy hand;" and therefore, there is no remedy, I must be content to lie by it, waiting thy time, and throwing myself on thy mercy in submission to thy sovereign will. Here see, 1st. What ought to quiet us under our troubles; that it is to no purpose to contend with omnipotence. 2nd. What will abundantly comfort us if we are able to appeal to God as Job here, Lord, "thou knowest that I am not wicked." I cannot say that I am not wanting, or I am not weak; but, through grace, I can say I am not wicked. Thou knowest I am not, for thou knowest I love thee.

8 Thine hands have made me and fashioned me
Together round about; yet thou dost destroy me.
9 Remember, I beseech thee, that thou hast made me as the clay;
And wilt thou bring me into dust again?
10 Hast thou not poured me out as milk,
And curdled me like cheese?
11 Thou hast clothed me with skin and flesh,
And hast fenced me with bones and sinews.
12 Thou hast granted me life and favour,
And thy visitation hath preserved my spirit.
13 And these things hast thou hid in thine heart:
I know that this is with thee

In these verses we may observe,

First. How Job eyes God as his creator and preserver, and describes his dependence upon him as the author and upholder of his being. This is one of the first things we are all concerned to know and consider.

1. That God made us. He, and not our parents, who were only the instruments of his power and providence in our production; he made us and not we ourselves. His hands have made and fashioned these bodies of ours, and every part of them, ver. 8; and they are fearfully and wonderfully made. The soul also which animates the body is his gift. He takes notice of both here. 1st. The body is made as the clay, ver. 9; cast into shape, into this shape, as the clay is formed into a vessel according to the skill and will of the potter. We are earthen vessels, mean in our original, and soon broken into pieces, made as the clay; "let not," therefore, "the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus?" We must not be proud of our bodies, because the matter is from the earth, yet not dishonour our bodies, because the mould and shape is from the Divine wisdom. The formation of human bodies in the womb is described by an elegant similitude; ver. 10, "Thou hast poured me out like milk," which is coagulated into cheese; and by an induction of some particulars, ver. 11. Though we come into the world naked, yet the body is itself both clothed and armed. The skin and flesh are its clothing; the bones and sinews are its armour, not offensive, but defensive. The vital parts, the heart and lungs, are thus clothed, not to be seen—thus fenced, not to be hurt. The admirable structure of human bodies is an illustrious instance of the wisdom, power, and goodness of the Creator. What pity is it that these bodies should be instruments of unrighteousness which are capable of being temples of the Holy Ghost. 2nd. The soul is the life, the soul is the man; and this is the gift of God: Thou hast granted me life, breathed into me the breath of life, without which the body would be but a worthless carcass. God is the father of spirits, he made us living souls, and endued us with the powers of reason; gave us life and favour, and life is a favour, a great favour, more than meat, more than raiment; a distinguishing favour, a favour that puts us into a capacity of receiving other favours. Now Job was in a better mind than he was when he quarrelled with life as a burthen, and asked, "Why died I not from the womb?" Or, by life and favour may be meant life and all the comforts of life, referring to his former prosperity. Time was when he walked in the light of the Divine favour; and thought, as David, that through that favour his mountain stood strong.

2. That God maintains us. Having lighted the lamp of life, he doth not leave it to burn upon its own stock, but continually supplies it with fresh oil; "Thy visitation has preserved my spirit," kept me alive, protected me from the adversaries of life; the death we are in the midst of, and the dangers we are continually exposed to; and blessed me with all the necessary supports of life, and the daily supplies it needs and craves.

Secondly. How he pleads this with God, and what use he makes of it. He minds God of it; ver. 9, "Remember, I beseech thee, that thou hast made me;" What then!

1. Thou hast made me, and therefore thou hast a perfect knowledge of me, Ps. cxxxix. 1—13; and needest not to examine me by scourging, nor to put me upon the rack for the discovering of what is within me.

2. Thou hast made me as the clay by an act of sovereignty, and wilt thou by a like act of sovereignty unmake me again? If so, I must submit.

3. Wilt thou destroy the work of thine own hands? It is a plea the saints have often used in prayer, "We are the clay, and thou our potter," Isa. lxiv. 8; "Thy hands have made me and fashioned me," Ps. cxix. 73. So here, "Thou madest me," and wilt thou destroy me? ver. 8, "Wilt thou bring me into dust again?" ver. 9. Wilt thou not pity me? wilt thou not spare and help me, and stand by the work of thine own hands? Ps. cxxxviii. 8. Thou madest me and knowest my strength, wilt thou then suffer me to be pressed above measure? Was I made to be made miserable? Was I preserved only to be reserved for these calamities? If we plead this with ourselves as an inducement to duty, God made me and maintains me, and therefore, I will serve him and submit to him, we may plead it with God as an argument for mercy, "Thou hast made me," new make me; "I am thine, save me." Job knew not how to reconcile God's former favours and his present frowns; but concludes, ver. 13, "These things hast thou hid in thine heart." Both are according to the counsel of thine own will, and therefore undoubtedly consistent, however they seem. When God thus strangely changeth his way, though we cannot account for it, we are bound to believe there are good reasons, for it is hid in his heart, which will be manifested shortly. It is not with us, or in our reach to assign the cause; but "I know that this is with thee." "Known unto God are all his works."

14 If I sin, then thou markest me,
And thou wilt not acquit me from mine iniquity.
15 If I be wicked, woe unto me;
And if I be righteous, yet will I not lift up my head.
I am full of confusion; therefore see thou mine affliction;
16 For it increaseth. Thou huntest me as a fierce lion:
And again thou shewest thyself marvellous upon me.
17 Thou renewest thy witnesses against me,
And increasest thine indignation upon me;
Changes and war are against me.
18 Wherefore then hast thou brought me forth out of the womb? [me!
Oh that I had given up the ghost, and no eye had seen 19 I should have been as though I had not been;
I should have been carried from the womb to the grave
20 Are not my days few? cease then,
And let me alone, that I may take comfort a little,
21 Before I go whence I shall not return,
Even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death;
22 A land of darkness, as darkness itself:
And of the shadow of death, without any order,
And where the light is as darkness.

Here is, First. Job's passionate complaints. On that harsh and unpleasant string he harps much, in which, though he cannot be justified, he may be excused. He complained not for nothing as the murmuring Israelites, but had cause to complain. If we think it looks ill in him, let it be a warning to us to keep our temper better.

1. He complains of the strictness of God's judgment, and the rigour of his proceedings against him, and is ready to call it summum jus,—'justice bordering on severity.' 1st. That he took all advantages against him, "If I sin, then thou markest me," ver. 14. If I do but take one false step, misplace a word, or cast a look awry, I shall be sure to hear of it; conscience, thy deputy, will be sure to upbraid me with it, and to tell me this gripe, this twitch of pain, is to punish me for that. If God should thus mark iniquities we are undone; we must say the contrary, though we sin, God doth not deal in extremity with us. 2nd. That he prosecuted those advantages to the utmost; "Thou will not acquit me from mine iniquity." While his troubles continued, he could not take the comfort of his pardon, nor hear that voice of joy and gladness, so hard is it to see love in God's heart, when we see frowns in his face, and a rod in his hand. 3rd. That, whatever was his character, his case at present was very uncomfortable, ver. 15. First. If he be wicked, he is certainly undone in the other world; "If I be wicked, woe unto me." Note, A sinful state is a woful state. This we should each of us believe, as Job here, with application to ourselves; "If I be wicked," though prosperous, and living in pleasure, yet "woe to me." Some especially have reason to dread double woes if they be wicked. I that have knowledge, that have made great profession of religion, that have been so often under strong convictions, and have made so many fair promises,—I that was born of so good parents, blessed with a good education, that have lived in good families, and long enjoyed the means of grace,—"if I be wicked, woe," and a thousand woes "to me." Secondly. If he be righteous, yet he dares not lift up his head; dares not answer as before, ch. ix. 15. He is so oppressed and overwhelmed with his troubles, that he cannot look up with any comfort or confidence. Without were fightings, within were fears; so that between both he was full of confusion. Not only confusion of face for the disgrace he was brought down to, and the censures of his friends, but confusion of spirit; his mind was in a constant hurry, and he was almost distracted, Ps. lxxxviii. 15.

2. He complains of the severity of the execution. God, he thought, did not only punish him for every failure, but punish him in a high degree, ver. 16, 17. His affliction was, 1st. Grievous, very grievous, marvellous, exceeding marvellous. God hunted him as a lion, as a fierce lion hunts and runs down his prey. God was not only strange to him, but shewed himself marvellous upon him by bringing him into uncommon troubles, and so making him a prodigy, a wonder unto many. All admired that God would inflict, and that Job could bear so much. That which made his afflictions most grievous was, that he felt God's indignation in them; that was it that made them taste so bitter and lie so heavy. They were God's witnesses against him, tokens of his displeasure; this made the sores of his body wounds in his spirit. 2nd. It was growing, still growing worse and

"Like clay hast thou moulded me," and certainly the fashioning of the clay is the true idea; hence Patrick again, "I was formed by thee as the potter works the clay into what shape he pleases."

x. 12. The words, "And thy visitation hath preserved my spirit," refer to the oversight of Divine Providence; hence A. B. Davidson translates, "Thy providence preserved my spirit;" Delitzsch, "Thy care hath guarded my breath;" Barnes, "Thy care hath preserved my spirit;" and Rodwell, "Thy care has watched over my breath."

x. 14, 15. These verses are by some referred to past time. Thus Rodwell: "Had I sinned, thou wouldst have watched me, wouldst not have acquitted me of my guilt. Had I done wickedly, alas! for me; or had I been righteous, I would not raise my head, sated with shame, and seeing my own misery." Dr. Bernard gives the passage a similar turn; while Delitzsch, A. B. Davidson, and others, render it as if it was "Should I sin, then thou wouldst mark me," &c. The shade of meaning is quite uncertain.

worse. This he insists much upon; when he hoped the tide would turn and begin to ebb, still it flowed higher and higher. His affliction increased, and God's indignation in the affliction; he found himself no better, no way better. These witnesses were renewed against him, that if one did not reach to convict him, another might. Changes and war were against him. If there were any change with him it was not for the better, still he was kept in a state of war. As long as we are here in this world, we must expect that the clouds will return after the rain, and perhaps the sorest and sharpest trials may be reserved for the last. God was at war with him, and it was a great change. He did not use to be so, which aggravated the trouble, and made it truly marvellous. God uses to shew himself kind to his people; if at any time he shews himself otherwise it is his strange work, his strange act, and he doth in it shew himself marvellous.

3. He complains of his life, and that ever he was born to all this trouble and misery, ver. 18, 19. If this was designed for my lot, "why was I brought out of the womb" and not smothered here, or stifled in the birth? This was the language of his passion, and it was a relapse into the same sin he fell into before. He had just now called life a favour, ver. 12; yet now he counts it a burthen, and quarrels with God for giving it, or rather laying it upon him. Mr. Caryl gives this a good turn in favour of Job. We may charitably suppose, saith he, that that which troubled Job was, that he was in a condition of life, which, as he conceived, hindered the main end of his life, which was the glorifying God. His harp was hung on the willow trees, and he was quite out of tune for praising God; nay, he feared lest his troubles should reflect dishonour upon God, and give occasion to his enemies to blaspheme; and therefore he wisheth, "O that I had given up the ghost!" A godly man reckons that he lives to no purpose if he do not live to the praise and glory of God; but if that had been his meaning, it was grounded on a mistake, for we may glorify the Lord in the fires. But this use we may make of it, not to be over fond of life, since the case hath been such sometimes even with wise and good men that they have complained of it. Why should we dread giving up the ghost, or covet to be seen of men, since the time may come when we may be ready to wish we had given up the ghost, and no eye had seen us. Why should we inordinately lament the death of our children in their infancy, that are as if they had not been, and are carried from the womb to the grave, when perhaps we ourselves may sometimes wish it had been our own lot?

Secondly. Job's humble requests. He prays,

1. That God would see his affliction, ver. 15; take cognizance of his case, and take it into his compassionate consideration. Thus David prays, Ps. xxv. 18: "Look upon mine affliction and my pain." Thus we should in our troubles refer ourselves to God, and may comfort ourselves with this, that he knows our souls in adversity.

2. That God would grant him some ease. If he could not prevail for the removal of his troubles, yet might he not have some intermission; Lord, let me not be always upon the rack, always in extremity, "O let me alone that I may take comfort a little!" ver. 20. Grant me some respite, some breathing time, some little enjoyment of myself. This he would reckon a great favour. Those that are not duly thankful for constant ease, should think how welcome one hour's ease would be if they were in constant pain. Two things he pleads:

1st. That life and its light were very short. "Are not my days few?" ver. 20. Yes, certainly they are, very few: Lord, let them not be all miserable, all in the extremity of misery. I have but a little time to live, let me have some comfort of life while it doth last. This plea fastens on the goodness of God's nature, the consideration of which is very comfortable to an afflicted spirit. And if we would use this as a plea with God for mercy, "Are not my days few?" Lord, pity me; we should use it as a plea with ourselves, to quicken us to duty. "Are not my days few?" then it concerns me to redeem time, to improve opportunities; what my hand finds to do, to do it with all my might, that I may be ready for the days of eternity, which shall be many.

2nd. That death and its darkness were very near, and would be very long, ver. 21, 22. Lord, give me some ease before I die, that is, lest I die of my pain. Thus David pleads, Ps. xiii. 3: "Lest I sleep the sleep of death," and then it will be too late to expect relief, for "wilt thou shew wonders to the dead?" Ps. lxxxviii. 10. Let me have a little comfort before I die, that I may calmly take leave of this world, and not in such confusion as I am now in. Thus earnest should we be for grace, and thus should we plead; Lord, renew me in the inward man; Lord, sanctify me before I die, for then it will never be done. See how he speaks here of the state of the dead.

First. It is a fixed state, whence we shall not return ever again to live such a life as we now live, ch. vii. 10. At death we must bid a final farewell to this world. The body must then be laid where it will lie long, and the soul determined to that state in which it must be for ever. That had need be well done which is to be done but once, and done for eternity.

Secondly. It is a very melancholy state; so it appears to us. Holy souls at death remove to a land of light, where there is no death; but their bodies they leave to a land of darkness and the shadow of death. He heaps up expressions here to the same purpose, to shew that he has as dreadful apprehensions of death and the grave as other men naturally have; so that it was only the extreme misery he was in that made him wish for it. Come, and let us look a little into the grave, and we shall find, 1*st.* That there is no order there. It is "without any order;" perpetual night, and no succession of day. All there lie on the same level, and there is no distinction between prince and peasant; but the servant is there free from his master, ch. iii. 19. No order is observed in bringing people to the grave; not the eldest first, not the richest, not the poorest, and yet every one in his own order, the order appointed by the God of life. 2*nd.* That there is no light there. In the grave there is thick darkness; darkness that cannot be felt indeed, yet cannot but be feared by those that enjoy the light of life. In the grave there is no knowledge, no comfort, no joy, no praising God, no working out our salvation; and therefore no light. Job was so much ashamed others should see his sores, and so much afraid to see them himself, that the darkness of the grave, which would hide them, and huddle them up, would upon that account be welcome to him. Darkness comes upon us, and therefore let us walk and work while we have the light with us. The grave being a land of darkness, it is well we are carried thither with our eyes closed, and then it is all one. The grave is a land of darkness to man; our friends that are gone thither we reckon removed into darkness, Ps. lxxxviii. 18. But that it is not so to God will appear by this, that the dust of the bodies of the saints, though scattered, though mingled with other dust, will none of it be lost; for God's eye is upon every grain of it, and it shall be forthcoming in the great day.

CHAPTER XI.

Poor Job's wounds were yet bleeding, his sore still runs and ceaseth not, but none of his friends bring him any oil, any balm; Zophar, the third, pours into them as much vinegar as the two former had done. I. He exhibits a very high charge against Job, as proud and false in justifying himself, ver. 1—4. II. He appeals to God for his conviction, and begs that God would take him to task, ver. 5, and that Job might be made sensible, 1. Of God's unerring wisdom, and his inviolable justice, ver. 6: 2. Of his unsearchable perfections, ver. 7—9; 3. Of his incontestable sovereignty, and uncontrollable power, ver. 10; 4. Of the cognizance he takes of the children of men, ver. 11, 12. III. He assures him that, upon his repentance and reformation, ver. 13, 14, God would restore him to his former prosperity and safety, ver. 15—19; but if he were wicked it was in vain to expect it, ver. 20.

THEN answered Zophar the Naamathite, and said,
2 Should not the multitude of words be answered?
And should a man full of talk be justified?
3 Should thy lies make men hold their peace?
And when thou mockest, shall no man make thee ashamed?
4 For thou hast said, My doctrine is pure.
And I am clean in thine eyes.
5 But oh that God would speak,
And open his lips against thee;
6 And that he would shew thee the secrets of wisdom,
That they are double to that which is!
Know therefore that God exacteth of thee less than thine iniquity deserveth.

It is sad to see what intemperate passions even wise and good men are sometimes betrayed into by the heat of disputation, of which Zophar here is an instance. Eliphaz began with a very modest preface, ch. iv. 2. Bildad was a little more rough upon Job, ch. viii. 2. But Zophar falls upon him without mercy, and gives him very ill language; "Should a man full of talk be justified? and should thy lies make men hold their peace?" Is this the way to comfort Job? no, nor to convince him neither. Doth this become one that appears as an advocate for God and his justice? Tantœne animis cœlestibus iræ?—'In heavenly hearts can such resentments dwell?' They that engage in controversy will find it very hard to keep their temper. All the wisdom, caution, and resolution they have will be little enough to prevent their breaking out into such indecencies as here we find Zophar guilty of.

First. He represents Job otherwise than what he was, ver. 2, 3; would have him thought idle and impertinent in his discourse, and one that loved to hear himself talk; gives him the lie, and calls him a mocker; and all this that it might be looked upon as a piece of justice to chastise him. Those that have a mind to fall out with their brethren, and to fall foul upon them, find it necessary to put the worst colours they can upon them and their performances; and, right or wrong, to make them odious. We have read and considered Job's discourses in the foregoing chapters, and have found them full of good sense, and much to the purpose; that his principles are right, his reasonings strong, and many of his expressions weighty and very considerable, and what there is in them of heat and passion, a little candour and charity will excuse and overlook; and yet Zophar here invidiously represents him,

1. As a man that never considered what he said, but uttered what came uppermost, only to make a noise with the multitude of words; hoping by that means to carry his cause, and run down his reprovers. "Should not the multitude of words be answered?" Truly, sometimes it is no great matter whether it be or no; silence, perhaps, is the best confutation of impertinence, and puts the greatest contempt upon it; "Answer not a fool according to his folly." But, if it be answered, let reason and grace have the answering of it, not pride and passion. "Should a man full of talk" (marg. 'a man of lips,' that is, all tongue, vox et præterea nihil,—'mere voice') be justified? Should he be justified in his loquacity, as in effect he is, if he be not reproved for it? No, for "in multitude of words there wanteth not sin." Should he be justified by it? Shall many words pass for valid pleas? Shall he carry the day with the flourishes of language? No, he shall not be accepted with God, or any wise men, for his much speaking, Mat. vi. 7.

2. As a man that made no conscience of what he said, a liar, and one that hoped by the impudence of lies to silence his adversaries; "Should thy lies make men hold their peace?" A mocker, one that bantered all mankind, and knew how to put false colours upon any thing, and was not ashamed to impose upon every one that talked with him; "When thou mockest shall no man make thee ashamed?" Is it not time to speak, to stem such a violent tide as this? Job was not mad, but spoke the words of truth and soberness, and yet is thus misrepresented. Eliphaz and Bildad had answered him, and said what they could to make him ashamed; it was, therefore, no instance of Zophar's generosity to set upon one so violently who was already thus baited. Three to one was great odds.

Secondly. He chargeth Job with saying that which he had not said; ver. 4, "Thou hast said, My doctrine is pure." And what if he had said so? It was true that Job was sound in the faith, and orthodox in his judgment, and spoke better of God than his friends did. If he had expressed himself unwarily, yet it did not therefore follow but that his doctrine was true; but he chargeth him with saying, "I am clean in thine eyes." Job had not said so. He had indeed said, "Thou knowest that I am not wicked," ch. x. 7; but he had said also, "I have sinned;" and never pretended to a spotless perfection. He had indeed maintained that he was not a hypocrite, as they charged him; but from thence to infer that he would not own himself a sinner, was an unfair insinuation. We ought to put the best construction on the words and actions of our brethren that they will bear, but contenders are tempted to put the worst.

Thirdly. He appeals to God, and wisheth him to appear against Job. So very confident is he that Job is in the wrong, that nothing will serve him but that God must presently appear to silence and condemn him. We are commonly ready with too much assurance to interest God in our quarrels; and to conclude that, if he would but speak, he would take our part, and speak for us, as Zophar here, "O that God would speak," for he would certainly open his lips against thee; whereas, when God did speak, he opened his lips for Job against his three friends. We ought, indeed, to leave all controversies to be determined by the judgment of God, which we are sure is according to truth; but they are not always in the right that are most forward to appeal to that judgment, and prejudge it against their antagonists. Zophar despairs to convince Job himself, and therefore desires God would convince him of two things, which it is good for every one of us duly to consider, and under all our afflictions cheerfully to confess.

1. The unsearchable depth of God's counsels. Zophar cannot pretend to do it; but he desires that God himself would shew Job so much of the secrets of the Divine wisdom as might convince him that they are at least double to that which is, ver. 6. Note, 1st. There are secrets in the Divine wisdom: arcana imperii,—'state secrets.' God's way is in the sea; clouds and darkness are x. 17. The words "changes and war are against me" are, literally, "changes and a host are against me." The idea is that of "host upon host," "host succeeding host." Dr. Bernard understands the reference of the witnesses just before mentioned, and says, "Of these witnesses there is a constant succession, yea, a whole host, with me. They relieve each other like so many sentinels, and seem to be without number." He adds that the Jewish commentator, Kalbag, says, "The witnesses which Job alludes to are the sores by which he is afflicted; no sooner does one go, than another comes." A similar idea is suggested by our translators in the margin, where on the word "witnesses" they put "i.e., plagues."

x. 20. Rodwell's translation of this verse is, "Are not my days few? Let him then desist and withdraw from me, that I may know some little brightness." Barnes has, "Are not my days few? Oh, spare me, and let me alone, that I may take a little ease." For "take comfort" it is better to render "be cheerful."

round about him. He has reasons of state which we cannot fathom, and must not pry into. 2nd. What we know of God is nothing to what we cannot know; what is hid is more than double to what appears to us to be, Eph. iii. 9. 3rd. It will help very much to silence us under the afflicting hand of God to adore the depth of those Divine counsels which we cannot find the bottom of. 4th. God knows a great deal more evil by us than we do by ourselves, so some understand it. When God gave David a sight and sense of sin, he saith that he had in the hidden part made him to know wisdom, Ps. li. 6.

2. The unexceptionable justice of his proceedings. "Know, therefore," that, how sore soever the correction is, that thou art under, "God exacteth of thee less than thine iniquity deserves;" or, as some read it, 'he remits thee part of thine iniquity,' and doth not deal with thee according to the full demerit of it. Note, 1st. When the debt of duty is not paid, it is justice to insist upon the debt of punishment. 2nd. Whatever punishment is inflicted upon us in this world, we must own that it is less than our iniquities deserve; and, therefore, instead of complaining of our troubles, we must be thankful that we are out of hell, Lam. iii. 39; Ps. ciii. 10.

7 Canst thou by searching find out God?
Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?
8 It is as high as heaven; what canst thou do?
Deeper than hell; what canst thou know?
9 The measure thereof is longer than the earth,
And broader than the sea.
10 If he cut off, and shut up, or gather together,
Then who can hinder him?
11 For he knoweth vain men:
He seeth wickedness also;
Will he not then consider it?
12 For vain man would be wise,
Though man be born like a wild ass's colt.

Zophar here speaks very good things concerning God, and his greatness and glory; concerning man, and his vanity and folly. These two compared together, and duly considered, will have a mighty influence upon our submission to the Divine providence in all the disposals of it.

First. See here what God is, and let him be adored.

1. He is an incomprehensible Being, infinite and immense, whose nature and perfections our finite understandings cannot possibly form any adequate conceptions of, and whose counsels and actings we cannot therefore, without the greatest presumption, pass a judgment upon. We that are so little acquainted with the Divine nature are incompetent judges of the Divine providence, and when we censure the dispensations of it we talk of things that we do not understand. We cannot find out God, how dare we then find fault with him? Zophar here shews,

1st. That God's nature infinitely exceeds the capacities of our understandings. "Canst thou find out God? find him out to perfection?" No, "What canst thou do? what canst thou know?" ver. 7, 8. Thou, a poor, weak, short-sighted creature, a worm of the earth, that art but of yesterday? Thou, though never so inquisitive after him, never so desirous and industrious to find him out, yet darest thou attempt the search, or canst thou hope to speed in it? We may by searching find God, Acts xvii. 27; but we cannot find him out in any thing he is pleased to conceal. We may apprehend him, but cannot comprehend him; may know that he is, but cannot know what he is. The eye can see the ocean, but not see over it. We may by an humble, diligent, and believing search find out something of God, but cannot find him out to perfection; may know, but cannot know fully, what God is, nor find out his work from the beginning to the end, Eccl. iii. 11. Note, God is unsearchable. The ages of his eternity cannot be numbered, nor the spaces of his immensity measured. The depths of his wisdom cannot be fathomed, nor the reaches of his power bounded. The brightness of his glory can never be described, nor the treasures of his goodness inventoried. This is a good reason why we should always speak of God with humility and caution, and never prescribe to him, or quarrel with him; why we should be thankful for what he has revealed of himself, and long to be there where we shall see him as he is, 1 Cor. xiii. 9, 10.

2nd. That it infinitely exceeds the limits of the whole creation. 'It is higher than heaven,' so some read it, "deeper than hell," the great abyss, "longer than the earth, and broader than the sea," many parts of which are to this day undiscovered, and more were then. It is quite out of our reach to comprehend God's nature; "such knowledge is too wonderful for us," Ps. cxxxix. 6. We cannot fathom God's designs, nor find out the reasons of his proceedings. His judgments are a great deep. St. Paul attributes such unmeasurable dimensions to the Divine love as Zophar here attributes to the Divine wisdom, and yet recommends it to our acquaintance; Eph. iii. 18, "that ye may know the breadth, and length, and depth, and height of the love of Christ."

2. God is a sovereign Lord; ver. 10, "If he cut off" by death, (margin, 'if he make a change,' for death is a change; if he make a change in nations, in families, in the posture of our affairs,)—if he "shut up" in prison, or in the net of affliction, Ps. lxvi. 11,—'if he seize any creature as a hunter doth his prey, he will gather it,' so Bishop Patrick, 'and who shall force him to restore?' or, 'if he gather together,' as tares for the fire; or, 'if he gather to himself man's spirit and breath,' (ch. xxxiv. 14.)—'then who can hinder him?' Who can either arrest the sentence, or oppose the execution? Who can control his power, or arraign his wisdom and justice? If he that made all out of nothing think fit to reduce all to nothing, or to their first chaos again,—if he that separated between light and darkness, dry land and sea at first, please to gather them together again,—if he that made unmakes, who can turn him away? alter his mind, or stay his hand; impede or impeach his proceedings?

3. God is a strict and just observer of the children of men; ver. 11, "He knows vain men." We know little of him; but he knows us perfectly. "He sees wickedness also," not to approve it, Hab. i. 13, but to animadvert upon men. 1st. He observes vain men; such all are, "every man at his best estate is altogether vanity;" and he considers it in his dealings with them. He knows what the projects and hopes of vain men are, and can blast and defeat them; the workings of their foolish fancies, and sits in heaven and laughs at them. He takes knowledge of the vanity of men, that is, their little sins, so some; their vain thoughts, and vain words, and unsteadiness in that which is good. 2nd. He observes ill men; he sees gross wickedness also, though acted never so secretly, and never so artfully palliated and disguised. All the wickedness of the wicked is naked and open before the all-seeing eye of God; "will he not then consider it?" Yes, certainly he will, and will reckon for it, though for a time he seem to keep silence.

Secondly. See here what man is, and let him be humbled, ver. 12. God sees this concerning vain man, that he would be wise, would be thought so, though he is "born like a wild ass's colt," so sottish and foolish, unteachable and untameable. See what man is. 1. He is a vain creature; empty, so the word is. God made him full; but he emptied himself, impoverished himself, and now he is raca, a creature that has nothing in him. 2. He is a foolish creature; become like the beasts that perish, Ps. xlix. 20; lxxiii. 22; an idiot, born like an ass, the most stupid animal, an ass's colt, not yet brought to any service. If ever he come to be good for any thing, it is owing to the grace of Christ, who once in the day of his triumph served himself of an ass's colt. 3. He is a wilful, ungovernable creature. An ass's colt may be made good for something, but the wild ass's colt will never be reclaimed, nor regards the crying of the driver: see ch. xxxix. 5—7. Man thinks himself as much at liberty, and his own master, as the wild ass's colt doth, that is used to the wilderness, Jer. ii. 24; eager to gratify his own appetites and passions. 4. Yet he is a proud creature, and self-conceited; he would be wise, would be thought so, values himself upon the honour of wisdom, though he will not submit himself to the laws of wisdom. He would be wise, that is, he reacheth after forbidden wisdom; and, like his first parents, aiming to be wise above what is written, loseth the tree of life for the tree of knowledge. Now is such a creature as this fit to contend with God, or call him to an account? Did we but better know God and ourselves, we should better know how to carry ourselves to God.

13 If thou prepare thine heart,
And stretch out thine hands toward him;
14 If iniquity be in thine hand, put it far away,
And let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacles.
15 For then shalt thou lift up thy face without spot;
Yea, thou shalt be stedfast, and shalt not fear:
16 Because thou shalt forget thy misery,
And remember it as waters that pass away:
17 And thine age shall be clearer than the noonday;
Thou shalt shine forth, thou shalt be as the morning.
18 And thou shalt be secure, because there is hope;
Yea, thou shalt dig about thee, and thou shalt take thy rest in safety.
19 Also thou shalt lie down, and none shall make thee afraid;
Yea, many shall make suit unto thee.
20 But the eyes of the wicked shall fail,
And they shall not escape,
And their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost

Zophar, as the other two, here encourageth Job to hope for better times, if he would but come to a better temper.

First. He gives him good counsel, ver. 13, 14; as Eliphaz did, ch. v. 8, and Bildad, ch. viii. 5. He would have him repent and return to God; and observe the steps of that return.

1. He must look within, and get his mind changed, and the tree made good. He must prepare his heart; there the work of conversion and reformation must begin. The heart, that wandered from God, must be reduced; that was defiled with sin, and put into disorder, must be cleansed, and put in order again; that was wavering and unfixed, must be settled and established, so the word here signifies. The heart is then prepared to seek God when it is determined and fully resolved to make a business of it, and to go through with it.

2. He must look up, and stretch out his hands towards God, that is, must stir up himself to take hold on God; must pray to him with earnestness, and importunity, striving in prayer, and with expectation to receive mercy and grace from him. To give the hand to the Lord signifies to yield ourselves to him, and to covenant with him, 2 Chr. xxx. 8; this Job must do, and for the doing of it must prepare his heart. Job had prayed; but Zophar would have him to pray in a better manner, not as an appellant, but as a petitioner and humble supplicant.

3. He must amend what was amiss in his own conversation, else his prayers would be ineffectual, ver. 14. "If iniquity be in thy hand," that is, if there be any sin which thou dost yet live in the practice of, "put it far away," forsake it with detestation, and a holy indignation; stedfastly resolving not to return to it, nor ever to have any thing more to do with it, Eze. xviii. 31; Hos. xiv. 9; Isa. xxx. 22. If any of the gains of iniquity, any goods gotten by fraud or oppression, be in thine hand, make restitution of it, as Zacchæus, Lu. xix. 8; and shake thy hands from holding it, Isa. xxxiii. 15. The guilt of sin is not removed if the gain of sin be not restored.

4. He must do his utmost to reform his family too. "Let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacles;" let not thy house harbour or shelter any wicked persons, any wicked practices, or any wealth gotten by wickedness. He suspected that Job's great household had been ill governed, and that where there were many there were many wicked, and that the ruin of his family was the punishment of the wickedness of it; and, therefore, if he expected God should return to him, he must reform what was amiss there; and, though wickedness might come into his tabernacles, he must not suffer it to dwell there, Ps. ci. 3, &c.

Secondly. He assures him of comfort if he took this counsel, ver. 15, &c. If he would repent and reform, he should, without doubt, be easy and happy, and all would be well. Perhaps Zophar might insinuate that, unless God did speedily make such a change as this in his condition, he and his friends would be confirmed in their opinion of him as a hypocrite and a dissembler with God. But, however, it speaks a great truth, that "the work of righteousness will be peace, and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance for ever," Isa. xxxii. 17. Those that sincerely turn to God may expect,

1. A holy confidence towards God; "Then shalt thou lift up thy face" towards heaven, "without spot;" thou mayest come boldly to the throne of grace, and not with that terror and amazement expressed ch. ix. 34. If our hearts condemn us not for hypocrisy and impenitency, then have we confidence in our approaches to God, and expectations from him, ch. iii. 21. If we are looked upon in the face of the Anointed, our faces, that were dejected, may be lifted up; that were polluted, being washed with the blood of Christ, may be lifted up without spot. We may draw near in full assurance of faith, when

xi. 6. The clause, "That they are double to that which is," is obscure in the Hebrew, and not clearly rendered. A. B. Davidson translates, "How that insight is manifold." Some, as Ewald, explain it to mean that "God's wisdom is double thine in real insight," or twice as great as that of man. Patrick's paraphrase conveys a similar idea: "The secret reasons of his wise counsels, which far surpass thine." Rodwell has, "For fold over fold is his counsel;" Barnes, "For they are double what we can understand;" Bernard, "For wisdom is twofold, i.e., there are two kinds of wisdom, human and Divine;" and with this Delitzsch pretty nearly agrees. The sense is, that wisdom is manifold.

xi. 8. Sheol, here translated "hell," would better have been left untranslated; it means the unseen world.

xi. 10. "If he assail and imprison and hold assize, then who shall hinder him?" (Rodwell). Barnes has, "If he arrest and imprison and bring to trial." Other critics give a generally similar explanation.

we are sprinkled from an evil conscience, Heb. x. 22. Some understand this of the clearing up of his credit before men, Ps. xxxvii. 6. If we make our peace with God, we may with cheerfulness look our friends in the face.

2. A holy composedness in themselves; "Thou shalt be stedfast, and shalt not fear," not "afraid of evil tidings, thy heart being fixed," Ps. cxii. 7. Job was now full of confusion, ch. x. 15, while he looked upon God as his enemy, and quarrelled with him; but Zophar assures him, if he would submit and humble himself, his mind would be stayed, and he would be freed from those frightful apprehensions he had of God, which put him into such a toss. The less we are frightened the more we are fixed, and, consequently, the more fit we are for our services and for our sufferings.

3. A comfortable reflection upon their past troubles; ver. 16, "Thou shalt forget thy misery," as the mother forgets her travailing pains for joy that the child is born; thou shalt be perfectly freed from the impressions it makes upon thee, and "thou shalt remember it as waters that pass away," or are poured out of a vessel, which leave no taste or tincture behind them, as other liquors do. The wounds of thy present affliction shall be perfectly healed, not only without a remaining scar, but without a remaining pain. Job had endeavoured to forget his complaint, ch. ix. 27, but found he could not; his soul had still in remembrance the wormwood and the gall. But here Zophar puts him in a way to forget it; let him by faith and prayer bring his griefs and cares to God, and leave them with him, and then he should forget them. Where sin sits heavy, affliction sits light. If we duly remember our sins, we shall in comparison with them forget our misery; much more if we obtain the comfort of a sealed pardon, and a sealed peace. He whose iniquity is forgiven shall not say, I am sick, but forget that, Isa. xxxiii. 24.

4. A comfortable prospect of their future peace. This Zophar here thinks to please Job with, in answer to the many despairing expressions he had used, as if it were to no purpose for him to hope ever to see good days again in this world. Yea, but thou mayest, saith Zophar, and good nights too. A blessed change he here puts him in hopes of.

1st. That, though now his light was eclipsed, it should shine out again, and brighter than ever, ver. 17. That even his setting sun should outshine his noonday sun, and his evening be fair and clear as the morning, in respect both of honour and pleasure; that his light should shine out of obscurity, Isa. lviii. 10, and the thick and dark cloud, from behind which his sun should break forth, would serve as a foil to its lustre. That it should shine even in old age, and those evil days should be good days to him. Note, They that truly turn to God then begin to shine forth; and their path is as the shining light, which increaseth; and the period of their day will be the perfection of it, and their evening to this world their morning to a better.

2nd. That, though now he was in a continual fear and terror, he should live in a holy rest and security, and find himself continually safe and easy; ver. 18, "Thou shalt be secure, because there is hope." Note, Those who have a good hope through grace, in God, and of heaven, are certainly safe, and have reason to be secure, how difficult soever the times are through which they pass in this world. He that walks uprightly may thus walk surely, because, though there is trouble and danger, yet there is hope that all will be well at last. Hope is an anchor of the soul, Heb. vi. 19, "Thou shalt dig about thee," that is, thou shalt be as safe as an army in its entrenchments. They that submit themselves to God's government shall be taken under his protection, and then they are safe both day and night. First. By day, when they employ themselves abroad; "Thou shalt dig in safety," thou and thy servants for thee, and not be again set upon by the rapparees, who fell upon his servants at plough, ch. i. 14. It is no part of the promised prosperity that he should live in idleness, but that he should have a calling, and follow it, and when he was about the business of it should be under the Divine protection. Thou shalt dig and be safe; not rob and be safe, revel and be safe. The way of duty is the way of safety. Secondly. By night, when they repose themselves at home; "Thou shalt take thy rest," —and "the sleep of the labouring man is sweet,"—"in safety," notwithstanding the dangers of the darkness. The pillar of cloud by day shall be a pillar of fire by night. "Thou shalt lie down," ver. 19; not forced to wander where there is no place to lay thy head on,—not forced to watch, and sit up in expectation of assaults,—but thou shalt go to bed at bed-time, and not only none shall hurt thee, but none shall make thee afraid, or so much as give thee an alarm. Note, It is a great mercy to have quiet nights and undisturbed sleep; those say so that are within hearing of the noise of war. And the way to be quiet is to seek unto God, and keep ourselves in his love. Nothing need make those afraid who return to God as their rest, and take him for their habitation.

3rd. That, though now he was slighted, yet he should be courted; "Many shall make suit to thee," and think it their interest to secure thy friendship. Suit is made to those that are eminently wise, or reputed to be so, that are very rich, or in power. Zophar knew Job so well that he foresaw, how low soever this present ebb was, if once the tide turned, it would flow as high as ever, and he would be again the darling of his country. They that rightly make suit to God, perhaps the day may come that others will make suit to them, as the foolish virgins to the wise, "Give us of your oil."

Lastly. Zophar concludes with a brief account of the doom of wicked people, ver. 20, "But the eyes of the wicked shall fail." It should seem he suspected that Job would not take his counsel; and here tells him what would then come of it; setting death as well as life before him. See what will come of those who persist in their wickedness, and will not be reformed.

1. They shall not reach the good they flatter themselves with the hopes of, in this world and in the other. Disappointments will be their doom, their shame, their endless torment. Their eyes shall fail with expecting that which will never come; when a wicked man dies, his expectation perisheth, Pr. xi. 7, 'their hope shall be as a puff of breath,' margin, vanished and gone,—past recall. Or, their hope will perish and expire as a man doth when he gives up the ghost; it will fail them when they have most need of it, and when they expected the accomplishment of it, it will die away, and leave them in utter confusion.

2. They shall not avoid the evil which sometimes they frighten themselves with the apprehensions of. They shall not escape the execution of the sentence passed upon them; can neither outbrave it nor outrun it. Those that will not fly to God will find it in vain to think of flying from him.

CHAPTER XII.

In this and the two following chapters we have Job's answer to Zophar's discourse, in which, as before, he first reasons with his friends, see ch. xiii. 19, and then turns to his God, and directs his expostulations to him from thence to the end of his discourse. In this chapter he addresseth himself to his friends, and, I. He condemns what they had said of him, and the judgment they had given of his character, ver. 1—5. II. He contradicts and confronts what they said of the destruction of wicked people in this world, shewing that they often prosper, ver. 6—11. III. He consents to what they had said of the wisdom, and power, and sovereignty of God, and the dominion of his providence over the children of men, and all their affairs; confirms this and enlargeth upon it, ver. 12—25.

AND Job answered and said,
2 No doubt but ye are the people,
And wisdom shall die with you.
3 But I have understanding as well as you;
I am not inferior to you:
Yea, who knoweth not such things as these?
4 I am as one mocked of his neighbour,
Who calleth upon God, and he answereth him:
The just upright man is laughed to scorn.
5 He that is ready to slip with his feet [ease.
Is as a lamp despised in the thought of him that is at

The reproofs Job here gives to his friends, whether they were just or no were very sharp, and may serve for a rebuke to all that are proud and scornful, and an exposing of their folly.

First. He upbraids them with their conceitedness of themselves, and the mighty good opinion they seemed to have of their own wisdom in comparison with him; than which nothing is more weak and unbecoming, nor better deserves to be ridiculed, as it is here.

1. He represents them as claiming the monopoly of wisdom, ver. 2. He speaks ironically, "No doubt but ye are the people;" you think yourselves fit to dictate and give law to all mankind, and your own judgment the standard by which every man's opinion must be measured and tried, as if nobody could discern between truth and falsehood, good and evil, but you only; and, therefore, every topsail must lower to you, and, right or wrong, we must all say as you say, and you three must be the people, the majority, to have the casting vote. Note, It is a very foolish, sinful thing for any to think themselves wiser than all mankind beside, or to speak and act confidently and imperiously, as if they thought so. Nay, he goes farther; You not only think there are none, but that there will be none as wise as you; and, therefore, wisdom must die with you, and all the world must be fools when you are gone, and in the dark when your sun is set. Note, It is folly for us to think that there will be any great irreparable loss of us when we are gone, or that we can be ill spared, since God has the residue of the Spirit, and can raise up others more fit than we are to do his work. When wise men and good men die, it is comfort to think that wisdom and goodness shall not die with them. Some think Job here reflects upon Zophar's comparing him, as he thought, and others, to the wild ass's colt, ch. xi. 12. Yes, saith he, we must be asses, you are the only men.

2. He doth himself the justice to put in his claim, as a sharer in the gifts of wisdom; ver. 3, "But I have understanding," a heart, "as well as you;" nay, 'I fall not lower than you,' as it is in the margin; I am as well able to judge of the methods and meanings of the Divine providence, and to construe the hard chapters of it, as you are. He saith not this to magnify himself; it was no great applause of himself to say, "I have understanding as well as you," no, nor to say, I understand this matter as well as you; for what reason had either he or they to be proud of understanding that which was obvious and level to the capacity of the meanest; "yea, who knows not such things as these?" What things you have said that are true, are plain truths, and common themes, which there are many that can talk as handsomely of as either you or I. But he saith it to humble them, and check the value they had for themselves as doctors of the chair. Note, 1st. It may justly keep us from being proud of our knowledge, to consider how many there are that know as much as we do, and perhaps much more, and to better purpose. 2nd. When we are tempted to be harsh in our censures of those we differ from and dispute with, we ought to consider that they also have understanding as well as we, a capacity of judging, and a right of judging for themselves; nay, perhaps they are not inferior to us, but superior: and it is possible they may be in the right and we in the wrong; and, therefore, we ought not to judge or despise them, Rom. xiv. 3, nor pretend to be masters, Jas. iii. 11, whilst all we are brethren, Mat. xxiii. 8. It is a very reasonable allowance to be made to all we converse with, all we contend with, that they are rational creatures as well as we.

Secondly. He complains of the great contempt with which they had treated him. Those that are haughty, and think too well of themselves, are commonly scornful, and ready to trample upon all about them. Job found it so, at least he thought he did; ver. 4, "I am as one mocked." I cannot say there was cause for this charge; we will not think Job's friends designed him any abuse, nor aimed at any thing but to convince him, and so in the right method to comfort him; yet he cries out, "I am as one mocked." Note, We are apt to call reproofs reproaches, and to think ourselves mocked when we are but advised and admonished; and this peevishness is our folly, and a great wrong to ourselves and to our friends. Yet we cannot but say there was colour for this charge. They came to comfort him, but they vexed him; gave him counsels and encouragements, but with no great opinion that either the one or the other would take place; and, therefore, he thought they mocked him, and it added much to his grief. Nothing more grievous to those that are fallen from the height of prosperity into the depth of adversity than to be trodden on, and insulted over when they are down, and it is what they are too apt to be jealous of. Observe,

1. What aggravated this grievance to him. Two things: 1st. That they were his neighbours, his friends, his companions, so the word signifies; and the scoff of such is often most spitefully given, and always most heinously taken; Ps. lv. 12, 13, "It was not an enemy that reproached me, then I would have" slighted it, and so "borne it; but it was thou, a man, mine equal." 2nd. That they were professors of religion, such as called upon God, and said that he answered them; for some understand that of the persons mocking. They are such as have a regard to heaven, and an interest in heaven; whose prayers I would therefore be glad of, and thankful for, and whose good opinion I cannot but covet: and therefore whose censures are the more grievous. Note, It is sad that any who call upon God should mock their brethren, Jas. iii. 9, 10, and it cannot but lie heavy on a good man to be thought ill of by those whom he thinks well of; yet this is no new thing.

2. What supported him under it. 1st. That he had a God to go to, with whom he could lodge his appeal; for some understand those words of the person mocked, that he "calleth upon God and he answereth him," and so it agrees with ch. xvi. 20, "My friends scorn me, but mine eye poureth out tears to God." If our friends be deaf to our complaints, God is not; if they condemn us, God knows our integrity; if they make the worst of us, he will make the best of us; if they give us cross answers, he will give us kind ones. 2nd. That his case was not singular, but very common; "the just upright man is laughed to scorn." By many he is laughed at even for his justice and his uprightness,—his honesty towards men and his piety towards God; these are derided as

xi. 12. This verse has been rendered in a variety of ways:—"But before an empty head gaineth understanding, a wild ass would become a man" (Delitzsch). "But a witless man would be wise, and a wild ass colt be a born man" (A. B. Davidson). "For deceitful man would seem to have a heart, though man be born like the colt of a wild ass" (Barnes). "For man is hollow, witless—yes, man is born a wild ass's colt;" or, "Then would the witless man gain wisdom, even a man born a wild ass's colt" (Rodwell). The real sense seems to be, that if called into judgment by God, "an empty-headed man would become intelligent, and a wild ass's colt would become a man," i.e., capable of understanding.

xi. 17. Either of the following is a better translation:—"And a lifetime brighter than noonday shall arise: if darkness come, it shall be as the morning" (Rodwell). "And clearer than noon shall life arise; if darkness come, it shall be as the morning" (A. B. Davidson).

xi. 18. The words "thou shalt dig about thee" are not by any foolish things, which silly people needlessly hamper themselves with: as if religion were a jest, and therefore to be made a jest of. By most he is laughed at for any little infirmity or weakness, notwithstanding his justice and uprightness, without any consideration had of that which is so much his honour. Note, It was of old the lot of honest, good people to be despised and derided; we are not, therefore, to think it strange, 1 Pet. iv. 12, no, nor to think it hard, if it be our lot. So persecuted they not only the prophets, but even the saints of the patriarchal age, Mat. v. 12; and can we expect to fare better than they?

3. What he suspected to be the true cause of it; and that was in short this: they were themselves rich and easy, and therefore they despised him who was fallen into poverty. It is the way of the world, we see instances of it daily: they that prosper are praised; but they that are going down, down with them. "He that is ready to slip with his feet" and fall into trouble, though he has formerly shone as a lamp, is then looked upon as a lamp going out, like the snuff of a candle, which we throw to the ground and tread upon, and is accordingly "despised in the thought of him that is at ease," ver. 5. Even the just upright man,—that is in his generation as a burning and shining light,—if he enter into temptation, Ps. lxxiii. 2, or come under a cloud, is looked upon with contempt. See here, 1st. What is the common fault of those that live in prosperity. Being full and easy, and merry themselves, they look scornfully upon those that are in want, pain, and sorrow; they overlook them, take no notice of them, and study to forget them: see Ps. cxxiii. 4. The chief butler drinks wine in bowls, but makes nothing of the afflictions of Joseph. Wealth, without grace, often makes men thus haughty, thus careless of their poor neighbours. 2nd. What is the common fate of those that fall into adversity. Poverty serves to eclipse all their lustre; though they are lamps, yet, if taken out of golden candlesticks and put, like Gideon's, into earthen pitchers, nobody values them as formerly, but they that live at ease despise them.

6 The tabernacles of robbers prosper,
And they that provoke God are secure,
Into whose hand God bringeth abundantly.
7 But ask now the beasts, and they shall teach thee;
And the fowls of the air, and they shall tell thee:
8 Or speak to the earth, and it shall teach thee:
And the fishes of the sea shall declare unto thee
9 Who knoweth not in all these
That the hand of the LORD hath wrought this?
10 In whose hand is the soul of every living thing,
And the breath of all mankind.
11 Doth not the ear try words?
And the mouth taste his meat?

Job's friends, all of them, went upon this principle, that wicked people cannot prosper long in this world, but some remarkable judgment or other will suddenly light on them. Zophar had concluded with it, that "the eyes of the wicked shall fail," ch. xi. 20. This principle Job here opposeth, and maintains that God, in disposing men's outward affairs, acts as a sovereign, reserving the exact distribution of rewards and punishments for the future state.

First. He asserts it as an undoubted truth, that wicked people may, and often do, prosper long in this world, ver. 6. Even great sinners may enjoy great prosperity. Observe, 1st. How he describes the sinners. They are robbers and such as provoke God; the worst kind of sinners, blasphemers, and persecutors. Perhaps he refers to the Sabeans and Chaldeans, who had robbed him, and had always lived by spoil and rapine, and yet they prospered; all the world saw they did, and there is no disputing against sense. One observation built upon matter of fact is worth twenty notions framed by an hypothesis. Or, more generally, all proud oppressors are robbers and pirates. It is supposed that what is injurious to men is provoking to God, the patron of right, and the protector of mankind. It is not strange if those that violate the bonds of justice break through the obligations of all religion, bid defiance even to God himself, and make nothing of provoking him. 2. How he describes their prosperity. It is very great; for, 1st. Even their tabernacles prosper, those that live with them, and those that come after them, and descend from them. It seems as if a blessing were entailed upon their families, and that is preserved sometimes to succeeding generations which was got by fraud. 2nd. They are secure, and not only feel no hurt, but fear none; nor are under any apprehensions of danger, either from threatening providences or an awakened conscience. But those that provoke God are never the more safe for their being secure. 3rd. "Into their hand God brings abundantly;" "they have more than heart could wish," Ps. lxxiii. 7. Not for necessity only, but for delight; not for themselves only, but for others; not for the present only, but for hereafter; and this from the hand of Providence too. God brings plentifully to them; we cannot therefore judge of men's piety by their plenty, nor of what they have in their heart by what they have in their hand.

Secondly. He appeals even to the inferior creatures for the proof of this, the beasts, and fowls, and trees, and even the earth itself; Consult these, and they shall tell thee, ver. 7, 8. Many a good lesson we may learn from them, but what are they here to teach us?

1. We may from them learn that "the tabernacles of robbers prosper;" so some. For, 1st. Even among the brute creatures the greater devour the lesser, and the stronger prey upon the weaker, and men are as the fishes of the sea, Hab. i. 14. If sin had not entered, we may suppose there had been no such disorder among the creatures, but the wolf and lamb had lain down together. 2nd. These creatures are serviceable to wicked men, and so they declare their prosperity. Ask the herds and the flocks to whom they belong, and they will tell you such a robber, such an oppressor, is their owner. The fishes and fowls will tell you they are served up to the tables and feed the luxury of proud sinners. The earth brings forth her fruits to them, ch. v. 24, and the whole creation groans under the burthen of their tyranny, Rom. viii. 20, 22. Note, All the creatures which wicked men abuse, by making them the food and fuel of their lusts, will witness against them another day, Jas. v. 3, 4.

2. We may from them learn the wisdom, power, and goodness of God, and that sovereign dominion of his; into which plain and self-evident truth all these difficult dispensations must be resolved. Zophar had made a mighty mystery of it, ch. xi. 7. So far from that, saith Job, that so much as we are concerned to know we may learn even from the inferior creatures; for, "who knows not from all these?" Any one may easily gather, from the book of the creatures, that "the hand of the Lord hath wrought this," ver. 9; that is, that there is a wise Providence which guides and governs all these things by rules which we neither are acquainted with nor are competent judges of. Note, From God's sovereign dominion over the inferior creatures we should learn to acquiesce in all his disposals of the affairs of the children of men, though contrary to our measures.

Thirdly. He resolves all into the absolute propriety which God has in all the creatures; ver. 10, "In whose hand is the soul of every living thing." All the creatures, and mankind particularly, derive their being from him, owe their being to him, depend upon him for the support of it, lie at his mercy, are under his direction and dominion, and entirely at his disposal, and at his summons must resign their lives. "All souls are his," and may he not do what he will with his own? The name Jehovah is used here, ver. 9, and it is the only time that we meet with it in all the discourses between Job and his friends; for God was in that age more known by the name of Shaddai, 'the Almighty.'

Those words, ver. 11, "Doth not the ear try words, and the mouth taste his meat?" may be taken either as the conclusion of the foregoing discourse, or the preface to what follows. The mind of man has as good a faculty of discerning between truth and error, when duly stated, as the palate has of discerning between what is sweet and what is bitter. He therefore demands from his friends a liberty to judge for himself of what they had said, and desires them to use the same liberty in judging of what he had said; nay, he seems to appeal to any man's impartial judgment in this controversy. Let the ear try the words on both sides, and it would be found he was in the right. Note, The ear must try words before it receives them so as to subscribe to them. As by the taste we judge what food is wholesome to the body and what not, so, by the spirit of discerning, we must judge what doctrine is sound, and savoury, and wholesome, and what not, 1 Cor. x. 15; xi. 13.

12 With the ancient is wisdom;
And in length of days understanding.
13 With him is wisdom and strength
He hath counsel and understanding.
14 Behold, he breaketh down, and it cannot be built again:
He shutteth up a man, and there can be no opening 15 Behold, he withholdeth the waters, and they dry up:

DRY VALLEY OF IDUMEA.

Also he sendeth them out, and they overturn the earth.
16 With him is strength and wisdom:
The deceived and the deceiver are his.
17 He leadeth counsellors away spoiled,
And maketh the judges fools.
18 He looseth the bond of kings.
And girdeth their loins with a girdle
19 He leadeth princes away spoiled,
And overthroweth the mighty.
20 He removeth away the speech of the trusty,
And taketh away the understanding of the aged.
21 He poureth contempt upon princes,
And weakeneth the strength of the mighty.
22 He discovereth deep things out of darkness,
And bringeth out to light the shadow of death.
23 He increaseth the nations, and destroyeth them:
He enlargeth the nations, and straiteneth them again.
24 He taketh away the heart of the chief of the people of the earth,
And causeth them to wander in a wilderness where there is no way.
25 They grope in the dark without light,
And he maketh them to stagger like a drunken man

This is a noble discourse of Job's concerning the wisdom, power, and sovereignty of God, in ordering and disposing of all the affairs of the children of men, according to the counsel of his own will, which none dares gainsay, or means accepted as a correct version by some modern critics, who are, however, divided among themselves. Thus Barnes, "now thou art suffused with shame;" Rodwell, "thou shalt look around;" Delitzsch, "and thou shalt search." Fürst, however, comes very near to our version: "and if thou hast digged thou mayest lie down quietly," understanding the digging of cultivating the ground. The context and the Hebrew word both allow us to adopt the sense intended by our translators:—"thou shalt dig," i.e., labour, "and thou shalt lie down in safety," i.e., shalt rest in peace. We regard other explanations as rather ingenious than accurate.

xi. 19. For "many shall make suit unto thee," Delitzsch gives "many shall caress thy cheeks," which is utterly unsuited to our idiom.

xii. 2. The words of Job are those of sarcasm and indignation: "Verily you are the people; none are so wise and right as you; and when you die, wisdom itself will be no more." The irony is admitted by all expositors.

can resist. Take both him and them out of the controversy in which they were so warmly engaged, and they all speak admirably well; but in that sometimes we scarce know what to make of them. It were well if wise and good men, that differ in their apprehensions about lesser things, would see it to be for their honour and comfort, and the edification of others, to dwell most upon those great things in which they are agreed. On this subject Job speaks like himself; here are no passionate complaints, no peevish reflections, but every thing masculine and great.

First. He asserts the unsearchable wisdom and irresistible power of God. It is allowed, that among men there is wisdom and understanding, ver. 12. But it is to be found only with some few, with the ancient, and those that are blessed with length of days, who get it by long experience and constant experience; and when they have got the wisdom they have lost the strength, and are unable to execute the results of their wisdom. But now with God there is both wisdom and strength,—wisdom to design the best, and strength to accomplish what is designed. He doth not get counsel and understanding as we do, by observation, but he hath it essentially and eternally in himself, ver. 13. What is the wisdom of ancient men compared with the wisdom of the Ancient of days! It is but little that we know, and less that we can do; but God can do every thing, and no thought can be withholden from him. Happy they that have this God for their God, for they have infinite wisdom and strength engaged for them. Foolish and fruitless are all the attempts of men against him; ver. 14, "He breaketh down, and it cannot be built again." Note, There is no contending with the Divine providence, nor breaking the measures of it. As he had said before, ch. ix. 12, "He takes away, and who can hinder him;" so he saith again. What God saith cannot be gainsaid, nor what he doth undone. There is no rebuilding what God will have to lie in ruins; witness the tower of Babel, which the undertakers could not go on with; and the desolations of Sodom and Gomorrah, which could never be repaired: see Isa. xxv. 2; Eze. xxvi. 14; Rev. xviii. 21. There is no releasing those whom God has condemned to a perpetual imprisonment; if he shut up a man by sickness, reduce him to straits, and embarrass him in his affairs, there can be no opening. He shuts up in the grave, and none can break open those sealed doors; shuts up in hell, in chains of darkness, and none can pass that great gulf fixed.

Secondly. He gives an instance for the proof of it in nature, ver. 15. God has the command of the waters, binds them as in a garment, Pr. xxx. 4; holds them in the hollow of his hand, Isa. xl. 12; and he can punish the children of men either by the defect or by the excess of them. As men break the laws of virtue by extremes on each hand, both defects and excesses, while the virtue is in the mean, so God corrects them by extremes, and denies them the mercy which is in the mean. 1. Great droughts are sometimes great judgments. "He withholdeth the waters, and they dry up;" if the heaven be as brass, the earth is as iron; if the rain be denied, fountains dry up, and their streams are wanted; fields are parched, and their fruits are wanted, Am. iv. 7. 2. Great wet is sometimes a great judgment; raiseth the waters, and overturns the earth, the products of it, the buildings upon it. A sweeping rain is said to leave no food, Pr. xxviii. 3. See how many ways God has of contending with a sinful people, and taking from them abused, forfeited mercies, and how utterly unable we are to contend with him. If we might invert the order, this verse would fitly refer to Noah's flood, that ever-memorable instance of the Divine power. God then in wrath sent the waters out, and they overturned the earth; but in mercy he withheld them, shut the windows of heaven, and the fountains of the great deep, and then in a little time they dried up.

Thirdly. He gives many instances of it in God's powerful management of the children of men, crossing their purposes, and serving his own by them, and upon them; overruling all their counsels, overpowering all their attempts, and overcoming all their oppositions. What changes doth God make with men, what turns doth he give them, how easily, how surprisingly!

In general; ver. 16, 'With him is strength and reason,' so some translate it; strength and consistency with himself. It is an elegant word in the original; with him is the very quintessence and extract of wisdom. 'With him is power and all that is,' so some read it. He is what he is himself, and by him and in him all things subsist. Having this strength and wisdom, he knows how to make use not only of those that are wise and good, who willingly and designedly serve him, but even of those that are foolish and bad, that one would think could be made no way serviceable to the designs of his providence. "The deceived and the deceiver are his;" the simplest men that are deceived are not below his notice; the subtlest men that do deceive cannot with all their subtlety escape his cognizance. The world is full of deceit; the one half of mankind cheats the other, and God suffers it, and from both will at last bring glory to himself. The deceivers make tools of the deceived; but the great God makes tools of them both, wherewith he works, and none can let him. He has wisdom and might enough to manage all the fools and knaves in the world, and knows how to serve his own purposes by them, notwithstanding the weakness of the one and the wickedness of the other. When Jacob, by a fraud, got the blessing, the design of God's grace was served; when Ahab was drawn by a false prophecy into an expedition that was his ruin, the design of God's justice was served; and in both "the deceived and the deceiver" were at his dispose: see Eze. xiv. 8. God would not suffer the sin of the deceiver, nor the misery of the deceived, if he knew not how to set bounds to both, and bring glory to himself out of both. Hallelujah, the Lord God omnipotent thus reigns, and it is well he doth, for otherwise there is so little wisdom and so little honesty in the world, that it had all been in confusion and ruin long ago.

He next descends to the particular instances of the wisdom and power of God in the revolutions of states and kingdoms; for thence he fetcheth his proofs rather than from the like operations of Providence concerning private persons and families; because, the more high and public the station is in which men are placed, the more the changes that are concerning them are taken notice of, and consequently the more illustriously doth Providence shine forth in them. And it is easy to argue, If God can thus turn and toss the great ones of the earth like a ball in a large place, as the prophet speaks, Isa. xxii. 18, much more the little ones; and with him to whom states and kingdoms must truckle it is sure the greatest madness for us to contend. Some think Job here refers to the extirpation of those powerful nations, the Rephaim, the Zuzim, the Emim, and the Horites, which are mentioned Gen. xiv. 5, 6; Deu. ii. 10, 20; in which, perhaps, it was particularly taken notice of how strangely they were infatuated and enfeebled. But, if so, it is designed to shew that, whenever the like is done in the affairs of nations, it is God that doth it, and we must therein observe his sovereign dominion, even over those that think themselves most powerful, politic, and absolute. Compare this with that of Eliphaz, ch. v. 12, &c.

Let us gather up the particular changes here instanced in, which God makes upon persons, either for the destruction of nations, and the planting of others in their room, or for the turning out of a particular government and ministry, and the elevation of another in its room, which may be a blessing to the kingdom; witness the glorious revolution in our own land twenty years ago, in which we saw as happy an exposition as ever was given of this discourse of Job's.

1. Those that were wise are sometimes strangely infatuated, and in that the hand of God must be acknowledged; ver. 17, "He leadeth counsellors away spoiled," as trophies of his victory over them; spoiled of all the honour and wealth they have got by their policy; nay, spoiled of the wisdom itself for which they had been celebrated, and the success they promised themselves in their projects. His counsel stands, while all their devices are brought to nought, and their designs baffled; and so they are spoiled both of the satisfaction and of the reputation of their wisdom. "He maketh the judges fools;" by a work on their minds he deprives them of their qualifications for business, and so they become really fools; and by a disposal of their affairs he makes the issue and event of their projects to be quite contrary to what they themselves intended, and so he makes them look like fools. Ahithophel, one in whom this Scripture was remarkably fulfilled, his counsel became foolishness, and he, according to his name, the brother of a fool: see Isa. xix. 13, "The princes of Zoan are become fools, they have seduced Egypt, even they that are the stay of the tribes thereof." Let not the wise man, therefore, glory in his wisdom, nor the ablest counsellors and judges be proud of their station, but humbly depend upon God for the continuance of their abilities. Even the aged, who seem to hold their wisdom by prescription, and think they have got it by their own industry, and therefore have an indefeasible title to it, may yet be deprived of it, and often are, by the infirmities of age, which make them twice children; he "taketh away the understanding of the aged," ver. 20. The aged, that were most depended on for advice, fail those that depended on them. We read of an old and yet foolish king, Eccl. iv. 13.

2. Those that were high and in authority are strangely brought down, impoverished, and enslaved, and it is God that humbles them; ver. 18, "He looseth the bond of kings," and taketh from them the power wherewith they ruled their subjects,—perhaps enslaved them, and ruled them with rigour; strips them of all the ensigns of their honour and authority, and all the supports of their tyranny; unbuckles their belts, so that the sword drops from their side, and then no marvel if the crown quickly drops from their heads; on which presently follows the girding of their loins with a girdle, a badge of servitude, for servants went with their loins girt. Thus he leads great princes away spoiled of all their power and wealth, and that in which they pleased and prided themselves, ver. 19. Note, Kings are not exempt from God's jurisdiction. To us they are gods, but men to him, and subject to more than the common changes of human life.

3. Those that were strong are strangely weakened, and it is God that weakens them, ver. 21, and overthrows the mighty, ver. 19. Strong bodies are weakened by age and sickness, powerful armies moulder and come to nothing, and their strength will not secure them from a fatal overthrow. No force can stand before Omnipotence, no, not that of Goliath.

4. Those that were famed for eloquence, and intrusted with public business, are strangely silenced, and have nothing to say; ver. 20, "He removeth away the speech of the trusty," so that they cannot speak as they intended, and as they used to do, with freedom and clearness, but blunder and falter, and make nothing of it. Or they cannot speak what they intended, but the contrary, as Balaam, who blessed those whom he was called to curse. Let not the orator, therefore, be proud of his rhetoric, nor use it to any ill purposes, lest God take it away, who made man's mouth.

5. Those that were honoured and admired strangely fall into disgrace. He "poureth contempt upon princes," ver. 21; he leaves them to themselves to do mean things, or alters the opinions of men concerning them. If princes themselves dishonour God and despise him, if they do indignities to the people of God, and trample upon them, they shall be lightly esteemed, and God will pour contempt upon them: see Ps. cvii. 40. Commonly none more abject in themselves, nor more abused by others when they are down, than those that were haughty and insolent when they were in power.

6. That which was secret and lay hid is strangely brought to light and laid open; ver. 22, "He discovers deep things out of darkness." Plots closely laid are discovered and defeated; wickedness closely committed and artfully concealed is discovered, and the guilty brought to condign punishment; secret treasons, (Eccl. x. 20,) secret murders, secret whoredoms. The cabinet councils of princes are before God's eye, 2 Kin. vi. 11.

7. Kingdoms have their ebbings and flowings, their waxings and wanings, and both are from God, ver. 22. He sometimes increaseth their numbers, and enlargeth their bounds, so that they make a figure among the nations, and become formidable; but, after a while, by some undiscerned cause, perhaps they are destroyed and straitened, made few and poor, cut short, and many of them cut off; and so they are rendered despicable among their neighbours, and they that were the head become the tail of the nations: see Ps. cvii. 38, 39.

8. They that were bold and courageous, and made nothing of dangers, are strangely cowed and dispirited; and this also is the Lord's doing. "He taketh away the heart of the chief of the people," ver. 24, that were their leaders and commanders, and were most famed for their martial fire, and great achievements; when any thing was to be done they were heartless, and ready to flee at the shaking of a leaf, Ps. lxxvi. 5.

9. They that were driving on their projects with full speed are strangely bewildered and at a loss; they know not where they are, nor what they do, are unsteady in their counsels, and uncertain in their motions, off and on, this way and that way, wander like men in a desert, ver. 24, grope like men in the dark, and stagger like men in drink, ver. 25; Isa. lix. 10. Note, God can soon nonplus the deepest politicians, and bring the greatest wits to their wit's end, to shew that wherein they deal proudly he is above them.

Thus are the revolutions of kingdoms wonderfully brought about by an overruling Providence. Heaven and earth are shaken, but the Lord sits King for ever, and with him we look for a kingdom that cannot be shaken.

CHAPTER XIII.

Job here comes to make application of what he had said in the foregoing chapter, and now we have him not in so good a temper as he was in then; for, I. He is very bold with his friends, comparing himself with them, notwithstanding the mortifications he was under, ver. 1, 2; condemning them for their falsehood, their forwardness to judge, their partiality and deceitfulness, under colour of pleading God's cause, ver. 4—8; and threatening them with the judgments of God for their so doing, ver. 9—12; desiring them to be silent, ver. 5, 13, 17; and turning from them to God, ver. 3. II. He is very bold with his God. 1. In some expressions his faith is very bold, yet that is not more bold than welcome, ver. 15, 16, 18; but, 2. In other expressions his passion is rather too bold in expostulations with God concerning the deplorable condition he was in, ver. 14, 19, &c.; complaining of the confusion he was in, ver. 20—22; and the loss he was at to find out the sin that provoked God thus to afflict him, and, in short, of the rigour of God's proceedings against him, ver. 13—28.

LO, mine eye hath seen all this,
Mine ear hath heard and understood it.

xii. 5. The sense of this verse is disputed. Some critics follow the idea of our translation, but others put a different construction upon the words. Thus Rodwell: "Contempt for misfortune is the thought of the secure: it awaits those whose feet totter." Delitzsch: "Contempt belongs to misfortune, according to the ideas of the prosperous: it awaits those who are ready to slip." The words may be rendered, "For misfortune there is contempt in the thoughts of him that is at ease: (and) it awaits those whose feet waver."

xii. 6. We should connect this verse with the foregoing, as further developing its thought. Not only the prosperous in the ordinary sense, but successful sinners, are full of confidence, which shows that such a state of mind is not a necessary proof of goodness.

xii. 12. "The ancient," i.e., the aged.

xii. 19. For "princes" the word "priests" may be substituted.

xii. 25. Instead of "stagger," we should prefer "wander," or "go astray."

2 What ye know, the same do I know also.
I am not inferior unto you.
3 Surely I would speak to the Almighty,
And I desire to reason with God.
4 But ye are forgers of lies,
Ye are all physicians of no value.
5 O that ye would altogether hold your peace!
And it should be your wisdom.
6 Hear now my reasoning,
And hearken to the pleadings of my lips.
7 Will ye speak wickedly for God?
And talk deceitfully for him?
8 Will ye accept his person?
Will ye contend for God?
9 Is it good that he should search you out?
Or as one man mocketh another, do ye so mock him?
10 He will surely reprove you,
If ye do secretly accept persons.
11 Shall not his excellency make you afraid?
And his dread fall upon you?
12 Your remembrances are like unto ashes,
Your bodies to bodies of clay.

Job here warmly expresseth his resentments of the unkindness of his friends to him.

First. He comes up with them as one that understood the matter in dispute as well as they, and did not need to be taught by them, ver. 1, 2. They compelled him, as the Corinthians did Paul, to commend himself, and his own knowledge; yet not in a way of self-applause, but of self-justification. All he had said before his eye had seen confirmed by many instances, and his ear had heard seconded by many authorities, and he well understood it, and what use to make of it. Happy they that do not only see and hear, but understand the greatness, and glory, and sovereignty of God. And this he thought would justify what he had said before, ch. xii. 3, which he repeats here, ver. 2, "What ye know, the same do I know also," so that I need not come to you to be taught; "I am not inferior unto you" in wisdom. Note, Those that enter into disputation enter into temptation to magnify themselves and vilify their brethren more than is fit, and therefore ought to watch and pray against the workings of pride.

Secondly. He turns from them to God; ver. 3, "Surely I would speak to the Almighty:" as though he would say, I can promise myself no satisfaction in talking with you; O, that I might have liberty to reason with God! He would not be so hard upon me as you are. The prince himself will perhaps give audience to a poor petitioner with more mildness, and patience, and condescension, than the servants will. Job would rather argue with God himself than with his friends. See here, 1. What confidence they have towards God whose hearts condemn them not of reigning hypocrisy: they can with humble boldness appear before him, and appeal to him. 2. What comfort they have in God whose neighbours unjustly condemn them. If they may not speak to them with any hopes of a fair hearing, yet they may speak to the Almighty; they have easy access to him, and shall find acceptance with him.

Thirdly. He condemns them for their unjust and uncharitable usage of him, ver. 4. 1. They falsely accused him, and that was unjust; "Ye are forgers of lies." They framed a wrong hypothesis concerning the Divine providence, and belied that, as if that did never remarkably afflict any but wicked men in this world; and from thence they drew a false judgment concerning Job, that he was certainly a hypocrite. For this gross mistake, both in doctrine and application, he thinks an indictment of forgery lies against them. To speak lies is bad enough, though but at second hand; but to forge them with contrivance and deliberation is much worse. Yet against this wrong neither innocency nor excellency will be a fence. 2. They basely deceived him, and that was unkind. They undertook his cure, and pretended to be his physicians, but they were "all physicians of no value;" idol physicians, that can do me no more good than an idol can. They were worthless physicians, who neither understood his case, nor knew how to prescribe to him; mere quacks, that pretended to mighty things, but in conference added nothing to him: he was never the wiser for all they said. Thus, to broken hearts and wounded consciences, all creatures without Christ are physicians of no value, on which one may spend all and be never the better, but rather grow worse, Mar. v. 26.

Fourthly. He begs they would be silent, and give him a patient hearing, ver. 5, 6. 1. He thinks it would be a credit to themselves if they would say no more, having said too much already. "Hold your peace, and it shall be your wisdom," for thereby you will conceal your ignorance and ill-nature, which now appear in all you say. They pleaded they could not forbear speaking, ch. iv. 2; xi. 2, 3; but he tells them they had more consulted their own reputation if they had enjoined themselves silence. Better say nothing than nothing to the purpose, or say that which tends to the dishonour of God, and the grief of our brethren. "Even a fool when he holdeth his peace is counted wise," because nothing appears to the contrary, Pr. xvii. 28. And as silence is an evidence of wisdom, so it is a means of it, as it gives time to think and hear. 2. He thinks it would be a piece of justice to him to hear what he had to say; "Hear now my reasoning." Perhaps, though they did not interrupt him in his discourse, yet they seemed careless, and did not much heed what he said; he therefore begs they would not only hear but hearken. Note, We should be very willing and glad to hear what those have to say for themselves whom, upon any account, we are in temptation to have hard thoughts of. Many a man, if he could but be fairly heard, would be fairly acquitted, even in the consciences of those that run him down.

Fifthly. He endeavours to convince them of the wrong they did to God's honour, while they pretended to plead for him, ver. 7, 8. They valued themselves upon it that they spoke for God, were advocates for him, and had undertaken to justify him and his proceedings against Job. And being (as they thought) of counsel for the Sovereign, they expected not only the ear of the court, and the last word, but judgment on their side. But Job tells them plainly, 1. That God and his cause did not need such advocates; "Will ye think to "contend for God?" As if his justice were clouded, and wanted to be cleared up; or as if he were at a loss what to say, and wanted you to speak for him. Will you, that are so weak and passionate, put in for the honour of pleading God's cause? Good work ought not to be put into bad hands. "Will you accept his person?" Those that have not right on their side, if they carry their cause, it is by the partiality of the judge in favour of their persons; but God's cause is so just that it needs no such methods for the support of it. He is a God, and can plead for himself, Jud. vi. 31; and, if you were for ever silent, the heavens would declare his righteousness. 2. That God's cause suffered by such management. Under pretence of justifying God in afflicting Job, they magisterially condemn him as a hypocrite and an ill man. This, saith he, is speaking wickedly; for uncharitableness and censoriousness is wickedness, it is great wickedness; it is an offence to God to wrong our brethren. It is talking deceitfully; for you condemn one whom yet perhaps your own consciences at the same time cannot but acquit. Your principles are false, and your arguings fallacious, and will it excuse you to say it is for God? No, for a good intention will not justify, much less will it sanctify, an ill word or action. God's truth needs not our lie, nor God's cause either our sinful policies or our sinful passions. "The wrath of man works not the righteousness of God," nor may we do evil that good may come, Rom. iii. 7, 8. Pious frauds (as they call them) are impious cheats; and devout persecutions horrid profanations of the name of God, as theirs that hated their brethren, and cast them out, saying, "Let the Lord be glorified," Isa. lxvi. 5; Jno. xvi. 2.

Sixthly. He endeavours to possess them with a fear of God's judgment, and so to bring them to a better temper. Let them not think to impose upon God as they might upon a man like themselves, nor expect to gain his countenance in their ill practices, by pretending a zeal for him and his honour. As one man mocks another by flattering him, do you think so to mock him and deceive him? No, those that think to put a cheat upon God, will prove to have put a cheat upon themselves; "Be not deceived, God is not mocked." That they might not think thus to jest with God and affront him, he would have them to consider both God and themselves, and then they would find themselves unable to enter into judgment with him.

1. Let them consider what a God he is into whose service they had thus thrust themselves, and to whom they really did so much disservice, and inquire whether they could give him a good account of what they did. Consider,

1st. The strictness of his scrutiny, and inquiries concerning them; ver. 9, "Is it good that he should search you out?" Can you bear to have the principles looked into which you go upon in your censures, and to have the bottom of the matter found out? Note, It concerns us all seriously to consider whether it will be to our advantage or no that God searcheth the heart. It is good to an upright man, who means honestly, that God should search him; therefore he prays for it, "Search me, O God, and know my heart:" God's omniscience is a witness of his sincerity. But it is bad to him that looks one way and rows another that God should search him out, and lay him open to his confusion.

2nd. The severity of his rebukes and displeasure against them, ver. 10, "If ye do accept persons," though but secretly, and in heart, "he will surely reprove you." He will be so far from being pleased with your censures of me, though it be under colour of vindicating him, that he will resent it as a great provocation, as any prince or great man would, if an ill action were done under colour of his name, and advancing his interest. Note, What we do amiss we shall certainly be reproved for one way or other, one time or other though it be done never so secretly.

3rd. The terror of his majesty, which, if they would duly stand in awe of, they would not do that which would make them obnoxious to his wrath; ver. 11, "Shall not his excellency make you afraid?" You that have great knowledge of God, and profess religion and a fear of him, how dare you talk at this rate, and give yourselves so great a liberty of speech? "Ought ye not to walk" and talk "in the fear of God?" Neh. v. 9. "Should not his dread fall upon you," and give check to your passions? Methinks Job speaks this as one that did himself know the terror of the Lord, and lived in a holy fear of him, whatever his friends suggested to the contrary. Note, First. There is in God a dreadful excellency. He is the most excellent being, has all excellences in himself, and in each infinitely excels any creature. His excellences in themselves are amiable and lovely: he is the most beautiful being; but, considering man's distance from God by nature, and his defection and degeneracy by sin, his excellences are dreadful. His power, holiness, justice, yea, and his goodness too, are dreadful excellences. They shall fear the Lord and his goodness. Secondly. A holy awe of this dreadful excellency should fall upon us and make us afraid. This would awaken impenitent sinners, and bring them to repentance, and would influence all to be careful to please him, and afraid of offending him.

2. Let them consider themselves, and what an unequal match they were for this great God; ver. 12, "Your remembrances," all that in you for which you hope to be remembered when you are gone, "is like unto ashes," worthless and weak, and easily trampled on and blown away. "Your bodies are like bodies of clay," mouldering and coming to nothing; your memories you think will survive your bodies, but, alas! they are like ashes, which will be shovelled up with your dust. Note, The consideration of our own meanness and mortality should make us afraid of offending God, and is a good reason why we should not despise and trample upon our brethren. Bishop Patrick gives another sense of this verse: 'Your remonstrances on God's behalf are no better than dust, and the arguments you accumulate but like so many heaps of dirt.'

13 Hold your peace, let me alone, that I may speak,
And let come on me what will.
14 Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth,
And put my life in mine hand?
15 Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him;
But I will maintain mine own ways before him
16 He also shall be my salvation:
For an hypocrite shall not come before him.
17 Hear diligently my speech,
And my declaration with your ears.
18 Behold now, I have ordered my cause;
I know that I shall be justified.
19 Who is he that will plead with me?
For now, if I hold my tongue, I shall give up the ghost.

xiii. 12. The rendering of this verse needs some correction. Barnes gives, "Your maxims are parables of ashes; your ramparts are ramparts of clay." Rodwell, "Your sayings are maxims of ashes; your defences, defences of clay." Delitzsch, "Your memorable words are proverbs of dust, your strongholds are become strongholds of clay" A. B. Davidson, "Your old saws shall be maxims of ashes; defences of mud shall be your defences." Bernard, "Your records are parables for ashes, parables for bodies of clay like yours." Douay version, from the Vulgate, "Your memory shall be compared to ashes, and your necks shall be brought into clay." The words may be simply translated, "Your memorials are proverbs of ashes; your mounds are mounds of clay," or "like mounds of clay." Bishop Patrick comes very near the true idea: "Whose remonstrances on his behalf are no better than dust, and the arguments you accumulate but like so many heaps of dirt."

xiii. 15. Popular as our version here is, it is very much questioned

20 Only do not two things unto me:
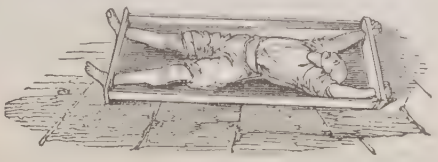
Then will I not hide myself from thee.
21 Withdraw thine hand far from me:
And let not thy dread make me afraid
22 Then call thou, and I will answer:
Or let me speak, and answer thou me

Job here takes fresh hold, fast hold of his integrity, as one that was resolved not to let it go, nor suffer it to be wrested from him. His firmness in this matter is commendable, and his warmness excusable.

First. He bespeaks his friends and all the company to let him alone, and not interrupt him in what he was about to say, ver. 13; but diligently to hearken to it, ver. 17. He would have his own protestation to be decisive, for none but God and himself knew his heart; Be you silent from me, therefore, and let me hear no more of you, but do you hearken diligently to what I say, and let my own oath for confirmation be an end of the strife.

Secondly. He resolves to adhere to the testimony his own conscience gave of his integrity; and, though his friends called it obstinacy, that should not shake his constancy; I will speak in my own defence, and "let come on me what will," ver. 13. Let my friends put what construction they please upon it, and think the worse of me for it, I hope God will not make my necessary defence to be my offence, as you do. He will justify me, ver. 18, and then nothing can come amiss to me. Note, Those that are upright, and have the assurance of their uprightness, may cheerfully welcome every event. Come what will, it is bene præparatum pectus,—'they are ready for it.' He resolves, ver. 15, he will maintain his own ways; he will never part with the satisfaction he had in having walked uprightly with God, but, though he could not justify every word he had spoken, yet in the general his ways were good, and he would maintain it; and why should he not, since that was his great support under his present exercises, as it was Hezekiah's, "Now, Lord, remember how I have walked before thee." Nay, he would not only not betray his own cause, or give it up, but he would openly avow his sincerity; for, "If I hold my tongue," and do not speak for myself, my silence now will for ever silence me, for "I shall" certainly "give up the ghost," ver. 19; if I cannot be cleared, yet let me be eased by what I say, as Elihu, ch. xxxii. 17.

Thirdly. He complains of the extremity of pain and misery he was in; ver. 14, "Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth?" That is, 1. Why do I suffer such agonies? I cannot but wonder that God should lay so much upon me when he knows I am not a wicked man. He was ready not only to rend his clothes, but even to tear his flesh, through the greatness of his affliction, and saw himself at the brink of death, and his life in his hand; yet his friends could not charge him with any enormous crime, nor could he himself discover any; no marvel then he was in such confusion. 2. Why do I stifle and smother the protestations of my innocency? When a man with great difficulty keeps in what he would say, he bites his lips. Now, saith he, why may not I take a liberty to speak, since I do but vex myself, add to my torment, and endanger my life by refraining? Note, It would vex the most patient man, when he has lost every thing else, to be denied the comfort, if he deserves it, of a good conscience and a good name.



Fourthly. He comforts himself in God, and still keeps hold of his confidence in him. Observe here,

1. What he depends upon God for—justification and salvation, the two great things we hope for through Christ. 1st. Justification; ver. 18, "I have ordered my cause," and upon the whole matter "I know that I shall be justified." This he knew because he knew that his Redeemer lived, ch. xix. 25. They whose hearts are upright with God in walking not after the flesh, but after the Spirit, may be sure that through Christ there shall be no condemnation to them; but, whoever lays any thing to their charge, they shall be justified, they may know that they shall. 2nd. Salvation; ver. 16, "He also shall be my salvation." He means it not of temporal salvation, he had little expectation of that; but concerning his eternal salvation he was very confident that God would not only be his Saviour to make him happy, but his salvation, in the vision and fruition of whom he should be happy. And the reason why he depended on God for salvation is, because a hypocrite shall not come before him. He knew himself not to be a hypocrite, and that none but hypocrites are rejected of God; and therefore concluded he should not be rejected. Sincerity is our evangelical perfection, nothing will ruin us but the want of that.

2. With what constancy he depends upon him; "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him," ver. 15. This is a high expression of faith, and what we should all labour to come up to; to trust in God though he slay us. That is, we must be well pleased with God as a friend, even then when he seems to come forth against us as an enemy, ch. xxiii. 8—10. We must believe that all shall work for good to us, even then when all seems to make against us, Jer. xxiv. 5. We must proceed and persevere in the way of our duty, though it cost us all that is dear to us in this world, even life itself, Heb. xi. 35. We must depend upon the performance of the promise when all the ways leading to it are shut up, Rom. iv. 18. We must rejoice in God when we have nothing else to rejoice in and cleave to him, yea, though we cannot for the present find comfort in him. In a dying hour we must derive from him living comforts, and this is to trust in him though he slay us.

Fifthly. He wishes to argue the case even with God himself, if he might but have leave to settle the preliminaries of the treaty, ver. 20—22. He had desired, ver. 3, to reason with God, and is still of the same mind; he will not hide himself, that is, he will not decline the trial, nor dread the issue of it; but under two provisos: 1. That his body might not be tortured with this exquisite pain; "Withdraw thine hand far from me," for while I am in this extremity I am fit for nothing; I can make a shift to talk with my friends, but I know not how to address myself to thee. When we are to converse with God we have need to be composed, and as free as possible from every thing that may make us uneasy. 2. That his mind might not be terrified with the tremendous majesty of God; "Let not thy dread make me afraid;" either let the manifestations of thy presence be familiar, or let me be enabled to bear them without disorder and disturbance. Moses himself trembled before God, so did Isaiah and Habakkuk, "O God, thou art terrible even in thy holy places." Lord, saith Job, let not me be put into such a consternation of spirit, together with this bodily affliction; for then I must certainly drop the cause, and shall make nothing of it. See what a folly it is for men to put off their repentance and conversion to a sick bed and a death bed! How can even a good man, much less a bad man, reason with God, so as to be justified before him, when he is upon the rack of pain, and under the terror of the arrests of death? At such a time it is very bad to have the great work to do, but very comfortable to have it done, as it was to Job, who, if he might but have a little breathing time, was ready either, 1st. To hear God speaking to him by his word, and return an answer; "Call thou, and I will answer;" or, 2nd. To speak to him by prayer, and expect an answer; "Let me speak, and answer thou me, ver. 22. Compare this with ch. ix. 34, 35, where he spoke to the same purpose. In short, the badness of his case was at present such a damp upon him as he could not get over; otherwise he was well assured of the goodness of his cause, and doubted not but to have the comfort of it at last, when the present cloud was over. With such holy boldness may the upright come to the throne of grace, not doubting but to find mercy there.

23 How many are mine iniquities and sins?
Make me to know my transgression and my sin.
24 Wherefore hidest thou thy face,
And holdest me for thine enemy?
25 Wilt thou break a leaf driven to and fro?
And wilt thou pursue the dry stubble?
26 For thou writest bitter things against me,
And makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth,
27 Thou puttest my feet also in the stocks,

INDIAN STOCKS.

And lookest narrowly unto all my paths;
Thou settest a print upon the heels of my feet.
28 And he, as a rotten thing, consumeth,
As a garment that is moth eaten.

Here, First. Job inquires after his sins, and begs to have them discovered to him. He looks up to God and asks him what was the number of them; "How many are mine iniquities?" and what the particulars of them; "Make me to know my transgressions," ver. 23. His friends were ready enough to tell him how numerous and how heinous they were, ch. xxii. 5. But, Lord, saith he, let me know them from thee, for thy judgment is according to truth, theirs is not. This may be taken either, 1. As a passionate complaint of hard usage; that he was punished for his faults, and yet was not told what his faults were. Or, 2. As a prudent appeal to God from the censures of his friends. He desired all his sins might be brought to light, as knowing they would then appear nothing so many, nor so mighty, as his friends suspected him to be guilty of. Or, 3. As a pious request to the same sense with that which Elihu directed him to; ch. xxxiv. 32, "That which I see not teach thou me." Note, A true penitent is willing to know the worst by himself; and we should all desire to know what our transgressions are, that we may be particular in the confession of them, and on our guard against them for the future.

Secondly. He bitterly complains of God's withdrawings from him; ver. 24, "Wherefore hidest thou thy face?" This must be meant of something more than his outward afflictions; for the loss of estate, children, health, might well consist with God's love,—when that was all, he blessed the name of the Lord; but his soul was also sore vexed, and that is it which he here laments. 1. That the favours of the Almighty were suspended. God hid his face as one strange to him, displeased with him, shy and regardless of him. 2. That the terrors of the Almighty were inflicted and impressed upon him. God held him for his enemy, shot his arrows at him, ch. vi. 4, and set him as a mark, ch. vii. 20. Note, The holy God sometimes denies his favours, and discovers his terrors, to the best and dearest of his saints and servants in this world. This case occurs not only in the production, but sometimes in the progress, of the Divine life; evidences for heaven are eclipsed, sensible communications interrupted, dread of Divine wrath impressed, and the returns of comfort for the present despaired of, Ps. lxxvii. 7—9; lxxxviii. 7, 15, 16. These are grievous burthens to a gracious soul that values God's lovingkindness as better than life; Pr. xviii. 14, "A wounded spirit who can bear?" Job, by asking here, Why hidest thou thy face, teacheth us that, when at any time we are under the sense of God's withdrawings, we are concerned to inquire into the reason of them; what is the sin for which he corrects us? and what the good he designs us? Job's sufferings were typical of the sufferings of Christ, from whom not only men hid their faces, Isa. liii. 3, but God hid his. Witness the darkness which surrounded him on the cross when he cried out, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" If this were done to these green trees, what shall be done to the dry? They will for ever be forsaken.

Thirdly. He humbly pleads with God his own utter inability to stand before him; ver. 25, "Wilt thou break a leaf, pursue the dry stubble?" Lord, is it for thine honour to trample upon one that is down already? or to crush one that neither hath, nor pretends to, any power to resist thee? Note, We ought to have such an apprehension of the goodness and compassion of God as to believe that he will not break the bruised reed, Mat. xii. 20.

Fourthly. He sadly complains of God's severe dealings with him; he owns it was for his sins that God thus contended with him, but thinks it hard,

1. That his former sins long since committed should now be remembered against him, and he should be reckoned with for the old scores; ver. 26, "Thou writest bitter things against me." Afflictions are bitter things; writing of them notes deliberation and determination, written as a warrant for execution. It notes also the continuance of his affliction, for that which is written remains, and herein thou "makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth;" that is, thou punishest me for them, and thereby puttest me in mind of them, and obligest me to renew my repentance for them. Note, 1st. God sometimes writes very bitter things against the best and dearest of his saints and servants, both in outward afflictions and inward disquiet, trouble in body and trouble in mind, that he may humble them and prove them, and do them good in their latter end. 2nd. That the sins of youth are oftentimes the smart of age, both in respect of sorrow within, Jer. xxxi. 18, 19, and suffering without, ch. xx. 11. Time doth not wear out the guilt of sin. 3rd. That when God writes bitter things against us, his design therein is to make us possess our iniquities, to bring forgotten sins to mind, and so to bring us to remorse for them as to break us off from them. This is all the fruit to take away our sin.

2. That his present mistakes and miscarriages should be so strictly taken notice by critics. Thus, although some, like Barnes, come very near to our common rendering, others depart widely from it. Rodwell explains the first clause, "Lo! he may slay me, I shall cease to hope;" so A. B Davidson, "Behold, he may slay me, I entertain no hope." There is a various reading in the Hebrew, which, though very slight in appearance, causes a great difference in the meaning. Hence, we may either translate, "Behold, he will slay me, I shall not hope," or, "Behold, should he slay me," or "if he should slay me, I will trust in him." The ancient versions favour the reading adopted by our translators. The rendering of Barnes, already referred to, is, "Lo! let him slay me, I will trust in him." The new American version is, "Behold, he will slay me, I may not hope," which is from Rosenmüller.

xiii. 27. The three ideas of this verse, the exact rendering of which is much disputed, seem to be, that Job was subject to constraint, as if in the stocks, watched as if by a spy, and restrained, or without freedom to go where he would. Bishop Patrick gives the sense well:

of, and so severely animadverted upon; ver. 27, "Thou puttest my feet also in the stocks," not only to afflict me, and expose me to shame, nor only to keep me from outrunning the strokes of thy wrath, but that thou mayest critically remark all my motions, and "look narrowly to all my paths," to correct me for every false step; nay, for but a look awry, or a word misapplied. Nay, thou "settest a print upon the heels of my feet," scorest down every thing I do amiss, to reckon for it; or no sooner have I trod wrong, though never so little, but immediately I smart for it: the punishment treads upon the very heels of the sin. Guilt, both of the oldest and of the freshest date, is put together to make up the cause of my calamity. Now, 1st. It was not true that God did thus seek advantages against him. He is not thus extreme to mark what we do amiss; if he were, there were no abiding for us, Ps. cxxx. 3; but he is so far from this, that he deals not with us according to the desert, no, not of our manifest sins, which are not found by secret search, Jer. ii. 34. This, therefore, was the language of Job's melancholy; his sober thoughts never represented God thus as a hard master. 2nd. But we should keep such a strict and jealous eye as this upon ourselves, and our own steps, both for the discovery of sin past, and the prevention of it for the future. It is good for us all to ponder the path of our feet.

Fifthly. He finds himself wasting away apace under the heavy hand of God, ver. 28. He, that is, man, as a rotten thing, the principle of whose putrefaction is in itself, consumeth, even like a moth-eaten garment, which goes ever the longer the worse. Or, He, that is, God, like rottenness, and like a moth, consumeth me. Compare this with Hos. v. 12, "I will be unto Ephraim as a moth, and to the house of Judah as rottenness;" and see Ps. xxxix. 11. Note, Man at the best wears fast; but under God's rebukes especially he is soon gone. While there is so little soundness in the soul, no marvel there is so little soundness in the flesh, Ps. xxxviii. 3.

CHAPTER XIV.

Job had turned from speaking to his friends, finding it to no purpose to reason with them, and here goes on to speak to God and himself. He had minded his friends of their frailty and mortality, ch. xiii. 12; here he minds himself of his own, and pleads it with God for some mitigation of his miseries. We have here an account, I. Of man's life, that it is short, ver. 1, 2; sorrowful, ver. 1; sinful, ver. 4; stinted, ver. 5, 14. II. Of man's death, that it puts a final period to our present life, to which we shall not again return, ver. 7—12; that it hides us from the calamities of life, ver. 13; destroys the hopes of life, ver. 18, 19; sends us away from the business of life, ver. 20; and keeps us in the dark concerning our relations in this life, how much soever we have formerly been in care about them, ver. 21, 22. III. The use Job makes of all this: 1. He pleads it with God, who he thought was too strict and severe with him, ver. 16, 17, begging that, in consideration of his frailty, he would not contend with him, ver. 3; but grant him some respite, ver. 6; 2. He engageth himself to prepare for death, ver. 14; and encourageth himself to hope that it would be comfortable to him, ver. 15. This chapter is proper for funeral solemnities; and serious meditations on it will help us both to get good by the death of others and to get ready for our own.

MAN that is born of a woman
Is of few days, and full of trouble.
2 He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down:
He fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not
3 And dost thou open thine eyes upon such an one,
And bringest me into judgment with thee?
4 Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?
Not one.
5 Seeing his days are determined,
The number of his months are with thee,
Thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass;
6 Turn from him, that he may rest,
Till he shall accomplish, as an hireling, his day.

We are here led to think,

First. Of the original of human life. God is, indeed, its great original, for he breathed into man the breath of life, and in him we live; but we date it from our birth, and thence we must date both its frailty and its pollution. 1. Its frailty. "Man that is born of a woman" is therefore "of few days," ver. 1. It may refer to the first woman, who was called Eve, because she was the mother of all living. Of her, who, being deceived by the tempter, was first in the transgression, we are all born, and consequently derive from her that sin and corruption which both shortens our days and saddens them. Or it may refer to every man's immediate mother. The woman is the weaker vessel, and we know that partus sequitur ventrem,—the child takes after the mother. Let not the strong man, therefore, glory in his strength, or in the strength of his father, but remember that he is born of a woman, and that when God pleaseth the mighty men become as women, Jer. li. 30. 2. Its pollution; ver. 4, "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?" If man be born of a woman that is a sinner, how can it be otherwise but that he should be a sinner? See ch. xxv. 4, "How can he be clean that is born of a woman?" Clean children cannot come from unclean parents, no more than pure streams from an impure spring, or grapes from thorns. Our habitual corruption is derived with our nature from our parents, and is, therefore, bred in the bone. Our blood is not only attainted by a legal conviction, but tainted with an hereditary disease. Our Lord Jesus, being made sin for us, is said to be made of a woman, Gal. iv. 4.

Secondly. Of the nature of human life. It is a flower, it is a shadow, ver. 2. The flower is fading, and all its beauty soon withers and is gone. The shadow is fleeting, and its very being will soon be lost and drowned in the shadows of the night. Of neither do we make any account, in neither do we put any confidence.

Thirdly. Of the shortness and uncertainty of human life. Man is of few days. Life is computed not by months or years, but by days; for we cannot be sure of any day but that it may be our last. These days are few, fewer than we think of; few at the most in comparison with the days of the first patriarchs, much more in comparison with the days of eternity; but much fewer to most who come short of what we call the age of man. Man sometimes no sooner comes forth, but he is cut down; comes forth out of the womb, but he dies in the cradle; comes forth into the world, and enters into the business of it, but is hurried away as soon as he has laid his hand to the plough. If not cut down immediately, yet fleeing as a shadow, that never continues in one stay, in one shape, but the fashion of it passeth away; so doth this world, and our life in it. 1 Cor. vii. 31.

Fourthly. Of the calamitous state of human life. Man, as he is short lived, so he is sad lived. Though he had but a few days to spend here, yet if he might rejoice in those few it were well enough. A short life and a merry is the boast of some; but it is not so. During these few days he is full of trouble, not only troubled, but full of trouble, full of commotion, so the word is, either toiling or fretting, grieving or fearing. No day passeth without some vexation, some hurry, some disorder or other. He has his belly full of trouble. They that are fond of the world shall have enough of it. He is satur tremore,—full of commotion. The fewness of his days creates him a continual trouble and uneasiness in expectation of the period of them, and he always hangs in doubt of his life. Yet, since man's days are so full of trouble, it is well they are few, that the soul's imprisonment in the body, and banishment from the Lord, is not perpetual, is not long. When we come to heaven, our days will be many and perfectly free from trouble; and, in the mean time, faith, hope, and love, balance best the present grievances.

Fifthly. Of the sinfulness of human life, arising from the sinfulness of the human nature. So some understand that question; ver. 4, "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean," a clean performance from an unclean principle? Note, Actual transgressions are the natural product of habitual corruption; which is therefore called original sin, because it is the original of all our sins. This holy Job here laments, as all that are sanctified do, running up the streams to the fountain, Ps. li. 5; and some think he intends it as a plea with God for compassion: Lord, be not extreme to mark my sins of human frailty and infirmity for thou knowest my weakness; "O remember that I am flesh." The Chaldee paraphrase has an observable reading of this verse, 'Who can make a man clean that is polluted with sin? cannot one? that is God; or who but God who is one, and will spare him?' God by his almighty grace can change the skin of the Ethiopian, the skin of Job, though clothed with worms.

Sixthly. Of the settled period of human life, ver. 5. We are here assured, 1. That our life will come to an end. Our days upon earth are not numberless, are not endless; no, they are numbered, and will soon be finished, Dan. v. 26. 2. That it is determined in the counsel and decree of God how long we shall live, and when we shall die. The number of our months is with God, at the disposal of his power, which cannot be controlled; and under the ken of his omniscience, which cannot be deceived. It is certain God's providence has the ordering of the period of our lives: our times are in his hand; the powers of nature depend upon him, and act under him. In him we live and move; diseases are his servants, he kills and makes alive; nothing comes to pass by chance, no, not the execution done by a bow drawn at a venture. It is, therefore, certain; God's prescience has determined it before, for known unto God are all his works. Whatever he doth he determined, yet with a regard partly to the settled course of nature,—the end and the means are determined together; and to the settled rules of moral government, punishing evil and rewarding good in this life. We are no more governed by the stoic's blind fate than by the epicurean's blind fortune. 3. That the bounds God has fixed we cannot pass; for his counsels are unalterable, his foresight being infallible.

These considerations Job here urgeth as reasons,

1st. Why God should not be so strict in taking cognizance of him, and of his slips and failings, ver. 3. Having such a corrupt nature within, and being liable to so much trouble, which is a constant temptation from without, dost thou open thine eyes and fasten them upon such a one, extremely to mark what I do amiss, ch. xiii. 27; and dost thou bring me, such a worthless worm as I am, into judgment with thee who art so quick-sighted to discover the least failing, so holy to hate it, so just to condemn it, and so mighty to punish it? The consideration of our own inability to contend with God, of our own sinfulness and weakness, should engage us to pray, "Lord, enter not into judgment with thy servant."

2nd. Why he should not be so severe in his dealings with him. Lord, I have but a little time to live, and must certainly and shortly go hence, and the few days I have to spend here are at the best full of trouble. Oh, let me have a little respite, ver. 6. Turn from plaguing a poor creature thus, and let him rest awhile; allow him some breathing time, "until he shall accomplish as a hireling his day." It is appointed to me once to die; let that one day suffice me, and let me not thus be continually dying, dying a thousand deaths. Let it suffice that my life at best is "as the day of a hireling," a day of toil and labour, I am content to accomplish that, and will make the best of the common hardships of human life, the burthen and heat of the day; but let me not feel those uncommon tortures, let not my life be as the day of a malefactor, all execution day. Thus may we find some relief under great troubles, by recommending ourselves to the compassion of that God who knows our frame, and will consider it, and our being out of frame too.

7 For there is hope of a tree,
If it be cut down, that it will sprout again,
And that the tender branch thereof will not cease.
8 Though the root thereof wax old in the earth,
And the stock thereof die in the ground;
9 Yet through the scent of water it will bud,
And bring forth boughs like a plant.
10 But man dieth, and wasteth away:
Yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?
11 As the waters fail from the sea,
And the flood decayeth and drieth up:
12 So man lieth down, and riseth not:
Till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake,
Nor be raised out of their sleep.
13 O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave,
That thou wouldest keep me secret, until thy wrath be past,
That thou wouldest appoint me a set time, and remember me!
14 If a man die, shall he live again?
All the days of my appointed time will I wait,
Till my change come.

"I can no more escape than a malefactor whose feet are in the stocks, who is encompassed with a vigilant guard, and cannot stir a foot from the place where he is." The last clause is rendered by Delitzsch: "Thou makest for thyself a circle round the soles of my feet;" and better still by A. B. Davidson—"drawest a line around the soles of my feet."

xiv. 4. Instead of the question, "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?" perhaps the majority of modern critics prefer the form of a wish: "Oh, that a pure one could come from an impure!" There is certainly very good reason for such a rendering, but it is not a correct one, and there are some who still adhere to the old translation. The Hebrew is literally, "Who will give a clean from an unclean?" A similar phrase occurs in Psa. xiv. 7, and elsewhere, about which no question is raised. On the whole, we are disposed to adopt the proposed alteration, although we think the idea may be, "Oh, that he who is unclean might be clean!" The response to this would be, "no one can"—it cannot be.

15 Thou shalt call, and I will answer thee:
Thou wilt have a desire to the work of thine hands

We have seen what Job has to say concerning life; let us now see what he has to say concerning death, which his thoughts were very much conversant with now he was sick and sore. It is not unseasonable when we are in health to think of dying; but it is an inexcusable incogitancy if, when we are already taken into the custody of death's messengers, we look upon it as a thing at a distance. Job had already shewed that death will come, and that its hour is already fixed. Now here he shews,

First. That death is a removal for good and all out of this world. This he had spoken of before, ch. vii. 7, 9, 10, and now he mentions it again; for, though it be a truth that needs not be proved, yet it needs to be much considered that it may be duly improved.

1. A man cut down by death will not revive again, as a tree cut down will. What hope there is of a tree he shews very elegantly, ver. 7—9; if the body of a tree be cut down, and only the stem or stump left in the ground, though it seem dead and dry, yet it will shoot out young boughs again, as if it were but newly planted. The moisture of the earth and the rain of heaven are, as it were, scented and perceived by the stump of a tree, and they have an influence upon it to revive it; but the dead body of a man would not perceive them, nor be in the least affected by them. In Nebuchadnezzar's dream, when his being deprived of the use of his reason was signified by the cutting down of a tree, his return to it again was signified by the leaving of the stump in the earth with a band of iron and brass, to be wet with the dew of heaven, Dan. iv. 15. But man has no such prospect of a return to life. The vegetable life is a cheap and easy thing, the scent of water will recover it; the animal life in some insects and fowls is so, the heat of the sun retrieves it; but the rational soul, when once retired, is too great, too noble a thing to be recalled by any of the powers of nature. It is out of the reach of sun or rain, and cannot be restored but by the immediate operations of Omnipotence itself; for, ver. 10, "Man dieth and wasteth away, yea, man giveth up the ghost and where is he?" Two words are here used for man—Geber, 'a mighty man,' though mighty, dies; Adam, 'a man of the earth,' because earthy, "gives up the ghost." Note, Man is a dying creature: he is here described by what occurs, 1st. Before death, he wasteth away; he is continually wasting, dying daily, spending upon the quick stock of life. Sickness and old age are wasting things to the flesh, the strength, the beauty. 2nd. In death he "giveth up the ghost;" the soul leaves the body, and returns to God who gave it, the Father of spirits. 3rd. After death "where is he?" He is not where he was, his place knows him no more; but, 'is he nowhere?' so some read it. Yes; he is somewhere, and it is a very awful consideration to think where they are that have given up the ghost, and where we shall be when we give it up. It is gone to the world of spirits, gone into eternity, gone to return no more to this world.

2. A man laid down in the grave will not rise up again, ver. 11, 12. Every night we lie down to sleep, and in the morning we awake and rise again, but at death we must lie down in the grave, not to awake or rise again to such a world, such a state as we are now in, never to awake or arise until the heavens, the faithful measurers of time, shall be no more; and consequently time itself shall come to an end, and be swallowed up in eternity. So that the life of man may fitly be compared to the waters of a land flood, which spread far and make a great show; but they are shallow, and when they are cut off from the sea or river, the swelling and overflowing of which was the cause of them, they soon decay and dry up, and their place knows them no more. The waters of life are soon exhaled, and disappear; the body, like some of those waters, sinks and soaks into the earth, and is buried there; the soul, like others of them, is drawn upwards to mingle with the waters above the firmament. The learned Sir Richard Blackmore makes this also to be a dissimilitude. If the waters decay and be dried up in the summer, yet they will return again in the winter, but it is not so with the life of man. Take part of his paraphrase in his own words:—

'A flowing river, or a standing lake,
May their dry banks and naked shores forsake,
Their waters may exhale and upwards move,
Their channel leave to roll in clouds above;
But the returning winter will restore
What in the summer they had lost before:
But if, O man, thy vital streams desert
Their purple channels, and defraud the heart,
With fresh recruits they ne'er will be supplied,
Nor feel their leaping life's returning tide.'

Secondly. That yet there will be a return of man to life again in another world at the end of time, when the heavens are no more; then "they shall awake and be raised out of their sleep." The resurrection of the dead was, doubtless, an article of Job's creed, as appears, ch. xix. 26; and to that it should seem he has an eye here, where in the belief of that we have three things:

1. An humble petition for a hiding-place in the grave, ver. 13. It was not only in a passionate weariness of this life that he wished to die, but in a pious assurance of a better life, to which at length he should arise; "O that thou wouldst hide me in the grave." The grave is not only a resting-place, but a hiding-place to the people of God. God has the key of the grave to let in now, and to let out at the resurrection. He hides men in the grave, as we hide our treasures in a place of secrecy and safety; and he that hides will find, and nothing shall be lost. O that thou wouldst hide me not only from the storms and troubles of this life, but for the bliss and glory of a better life. Let me lie in the grave reserved for immortality; in secret from all the world, but not from thee, not from those eyes which saw my substance when first curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth, Ps. cxxxix. 15, 16. There let me lie, 1st. "Until thy wrath be past." As long as the bodies of the saints lie in the grave, so long there are some remains of that wrath which they were by nature children of; so long they are under some of the effects of sin. But when the body is raised, it is wholly passed; death, the last enemy, will then be totally destroyed. 2nd. Till the set time comes for my being remembered, as Noah was remembered in the ark, (Gen. viii. 1,) where God hid him, not only from the destruction of the old world, but for the reparation of a new world. The bodies of the saints shall not be forgotten in the grave; there is a time appointed, a time set for their being inquired after. We cannot be sure that we shall look through the darkness of our present troubles, and see good days after them in this world; but, if we can but get well to the grave, we may with an eye of faith look through the darkness of that, as Job here, and see better days on the other side it, in a better world.

2. A holy resolution patiently to attend the will of God both in his death and in his resurrection; ver. 14, "If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait until my change come." Job's friends proving miserable comforters, he set himself to be the more his own comforter. His case was now bad; but he pleaseth himself with the expectation of a change. I think it cannot be meant of his return to a prosperous condition in this world; his friends, indeed, flattered him with the hopes of that, but he himself all along despaired of it. Comforts founded upon uncertainties at best must needs be uncertain comforts; and, therefore, no doubt it is something more sure than that which he here bears up himself with the expectation of. The change he waits for must, therefore, be understood either, 1st. Of the change of the resurrection, when the vile body shall be changed, Phil. iii. 21; and a great and glorious change it will be; and then that question, "If a man die, shall he live again?" must be taken by way of admiration. Strange! shall these dry bones live? If so, all the time appointed for the continuance of the separation between soul and body, my separate soul shall wait until that change comes, when it shall be united again to the body, "and my flesh also shall rest in hope," Ps. xvi. 9. Or, 2nd. Of the change at death, "If a man die, shall he live again?" No, not such a life as he now lives; and, therefore, I will patiently wait until that change comes, which will put a period to my calamities, and not impatiently wish for the anticipation of it as I have done. Observe here, First. That it is a serious thing to die; it is a work by itself. It is a change. There is a visible change in the body, its appearance altered, its actions brought to an end; but a greater change with the soul, which quits the body, and removes to the world of spirits, finisheth its state of probation, and enters upon that of retribution. This change will come, and it will be a final change; not like the transmutations of the elements, which return to their former state. No, we must die, not thus to live again. It is but once to die; and that had need be well done that is to be done but once. An error here is fatal, conclusive, and not again to be rectified. Secondly. That therefore it is the duty of every one of us to wait for that change, and to continue waiting all the days of our appointed time. The time of life is an appointed time, that time is to be reckoned by days, and those days are to be spent in waiting for our change. That is, 1*st.* We must expect that it will come, and think much of it. 2*nd.* We must desire that it would come, as those that long to be with Christ. 3*rd.* We must be willing to tarry until it doth come, as those that believe God's time to be the best. 4*th.* We must give diligence to get ready against it comes, that it may be a blessed change to us.

3. A joyful expectation of bliss and satisfaction in this; ver. 15, then, "Thou shalt call, and I will answer thee." Now he was under such a cloud that he could not, he durst not answer, ch. ix. 15, 35; xiii. 22; but he comforted himself with this, that there would come a time when God would call, and he should answer; then, that is, 1st. At the resurrection; Thou shalt call me out of the grave, by the voice of the archangel, and I will answer and come at the call. The body is the work of God's hands, and he will have a desire to that, having prepared a glory for it. Or, 2nd. At death; Thou shalt call my body to the grave, and my soul to thyself; and I will answer, Ready, Lord, ready, coming, coming; here I am. Gracious souls can cheerfully answer death's summons and appear to his writ. Their spirits are not forcibly required from them, as Lu. xii. 20, but willingly resigned by them; and the earthly tabernacle not violently pulled down, but voluntarily laid down, with this assurance, "Thou wilt have a desire to the work of thy hand;" thou hast mercy in store for me, not only as made by thy providence, but new made by thy grace; otherwise, "he that made them will not save them." Note, Grace in the soul is the work of God's own hands; and, therefore, he will not forsake it in this world, Ps. cxxxviii. 8; but will have a desire to it, to perfect it in the other, and to crown it with endless glory.

16 For now thou numberest my steps:
Dost thou not watch over my sin?
17 My transgression is sealed up in a bag,
And thou sewest up mine iniquity.
18 And surely the mountain falling cometh to nought,
And the rock is removed out of his place.
19 The waters wear the stones: [of the earth;
Thou washest away the things which grow out of the dust
And thou destroyest the hope of man.
20 Thou prevailest for ever against him, and he passeth:
Thou changest his countenance, and sendest him away
21 His sons come to honour, and he knoweth it not;
And they are brought low, but he perceiveth it not of 22 But his flesh upon him shall have pain, [them.
And his soul within him shall mourn.

Job here returns to his complaints; and, though he is not without hope of future bliss, he finds it very hard to get over his present grievances.

First. He complains of the particular hardships he apprehended himself under from the strictness of God's justice, ver. 16, 17. Therefore he longed to go hence to that world where God's wrath will be past, because now he was under the continual tokens of it, as a child under the severe discipline of the rod longs to be of age. When shall my change come? for now thou seemest to me to number my steps, and watch over my sin, and seal it up in a bag, as bills of indictment are kept safe to be produced against the prisoner: see Deu. xxxii. 34. Thou takest all advantages against me, old scores are called over, every infirmity is animadverted upon, and no sooner is a false step taken but I am beaten for it. Now, 1. Job doth right to the Divine justice in owning that he smarted for his sins and transgressions, that he had done enough to deserve all that was laid upon him; for there was sin in all his steps, and he was guilty of transgression enough to bring all this ruin upon him, if it were strictly inquired into. He is far from saying that he perisheth being innocent. But, 2. He doth wrong to the Divine goodness, in suggesting that God was extreme to mark what he did amiss, and made the worst of every thing. He spoke to this purpose, ch. xiii. 27. It was unadvisedly said, and therefore we will not dwell too much upon it. God doth indeed see all our sins, he sees sin in his own people, but he is not severe in reckoning with us; nor is the law ever stretched against us, but we are punished less than our iniquities deserve. The transgressions of the impenitent, God doth indeed seal and sew up against the day of wrath, but the sins of his people he blots out as a cloud.

Secondly. He complains of the wasting condition of mankind in general. We live in a dying world; who knows the power of God's anger, by which we are consumed and troubled, and in which all our days are passed away? see Ps. xc. 7—9, 11; and who can bear up against his rebukes? Ps. xxxix. 11.

1. We see the decays of the earth itself. 1st. Of the strongest parts of it, ver. 19. Nothing will last always, for we see even mountains moulder and come to nought, they wither and fall as a leaf; rocks wax old and pass away by the continual beating of the sea against them. "The waters wear the xiv. 6. For "till he shall accomplish, as an hireling, his day," we prefer the now generally adopted version, "so that he may enjoy, as a hireling, his day" of rest.

xiv. 13. The word sheol, here rendered "grave," may be taken in the wider sense of the unseen world, the separate state; and in this connection points clearly to Job's faith in a future life and resurrection. Some sceptical critics have racked their ingenuity to justify the opinion that Job had no such faith; but, while the plain sense of the words is against them, it does not appear that the expectation of Job was very precise and distinct.

xiv. 17. The words, "my transgression is sealed up in a bag, and thou sewest up mine iniquity," refer to well-known customs. In ancient as well as in modern times, it has been usual to put in a bag things intended to be kept, and to place a seal upon the cord or other fastening. The second clause intensifies the idea of the first: for greater security the bag was sewn, and not merely tied.

stones" with constant dropping; non vi, sed sæpe cadendo, 'not by the violence, but the constancy with which they fall.' On this earth every thing is the worse for the wearing; tempus edax rerum,—'time devours all things.' It is not so with the heavenly bodies. 2nd. Of the natural products of it. The things which grow out of the earth, and seem to be firmly rooted in it, are sometimes, by an excess of rain, washed away, ver. 19. Some think he pleads this for relief, 'Lord, my patience will not hold out always, even rocks and mountains will fail at last; therefore, cease the controversy.'

2. No marvel if we then see the decays of man upon the earth, for he is of the earth earthy. Job begins to think his case is not singular, and therefore he ought to reconcile himself to the common lot. We perceive, by many instances, 1st. How vain it is to expect much from the enjoyments of life. "Thou destroyest the hope of man," that is, puttest an end to all the projects he had framed, and all the prospects of satisfaction he had flattered himself with. Death will be the destruction of all those hopes which are built upon worldly confidences, and confined to worldly comforts. Hope in Christ, and hope in heaven, death will consummate, and not destroy. 2nd. How vain it is to struggle against the assaults of death; ver. 20, "Thou prevailest for ever against him." Note, 1. Man is an unequal match for God. Whom God contends with he will certainly prevail against, prevail for ever against, so that they shall never be able to make head again. 2. The stroke of death is irresistible. It is to no purpose to dispute its summons; God prevails against man, and he passeth, passeth away, and lo, he is not. Look upon a dying man and see,

First. How his looks are altered; "Thou changest his countenance," two ways: 1*st*. By the disease of his body. When a man has been a few days sick, what a change is there in his countenance! much more when he has been a few minutes dead. The countenance that was majestic and awful becomes mean and despicable, that was lovely and amiable becomes ghastly and frightful. "Bury my dead out of my sight." Where then is the admired beauty? Death changeth the countenance, and then sends us away out of this world; gives us our dismission hence, never to return. 2nd. By the discomposure of his mind. Note, The approach of death will make the strongest and stoutest to change countenance; it will make the most merry, smiling countenance to look grave and serious, and the most bold, daring countenance to look pale and timorous.

Secondly. How little he is concerned in the affairs of his family, which, when time was, lay so near his heart. When he is in the hands of the harbingers of death, suppose struck with a palsy, or apoplexy, or delirious in a fever, or in conflict with death, tell him then never so good news concerning his children, or never so bad, it is all alike, he knows it not, he perceiveth it not, ver. 21. He is going to that world where he will be a perfect stranger to all those things which here filled and affected him. The consideration of this should moderate our cares concerning our children and families. God will know what comes of them when we are gone; to him, therefore, let us commit them, with him let us leave them, and not burthen ourselves with needless, fruitless cares concerning them.

Thirdly. How dreadful the agonies of death are; ver. 22, 'While his flesh is upon him,' so it may be read, the body he is so loath to lay down, 'shall have pain;' and 'while his soul is within him,' the spirit he is so loath to resign, 'it shall mourn.' Note, Dying work is hard work; dying pangs are commonly sore pangs. It is folly, therefore, for men to defer their repentance to a death bed, and to have that to do which is the one thing needful when they are really unfit to do any thing. But it is true wisdom, by making our peace with God in Christ, and keeping a good conscience, to treasure up comforts which will support and relieve us against the pains and sorrows of a dying hour.

CHAPTER XV.

Perhaps Job was so clear, and so well satisfied in the goodness of his own cause, that he thought, if he had not convinced, yet he had at least silenced, all his three friends; but it seems he had not. At this chapter they begin a second attack upon him, each of them charging him afresh with as much vehemence as before. It is natural to us to be fond of our own sentiments, and therefore to be firm to them, and hardly to be brought to recede from them. Eliphaz here sticks close to the principles upon which he had condemned Job, and, I, He reproves him for justifying himself, and fathers on him many ill things which are unfairly inferred from thence, ver. 2—13. He persuades him to humble himself before God, and to take shame to himself, ver. 14—16. III. He reads him a long lecture concerning the woful estate of wicked people, that harden their hearts against God, and the judgments that are prepared for them, ver. 17—35. A good use may be made both of his reproofs, for they are plain, and of his doctrine, for it is sound, though both the one and the other are misapplied to Job.

THEN answered Eliphaz the Temanite, and said,
2 Should a wise man utter vain knowledge,
And fill his belly with the east wind?
3 Should he reason with unprofitable talk?
Or with speeches wherewith he can do no good?
4 Yea, thou castest off fear,
And restrainest prayer before God.
5 For thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity,
And thou choosest the tongue of the crafty.
6 Thine own mouth condemneth thee, and not I:
Yea, thine own lips testify against thee.
7 Art thou the first man that was born?
Or wast thou made before the hills?
8 Hast thou heard the secret of God?
And dost thou restrain wisdom to thyself?
9 What knowest thou, that we know not?
What understandest thou, which is not in us?
10 With us are both the grayheaded and very aged men,
Much elder than thy father.
11 Are the consolations of God small with thee?
Is there any secret thing with thee?
12 Why doth thine heart carry thee away?
And what do thy eyes wink at,
13 That thou turnest thy spirit against God,
And lettest such words go out of thy mouth?
14 What is man, that he should be clean? [righteous?
And he which is born of a woman, that he should be 15 Behold, he putteth no trust in his saints;
Yea, the heavens are not clean in his sight.
16 How much more abominable and filthy is man,
Which drinketh iniquity like water?

Eliphaz here falls very foul upon Job because he contradicted what he and his colleagues had said, and did not acquiesce in it, and applaud it as they expected. Proud people are apt thus to take it very heinously if they may not have leave to dictate and give law to all about them, and to run upon those as ignorant and obstinate, and all that is naught, that cannot in every thing say as they say. Several great crimes Eliphaz here chargeth Job with, only because he would not own himself a hypocrite.

First. He charges him with folly and absurdity, ver. 2, 3; that, whereas he had been reputed a wise man, he had now quite forfeited his reputation; any one would say that his wisdom was departed from him, he talked so extravagantly, and so little to the purpose. Bildad began thus, ch. viii. 2, and Zophar, ch. xi. 2, 3. It is common for angry disputants thus to represent one another's reasonings as impertinent and ridiculous, more than there is cause, forgetting the doom of him that calls his brother 'Raca,' and 'Thou fool.' It is true, 1. That there is in the world a great deal of vain knowledge, science falsely so called, that is useless, and therefore worthless. 2. That this is the knowledge that puffeth up, with which men fill their bellies, and swell in a fond conceit of their own accomplishments. 3. That whatever vain knowledge a man may have in his head, if he would be thought a wise man, he must not utter it, but let it die with himself as it deserves. 4. Unprofitable talk is evil talk. We must give an account in the great day, not only for wicked words, but for idle words. Speeches, therefore, which do no good, which do no service either to God or our neighbour, or no justice to ourselves, which are no way to the use of edifying, were better unspoken. Such words as are wind, light and empty, especially that are as the east wind, hurtful and pernicious, it will be ill-filling either ourselves or others with, for they will pass very ill in the account. 5. Vain knowledge, and unprofitable talk, ought to be reproved and checked, especially in a wise man, whom it worst becomes, and who doth most hurt by the ill example of it.

Secondly. He charges him with impiety and irreligion; ver. 4, "Thou castest off fear," that is, the fear of God, and that regard to him which thou shouldst have, "and thou restrainest prayer." See what religion is summed up in, fearing God and praying to him; the former the most needful principle, the latter the most needful practice. Where no fear of God is, no good is to be expected; and those that live without prayer certainly live without God in the world. Those who restrain prayer, it is a sign they cast off fear. Surely those have no reverence of God's majesty, no dread of his wrath, and are in no care about their souls and eternity, who make no applications to God for his grace. Those that are prayerless are fearless and graceless. When the fear of God is cast off, all sin is let in, and a door open to all manner of profaneness. It is especially bad with those who have had some fear of God, but now they have cast it off; have been frequent in prayer, but now they restrain it. How are they fallen! How is their first love lost! It notes a kind of force put upon themselves. The fear of God should stick to them; but they throw it off. Prayer would be uttered, but they restrain it, and in both baffle their convictions. Those that either omit prayer or straiten and abridge themselves in it, quench the spirit of adoption, and denying themselves the liberty they might take in the duty, restrain prayer. This is bad enough; but it is worse to restrain others from prayer, to prohibit and discourage prayer, as Darius, Dan. vi. 7.

Now Eliphaz charges this upon Job, either, 1. As that which was his own practice. He thought Job talked of God with such liberty as if he had been hail-fellow with him, charged him so high with hard usage of him, and challenged him so often to a fair trial, that he had quite thrown off all religious regard to him. This charge was utterly false, and yet wanted not some colour. We ought not only to take care that we keep up prayer and the fear of God, but that we never drop any unwary expressions which may give occasion to those who seek occasion to question our sincerity and constancy in religion. Or, 2. As that which others would infer from the doctrine he maintained. If this be true, thinks Eliphaz, which Job saith, that a man may be thus sorely afflicted, and yet be a good man, then farewell all religion, farewell prayer and the fear of God. If all things come alike to all, and the best men may have the worst treatment in this world, every one will be ready to say, "It is vain to serve God, and what profit is it to keep his ordinances?" Mal. iii. 14; "Verily I have cleansed my hands in vain," Ps. lxxiii. 13, 14. Who will be honest, if the tabernacles of robbers prosper? ch. xii. 6. If there be no forgiveness with God, ch. vii. 21, who will fear him? Ps. cxxx. 4. If he laugh at the trial of the innocent, ch. ix. 23, if he be so difficult of access, ch. ix. 32, who will pray to him? Note, It is a piece of injustice, which even wise and good men are too often guilty of in the heat of disputation, to charge upon their adversaries those consequences of their opinions which are not fairly drawn from them, and which really they abhor. This is not doing as we would be done by.

Upon this strained innuendo, Eliphaz grounds that high charge of impiety; ver. 5, "Thy mouth utters thine iniquity," 'teaches' it, so the word is. Thou teachest others to have the same hard thoughts of God and religion that thou thyself hast. It is bad to break even the least of the commandments; but worse to teach men so, Mat. v. 19. If we ever thought evil, let us lay our hand upon our mouth to suppress the evil thought, Pr. xxx. 32, and let us by no means utter it; that is putting an imprimatur to it, publishing it with allowance, to the dishonour of God, and the damage of others. Observe, when men have cast off fear and prayer their mouth utters iniquity. They that cease to do good soon learn to do ill. What can we expect but all manner of iniquity from those that arm not themselves with the grace of God against it? But, "Thou choosest the tongue of the crafty," that is, thou utterest thine iniquity with some show and pretence of piety, mixing some good words with the bad, as hucksters do with their wares, to help them off. The mouth of iniquity could not do so much mischief as it doth without the tongue of the crafty. The serpent beguiled Eve through his subtlety: see Rom. xvi. 18. The tongue of the crafty speaks with design and deliberation; and therefore they that use it may be said to choose it, as that which will serve their purpose better than the tongue of the upright. But it will be found at last that honesty is the best policy.

xv. 2, 3. The second of these verses may be taken as stating plainly what in the first of them is put figuratively. "Vain knowledge," or, as the Hebrew has it, "windy knowledge," is like words which do not profit; and so the speeches which can do no good are compared with the east wind. It has been matter of common observation, in all ages, that an east wind is fraught with perils. The thin ears of corn which Pharaoh saw in his dream are described as withered, and "blasted with the east wind" (Gen. xli. 23). Barnes says, "The east wind was not only tempestuous and vehement, but sultry and destructive to vegetation. It passed over vast deserts, and was characterised by great dryness and heat." So destructive were the words of Job, in the opinion of Eliphaz.

xv. 4. To cast off fear, in this place, is usually understood of religious fear or pious reverence towards God, and most recent translations so express it. Eliphaz accuses Job of nullifying the very first principles of religion.

ch. iv. 6, 7; but now he has got proof against him from his own discourses; ver. 6, "Thine own mouth condemneth thee, and not I." But then he should have considered that he and his fellows had provoked him to say that which now they took advantage of; and that was not fair. Those are most effectually condemned that are condemned by themselves, Tit. iii. 11; Lu. xix. 22. Many a man needs no more to sink him than for his own tongue to fall upon him.

Thirdly. He chargeth him with intolerable arrogancy and self-conceitedness. It was a just, and reasonable, and modest demand Job had made, ch. ix. 3, Allow that "I have understanding as well as you;" but see how they seek occasion against him. That is misconstrued, as if he pretended to be wiser than any man. Because he will not grant to them, they will have it thought that he claims to himself, the monopoly of wisdom, ver. 7—9; as if he thought he had the advantage of all mankind, 1. In length of acquaintance with the world, which furnisheth men with so much the more experience. "Art thou the first man that was born?" and consequently senior to us, and better able to give the sense of antiquity, and the judgment of the first and earliest, the wisest and purest ages? 'Art thou prior to Adam?' so it may be read. Did not he suffer for sin, and yet wilt not thou, who art so great a sufferer, own thyself a sinner? "Wast thou made before the hills," as wisdom herself was? Pr. viii. 23, &c. Must God's counsels, which are as the great mountains, Ps. xxxvi. 6, and immoveable as the everlasting hills, be subsequent to thy notions, and truckle to them? Dost thou know more of the world than any of us do? No, thou art but of yesterday, no more than we, ch. v. 9. Or, 2. In intimacy of acquaintance with God; ver. 8, "Hast thou heard the secret of God?" Dost thou pretend to be of the cabinet council of Heaven, that thou canst give better reasons than others can for God's proceedings? There are secret things of God which belong not to us, and which, therefore, we must not pretend to account for. Those are daringly presumptuous that do. He also represents him, 1st. As assuming to himself such knowledge as none else had; "Dost thou restrain wisdom to thyself," as if none were wise but thou? Job had said, ch. xiii. 2, "What ye know the same do I know also;" and now they return upon him, according to the usage of eager disputants, who think they have a privilege to commend themselves, "What knowest thou that we know not?" How natural are such replies as these in the heat of argument! but how simple do they look afterwards upon the review! 2nd. As opposing the stream of antiquity,—a venerable name, which all contending parties strive to shelter themselves under the umbrage of; "With us are the gray-headed, and very aged men," ver. 10. We have the fathers on our side, all the ancient doctors of the church are of our opinion. A thing soon said, but not so soon proved, and, when proved, truth is not so soon discovered and proved by it as most people imagine. David preferred right Scripture knowledge before that of antiquity, Ps. cxix. 100, "I understand more than the ancients, because I keep thy precepts." Or perhaps one or more, if not all three, of these friends of Job, were elder than he, ch. xxxii. 6, and therefore they thought he was bound to acknowledge them to be in the right. And this also serves contenders to make a noise with to very little purpose. If they are elder than their adversaries, and can say they knew such a thing before they were born, it will serve them to bounce and hector with; whereas the eldest are not always the wisest, ch. xxxii. 9.

Fourthly. He chargeth him with a contempt of the counsels and comforts that were given him by his friends; ver. 11, "Are the consolations of God small with thee?" 1. Eliphaz takes it ill that Job did not value the comforts which he and his friends administered to him more than it seems he did; and did not welcome every word they said as gospel. It is true they had said some very good things, but in their application to Job they were miserable comforters. Note, We are apt to think that great and considerable which we ourselves say, when others, perhaps with good reason, think it small and trifling. Paul found that those who seemed to be somewhat, yet in conference added nothing to him, Gal. ii. 6. 2. He represents this as a slight put upon Divine consolations in general, as if they were of small account with him; whereas really they were not. If he had not highly valued them, he could not have borne up as he did under his sufferings. Note, 1st. The consolations of God are not in themselves small. Divine comforts are great things; that is, the comfort which is from God, especially the comfort which is in God. 2nd. The consolations of God not being small in themselves, it is very ill if they be small with us. It is a great affront to God, and an evidence of a degenerate, depraved mind, to disesteem and undervalue spiritual delights, and despise the pleasant land. What, saith Eliphaz, "is there any secret thing with thee?" hast thou some cordial to support thyself with that is a proprium, an arcanum, that nobody else can pretend to, or knows any thing of? or is there some secret sin harboured and indulged in thy bosom which hinders the operation of Divine comforts? None disesteem Divine comforts but those that secretly affect the world and the flesh.

Fifthly. He chargeth him with opposition to God himself, and to religion; ver. 12, 13, "Why doth thine heart carry thee away" into such indecent, irreligious expressions? Note, Every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, Jas. i. 14. If we fly off from God and our duty, or fly out into any thing amiss, it is our own heart that carries us away; "If thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it." And there is a violence, an impetus, in the by-turnings of the soul; the corrupt heart carries men away, as it were, by force, against their convictions. What is it that thine eyes wink at? Why so careless and mindless of what is said to thee, hearing it as if thou wert half asleep? Why so scornful, disdaining what we say, as if it were below thee to take notice of it? What have we said that deserves to be thus slighted? nay, "that thou turnest thy spirit against God?" It was bad that his heart was carried away from God, but much worse that it was turned against God. But they that forsake God will soon break out in open enmity to him. But how did this appear? Why, thou lettest such words go out of thy mouth reflecting on God, and his justice and goodness. It is the character of the wicked that they set their mouth against the heavens, Ps. lxxiii. 9; which is a certain indication that the spirit is turned against God. He thought Job's spirit was soured against God, and so turned from what it had been, and exasperated at his dealings with him. Eliphaz wanted candour and charity, else he would not have put such a harsh construction upon the speeches of one that had such a settled reputation for piety, and was now in temptation. This was in effect to give the cause on Satan's side, and to own that Job had done as he said he would, curse God to his face.

Sixthly. He chargeth him with justifying himself to that degree as even to deny his share in the common corruption and pollution of the human nature; ver. 14, "What is man, that he should be clean?" that is, that he should pretend to be so, or that any should expect to find him so. What is he that is born of a woman, a sinful woman, that he should be righteous? Note, 1. Righteousness is cleanness, it makes us acceptable to God, and easy to ourselves, Ps. xviii. 24. 2. Man in his fallen state cannot pretend to be clean and righteous before God, either to acquit himself to God's justice, or recommend himself to his favour. 3. He is therefore to be adjudged unclean and unrighteous, because born of a woman, from whom he derives a corrupt nature, which is both his guilt and his pollution. With these plain truths, Eliphaz thinks to convince Job, whereas he had just now said the same, ch. xiv. 4, "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?" But doth it therefore follow that Job is a hypocrite, and a wicked man, which was all that he denied? By no means. Though man as born of a woman is not clean, yet as born again of the Spirit he is. Farther to evince this he here shews, 1st. That the brightest creatures are imperfect and impure before God; ver. 15, God placeth no confidence in saints and angels. He employs both; but trusts neither with his service without giving them fresh supplies of strength and wisdom for it, as knowing they are not sufficient of themselves, neither more nor better than his grace makes them. He takes no complacency in the heavens themselves; how pure soever they seem to us, in his eye they have many a speck, and many a flaw, "The heavens are not clean in his sight." If the stars, saith Mr. Caryl, have no light in the sight of the sun, what light has the sun in the sight of God? see Isa. xxiv. 23.

2nd. That man is much more so; ver. 16, "How much more abominable and filthy is man!" if saints are not to be trusted, much less sinners. If the heavens are not pure, which are as God made them, much less man that is degenerated. Nay, he is abominable and filthy in the sight of God; and, if ever he repent, he is so in his own sight, and therefore he abhors himself. Sin is an odious thing, it makes men hateful; the body of sin is so, and is therefore called a dead body, a loathsome thing. Is it not a filthy thing, and enough to turn one's stomach, to see a man swill swine meat, or some stinking, nasty stuff? Such is the filthiness of man, that he drinks iniquity (that abominable thing which the Lord hates) as greedily, and with as much pleasure, as a man drinks water when he is thirsty. It is his constant drink; it is natural to sinners to commit iniquity. It gratifies, but doth not satisfy, the appetites of the old man. It is like water to a man in a dropsy. The more men sin, the more they would sin.

17 I will shew thee, hear me;
And that which I have seen I will declare;
18 Which wise men have told from their fathers,
And have not hid it:
19 Unto whom alone the earth was given,
And no stranger passed among them.
20 The wicked man travaileth with pain all his days,
And the number of years is hidden to the oppressor.
21 A dreadful sound is in his ears:
In prosperity the destroyer shall come upon him.
22 He believeth not that he shall return out of darkness,
And he is waited for of the sword.
23 He wandereth abroad for bread, saying, Where is it?
He knoweth that the day of darkness is ready at his hand.
24 Trouble and anguish shall make him afraid; [battle.
They shall prevail against him, as a king ready to the 25 For he stretcheth out his hand against God,
And strengtheneth himself against the Almighty.
26 He runneth upon him, even on his neck,
Upon the thick bosses of his bucklers:
27 Because he covereth his face with his fatness,
And maketh collops of fat on his flanks.
28 And he dwelleth in desolate cities,
And in houses which no man inhabiteth,
Which are ready to become heaps. [tinue,
29 He shall not be rich, neither shall his substance con
Neither shall he prolong the perfection thereof upon the 30 He shall not depart out of darkness; [earth
The flame shall dry up his branches,
And by the breath of his mouth shall he go away
31 Let not him that is deceived trust in vanity:
For vanity shall be his recompence.
32 It shall be accomplished before his time,
And his branch shall not be green.
33 He shall shake off his unripe grape as the vine,
And shall cast off his flower as the olive.
34 For the congregation of hypocrites shall be desolate,
And fire shall consume the tabernacles of bribery.
35 They conceive mischief, and bring forth vanity,
And their belly prepareth deceit.

Eliphaz, having reproved Job for his answers, here comes to maintain his own thesis, upon which he built his censure of Job. His opinion is, that those that are wicked are certainly miserable. From whence he would infer, that those that are miserable are certainly wicked, and therefore Job was so. Observe,

First. His solemn preface to this discourse, in which he bespeaks Job's attention; which he had little reason to expect, he having given so little heed to, and put so little value upon, what Job had said; ver. 17, "I will shew thee" that which is worth hearing, and not reason as thou dost with unprofitable talk. Thus apt are men, when they condemn others' reasonings, to commend their own. He promiseth to teach him, 1. From his own experience and observation; "That which I have" myself "seen," in divers instances, "I will declare." It is of good use to take notice of the providences of God concerning the children of men, from which many a good lesson may be learned.

xv. 11. This verse may serve as a specimen to illustrate the variations which are so numerous among the ancient versions of Job. The Latin Vulgate has, "Is it a great thing that God should comfort thee? but thy bad words forbid this;" the Syriac, "Keep off from thee the menacings of God, and talk with thy soul in quietness;" the Greek, "Thou hast been chastised less than thou hast sinned, thou hast spoken very overbearingly;" the Arabic, "Put away from thee the provoking of God, and talk with thy soul in quietness;" the Chaldee, "Are the consolations of God small with thee? and he seems to speak a word in quiet with thee." Modern critics also vary considerably here, especially over the second clause, for which, instead of the common version, we would suggest, "Is there a gentle word with thee?" i.e., "have you used one kind word?" The answer being that he had not.

xv. 20—35. It is the opinion of high authorities that this passage is to be taken as a quotation, in which Eliphaz rehearses the wisdom

What good observations we have made, and have found benefit by ourselves, we should be ready to communicate for the benefit of others. And we may then speak boldly when we declare what we have seen. 2. From the wisdom of the ancients; ver. 18, "which wise men have told from their fathers." Note, The wisdom and learning of the moderns is very much derived from that of the ancients. Good children will learn a great deal from their good parents. And what we have learned from our ancestors we must transmit to our posterity, and not hide from the generations to come: see Ps. lxxviii. 3—6. If the thread of the knowledge of many ages be cut off by the carelessness of one, and nothing be done to preserve it pure and entire, all that succeed fare the worse. The authorities Eliphaz voucheth were authorities indeed, men of rank and figure, ver. 19, "unto whom alone the earth was given;" and therefore you may suppose them favourites of Heaven, and best capable of making observations concerning the affairs of this earth. The dictates of wisdom come with advantage from those that are in places of dignity and power, as Solomon's; yet there is a wisdom "which none of the princes of this world knew," 1 Cor. ii. 7, 8.

Secondly. The discourse itself. He here aims to shew,

1. That those who are wise and good do ordinarily prosper in this world; this he only hints at, ver. 19. That those of whose mind he was were such as had the earth given to them, and to them only; they enjoyed it entirely and peaceably; and no stranger passed among them, either to share with them, or give disturbance to them. Job had said, "the earth is given into the hand of the wicked," ch. ix. 24. No, saith Eliphaz, it is given into the hands of the saints, and runs along with the faith committed unto them; and they are not robbed and plundered by strangers and enemies making inroads upon them, as thou art by the Sabeans and Chaldeans. But, because many of God's people have remarkably prospered in this world, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, it doth not therefore follow that those who are crossed and impoverished, as Job, are not God's people.

2. That wicked people, and particularly oppressors, and tyrannizing rulers, are subject to continual terrors, live very uncomfortably, and perish very miserably. On this head he enlargeth, shewing that even they who impiously dare God's judgments yet cannot but dread them, and will feel them at last. He speaks in the singular number,—"the wicked man," some think meaning Nimrod, or perhaps Chedorlaomer, or some such mighty hunter before the Lord. I wish he doth not mean Job himself, whom he expressly chargeth both with the tyranny and with the timorousness here described, ch. xxii. 9, 10. Here he thinks the application easy, and that Job might in this description, as in a glass, see his own face. Now, 1st. Let us see how he describes the sinner who lives thus miserably. He doth not begin with that, but brings it in as a reason of his doom, ver. 25—28. It is no ordinary sinner, but one of the first rate, an oppressor, ver. 20; a blasphemer and a persecutor; one that neither fears God nor regards man.

First. He bids defiance to God, and to his authority and power, ver. 25. Tell him of the Divine law, and the obligations of it, he breaks those bonds asunder, and will not have, no, not him that made him to restrain him, or rule over him. Tell him of the Divine wrath, and the terrors of that, he bids the Almighty do his worst, he will have his will, he will have his way in spite of him; and will not be controlled by law or conscience, or the notices of a judgment to come. He stretcheth out his hand against God, in defiance of him, and of the power of his wrath. God is indeed out of his reach, but he stretcheth out his hand against him, to shew that if it were in his power he would ungod him. This speaks the audacious impiety of some sinners, who are really haters of God, Rom. i. 30; and whose carnal mind is not only an enemy to him, but enmity itself, Rom. viii. 7. But, alas! the sinner's malice is as impotent as it is impudent; what can he do? Why, "he strengtheneth himself" (he 'would be valiant,' so some read it) "against the Almighty;" he thinks with his exorbitant despotic power to change times and laws, Dan. vii. 25; and, in spite of Providence, to carry the day for rapine and wrong, clear of the check of conscience. Note, It is the prodigious madness of presumptuous sinners that they enter the lists with Omnipotence; "Woe unto him that strives with his Maker." That is generally taken for a farther description of the sinner's daring presumption; ver. 26, "He runs upon him," upon God himself, in a direct opposition to him, to his precepts and providences, "even upon his neck, as a desperate combatant, when he finds himself an unequal match for his adversary, flies in his face, though at the same time he falls on his sword's point, or 'the sharp spike of his buckler.' Every sinner runs from God; but the presumptuous sinner, who sins with a high hand, runs upon him, fights against him, and bids defiance to him; and it is easy to foretel what will be the issue.

Secondly. He wraps himself up in security and sensuality, ver. 27. "He covers his face with his fatness." This signifies both the pampering of his flesh with daily delicious fare and the hardening of his heart thereby against the judgments of God. Note, The gratifying of the appetites of the body, feeding and feasting that to the full, often turns to the damage of the soul and its interests. Why is God forgotten and slighted, but because the belly is made a god of, and the happiness placed in the delights of sense? They that fill themselves with wine and strong drink, abandon all that is serious, and flatter themselves with hopes that "to-morrow shall be as this day," Isa. lvi. 12; "Woe to them that are thus at ease in Zion," Am. vi. 1, 3, 4; Lu. xii. 19. The fat that covers his face makes him look bold and haughty, and that which covers his flanks makes him lie easy and soft, and feel little. But this will prove poor shelter against the darts of God's wrath.

Thirdly. He enriches himself with the spoils of all about him, ver. 28. He dwells in cities, which he himself hath made desolate, by expelling the inhabitants out of them, that he might be placed alone in them, Isa. v. 8. It is strange what pleasure proud and cruel men can take in ruins, when they are of their own making, in destroying cities, Ps. ix. 6, and triumphing in the destruction; since they cannot otherwise make them their own, but by making them ready to become heaps, and frightening the inhabitants out of them. Note, Those that aim to engross the world to themselves, and grasp at all, lose the comfort of all, and make themselves miserable in the midst of all. How doth this tyrant gain his point, and make himself master of cities that have all the marks of antiquity upon them? We are told, ver. 35, he doth it by malice and falsehood; the two chief ingredients of his wickedness who was a liar and a murderer from the beginning. They conceive mischief, and then they effect it by preparing deceit, pretending to protect those whom they design to subdue; and making leagues of peace, the more effectually to carry on the operations of war. From such wicked men God deliver all good men!

2nd. Let us see now what is the miserable condition of this wicked man, both in spiritual and temporal judgments.

First. His inward peace is continually disturbed. He seems to those about him to be easy, who therefore envy him, and wish themselves in his condition; but he that knows what is in men tells us that a wicked man has so little comfort and satisfaction in his own breast that he is rather to be pitied than envied.

1*st.* His own conscience accuseth him; and with the pangs and throes of that he "travaileth in pain all his days," ver. 20. He is continually uneasy at the thought of the cruelties he has been guilty of, and the blood in which he has imbrued his hands; his sins stare him in the face at every turn. Diri conscia facti mens habet attonitos,—'conscious guilt astonishes and confounds.'

2*nd.* He is vexed at the uncertainty of the continuance of his wealth and power; "the number of years is hidden to the oppressor." He knows, whatever he pretends, that it will not last always, and has reason to fear it will not last long, and this he frets at.

3*rd.* He is under "a certain fearful expectation of judgment and fiery indignation," (Heb. x. 27,) which puts him into, and keeps him in, a continual terror and consternation, so that he dwells with Cain, in the land of Nod, or commotion, Gen. iv. 16; and is made like Pashur, "Magor-missabib, a terror round about," Jer. xx. 3, 4. "A dreadful sound is in his ears," ver. 21. He knows both heaven and earth are incensed against him, that God is angry with him, and all the world hates him, and he has done nothing to make his peace with either; and, therefore, thinks every one that meets him will slay him, Gen. iv. 14; or, like a man absconding for debt, that thinks every man a bailiff. Fear came in at first with sin, Gen. iii. 10, and still attends it. Even in prosperity he is apprehensive that the destroyer will come upon him, either some destroying angel sent of God to avenge his quarrel, or some of his injured subjects that will be their own avengers. Those who are the terror of the mighty in the land of the living usually go down slain to the pit, Eze. xxxii. 25; the expectation of which makes them a terror to themselves. This is farther set forth, ver. 22, that he is in his own apprehension waited for of the sword, for he knows that he who killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword, Rev. xiii. 10. A guilty conscience represents to the sinner a flaming sword turning every way, Gen. iii. 24, and himself inevitably running on it. Again, ver. 23, "He knows that the day of darkness" (or the night of darkness, rather) "is ready at his hand;" that it is appointed to him, and cannot be put by; that it is hastening on apace, and cannot be put off. This day of darkness is something beyond death; it is that day of the Lord which to all wicked people will be darkness and not light, and in which they will be doomed to utter endless darkness. Note, Some wicked people, though they seem secure, have already received the sentence of death, eternal death, within themselves, and plainly see hell gaping for them. No marvel that it follows, ver. 24, "Trouble and anguish" (that inward tribulation and anguish of soul spoken of, Rom. ii. 8, 9, which is the effect of God's indignation and wrath fastening upon the conscience,) "shall make him afraid" of worse to come. What is the hell before him if this be the hell within him? And though he would fain shake off his fears, drink them away, and jest them away, it will not do, they shall prevail against him, and overpower him as a king ready to the battle, with forces too strong to be resisted. He that would keep his peace, let him keep a good conscience.

4th. If at any time he be in trouble, he despairs of getting out; ver. 22, "He believeth not that he shall return out of darkness," but he gives himself up for gone and lost in an endless night. Good men expect light at evening time, light out of darkness; but what reason have they to expect that they shall return out of the darkness of trouble who would not return from the darkness of sin, but went on in it? Ps. lxxxii. 5. It is the misery of damned sinners, that they know they shall never return out of that utter darkness, nor pass the gulf fixed.

5th. He perplexeth himself with continual care, especially if Providence never so little frown upon him, ver. 23. Such a dread he has of poverty, and such a waste doth he discern upon his estate, that he is already, in his own imagination, wandering abroad for bread, going a begging for a meal's meat, and saying, Where is it? The rich man in his abundance cried out, What shall I do? Lu. xii. 17. Perhaps he pretends fear of wanting as an excuse of his covetous practices, and justly may he be brought to this extremity at last. We read of those who were full, but have hired out themselves for bread, 1 Sam. ii. 5, which this sinner will not do; he cannot dig, he is too fat, ver. 27, but to beg he may well be ashamed: see Ps. cix. 10. David never saw the righteous so far forsaken as to beg their bread, for, verily, they shall be fed by the charitable unasked, Ps. xxxvii. 3, 25. But the wicked want it, and cannot expect it should be readily given them. How shall they find mercy that never shewed mercy?

Secondly. His outward prosperity will soon come to an end, and all his confidence and all his comfort will come to an end with it. How can he prosper when God runs upon him? so some understand that, ver. 26. And whom God runs upon, he will certainly run down; for when he judgeth he will overcome. See how the judgments of God cross this worldly wicked man in all his cares, desires, and projects, and so complete his misery.

1*st.* He is in care to get, but "he shall not be rich," ver. 29. His own covetous mind keeps him from being truly rich. He is not rich that has not enough, and he has not enough that doth not think he has. It is contentment only that is great gain. Providence remarkably keeps some from being rich, defeating their enterprises, breaking their measures, and keeping them always behind hand. Many that get much by fraud and injustice, yet do not grow rich. It goes as it comes; it is got by one sin, and spent upon another.

2*nd.* He is in care to keep what he has got, but in vain; "his substance shall not continue;" it will dwindle and come to nothing; God blasts it, and what came up in a night perisheth in a night. "Wealth gotten by vanity will certainly be diminished." Some have themselves lived to see the ruin of those estates which have been raised by oppression; however, it goes with a curse to those that succeed. De male quæsitis vix gaudet tertius hæres,—'Ill-gotten property will scarcely be enjoyed by the third generation.' He purchaseth estates to him and his heirs for ever, but to what purpose? He shall not "prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth," neither the credit nor the comfort of his riches shall be prolonged; and when those are gone, where is the perfection of them? How indeed can we expect the perfection of any thing to be prolonged upon the earth, where every thing is transitory, and we soon see the end of all perfection?

3*rd.* He is in care to leave what he has got and kept to his children after him; but in this he is crossed. The branches of his family shall perish, in whom he hoped to have lived and flourished, and to have had the reputation of making them all great men. "They shall not be green," ver. 32; "the flame shall dry them up," ver. 30. He shall shake them off as blossoms that never knit, or as the unripe grape, ver. 33. They shall die in the beginning of their days, and never come to maturity. Many a man's family is ruined by his iniquity.

4*th.* He is in care to enjoy it a great while himself; but in that also he is crossed. (1.) He may perhaps be taken from it; ver. 30, "By the breath of God's mouth" (that is, by his wrath, which like a stream of brimstone kindles the fire that devours him, Isa. xxx. 33: or, by his word, he speaks and it is done presently,) "shall he go away," and leave his wealth to others. "This night shall thy soul be required of thee;" and so "the wicked is driven away in his wickedness," the worldling in his worldliness. (2.) It may perhaps be taken from him, and fly away like an eagle towards heaven. "It shall be accomplished" (or cut off) "before his time," ver. 32; that is, he shall survive his prosperity, and see himself stripped of it.

5*th.* He is in care, when he is in trouble, how to get out of it, not how to get good by it; but in this also he is crossed, ver. 30, "He shall not depart out of darkness." When he begins to fall, like Haman, down with him. It was said of ancient sages. Delitzsch calls it "the doctrine of the wise men, which springs from a venerable primitive age, an age as yet undisturbed by any strange way of thinking (modern enlightenment and free thinking, as we should say), and is supported by Eliphaz's own experience." Barnes says, "Eliphaz professes to urge nothing which had not been handed down from his ancestors, and was the result of careful observation. What he says is made up of apophthegms and maxims that were regarded as containing the results of ancient wisdom, all meaning that God would punish the wicked, or that the wicked would be treated according to their deserts." There are a few verbal difficulties in the translation. Thus, in verse 20, for "hidden," some think "reserved" is better: the oppressor will only continue for a certain time. In verse 29, for "perfection" we may understand "possession." In verse 32, the "branch" should be probably a "palm branch." The following note from Delitzsch (Clarke's Edition) well illustrates verse 33: "In order to appreciate the point of him, ver. 22, "He believeth not that he shall return out of darkness," he frightened himself with the perpetuity of his calamity; and God also shall choose his delusions, and bring his fears upon him, Isa. lxvi. 4, as he did upon Israel, Num. xiv. 28. God saith Amen to his distrust and despair.

6th. He is in care to secure his partners, and hopes to secure himself by his partnership with them, but that is in vain too; ver. 34, 35, The congregation of them, the whole confederacy, they and all their tabernacles, shall be desolate, and consumed with fire. Hypocrisy and bribery are here charged upon them; that is, deceitful dealing both with God and man: God affronted under colour of religion, man wronged under colour of justice. It is impossible these should end well. "Though hand join in hand" for the support of these perfidious practices, "yet shall not the wicked go unpunished."

Thirdly. The use and application of all this. Will the prosperity of presumptuous sinners end at last thus miserably? Then, (ver. 31,) "let not him that is deceived trust in vanity." Let others' harms be our warnings, and let not us rest on that broken reed which always failed those that leaned on it. 1st. Those that trust to their sinful ways of getting wealth trust in vanity; and vanity will be their recompence, for they shall not get what they expected. Their arts will deceive them, and perhaps ruin them in this world. 2nd. Those that trust to their wealth when they have gotten it, especially to the wealth they have gotten dishonestly, trust in vanity, for it will yield them no satisfaction; the guilt that cleaves to it will ruin the joy of it. They sow the wind, and will reap the whirlwind, and will own at length, with the utmost confusion, that a deceived heart turned them aside, and they cheated themselves with a lie in their right hand.

CHAPTER XVI.

This chapter begins Job's reply to that discourse of Eliphaz which we had in the foregoing chapter; and it is but the second part of the same song of lamentation with which he had before bemoaned himself, and to the same melancholy tune. I. He upbraids his friends with their unkind usage of him, ver. 1—5. II. He represents his own case as very deplorable upon all accounts, ver. 6—16. III. He still holds fast his integrity, concerning which he appeals to God's righteous judgment from the unrighteous censures of his friends, ver. 17—22.

THEN Job answered and said,
2 I have heard many such things:
Miserable comforters are ye all.
3 Shall vain words have an end?
Or what emboldeneth thee that thou answerest?
4 I also could speak as ye do:
If your soul were in my soul's stead,
I could heap up words against you,
And shake mine head at you.
5 But I would strengthen you with my mouth,
And the moving of my lips should asswage your grief.

Both Job and his friends took the same way that disputants commonly take, which is to undervalue one another's sense, and wisdom, and management. The saw of contention, the longer it is drawn the hotter it grows, and the beginning of this sort of strife is as the letting forth of water; therefore leave it off before it be meddled with. Eliphaz had represented Job's discourses as idle and unprofitable, and nothing to the purpose; and Job here gives his the same character. Those who are free in passing such censures must expect to have them retorted. It is easy, it is endless; but, cui bono?—'what good doth it do?' It will stir up men's passions, but will never convince their judgments, nor set truth in a clear light. Job here reproves Eliphaz,

First. For needless repetitions; ver. 2, "I have heard many such things." You tell me nothing but what I knew before, nothing but what you yourselves have before said; you offer nothing new, it is the same thing over and over again; which Job thinks as great a trial of his patience as almost any of his troubles. The inculcating of the same things thus by an adversary is indeed provoking and nauseous; but by a teacher it is often necessary, and must not be grievous to the learner, to whom precept must be upon precept, and line upon line. Many things we have heard which it is good for us to hear again, that we may understand and remember them better, and be more affected with them and influenced by them.

Secondly. For unskilful applications. They came with a design to comfort him, but they went about it very awkwardly, and when they touched Job's case, quite mistook it; "Miserable comforters are ye all," that, instead of offering anything to alleviate the affliction, add affliction to it, and make it yet more grievous. The patient's case is sad indeed when his medicines are poisons, and his physicians his worst disease. What Job saith here of his friends is true of all creatures in comparison with God, and one time or other we shall be made to see it and own it, that "miserable comforters are they all." When we are under convictions of sin, terrors of conscience, and the arrests of death, it is only the blessed Spirit that can comfort effectually; all others without him do it miserably, and sing songs to a heavy heart to no purpose.

Thirdly. For endless impertinence. Job wisheth that vain words might have an end, ver. 3; and, if they be vain, it were well they were never begun, and the sooner they are ended the better. Those who are so wise as to speak to the purpose will be so wise as to know when they have said enough of a thing, and when it is time to break off.

Fourthly. For causeless obstinacy; "What emboldeneth thee that thou answerest?" It is a great piece of confidence, and unaccountable with Eliphaz, to charge men with those crimes which we cannot prove upon them, to pass a judgment on men's spiritual state upon the view of their outward condition, and to re-advance those objections which have been again and again answered.

Fifthly. For the violation of the sacred laws of friendship, doing by his brother as he would not have been done by, and as his brother would not have done by him. This is a cutting reproof, and very affecting, ver. 4, 5.

1. He desires his friends in imagination for a little while to change conditions with him, to put their souls into his soul's stead; to suppose themselves in misery like him, and him at ease like them. And it is no absurd or foreign supposition, but what might quickly become true in fact; so strange, so sudden, many times are the vicissitudes of human affairs, and such the turns of the wheel, that the spokes soon change places. Whatever our brethren's sorrows are, we ought by sympathy to make them our own, because we know not how soon they may be so.

2. He represents the unkindness of their carriage towards him by shewing what he could do to them if they were in his condition; "I could speak as ye do." It is an easy thing to trample upon those that are down, and to find fault with what those say that are in extremity of pain and affliction. "I could heap up words against you," as you do against me, and how would you like it? how would you bear it?

3. He shews them what they should do, by telling them what in that case he would do; ver. 5, "I would strengthen you," and say all I could to assuage your grief, but nothing to aggravate it. It is natural to sufferers to think what they would do if the tables were turned; but perhaps our hearts may deceive us, we know not what we would do. We find it easier to discern the reasonableness and importance of a command when we have occasion to claim the benefit of it than when we have occasion to do the duty of it. See what is the duty we owe to our brethren in affliction. 1st. We should say and do all we can to strengthen them, suggesting to them such considerations as are proper to encourage their confidence in God, and to support their sinking spirits. Faith and patience are the strength of the afflicted; what helps these graces confirms the feeble knees. 2nd. To assuage their grief, the causes of their grief if possible, or, however, their resentment of those causes. Good words cost nothing; but they may be of good service to those that are in sorrow, not only as it is some comfort to them to see their friends concerned for them, but they may so be minded of that which through the prevalency of grief was forgotten. Though hard words, we say, break no bones, yet kind words may help to make broken bones rejoice; and those have the tongue of the learned that know how to speak a word in season to the weary.

6 Though I speak, my grief is not asswaged:
And though I forbear, what am I eased?
7 But now he hath made me weary:
Thou hast made desolate all my company
8 And thou hast filled me with wrinkles,
Which is a witness against me:
And my leanness rising up in me
Beareth witness to my face.
9 He teareth me in his wrath, who hateth me:
He gnasheth upon me with his teeth;
Mine enemy sharpeneth his eyes upon me.
10 They have gaped upon me with their mouth;
They have smitten me upon the cheek reproachfully;
They have gathered themselves together against me.
11 God hath delivered me to the ungodly,
And turned me over into the hands of the wicked.
12 I was at ease, but he hath broken me asunder:
He hath also taken me by my neck, and shaken me to pieces,
And set me up for his mark.
13 His archers compass me round about,
He cleaveth my reins asunder, and doth not spare;
He poureth out my gall upon the ground.
14 He breaketh me with breach upon breach,
He runneth upon me like a giant.
15 I have sewed sackcloth upon my skin,
And defiled my horn in the dust.
16 My face is foul with weeping,
And on my eyelids is the shadow of death.

Job's complaint is here very bitter, as anywhere in all his discourses, and he is at a stand whether to smother it or to give it vent. Sometimes the one, and sometimes the other, is a relief to the afflicted, according as the temper or the circumstances are; but Job found help by neither, ver. 6. 1. Sometimes giving vent to grief gives ease; but "though I speak," saith Job, "my grief is not assuaged," my spirit is never the lighter for the pouring out of my complaint; nay, what I speak is so misconstrued as to be turned to the aggravation of my grief. 2. At other times, keeping silence makes the trouble the easier, and the sooner forgotten; but, saith Job, "though I forbear," I am never the nearer, "what am I eased?" If he complained, he was censured as passionate; if not, as sullen; if he maintained his integrity, that was his crime; if he made no answer to their accusations, his silence was taken for a confession of his guilt. Here is a doleful remonstrance of Job's grievances. Oh, what reason have we to bless God that we are not making such complaints! He complains,

First. That his family was scattered; ver. 7, "He made me weary;" weary of speaking, weary of forbearing, weary of my friends, weary of life itself; my journey through the world proves so very uncomfortable that I am quite tired with it. And this made it as tiresome as any thing, that all his company was made desolate, his children and servants killed, and the poor remains of his great household dispersed. The company of good people that used to meet at his house for religious worship was now scattered, and he spent his sabbaths in silence and solitude. He had company indeed, but such as he would rather have been without, for they seemed to triumph in his desolation. If lovers and friends are put far from us, we must see and own God's hand in it, making our company desolate.

Secondly. That his body was worn away with diseases and pains, so that he was become a perfect skeleton, nothing but skin and bones, ver. 8. His face was furrowed, not with age, but sickness; "Thou hast filled me with wrinkles." His flesh was wasted with the running of his sore boils, so that his leanness rose up in him; that is, his bones that were not seen stuck out, ch. xxxiii. 21. These are called witnesses against him, witnesses of God's displeasure against him, and such witnesses as his friends produced against him to prove him a wicked man. Or, they are witnesses for me, that my complaint is not causeless, or witnesses to me that I am a dying man, and must be gone shortly.

Thirdly. That his enemy was a terror to him, threatened him, frightened him, looked stern upon him, and gave all the indications of rage against him; ver. 9, "He tears me in his wrath." But who is the enemy? Either, 1. Eli-of the comparison, it is needful to know that the Syrian olive-tree bears fruit plentifully the first, third, and fifth years, but rests during the second, fourth, and sixth. It blossoms in these years also, but the blossoms fall off almost entirely without any berries being formed. The harvest of the olive is therefore in such years very scanty. With respect to the vine, every year enormous quantities of grapes are used up before they are ripe. When the berries are only about the size of a pea, the acid from them is used in housekeeping to prepare almost every kind of food. The people are exceedingly fond of things sour—a taste which is caused by the heat of the climate. During the months of June, July, and August, above 600 horses and asses, laden with unripe grapes, come daily to the market in Damascus alone; and during this season no one uses vinegar."

xvi. 4. For "heap up" we should rather translate, with Barnes, "string together."

xvi. 5, 6. Instead of "assuage" here, we might use the word phaz, who shewed himself very much exasperated against him, and perhaps had expressed himself with such marks of indignation as are here mentioned; however, what he said tore Job's good name, and thundered nothing but terror to him. His eyes were sharpened to spy out matter of reproach against Job, and very barbarously both he and the rest of them used him. Or, 2. Satan. He was his enemy that hated him, and, perhaps, by the Divine permission, terrified him with apparitions, as (some think) he terrified our Saviour, which put him into his agonies in the garden; and thus he aimed to make him curse God. It is not improbable that this is the enemy he means. Or, 3. God himself. If we understand it of him, the expressions are indeed as rash as any he used; God hates none of his creatures, but Job's melancholy did thus represent to him the terrors of the Almighty; and nothing can be more grievous to a good man than to apprehend God to be his enemy. If the wrath of a king be as messengers of death, what is the wrath of the King of kings!

Fourthly. That all about him were abusive to him, ver. 10. They came upon him with open mouth to devour him, as if they would swallow him alive, so terrible were their threats, and so scornful was their carriage to him. They did him all the indignities they could invent, and even smote him on the cheek; and herein many were confederate,—they gathered themselves together against him, even the abjects, Ps. xxxv. 15. Herein Job was a type of Christ, as many of the ancients make him. These very expressions are used in the predictions of his sufferings; Ps. xxii. 13. "They gaped upon me with their mouths;" and Mic. v. 1, "They shall smite the judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek," which was literally fulfilled, Mat. xxvi. 67. How were they increased that troubled him!

Fifthly. That God, instead of delivering him out of their hands, as he hoped, delivered him into their hands; ver. 11, "He hath turned me over into the hands of the wicked." They could have had no power against him if it had not been given them from above; he therefore looks beyond them to God, who gave them their commission, as David did when Shimei cursed him. But he thinks it strange, and almost thinks it hard, that those should have power against him who were God's enemies as much as his. But God sometimes makes use of wicked men as his sword to one another, (Ps. xvii. 13,) and his rod to his own children, Isa. x. 5. Herein also Job was a type of Christ, who was delivered into wicked hands to be crucified and slain by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, Acts ii. 23.

Sixthly. That God not only delivered him into the hands of the wicked, but took him into his own hands too, into which it is a fearful thing to fall; ver. 12, "I was at ease" in the comfortable enjoyment of the gifts of God's bounty, not fretting and uneasy, as some are in the midst of their prosperity, who thereby provoke God to strip them; yet "he has broken me asunder," put me upon the rack of pain, and torn me limb from limb. God in afflicting him had seemed, 1. As if he were furious. Though fury is not in God, he thought it was, when he took him by the neck (as a strong man in a passion would take a child) and shook him to pieces, triumphing in the irresistible power he had to do what he would with him. 2. As if he were partial. He hath distinguished me from the rest of mankind by this hard usage of me; he "hath set me up for his mark," the butt at which he is pleased to let fly all his arrows. At me they are directed, and they come not by chance; against me they are levelled, as if I were the greatest sinner of all the men of the East, or were singled out to be made an example. When God set him up for a mark, his archers presently compassed him round. God has archers at command, who will be sure to hit the mark that he sets up. Whoever are our enemies, we must look upon them as God's archers, and see him directing the arrow. "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good." 3. As if he were cruel, and his wrath as relentless as his power was resistless. As if he contrived to touch him in the tenderest part, cleaving his reins asunder with acute pains. Perhaps they were nephritic pains, those of the stone, which lie in the region of the kidneys. As if he had no mercy in reserve for him; he doth not spare, nor abate any thing of the extremity. And as if he aimed at nothing but his death, and his death in the midst of the most grievous tortures; "He pours out my gall upon the ground;" as, when men have taken a wild beast and killed it, they open it and pour out the gall with a loathing of it. He thought his blood was poured out as if it were not only not precious but nauseous. 4. As if he were unreasonable and insatiable in his executions; ver. 14, "He breaketh me with breach upon breach," follows me with one wound after another. So his troubles came at first, while one messenger of evil tidings was speaking another came; and so it was still, new boils were rising every day, so that he had no prospect of the end of his troubles. Thus he thought God ran upon him like a giant, whom he could not possibly stand before or confront, as the giants of old ran down all their poor neighbours, and were quite too hard for them. Note, Even good men, when they are in great and extraordinary troubles, have much ado not to entertain hard thoughts of God.

Seventhly. That he had divested himself of all his honour, and all his comfort, in compliance with the surprising providences that were concerning him. Some can lessen their own troubles by concealing them, holding their heads as high, and putting as good a face upon it as ever; but Job could not do so. He received the impressions of them, and, as one truly penitent and truly patient, he humbled himself under the mighty hand of God, ver. 15, 16. 1. He now laid aside all his ornaments and soft clothing, consulted not either his ease or finery in his dress, but sewed sackcloth upon his skin; that clothing he thought good enough for such a defiled, distempered body as he had. Silks upon sores, such sores, he thought would be disagreeable; sackcloth would be more becoming. Those are fond indeed of gay clothing that will not be weaned from it by sickness and old age, and, as Job was, ver. 8, by wrinkles and leanness. He not only put on sackcloth, but sewed it on, as one that resolved to continue his humiliation as long as the affliction continued. 2. He insisted not upon any points of honour, but humbled himself under humbling providences; he defiled his horn in the dust, and refused the respects that used to be paid to his dignity, power, and eminency. Note, When God brings down our condition, that should bring down our spirits. Better lay the horn in the dust, than lift it up in contradiction to the designs of Providence, and have it broken at last. Eliphaz had represented Job as high, and haughty, and unhumbled under his affliction. No, saith Job, I know better things; the dust is now the fittest place for me. 3. He banished mirth as utterly unseasonable, and set himself to sow in tears; ver. 16, "My face is foul with weeping" so constantly for my sins, for God's displeasure against me, and for my friends' unkindness; this has brought a shadow of death upon my eyelids. He had not only wept away all his beauty, but almost wept his eyes out. In this also he was a type of Christ, who was a man of sorrows, and much in tears, and pronounced those blessed that mourn, for they shall be comforted.

17 Not for any injustice in mine hands:
Also my prayer is pure.
18 O earth, cover not thou my blood,
And let my cry have no place.
19 Also now, behold, my witness is in heaven,
And my record is on high.
20 My friends scorn me:
But mine eye poureth out tears unto God
21 O that one might plead for a man with God,
As a man pleadeth for his neighbour!
22 When a few years are come,
Then I shall go the way whence I shall not return.

Job's condition was very deplorable; but had he nothing to support him nothing to comfort him? Yes, and he here tells us what it was.

First. He had the testimony of his conscience for him that he had walked uprightly, and had never allowed himself in any gross sin. None was ever more ready than he to acknowledge his sins of infirmity; but, upon search, he could not charge himself with any enormous crime for which he should be made more miserable than other men, ver. 17. He had kept a conscience void of offence, 1 Towards men. "Not for any injustice in my hands," any wealth that I have unjustly got or kept. Eliphaz had represented him as a tyrant and an oppressor. No, saith he, I never did any wrong to any man, but always despised the gain of oppression. 2. Towards God. "Also my prayer is pure," which it cannot be as long as there is injustice in our hands, Isa. i. 15. Eliphaz had charged him with hypocrisy in religion; but he instanceth in prayer, the great act of religion, and professeth that in that he was pure; though not from all infirmity, yet from reigning and allowed guile. It was not like the prayers of the Pharisees, who looked no farther than to be seen of men, and to serve a turn.

This assertion of his own integrity he backs with a solemn imprecation of shame and confusion to himself if it were not true, ver. 18. 1. If there were any injustice in his hands, he wishes it might not be concealed; "O earth, cover thou not my blood," that is, the innocent blood of others which I am suspected to have shed. Murder will out; and let it, saith Job, if I have ever been guilty of it, Gen. iv. 10, 11. The day is coming when the earth shall disclose her blood, Isa. xxvi. 21; and a good man is far from dreading that day. 2. If there were any impurity in his prayers, he wisheth they might not be accepted; "Let my cry have no place." He was willing to be judged by that rule, "If I regard iniquity in my heart, God will not hear me," Ps. lxvi. 18. There is another probable sense of these words, that he doth hereby, as it were, lay his death upon his friends, who broke his heart with their harsh censures, and chargeth the guilt of his blood upon them, begging of God to avenge it, and that the cry of his blood might have no place in which to lie hid, but might come up to heaven, and be heard by him that makes inquisition for blood.

Secondly. He could appeal to God's omniscience concerning his integrity, ver. 19. The witness in our own bosoms for us will stand us in little stead, if we have not a witness in heaven for us too; for God is greater than our hearts, and we are not to be our own judges: this, therefore, is Job's triumph, "My witness is in heaven." Note, It is an unspeakable comfort to a good man, when he lies under the censure of his brethren, that there is a God in heaven who knows his integrity, and will clear it up sooner or later: see Job v. 31, 37. This one Witness is instead of a thousand.

Thirdly. He had a God to go to, before whom he might unbosom himself ver. 20, 21. See here, 1. How the case stood between him and his friends; he knew not how to be free with them, nor could he expect either a fair hearing with them, or fair dealing from them. My friends (so they call themselves) scorn me; they set themselves not only to oppose me, but to expose me; they are of counsel against me, and use all their art and eloquence (so the word signifies) to run me down. The scorns of friends are more cutting than those of enemies; but we must expect them, and provide accordingly. 2. How it stood between him and God. He doubted not but that, 1st. God did now take cognizance of his sorrows; "Mine eye pours out tears to God." He had said, ver. 16, that he wept much; here he tells us in what channel his tears ran, and which way they were directed. His sorrow was not that of the world; but he sorrowed after a godly sort, wept before the Lord, and offered to him the sacrifice of a broken heart. Note, Even tears, when sanctified to God, give ease to troubled spirits; and, if men slight our grief, this may comfort us, that God regards them. 2nd. That he would in due time clear up his innocency; ver. 21, "O that one might plead for a man with God!" If he could but now have the same freedom at God's bar that men commonly have at the bar of the civil magistrate, he doubted not but to carry his cause; for the judge himself was a witness to his integrity. The language of this wish is, that, Isa. l. 7, 8, "I know that I shall not be ashamed, for he is near that justifies me." Some give a gospel sense of this verse, and the original will very well bear it; 'And he will plead' (that is, there is one that will plead) 'for man with God, even the Son of man for his friend,' or neighbour. Those who pour out tears before God, though they cannot plead for themselves, by reason of their distance and defects, have a friend to plead for them, even the Son of man; and on this we must bottom all our hopes of acceptance with God.

Fourthly. He had a prospect of death, which would put a period to all his troubles. Such confidence had he towards God, that he could take pleasure in thinking of the approach of death, when he should be determined to his everlasting state, as one that doubted not but it would be well with him then. "When a few years are come," the years of number which are determined and appointed to me, "then I shall go the way whence I shall not return." Note, 1. To die is to go the way whence we shall not return; it is to go a journey, a long journey, a journey for good and all; to remove from this to another country, from the world of sense to the world of spirits; it is a journey to our long home; there will be no coming back to our state in this world, nor any change of our state in the other world. 2. We must all of us very certainly, and very shortly, go this journey; and it is comfortable to those who keep a good conscience to think of it, for it is the crown of their integrity.

CHAPTER XVII.

In this chapter, I. Job reflects upon the harsh censures which his friends had passed upon him, and, looking upon himself as a dying man, ver. 1, he appeals to God, and begs of him speedily to appear for him and right him, because they had wronged him, and he knew not how to right himself, ver. 2—7; but hopes, though it be a surprise, it will be no stumblingblock to good people to see him thus abused, ver. 8, 9. II. He reflects upon the vain hopes they had fed him with, that he should yet see good days; shewing that his days were just at an end, and with his body all his hopes would be buried in the dust, ver. 10—16. His friends becoming strange to him, which greatly grieved him, he makes death and the grave familiar to him, which yielded him some comfort.

"moderate," but what is it which Job would moderate in verse 5? Perhaps he means that he would moderate or modify their grief, as suggested by our translators. If so, the reference is to consoling or strengthening, as some translate the word. In verse 6 we must put "if" for "though," because the Hebrew text requires it.

xvi. 8. For "thou hast filled me with wrinkles," the American Bible Union translate, "me hast thou seized;" Barnes, "thou hast compressed me;" the Greek, "thou hast taken hold of me," and this may be regarded as the preferable rendering, although our version is still received by some good scholars.

xvi. 10. The word "gathered" represents a Hebrew term, usually meaning "fill," and it has led to much discussion among critics; but the result has been to confirm the general accuracy of our version.

xvi. 13. For "archers" some, following the ancient translations, have "arrows," but others give "strong ones." We think the true sense is uncertain; but the English version is probably correct.

MY breath is corrupt,
My days are extinct,
The graves are ready for me.

Job's discourse here is somewhat broken and interrupted, and he passeth suddenly from one thing to another, as is usual with men in trouble. But we may reduce what is said here to three heads.

First. The deplorable condition which poor Job was now in, which he describes, to aggravate the great unkindness of his friends to him, and to justify his own complaints. Let us see what his case was.

1. He was a dying man, ver. 1. He had said, ch. xvi. 22, "When a few years are come," I shall go that long journey. But here he corrects himself: What! do I talk of years to come? alas, I am just setting out on that journey, am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand, "my breath is" already "corrupt," or broken off, "my spirits are spent." I am a gone man. It is good for every one of us thus to look upon ourselves as dying, and especially to think of it when we are sick. We are dying, that is, 1st. Our life is going, for the breath of life is going. It is continually going forth, it is in our nostrils, Isa. iii. 26, the door at which it entered, Gen. ii. 7; there it is upon the threshold, ready to depart. Perhaps Job's distemper obstructed his breathing, and short breath will be no breath after a while. Let the Anointed of the Lord be the breath of our nostrils, and let us get spiritual life breathed into us, and that breath will never be corrupted. 2nd. Our time is ending. "My days are extinct," are put out, as a candle which from the first lighting is continually wasting and burning down, and will by degrees burn out of itself, but may by a thousand accidents be extinguished. Such is life. It concerns us, therefore, carefully to redeem the days of time, and to spend them in getting ready for the days of eternity, which will never be extinct. 3rd. We are expected in our long home. "The graves are ready for me." But would not one grave serve? Yes; but he speaks of the sepulchres of his fathers, to which he must be gathered. The graves where they are laid are ready for me also; graves in concert, the congregation of the dead. Wherever we go, there is but a step between us and the grave. Whatever is unready, that is ready. It is a bed soon made. If the graves be ready for us, it concerns us to be ready for the graves. 'The graves for me,' so it runs; noting not only his expectation of death, but his desire of it. I have done with the world, and have nothing now to wish for but a grave.

2. He was a despised man; ver. 6, "He" (that is, Eliphaz, so some, or rather God, whom he all along acknowledgeth to be the author of his calamities,) "has made me a byword of the people," the talk of the country, a laughing-stock to many, a gazing-stock to all; "and aforetime" (or, to men's faces, publicly) "I was as a tabret," that who would might play upon. They made ballads of him; his name became a proverb, it is so still, As poor as Job. He has now made me a byword, a reproach of men, whereas aforetime, in my prosperity, I was as a tabret, 'the darling of the country,'—deliciæ humani generis, whom they were all pleased with. It is common for those who were honoured in their wealth to be despised in their poverty.

3. He was a man of sorrows, ver. 7. He wept so much that he had almost lost his sight; "Mine eye is dim by reason of sorrow," ch. xvi. 16. The sorrow of the world thus works darkness and death. He vexed so much that he had fretted all the flesh off his back, and was become a perfect anatomy, a skeleton, nothing but skin and bones: "All my members are as a shadow." I am grown so poor and thin that I am not to be called a man, but the shadow of a man.

Secondly. The ill use which his friends made of his miseries. They trampled upon him, and insulted over him, and condemned him as a hypocrite, because he was thus grievously afflicted. Hard usage! Now observe,

1. How Job describes it, and what construction he puts upon their discourses with him. He looks upon himself as basely abused by them. 1st. They abused him with their foul censures, condemning him as an ill man, justly reduced thus, and exposed to contempt; ver. 2, They are mockers that deride my calamities, and insult over me because I am thus brought low. They are so with me, abusing me to my face, pretending friendship in their visit, but intending mischief. I cannot get clear of them, they are continually tearing me; and they will not be wrought upon, either by reason or pity, to let fall the prosecution. 2nd. They abused him too with their fair promises, for in them they did but banter him; he reckons them, ver. 5, among those that speak flattery to their friends. They all came to mourn with him; Eliphaz began with a commendation of him, ch. iv. 3. They had all promised him how happy he should be if he would take their advice; now all this he looked upon as flattery, and designed to vex him so much the more. All this he calls their provocation, ver. 2. They did what they could to provoke him, and then condemned him for his resentment of it; but he thinks himself excusable when his eye continued thus in their provocation: it never ceased, and he could never look off it. Note, The unkindness of those that trample upon their friends in affliction, that banter and abuse them then, is enough to try, if not to tire, the patience even of Job himself.

2. How he condemns it. 1st. It was a sign that "God had hid their heart from understanding," ver. 4, and that in this matter they were infatuated, and their wonted wisdom was departed from them. Wisdom is a gift of God, which he grants to some and withholds from others; grants at some times and withholds at other times. Those that are void of compassion are so far void of understanding. Where there is not the tenderness of a man, one may question whether there be the understanding of a man. 2nd. It would be a lasting reproach and diminution to them; "Therefore shalt thou not exalt them." Those are certainly kept back from honour whose hearts are hid from understanding. When God befools men, he will abase them. Sure they who discover so little acquaintance with the methods of Providence shall not have the honour of deciding this controversy! That is reserved for a man of better sense and better temper; such a one as Elihu afterwards appeared to be. 3rd. It would entail a curse upon their families. He that thus violates the sacred laws of friendship forfeits the benefit of it, not only for himself, but for his posterity. "Even the eyes of his children shall fail;" and, when they look for succour and comfort from their own and their father's friends, they shall look in vain as I have done, and be as much disappointed as I am in you. Note, Those that wrong their neighbours may prove to wrong their own children more than they are aware of.

3. How he appeals from them to God; ver. 3, "Lay down now, put me in a surety with thee;" that is, Let me be assured that God will take the hearing and determining of the cause into his own hands, and I desire no more. Let some or other engage for God to bring on this matter. Thus they whose hearts condemn them not have confidence towards God, and can with humble and believing boldness beg of him to search and try them. Some make Job here to glance upon the mediation of Christ; for he speaks of a surety with God, without whom he durst not appear before God, nor try his cause at his bar; for, though his friends' accusations of him were utterly false, yet he could not justify himself before God but in a mediator. Our English Annotations give this reading of the verse, 'Appoint, I pray thee, my surety with thee,' namely, Christ, who is with thee in heaven, and hath undertaken to be my surety; let him plead my cause and stand up for me, and "who is he then that will strike upon mine hand?" that is, who dares then contend with me? who shall lay any thing to my charge if Christ be an advocate for me? Rom. viii. 32, 33. Christ is the surety of the better testament, Heb. vii. 22, a surety of God's appointing; and, if he undertake for us, we need not fear what can be done against us.

Thirdly. The good use which the righteous should make of Job's afflictions, both from God, from his enemies, and from his friends, ver. 8, 9. Observe here,

1. How the saints are described. 1st. They are upright men, honest and sincere, and that act from a steady principle, with a single eye. This was Job's own character, ch. i. 1; and probably he speaks of such upright men especially as had been his intimates and associates. 2nd. They are the innocent; not perfectly so, but it is what they aim at, and press towards. Sincerity is evangelical innocency; and they that are upright are said to be innocent from the great transgression, Ps. xix. 13. 3rd. They are the righteous, who walk in the way of righteousness. 4th. They have clean hands, kept clean from the gross pollutions of sin, and when spotted with infirmities washed with innocency, Ps. xxvi. 6.

2. How they should be affected with the account of Job's troubles. Great inquiry no doubt would be made concerning him, and every one would speak of him and his case, and what use will good people make of it?

1st. It will amaze them; "Upright men shall be astonied at this." They will wonder to hear that so good a man as Job should be so grievously afflicted, both in body, name, and estate; that God should lay his hand so heavy upon him, and that his friends, who ought to have comforted him, should add to his grief; that such a remarkable saint should be such a remarkable sufferer, and so useful a man laid aside in the midst of his usefulness. What shall we say to these things? Upright men, though satisfied in general that God is wise and holy in all he doth, yet cannot but be astonished at such dispensations of Providence; paradoxes which will not be unfolded till the mystery of God shall be finished.

2nd. It will animate them. Instead of being deterred from, and discouraged in, the service of God by the hard usage which this faithful servant of God met with, they shall be so much the more emboldened to proceed and persevere in it. That which was St. Paul's care, 1 Thes. iii. 3, was Job's, that no good man should be moved either from his holiness or his comfort by these afflictions; that none should for the sake hereof think the worse of the ways or work of God. And that which was St. Paul's comfort was his too, that the brethren in the Lord would wax confident by his bonds, Phil. i. 14. They would hereby be animated,

First. To oppose sin, and to confront the corrupt and pernicious inferences which evil men would draw from Job's sufferings, as that God has forsaken the earth, that it is in vain to serve him, and the like. "The innocent shall stir up himself against the hypocrite;" will not bear to hear this, Rev. ii. 2, but will withstand him to his face; will stir up himself to search into the meaning of such providences, and study these hard chapters that he may read them readily; will stir up himself to maintain religion's just but injured cause against all its opposers. Note, The boldness of the attacks which profane people make upon religion should sharpen the courage and resolution of its friends and advocates. It is time to stir when proclamation is made in the gate of the camp, "Who is on the Lord's side?" When vice is daring, it is no time for virtue to be sneaking.

Secondly. To persevere in religion. "The righteous, instead of drawing back, or so much as starting back, at this frightful spectacle, or standing still to deliberate whether he should proceed or no, (allude to 2 Sam. ii. 23,) "shall" with so much the more constancy and resolution "hold on his way," and press forward. Though in me he foresees bonds and afflictions abide him, yet none of those things shall move him, Acts xx. 24. Those who keep their eye upon heaven as their end, will keep their feet in the paths of religion as their way, whatever difficulties and discouragements they meet with in it.

Thirdly. In order thereunto to grow in grace. He will not only hold on his way notwithstanding, but will grow "stronger and stronger;" and by the sight of other good men's trials, and the experience of his own, he will be made more vigorous and lively in his duty, more warm and affectionate, more resolute and undaunted; and the worse others are, the better he will be. That which dismays others heartens him. The blustering wind makes the traveller gather his cloak the closer about him, and gird it the faster. They that are truly wise and good will be continually growing wiser and better. Proficiency in religion is a good sign of sincerity in it.

10 But as for you all, do ye return, and come now:
For I cannot find one wise man among you.
11 My days are past,
My purposes are broken off,
Even the thoughts of my heart.
12 They change the night into day:
The light is short because of darkness
13 If I wait, the grave is mine house:
I have made my bed in the darkness.

xvii. 3. "Lay down now," in the sense of deposit, or make a deposit by way of security; hence, give a security. Job knew that he could give no guarantee himself sufficient for the necessity of the case, he therefore doubles his entreaty: "Put down pledges now; be thou surety for me with thyself; who else will strike hands for me?" (Rodwell). Bishop Patrick understands the verse as a petition that God will judge the cause of Job, and appoint some one to see him righted. Delitzsch thinks Job implores God "to confirm the reality of his innocence in some way or other, by laying down a pledge," to provide him with a surety, and to take his part. "To strike hands" is to make an agreement; and the form is still practised.

xvii. 6. The second half of this verse is rendered very differently by many moderns, who take it to mean that Job's friends are accused of spitting at him. Barnes expresses it thus, "I am an object of scorn before their face;" and Rodwell, "I am become one in whose face they spit," which is a very probable translation.

14 I have said to corruption, Thou art my father:
To the worm, Thou art my mother, and my sister.
15 And where is now my hope?
As for my hope, who shall see it?
16 They shall go down to the bars of the pit,
When our rest together is in the dust

Job's friends had pretended to comfort him with the hopes of his return to a prosperous estate again; now here he shews,

First. That it was their folly to talk so; ver. 10, "Return, and come now," be convinced that you are in an error, and let me persuade you to be of my mind, for "I cannot find one wise man among you," that knows how to explain the difficulties of God's providence, or how to apply the consolations of his promises. Those do not go wisely about the work of comforting the afflicted who fetch their comforts from the possibility of their recovery and enlargement in this world, though that is not to be despaired of; but at the best it is uncertain, and if it should fail, as perhaps it may, the comfort built upon it will fail too. It is therefore our wisdom to comfort ourselves and others in distress with that which will not fail, the promise of God, his love and grace, and a well-grounded hope of eternal life.

Secondly. That it would be much more his folly to heed them; for,

1. All his measures were already broken, and he was full of confusion, ver. 11, 12. He owns he had in his prosperity often pleased himself, both with projects of what he should do, and prospects of what he should enjoy; but now he looked upon his days as past, and drawing towards a period, all those purposes were broken off, and those expectations dashed. He had had thoughts about enlarging his border, increasing his stock, and settling his children, and many pious thoughts, it is likely, of promoting religion in his country, redressing grievances, reforming the profane, relieving the poor, and raising funds perhaps for charitable uses; but all these thoughts of his heart were now at an end, and he should never have the satisfaction of seeing his designs effected. Note, The period of our days will be the period of all our contrivances and hopes for this world; but, if with full purpose of heart we cleave to the Lord, death will not break off that purpose. Job being thus put upon new counsels was under a constant uneasiness, ver. 12. The thoughts of his heart being broken, they changed the night into day and shortened the light. Some, in their vanity and riot, turn night into day, and day into night; but Job did so through trouble and anguish of spirit, which was a hindrance, 1st. To the repose of the night; keeping his eyes waking, so that the night was as wearisome to him as the day, and the tosses of the night tired him as much as the toils of the day. 2nd. To the entertainments of the day. The light of the morning is welcome, but by reason of his inward darkness the comfort of it is soon gone, and the day is to me as dismal as the black and dark night, Deu. xxviii. 67. See what reason we have to be thankful for that health and ease which enables us to welcome both the shadows of the evening and the light of the morning.

2. All his expectations from this world would very shortly be buried in the grave with him; so that it was a jest for him to think of such mighty things as they had flattered him with the hopes of, ch. iv. 19; viii. 21; xi. 17: Alas, you do but make a fool of me.

1st. He saw himself just dropping into the grave. A convenient house, an easy bed, and agreeable relations, are some of those things which we take satisfaction in in this world. Job expected not any of these above ground; all he felt, and all he had in view, was unpleasing and disagreeable; but under ground he expected them.

First. He counted upon no house but the grave; ver. 13, If I wait, if there be any place where I shall ever be easy again, it must be in the grave. I should deceive myself if I should count upon any outlet from my trouble but what death will give me. Nothing so sure as that. Note, In all our prosperity it is good to keep death in prospect. Whatever we expect, let us be sure to expect that; for that may prevent other things we expect, but nothing will prevent that. But see how he endeavours, not only to reconcile himself to the grave, but to recommend it to himself; It is my house. The grave is a house; to the wicked it is a prison house, ch. xxiv. 19, 20; to the godly it is Bethabara,—'a passage house' in their way home. It is my house; mine by descent, I am born to it, it is my father's house; mine by purchase, I have made myself obnoxious to it. We must, every one of us, shortly remove to this house, and it is our wisdom to provide accordingly; let us think of flitting, and send before to our long home.

Secondly. He counted upon no quiet bed but in the darkness; There, saith he, "I have made my bed." It is made, for it is ready, and I am just going to it. The grave is a bed; for we shall rest in it in the evening of our day on earth, and rise from it in the morning of our everlasting day, Isa. lvii. 2. Let this make good people willing to die, it is but going to bed. They are weary and sleepy, and it is time they were in their beds; why should they not go willingly when their Father calls? Nay, "I have made my bed," by preparation for it; have endeavoured to make it easy, by keeping conscience pure, by seeing Christ lying in this bed, and so turning it into a bed of spices, and by looking beyond it to the resurrection.

Thirdly. He counted upon no agreeable relations but what he had in the grave; ver. 14, "I have cried to corruption," that is, to the grave, where the body will corrupt, "Thou art my father," for our bodies were formed out of the earth; and "to the worms" there, "Ye are my mother and my sister," to whom I am allied, for man is a worm, and with whom I must be conversant, for the worms shall cover us, ch. xxi. 26. Job complained that his kindred were estranged from him, ch. xix. 13, 14; therefore here he claims acquaintance with other relations, that would stick to him when those disowned him. Note, 1*st.* We are all of us near akin to corruption and the worms. 2*nd.* It is, therefore, good to make ourselves familiar with them, by conversing much with them in our thoughts and meditations, which would very much help us above the inordinate love of life and fear of death.

2nd. He saw all his hopes from this world dropping into the grave with him; ver. 15, 16, Seeing I must shortly leave the world, "where is now my hope?" How can I expect to prosper, who do not expect to live? He is not hopeless, but his hope is not there where they would have it be. If in this life only he had hope, he were of all men most miserable. No; "as for my hope," that hope which I comfort and support myself with, "who shall see it?" It is something out of sight that I hope for, not things that are seen, that are temporal, but things not seen, that are eternal. What is his hope he will tell us, ch. xix. 25. Non est mortale quod opto, immortale peto,—'I seek not for that which perishes, but for that which abideth for ever.' But as for the hopes you would buoy me up with, they shall go down with me to the bars of the pit. You are dying men, and cannot make good your promises; I am a dying man, and cannot enjoy the good you promise: seeing, therefore, our rest will be together in the dust, let us all lay aside the thoughts of this world, and set our hearts upon another. We must shortly be in the dust, for dust we are, dust and ashes in the pit, under "the bars of the pit;" held fast there, never to loose the bands of death till the general resurrection. But we shall rest there, we shall rest together there. Job and his friends could not agree now, but they will both be quiet in the grave; the dust of that will shortly stop their mouths, and put an end to the controversy. Let the foresight of this cool the heat of all contenders, and moderate the disputers of this world.

CHAPTER XVIII.

In this chapter Bildad makes a second assault upon Job. In his first discourse, ch. viii., he had given him encouragement to hope that all should yet be well with him; but here, not a word of that: he is grown more peevish, and is so far from being convinced by Job's reasonings that he is but more exasperated. I. He sharply reproves Job as haughty, and passionate, and obstinate in his opinion, ver. 1—4. II. He enlargeth upon the doctrine he had before maintained, concerning the misery of wicked people, and the ruin that attends them, ver. 5—21. In which he seems all along to have an eye to Job's complaints of the miserable condition he was in, that he was in the dark, bewildered, ensnared, terrified, and hastening out of the world. Why this, saith Bildad, is the condition of a wicked man, and therefore thou art one.

THEN answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said,
2 How long will it be ere ye make an end of words?
Mark, and afterwards we will speak.
3 Wherefore are we counted as beasts,
And reputed vile in your sight?
4 He teareth himself in his anger:
Shall the earth be forsaken for thee?
And shall the rock be removed out of his place?

Bildad here shoots his arrows, even bitter words, against poor Job, little thinking that, though he was a wise and good man, yet in this instance he was serving Satan's design in adding to his affliction.

First. He charges him with idle, endless talk, as Eliphaz had done, ch. xv. 2, 3; "How long will it be ere ye make an end of words?" ver. 2. Here he reflects not only upon Job himself, but either upon all the managers of the conference, thinking, perhaps, that Eliphaz and Zophar did not speak so close to the purpose as they might have done, or upon some that were present, who possibly took part with Job, and put in a word now and then in his favour, though it be not recorded. Bildad was weary of hearing others speak, and impatient till it came to his turn, which cannot be observed to any man's praise, for we ought to be swift to hear and slow to speak. It is common for contenders to monopolize the reputation of wisdom, and then to insist upon it as their privilege to be dictators. How unbecoming that is in others every one can see, but few that are guilty of it can see it in themselves. Time was when Job had the last word in all debates; ch. xxix. 22, "After my words they spake not again." Then he was in power and prosperity; but, now he was impoverished and brought low, he could scarce be allowed to speak at all, and every thing he said was as much vilified as formerly it had been magnified. "Wisdom," therefore, as the world goes, "is good with an inheritance," Eccl. vii. 11; for "the poor man's wisdom is despised," and because he is poor "his words are not heard," Eccl. ix. 16.

Secondly. With a regardlessness of what was said to him, intimated in that, "Mark, and afterwards we will speak." And it is to no purpose to speak, though what is said be never so much to the purpose, if those to whom it is spoken will not mark and observe it. Let the ear be opened to hear as the learned, and then the tongues of the learned will do good service, Isa. l. 4, and not otherwise. It is an encouragement to those that speak of the things of God to see the hearers attentive.

Thirdly. With a haughty contempt and disdain of his friends, and of that which they offered; ver. 3, "Wherefore are we counted as beasts?" This was invidious. Job had indeed called them mockers, had represented them both as unwise and as unkind, wanting both in the reason and tenderness of men; but he did not count them beasts, yet Bildad so represents it, 1. Because his high spirit resented what Job had said, as if it had been the greatest affront imaginable. Proud men are apt to think themselves slighted more than really they are. 2. Because his hot spirit was willing to find a pretence to be hard upon Job. Those that incline to be severe upon others will have it thought that they have first been so upon them.

Fourthly. With outrageous passion; "He teareth himself in his anger," ver. 4. Herein he seems to reflect upon what Job had said, ch. xiii. 14, "Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth?" It is thine own fault, saith Bildad; or upon what he said, ch. xvi. 9, where he seemed to charge it upon God, or, as some think, upon Eliphaz, "He teareth me in his wrath;" No, saith Bildad, thou alone shalt bear it. "He teareth himself in his anger." Note, Anger is a sin that is its own punishment. Fretful, passionate people tear and torment themselves. He teareth his soul, so the word is; every sin wounds the soul, tears that, wrongs that, Pr. viii. 36; unbridled passion particularly.

Fifthly. With a proud and arrogant expectation to give law even to Providence itself; "Shall the earth be forsaken for thee?" No, sure, there is no reason for that, that the course of nature should be changed, and the settled rules of government violated to gratify the humour of one man. Job, dost thou think the world cannot stand without thee? but that, if thou art ruined, all the world is ruined and forsaken with thee? Some make it a reproof of Job's justification of himself, falsely insinuating that either Job was a wicked man or we must deny a Providence, and suppose that God has forsaken the earth, and the Rock of ages is removed. It is rather a just reproof of his passionate complaints. When we quarrel with the events of Providence, we forget that whatever befalls us it is, 1. According to the eternal purpose and counsel of God. 2. According to the written Word. Thus it is written, that in the world we must have tribulation; that, since we sin daily, we must expect to smart for it. And, 3. According to the usual way and custom, the track of Providence, nothing but what is common to men; and to expect that God's counsels should change, his method alter, and his Word fail to please us, is as absurd and unreasonable as to think that "the earth should be forsaken for us, and the rock removed out of its place."

5 Yea, the light of the wicked shall be put out,
And the spark of his fire shall not shine.
6 The light shall be dark in his tabernacle,
And his candle shall be put out with him.

xvii. 10. Mr. Henry thinks the change or turn indicates that Job's friends had made a show of comforting him. Renan supposes that they had been irritated by his vehemence of speech and manner, and had made as if they would leave him. Others, on the contrary, think that Job merely invites them to return to the attack, and to reprove him again. Job may simply mean that if they should renew the attack, he should still fail to discover a wise man among them.

xvii. 16. The Hebrew is not "they shall go down," but "it shall go down," that is, the hope mentioned in the verse before. The following words are "to the bars of Sheol," where "bars" denote the fastenings; and the idea is of a place barred or fastened, so that escape is precluded; in other words, the prison of the grave. The second clause may possibly mean "we shall rest together in the dust," but more probably the sense simply is "there is rest altogether in the dust." Some understand Job to mean that when his hope is buried, he shall at the same time find rest in the dust.

7 The steps of his strength shall be straitened,
And his own counsel shall cast him down.
8 For he is cast into a net by his own feet,
And he walketh upon a snare.
9 The gin shall take him by the heel,
And the robber shall prevail against him.
10 The snare is laid for him in the ground,
And a trap for him in the way.

The rest of Bildad's discourse is entirely taken up in an elegant description of the miserable condition of a wicked man, in which there is a great deal of certain truth, and which will be of excellent use if duly considered; that a sinful condition is a sad condition, and that iniquity will be men's ruin if they do not repent of it. But, 1. It is not true that all wicked people are visibly and openly made thus miserable in this world; nor, 2. That all who are brought into great distress and trouble in this world are therefore to be deemed and adjudged wicked men, though no other proof appears against them; and therefore, though Bildad thought the application of it to Job was easy, yet it was not safe, nor just. In these verses we have,

First. The destruction of the wicked foreseen and foretold, under the similitude of darkness; ver. 5, 6, "Yea, the light of the wicked shall be put out." Even his light, the best and brightest part of him, shall be put out; even that which he rejoiced in shall fail him. Or, the "Yea" may refer to Job's complaints of the great distress he was in, and the darkness he should shortly make his bed in. "Yea," saith Bildad, so it is; thou art clouded, and straitened, and made miserable, and no better could be expected, for "the light of the wicked shall be put out," and therefore thine shall. Observe here, 1. The wicked may have some light for a while, some pleasure, some joy, some hope within, as well as wealth, and honour, and power without. But his light is but a spark, ver. 5, a little thing, and soon extinguished. It is but a candle, ver. 6, wasting and burning down, and easily blown out. It is not the light of the Lord, that is sun-light, but the light of his own fire, and sparks of his own kindling, Isa. l. 11. That light will certainly be put out at length, quite put out, so that not the least spark of it shall remain with which to kindle another fire. Even while he is in his tabernacle, while he is in the body, which is the tabernacle of the soul, 2 Cor. v. 1, the light shall be dark, he shall have no true, solid comfort, no joy that is satisfying, no hope that is supporting; even the light that is in him is darkness, and how great is that darkness! But, when he is put out of this tabernacle by death, "his candle shall be put out with him." The period of his life will be the final period of all his days, and will turn all his hopes into endless despair. "When a wicked man dies, his expectation shall perish," Pr. xi. 7. "He shall lie down in sorrow."

Secondly. The preparatives for that destruction represented under the similitude of a beast or bird caught in a snare, or a malefactor arrested and taken into custody, in order to his punishment, ver. 7—10.

1. Satan is preparing for his destruction. He is "the robber that shall prevail against him," ver. 9; for, as he was a murderer, so was he a robber from the beginning. He, as the tempter, lays snares for sinners in the way, wherever they go, and he shall prevail. If he make them sinful like himself, he will make them miserable like himself. He "hunts for the precious life."

2. He is himself preparing for his own destruction, by going on in sin, and so treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath. God gives him up, as he deserves and desires, to his own counsels, and then his own counsels cast him down, ver. 7. His sinful projects and pursuits bring him to one mischief or other. He is "cast into a net by his own feet," ver. 8; runs upon his own destruction, is "snared in the work of his own hands," Ps. ix. 16; his "own tongue falls upon him," Ps. lxiv. 8. "In the transgression of an evil man there is a snare."

3. God is preparing for his destruction. The sinner, by his sin, is preparing the fuel, and then God, by his wrath, is preparing the fire. See here, 1st. How the sinner is infatuated to run himself into the snare; and whom God will destroy he befools. 2nd. How he is embarrassed. "The steps of his strength," his mighty designs and efforts, "shall be straitened," so that he shall not compass what he intended; and the more he strives to extricate himself the more will he be entangled. Evil men wax worse and worse. 3rd. How he is secured and kept from outrunning the judgments of God that are in pursuit of him; "The gin shall take him by the heel." He can no more escape the Divine wrath that is in pursuit of him than a man so held can flee from the pursuer. "God knows how to reserve the wicked for the day of judgment," 2 Pet. ii. 9.

11 Terrors shall make him afraid on every side,
And shall drive him to his feet.
12 His strength shall be hungerbitten,
And destruction shall be ready at his side.
13 It shall devour the strength of his skin:
Even the firstborn of death shall devour his strength.
14 His confidence shall be rooted out of his tabernacle,
And it shall bring him to the king of terrors.
15 It shall dwell in his tabernacle, because it is none of his:
Brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation.
16 His roots shall be dried up beneath,
And above shall his branch be cut off.
17 His remembrance shall perish from the earth,
And he shall have no name in the street.
18 He shall be driven from light into darkness,
And chased out of the world.
19 He shall neither have son nor nephew among his people,
Nor any remaining in his dwellings
20 They that come after him shall be astonied at his day,
As they that went before were affrighted.
21 Surely such are the dwellings of the wicked,
And this is the place of him that knoweth not God.

Bildad here describes the destruction itself which wicked people are reserved for in the other world, and which in some degree often seizeth them in this world. Come, and see what a miserable condition the sinner is in when his day comes to fall.

First. See him disheartened and weakened by continual terrors arising from the sense of his own guilt and the dread of God's wrath; ver. 11, 12, "Terrors shall make him afraid on every side." The terrors of his own conscience shall haunt him so that he shall never be easy; wherever he goes these shall dog him, which way soever he looks these shall stare him in the face. It will make him tremble to see himself fought against by the whole creation; to see Heaven frowning on him, hell gaping for him, and earth sick of him. He that carries his own accuser and his own tormentor always in his bosom cannot but be afraid on every side. This will drive him to his feet, like the malefactor, who, being conscious of his guilt, takes to his heels, and flies for the same, "flees when none pursues," Pr. xxviii. 1. But his feet will do him no service, they are fast in the snare, ver. 9. The sinner may as soon overpower the Divine omnipotence as overrun the Divine omniscience, Am. ix. 2, 3.

No marvel for the sinner to be dispirited and distracted with fear; for, 1. He sees his ruin approaching, "Destruction shall be ready at his side," to seize him whenever justice gives the word, so that he is brought into desolation in a moment, Ps. lxxiii. 19. 2. He feels himself utterly unable to grapple with it, either to escape it, or to bear up under it. That which he relied upon as his strength, his wealth, power, pomp, friends, and the hardiness of his own spirit, shall fail him in the time of need, and be hunger-bitten; that is, it shall do him no more service than a famished man pining away for hunger would do in work or war. The case being thus with him, no marvel that he is a terror to himself. Note, The way of sin is a way of fear, and leads to everlasting confusion, which the present terrors of an impure and unpacified conscience are earnests of, as they were to Cain and Judas.

Secondly. See him devoured and swallowed up by a miserable death; and miserable indeed a wicked man's death is, how secure and jovial soever his life was.

1. See him dying; arrested by "the firstborn of death," some disease, or some stroke that has in it a more than ordinary resemblance of death itself,—so great a death, as it is called, 2 Cor. i. 10; a messenger of death that has in it an uncommon strength and terror,—weakened by the harbingers of death, which "devour the strength of his skin;" that is, it shall bring rottenness into his bones, and consume them. "His confidence shall then be rooted out of his tabernacle," ver. 14; that is, all that he trusted to for his support shall be taken from him, and he shall have nothing to rely upon, no, not his own tabernacle. His own soul was his confidence; but that shall be rooted out of the tabernacle of the body, as a tree that cumbered the ground. "Thy soul shall be required of thee."

2. See him dead, and see his case then with an eye of faith. 1st. He is then "brought to the king of terrors." He was surrounded with terrors while he lived, ver. 11, and death was the king of all those terrors. They fought against the sinner in death's name, for it is by reason of death that sinners are all their lifetime subject to bondage, Heb. ii. 15; and at length they will be brought to that which they so long feared, as a captive to the conqueror. Death is terrible to nature,—our Saviour himself prayed, "Father, save me from this hour;" but to the wicked it is in a special manner the king of terrors, both as it is a period to that life in which they placed their happiness, and a passage to that life where they will find their endless misery. How happy, then, are the saints, and how much indebted to the Lord Jesus, by whom death is so far abolished, and the property of it altered, that this king of terrors is become a friend and servant! 2nd. He is then "driven from light into darkness," ver. 18. From the light of this world, and his prosperous condition in it, into darkness, the darkness of the grave, the darkness of hell; into utter darkness, never to see light, Ps. xlix. 19, not the least gleam, nor any hopes of it. 3rd. He is then "chased out of the world," hurried and dragged away by the messengers of death, sore against his will; chased as Adam out of Paradise, for the world is his Paradise. It intimates that he would fain stay here, he is loath to depart, but go he must All the world is weary of him, and therefore chaseth him out, as glad to be rid of him. This is death to a wicked man.

Thirdly. See his family sunk and cut off, ver. 15. The wrath and curse of God light and lie not only upon his head and heart, but upon his house too, to consume it with the timber and stones thereof, Zec. v. 4. Death itself shall dwell in his tabernacle, and, having expelled him, shall take possession of his house, to the terror and destruction of all that he leaves behind; even the dwelling shall be ruined for the sake of its owner, "brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation," rained upon it as upon Sodom, to the destruction of which this seems to have reference. And some think he here upbraids Job with the burning of his sheep and servants with fire from heaven. The reason is here given why his tabernacle is thus marked for ruin, "because it is none of his;" that is, it was unjustly got, and kept from the rightful owner, and therefore, let him not expect either the comfort or the continuance of it.

His children shall perish, either with him or after him, ver. 16. So that, "his roots" being in his own person "dried up beneath, above his branch" (every child of his family) "shall be cut off." Thus the houses of Jeroboam, Baasha, and Ahab were cut off; none that descended from them were left alive. They who take root in the earth may expect it will thus be dried up; but, if we be rooted in Christ, even our leaf shall not wither, much less shall our branch be cut off. Those who consult the true honour of their family, and the welfare of its branches, will be afraid of withering it by sin. The extirpation of the sinner's family is mentioned again, ver. 19, "He shall neither have son nor nephew," child nor grandchild, to enjoy his estate and bear up his name, nor shall there be any remaining in his dwelling akin to him. Sin entails a curse upon posterity, and the iniquity of the fathers is often visited upon the children. Herein also, it is probable, Bildad reflects upon the death of Job's children and servants, as a farther proof of his being a wicked man, whereas all that are written childless are not thereby written graceless; there is a name better than that of sons and daughters.

Fourthly. See his memory buried with him, or made odious. He shall either be forgotten or spoken of with dishonour; ver. 17, "His remembrance shall perish from the earth," and if it perish from thence it perisheth wholly, for it was never written in heaven, as the names of the saints are, Lu. x. 20. All his honour shall be laid and lost in the dust, or stained with perpetual infamy, so that "he shall have no name in the street," departing without being desired. Thus the judgments of God follow him after death in this world, as an indication of the misery his soul is in after death, and an earnest of that everlasting shame and contempt to which he shall rise in the great day. "The memory of the just is blessed; but the name of the wicked shall rot," Pr. x. 7.

Fifthly. See a universal amazement at his fall, ver. 20. They that see it are affrighted, so sudden is the change, so dreadful the execution, so threatening to all about him. And "they that come after," and hear the report of it, are xviii. 4. For "he teareth himself in his anger," some translate, "oh, thou that tearest thyself in thine anger!" and such a rendering may be justified: the Hebrew literally is, "one tearing his soul in his anger!" The speaker speaks abruptly, and omits "oh, thou who art," or some such phrase, which deliberateness requires. In like manner, the negative to the questions in this verse is omitted; and without pausing to say "no," or "on the contrary," Bildad goes on to declare that "the light of the wicked shall be put out," &c. The dismal array of calamities which rapidly pass before us to the end of the chapter, betoken the splendid genius of the writer, who introduces them in order to show more vividly how terribly the soul of Job was torn by his strange comforters. Bildad does not say to Job, "Thou art the man," but it is evident that he means as much; uttering condemnation instead of consolation, as comforters are apt to do.

xviii. 13. "The first-born of death" is a personification, meaning a most violent or deadly disease.

astonished at it; their ears are made to tingle, and their hearts to tremble, and they cry out, Lord, "how terrible art thou in thy judgments!" A place or person utterly ruined is said to be made an astonishment, Deu. xxviii. 37; 2 Chr. vii. 21; Jer. xxv. 9, 18. Horrible sins bring strange punishments.

Lastly. See all this averred as the unanimous sense of the patriarchal age, grounded upon their knowledge of God, and their many observations of his providence; ver. 21, "Surely such are the dwellings of the wicked," and "this is the place," this the condition, "of him that knows not God!" See here what is the beginning and what is the end of the wickedness of this wicked world. 1. The beginning of it is ignorance of God, and it is a wilful ignorance, for there is that to be known of him which is sufficient to leave them for ever inexcusable. They know not God, and then they go all to nought; Pharaoh knows not the Lord, and therefore will not obey his voice. 2. The end of it, and that is utter destruction. Such, so miserable, are the dwellings of the wicked. Vengeance will be taken of those that know not God, 2 Thess. i. 8; for those whom he has not honour from he will get him honour upon. Let us, therefore, stand in awe, and not sin, for it will certainly be bitterness in the latter end.

CHAPTER XIX.

This chapter is Job's answer to Bildad's discourse in the foregoing chapter. Though his spirit was grieved and much heated, and Bildad was very peevish, yet he gave him leave to say all he designed to say, and did not break in upon him in the midst of his argument; but, when he had done, gave him a fair answer, in which, I. He complains of unkind usage. And very unkindly he takes it, 1. That his comforters added to his affliction, ver. 2—7; 2. That his God was the author of his affliction, ver. 8—12; 3. That his relations and friends were strange to him, and shy of him in his affliction, ver. 13—19; 4. That he had no compassion shewed him in his affliction, ver. 20—22. II. He comforts himself with the believing hopes of happiness in the other world, though he had so little comfort in this, making a very solemn confession of his faith, with a desire it might be recorded as an evidence of his sincerity, ver. 23—27. III. He concludes with a caution to his friends not to persist in their hard censures of him, ver. 28, 29. If the remonstrance Job here makes of his grievances may serve sometimes to justify our complaints, yet his cheerful views of the future state, at the same time, may shame us Christians, and may serve to silence our complaints, or, at least, to balance them.

THEN Job answered and said,
2 How long will ye vex my soul,
And break me in pieces with words?
3 These ten times have ye reproached me: [me.
Ye are not ashamed that ye make yourselves strange to 4 And be it indeed that I have erred,
Mine error remaineth with myself.
5 If indeed ye will magnify yourselves against me,
And plead against me my reproach:
6 Know now that God hath overthrown me,
And hath compassed me with his net.
7 Behold, I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard:
I cry aloud, but there is no judgment.

Job's friends had passed a very severe censure upon him as a wicked man, because he was so grievously afflicted; now here he tells them how ill he took it to be so censured. Bildad had twice begun with a "How long," ch. xviii. 2; and therefore Job, being now to answer him particularly, begins with a "How long" too, ver. 2. What is not liked is commonly thought long; but Job had more reason to think them long who assaulted him than they had to think him long who only vindicated himself. Better cause may be shewn for defending ourselves, if we have right on our side, than for offending our brethren, though we have right on our side. Now observe here,

First. How he describes their unkindness to him, and what account he gives of it. 1. They vexed his soul, and that is more grievous than the vexation of the bones, Ps. vi. 2, 3. They were his friends; they came to comfort him, pretended to counsel him for the best; but with a great deal of gravity, and affectation of wisdom and piety, they set themselves to rob him of the only comfort he had now left him in a good God, a good conscience, and a good name; and this vexed him to the heart. 2. They broke him in pieces with words; and those were hard words sure, and very cruel ones, that would break a man to pieces. They grieved him, and so broke him; and, therefore, there will be a reckoning hereafter for all the hard speeches spoken against Christ and his people, Jude 15. 3. They reproached him, ver. 3; gave him an ill character, put him into an ill name, and laid to his charge things that he knew not. To an ingenuous mind reproach is a cutting thing. 4. They made themselves strange to him; were shy of him now he was in his troubles, took on them, they did not know him, ch. ii. 12, were not free with him as they used to be when he was in his prosperity. Those are governed by the spirit of the world, and not by any principles of true honour or love, who make themselves strange to their friends, or God's friends, when they are in trouble. A friend loves at all times. 5. They not only estranged themselves from him, but magnified themselves against him, ver. 5; not only looked shy of him, but looked big upon him, and insulted over him, magnifying themselves to depress him. It is a mean thing,—it is an ill thing,—thus to trample upon those that are down. 6. They pleaded against him his reproach; that is, they made use of his affliction as an argument against him, to prove him a wicked man. They should have pleaded for him his integrity, and helped him to take the comfort of that under his affliction, and so have pleaded that against his reproach, as St. Paul, 2 Cor. i. 12; but, instead of that, they pleaded his reproach against his integrity, which was not only unkind, but very unjust; for where shall we find an honest man, if reproach may be admitted for a plea against him?

Secondly. How he aggravates their unkindness. 1. They had thus abused him often; ver. 3, "These ten times ye have reproached me," that is, very often, as Gen. xxxi. 7; Num. xiv. 22. Five times they had spoken, and every speech was a double reproach. He spoke as if he had kept a particular account of their reproaches, and could tell just how many they were; and it is but a peevish and unfriendly thing to do so, and looks like a design of retaliation and revenge. We better befriend our own peace by forgetting injuries and unkindnesses, than by booking them and scoring them up. 2. They continued still to do it, and seemed resolved to persist in it. How long will ye do it? ver. 2, 5. I see you will magnify yourselves against me, notwithstanding all I have said in mine own justification. Many times those that speak too much yet never think they have said enough; and when the mouth is opened in passion the ear is shut to reason. 3. They were not ashamed of what they did, ver. 3. They had reason to be ashamed of their hard-heartedness, so ill becoming men,—and their uncharitableness, so ill becoming good men,—and their deceitfulness, so ill becoming friends. But were they ashamed? No; though they were told of it again and again, yet they could not blush.

Thirdly. How he answers their harsh censures, by shewing them that what they condemned was capable of excuse, which they ought to have considered.

1. The errors of his judgment were excusable; ver. 4, "Be it indeed that I have erred," that I am in the wrong through ignorance or mistake, which may well be supposed concerning men, concerning good men, humanum est errare,—'error cleaves to humanity,' and we must be willing to suppose it concerning ourselves. It is folly to think ourselves infallible. But be it so, saith Job, "mine error remaineth with myself," that is, I speak according to the best of my judgment, with all sincerity, and not from a spirit of contradiction. Or, if I be in an error, I keep it to myself, and do not impose it upon others as you do; I only prove myself and my own work by it; I meddle not with other people, either to teach them or to judge them. Men's errors are the more excusable if they keep them to themselves, and do not disturb others with them. "Hast thou faith? have it to thyself." Some give this sense of these words: 'If I be in an error, it is I that must smart for it, and therefore you need not concern yourselves. Nay, it is I that do smart, and smart severely for it, and therefore you need not add to my misery by your reproaches.'

2. The breakings out of his passion, though not justifiable, yet were excusable, considering the vastness of his grief, and the extremity of his misery. If you will go on to cavil at every complaining word I speak,—will make the worst of it, and improve it against me,—yet take the cause of the complaint along with you, and weigh that before you pass a judgment upon the complaint, and turn it to my reproach. "Know then that God has overcome me," ver. 6. Three things he would have them consider: 1st. That his trouble was very great. He was overthrown, and could not help himself; enclosed as in a net, and could not get out. 2nd. That God was the author of it, and that in it he fought against him. It was his hand that overthrew me; it is in his net that I am enclosed, and, therefore, you need not appear against me thus; I have enough to do to grapple with God's displeasure, let me not have yours also. Let God's controversy with me be ended for pity, before you begin yours. It is barbarous to persecute him whom God hath smitten, and talk to the grief of one whom he hath wounded, Ps. lxix. 26. 3rd. That he could not obtain any hope of the redress of his grievances, ver. 7. He complained of his pain, but got no ease; begged to know the cause of his affliction, but could not discover it; appealed to God's tribunal for the clearing of his innocency, but could not obtain a hearing, much less a judgment, upon his appeal. "I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard." God, for a time, may seem to turn away his ear from his people, to be angry at their prayers, and overlook their appeals to him, and they must be excused if in that case they complain bitterly. Woe unto us if God be against us.

8 He hath fenced up my way that I cannot pass,
And he hath set darkness in my paths.
9 He hath stripped me of my glory,
And taken the crown from my head.
10 He hath destroyed me on every side, and I am gone:
And mine hope hath he removed like a tree
11 He hath also kindled his wrath against me,
And he counteth me unto him as one of his enemies.
12 His troops come together,
And raise up their way against me,
And encamp round about my tabernacle.
13 He hath put my brethren far from me,
And mine acquaintance are verily estranged from me.
14 My kinsfolk have failed,
And my familiar friends have forgotten me.
15 They that dwell in mine house,
And my maids, count me for a stranger:
I am an alien in their sight.
16 I called my servant, and he gave me no answer;
I intreated him with my mouth.
17 My breath is strange to my wife, [body.
Though I intreated for the children's sake of mine own 18 Yea, young children despised me;
I arose, and they spake against me.
19 All my inward friends abhorred me:
And they whom I loved are turned against me
20 My bone cleaveth to my skin and to my flesh,
And I am escaped with the skin of my teeth.
21 Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O ye my friends;
For the hand of God hath touched me.
22 Why do ye persecute me as God,
And are not satisfied with my flesh?

Bildad had very disingenuously perverted Job's complaints, by making them the description of the miserable condition of a wicked man, and yet he repeats them here to move their pity, and to work upon their good nature, if they had any left in them.

First. He complains of the tokens of God's displeasure which he was under, and which infused the wormwood and gall into the affliction and misery. How doleful are the accents of his complaint! ver. 11, "He hath kindled his wrath xviii. 14. The favourite epithet of death, "the king of terrors," although derived from this verse, is objected to as a translation by many modern critics. Thus Gesenius says it means "terrors shall pursue him like a king," and that it is incorrect to translate "king of terrors." But with all deference to such an opinion, which is not followed by Furst, Delitzsch, Barnes, Rodwell, &c., we must plead for our old translation, as both more critical and more natural; in fact, that of Gesenius is grammatically inaccurate.

xviii. 19. For "nephew" some put "kinsman," and others "grandson." The phrase here translated "son nor nephew" really means "no progeny," and might be etymologically imitated by such a phrase as "sprig nor sprout," or "shoot nor offshoot."

xviii. 20. Barnes renders this, "The dwellers in the east shall be astonished at his day; they in the west shall be struck with horror." This opinion has been favoured by other expositors, but we think it is doubtful. The idea really intended seems to be that both younger against me," which flames and terrifies me, which burns and pains me. What is the fire of hell but the wrath of God? Seared consciences will feel it shortly, but do not fear it now. Enlightened consciences fear it now, but shall not feel it shortly. Job's present apprehension was, that God counted him as one of his enemies; and yet, at the same time, God loved him, and gloried in him as his faithful friend. It is a gross mistake, but a very common one, to think that whom God afflicts he treats as his enemies; whereas, on the contrary, "as many as he loves he rebukes and chastens." It is the discipline of his sons. Which way soever Job looked he thought he saw the tokens of God's displeasure against him.

1. Did he look back upon his former prosperity, he saw God's hand putting an end to that; ver. 9, "He has stripped me of my glory," my wealth, honour, power, and all the opportunity I had of doing good; my children were my glory, but I have lost them; and whatever was a crown to my head he has taken it from me, and has laid all mine honour in the dust. See the vanity of worldly glory; it is what we may be soon stripped of; and whatever strips us we must see and own God's hand in it, and comply with his design.

2. Did he look down upon his present troubles, he saw God giving them their commission, and their orders to attack him. They are his troops, that act by his direction, which encamp against me, ver. 12. It did not so much trouble him that his miseries came upon him in troops as that they were God's troops, in whom it seemed as if God fought against him, and intended his destruction. God's troops encamped round his tabernacle, as soldiers lay siege to a strong city, cutting off all provisions from being brought into it, and battering it continually. Thus was Job's tabernacle besieged. Time was when God's hosts encamped round him for his safety, "Hast thou not made a hedge about him?" Now, on the contrary, they surrounded him to his terror, and destroyed him on every side, ver. 10.

3. Did he look forward for deliverance, he saw the hand of God cutting off all hopes of that; ver. 8, "He hath fenced up my way that I cannot pass." I have now no way left to help myself, either to extricate myself out of my troubles, or to ease myself under them. Would I make any motion, take any steps towards deliverance, I find my way hedged up, I cannot do what I would; nay, if I would please myself with the prospect of a deliverance hereafter, I cannot do it; it is not only out of my reach, but out of my sight; God hath set darkness in my paths, and there is none to tell me how long, Ps. lxxiv. 9. He concludes, ver. 10, I am gone, quite lost and undone for this world; "my hope hath he removed like a tree," cut down, or plucked up by the roots, which will never grow again. Hope, in this life, is a perishing thing; but the hope of good men, when it is cut off from this world, is but removed like a tree,—transplanted from this nursery to the garden of the Lord. We shall have no reason to complain if God thus remove our hopes from the sand to the rock,—from things temporal to things eternal.

Secondly. He complains of the unkindness of his relations, and of all his old acquaintance. In this also he owns the hand of God; ver. 13, "He hath put my brethren far from me;" that is, he has laid those afflictions upon me which frighten them from me, and make them stand aloof from my sores. As it was their sin, God was not the author of it,—it is Satan that alienates men's minds from their brethren in affliction; but, as it was Job's trouble, God ordered it for the completing of his trial. As we must eye the hand of God in all the injuries we receive from our enemies,—the Lord has bidden Shimei curse David,—so also in all the slights and unkindnesses we receive from our friends, which will help us to bear them the more patiently. Every creature is that to us (kind or unkind, comfortable or uncomfortable,) which God makes it to be. Yet this doth not excuse Job's relations and friends from the guilt of horrid ingratitude and injustice to him, which he had reason to complain of. Few could have borne it so well as he did. He takes notice of the unkindness,

1. Of his kindred and acquaintance, his neighbours, and such as he had formerly been familiar with, who were bound, by all the laws of friendship and civility, to concern themselves for him, to visit him, and inquire after him, and to be ready to do him all the good offices that lay in their power; yet these were estranged from him, ver. 13; they took no more care about him than if he had been a stranger whom they never knew. His kinsfolk, that called him cousin, and claimed relation to him when he was in prosperity, now failed him; they came short of their former professions of friendship to him, and his present expectations of kindness from them. Even his familiar friends, whom he was mindful of, had now forgotten him; had forgotten both his former friendliness to them, and his present miseries. They had heard of his troubles, and designed him a visit, but truly they forgot it, so little affected were they with it. Nay, his inward friends, the men of his secret, whom he was most intimate with, and laid in his bosom, not only forgot him, but abhorred him, kept as far off him as they could, because he was poor and could not entertain them as he used to do, and because he was sore and a loathsome spectacle. Those whom he loved, and who, therefore, were worse than publicans if they did not love him now he was in distress, not only turned from him, but were turned against him, and did all they could to make him odious, so to justify themselves in being so strange to him, ver. 19. So uncertain is the friendship of men; but, if God be our friend, he will not fail us in a time of need. But let none that pretend either to humanity or Christianity ever use their friends as Job's friends used him. Adversity is the proof of friendship.

2. Of his domestics and family relations. Sometimes, indeed, we find that, beyond our expectation, there is a friend that sticks closer than a brother; but ordinarily the master of a family expects to be attended on, and taken care of, by those of his family, even then when, through weakness of body or mind, he is become despicable to others. But poor Job was misused by his own family, and some of his worst foes were those of his own house. He mentions not his children, they were all dead, and we may suppose that the unkindness of his surviving relations made him lament the death of his children so much the more. If they had been alive, would he think, I should have had comfort in them. As for those that were now about him, 1st. His own servants slighted him. His maids did not attend him in his illness, but "counted him for a stranger and an alien," ver. 15. His other servants never heeded him; if he called to them they would not come at his call, but took on them they did not hear him. If he asked them a question, they would not vouchsafe to give him an answer, ver. 16. Job had been a good master to them, and did not despise their cause when they pleaded with him, ch. xxxi. 13, and yet they were rude to him now, and despised his cause when he pleaded with them. We must not think it strange if we receive ill at the hand of those from whom we have deserved well. Though he was now sickly, yet he was not cross with his servants, and imperious, as is too common; but he intreated his servant with his mouth, when he had authority to command, and yet he would not be civil to him, neither kind nor just. Note, Those that are sick and in sorrow are apt to take things ill, and be jealous of a slight, and to lay to heart the least unkindness done to them. When Job was in affliction, even his servants' neglect of him troubled him.

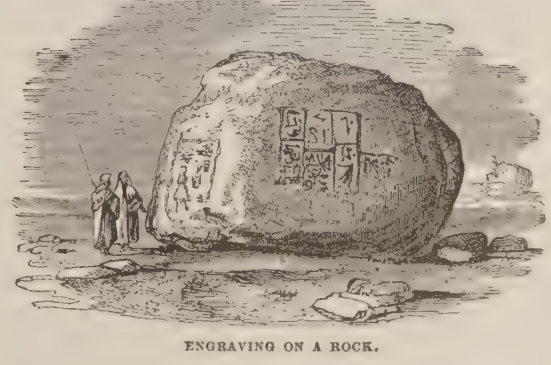
2nd. But one would think, when all forsook him, the wife of his bosom should have been tender of him. No; because he would not curse God and die, as she persuaded him, his breath was strange to her too; she did not care for coming near him, nor took any notice of what he said, ver. 17. Though he spoke to her, not with the authority, but with the tenderness of a husband,—did not command, but entreated her by that conjugal love which their children were the pledges of,—yet she regarded him not. Some read it, 'though I lamented,' or bemoaned myself for the children; that is, for the death of the children of my own body,—an affliction in which she was equally concerned with him. Now it appeared the devil spared her to him not only to be his tempter, but to be his tormenter. By what she said to him at first, "Curse God and die," it appeared she had little religion in her; and what can one expect that is kind and good from those that have not the fear of God before their eyes, and are not governed by conscience?

3rd. Even the little children that were born in his house, the children of his own servants, who were his servants by birth, despised him, and spake against him, ver. 18; though he arose in civility to speak friendly to them, or with authority to check them, they let him know, that they neither feared him nor loved him.



Thirdly. He complains of the decay of his body, all the beauty and strength of that was gone. When those about him slighted him, if he had been in health and at ease, he might have enjoyed himself. But he could take as little pleasure in himself as others took in him; ver. 20, "My bone cleaves" now "to my skin," as formerly it did to my flesh. This was it that filled him with wrinkles, ch. xvi. 8; he was a perfect skeleton, nothing but skin and bones. Nay, his skin too was almost gone; little remained unbroken but the skin of his teeth, his gums, and perhaps his lips, all the rest was fetched off by his sore boils. See what little reason we have to indulge the body, which, after all our care, may be thus consumed by the diseases which it has in itself the seeds of.

Lastly. Upon all these accounts he recommends himself to the compassion of his friends, and justly blames their harshness with him. From this remonstrance of his deplorable case it was easy to infer,

1. That they ought to pity him, ver. 21. This he begs in the most moving, melting language that could be, enough, one would think, to break a heart of stone: "Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O ye my friends." If you will do nothing else for me, be sorry for me, and shew some concern for me; "have pity upon me, for the hand of God hath touched me." My case is sad indeed, for I am fallen into the hands of the living God; my spirit is touched with the sense of his wrath, a calamity of all other the most piteous. Note, It becomes friends to pity one another when they are in any trouble, and not shut up the bowels of compassion.

2. That, however, they ought not to persecute him. If they would not ease his affliction by their pity, yet they must not be so barbarous as to add to it by their censures and reproaches; ver. 22, "Why do ye persecute me as God?" Sure his rebukes are enough for one man to bear; you need not add your wormwood and gall to the cup of affliction he puts into my hand, it is bitter enough without that. God has a sovereign power over me, and may do what he pleaseth with me; but do you think that you may do so too? No, we must aim to be like the Most Holy, and the Most Merciful, but not like the Most High, and Most Mighty. God gives not account of any of his matters, but we must. If they did delight in his calamity, let them be satisfied with his flesh, which was wasted and gone; but let them not, as if that were too little, wound his spirit, and ruin his good name. Great tenderness is owing to those that are in affliction, especially to those that are troubled in mind.

23 Oh that my words were now written!
Oh that they were printed in a book!
24 That they were graven with an iron pen
And lead in the rock for ever!

ENGRAVING ON A ROCK.

25 For I know that my redeemer liveth,
And that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth.
26 And though after my skin worms destroy this body,
Yet in my flesh shall I see God:
27 Whom I shall see for myself,
And mine eyes shall behold, and not another;
Though my reins be consumed within me.
28 But ye should say, Why persecute we him,
Seeing the root of the matter is found in me?
29 Be ye afraid of the sword:
For wrath bringeth the punishments of the sword,
That ye may know there is a judgment.

In all the conferences between Job and his friends we do not find any more weighty and considerable lines than these. Would one have expected it? Here is a great deal both of Christ and heaven in these verses; and he that said such things as these declared plainly that he sought the better country; that is, the heavenly, as the patriarchs of that age did, Heb. xi. 14. We have here Job's creed, or confession of faith. His belief in God the Father Almighty, and older men will be amazed and horrified. Mr. Henry and Bishop Patrick refer it to contemporaries and posterity.

xix. 3. The expression, "these ten times," gives a certain number for an uncertain one, and means "repeatedly."

xix. 12. Job represents his troubles by a bold figure—a host advancing, throwing up a raised way, and encamping round his dwelling, or rather his tent. He contrasts the magnitude of the preparations with the littleness of the object—an army laying siege to a tent!

xix. 20. "The skin of my teeth" is an expression which has been explained in many ways, all doubtful. But if we look at the whole verse, we may infer that as its first clause indicates that Job's body was wasted away, the second may denote that his property was all gone; he had escaped with the skin of his teeth; that is, with nothing.

xix. 23, 24. Of course the word "printed" is erroneous, although there is no doubt that the Assyrians stamped or impressed writing upon clay tablets, which have proved to be very durable records. From the maker of heaven and earth, and the principles of natural religion, he had often professed; but here we find him no stranger to revealed religion. Though the revelation of the promised Seed, and the promised inheritance, was then but discerned like the dawning of the day, yet Job was taught of God to believe in a living Redeemer, and to look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come, for of these, doubtless, he must be understood; these were the things he comforted himself with the expectation of, and not a deliverance from his trouble, or revival of his happiness in this world, as some would understand him. For, besides that the expressions he here useth of the Redeemer's standing at the latter day upon the earth, of his seeing God, and seeing him for himself, are wretchedly forced if they be understood of any temporal deliverance, it is very plain that he had no expectation at all of his return to a prosperous condition in this world. He had just now said, that his way was fenced up, ver. 8, and his hope removed like a tree, ver. 10. Nay, and after this he expressed his despair of any comfort in this life, ch. xxiii. 8, 9; xxx. 23; so that we must necessarily understand him of the redemption of his soul from the power of the grave, and his reception to glory, which is spoken of, Ps. xlix. 15. We have reason to think that Job was just now under an extraordinary impulse of the blessed Spirit, which raised him above himself, gave him light, and gave him utterance, even to his own surprise. And some observe, that after this we do not find in Job's discourses such passionate, peevish, unbecoming complaints of God and his providence as we have before met with. This hope quieted his spirit, stilled the storm; and, having here cast anchor within the veil, his mind kept steady from this time forward. Let us observe,

First. To what intent Job makes this confession of his faith here; never did any thing come in more pertinently, or to better purpose. 1. Job was now accused, and this was his appeal. His friends reproached him as a hypocrite, and contemned him as a wicked man; but he appeals to his creed, to his faith, to his hope, and to his own conscience, which not only acquitted him from reigning sin, but comforted him with the expectation of a blessed resurrection; "These are not the words of him that has a devil." He appeals to the coming of the Redeemer; from this wrangle at the bar to the judgment of the bench, even to him to whom all judgment is committed, who he knew would right him. The consideration of God's day coming will make it a very small thing with us to be judged of man's judgment, 1 Cor. iv. 3, 4. How easily may we bear the unjust calumnies and reproaches of men while we expect the glorious appearance of our Redeemer and his redeemed at the last day, and that there will then be a resurrection of names as well as bodies. 2. Job was now afflicted, and this was his cordial,—when he was pressed above measure, this kept him from fainting,—he believed that he should "see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living;" not in this world, for that is the land of the dying.

Secondly. With what a solemn preface he introduceth it, ver. 23, 24. He breaks off his complaints abruptly to triumph in his comforts, which he doth, not only for his own satisfaction, but for the edification of others. Those now about him he feared would little regard what he said, and so it proved; he therefore wished it might be recorded for the generations to come. "O that my words were now written!" the words I am now about to say; as if he should say, 'I own I have spoken many unadvised words, which I could wish might be forgotten, for they will neither do me credit, nor do others good. But I am now going to speak deliberately, and that which I desire may be published to all the world, and preserved for the generations to come, in perpetuam rei memoriam,—'for an abiding memorial,' and therefore that it may be written plain, and printed, or drawn out in large and legible characters, so that he that runs may read it, and that it may not be left in loose papers, but put into a book; or, if that should perish, that it may be engraven like an inscription upon a monument, "with an iron pen in lead," or in the stone; let the engraver use all his art to make it durable, and a lasting appeal to posterity. That which Job here somewhat passionately wished for, God graciously granted him; his words are written, they are printed in God's book, so that wherever that book is read there shall this be told for a memorial concerning Job, He believed, therefore he spoke.

Thirdly. What his confession itself is; what are the words which he would have to be written. We here have them written, ver. 25—27; let us observe them.

1. He believes the glory of the Redeemer, and his own interest in him; ver. 25, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," he is in being, and is my life, "and that he shall stand" at last, or stand the last, or "at the latter day upon (or above) the earth." He shall be raised up, or, He shall be (at the latter day, that is, in the fulness of time,—the gospel day is called the last time, because that is the last dispensation) upon the earth: so it points at his incarnation. Or, He shall be lifted up from the earth: so it points at his crucifixion. Or, Raised up out of the earth: so it is applicable to his resurrection. Or, as we commonly understand it, At the end of time he shall appear over the earth, for "he shall come in the clouds, and every eye shall see him," so close shall he come to this earth. He shall stand upon the dust, so the word is, upon all his enemies, which shall be put as dust under his feet, and he shall tread upon them, and triumph over them.

Observe here, 1st. That there is a Redeemer provided for fallen man, and Jesus Christ is that Redeemer. The word is goel, which is used for the next of kin, to whom, by the law of Moses, the right of redeeming a mortgaged estate did belong, Lev. xxv. 25. Our heavenly inheritance was mortgaged by sin, we are ourselves utterly unable to redeem it; Christ is near of kin to us, the next kinsman that is able to redeem: he has paid our debts, satisfied God's justice for sin, and so has taken off the mortgage, and made a new settlement of the inheritance. Our persons also want a Redeemer; we are sold for sin, and sold under sin: our Lord Jesus has wrought out a redemption for us, and proclaims a redemption to us, and so he is truly the Redeemer. 2nd. He is a living Redeemer. As we are made by a living God, so we are saved by a living Redeemer, who is both almighty and eternal, and is therefore able to save to the uttermost. "Of him it is witnessed that he liveth," Heb. vii. 8; Rev. i. 18. We are dying, but he liveth, and hath assured us that "because he lives, we shall live also," Jno. xiv. 19. 3rd. There are those that through grace have an interest in this Redeemer, and can upon good grounds call him theirs. When Job had lost all his wealth and all his friends, yet he was not separated from Christ, nor cut off from his relation to him; still he is "my Redeemer." That next kinsman stuck to him when all his other kindred forsook him, and he had the comfort of it. 4th. Our interest in the Redeemer is a thing that may be known; and where it is known may be triumphed in, as sufficient to balance all our griefs. "I know,"—observe with what an air of assurance he speaks it, as one confident of this very thing,—"I know that my Redeemer lives." His friends had often charged him with ignorance or vain knowledge; but he knows enough, and knows to good purpose, who knows Christ to be his Redeemer. 5th. There will be a latter day, a last day, a day when time shall be no more, Rev. x. 6. That is a day we are concerned to think of every day. 6th. Our Redeemer will at that day stand upon the earth, or over the earth, to summon the dead out of their graves, and determine to them an unchangeable state, for to him all judgment is committed. He shall stand the last on the dust to which this earth will be reduced by the conflagration.

2. He believes the happiness of the redeemed, and his own title to that happiness, that at Christ's second coming believers shall be raised up in glory, and so made perfectly blessed in the vision and fruition of God, and this he believes with application to himself.

1st. He counts upon the corrupting of his body in the grave, and speaks of it with a holy carelessness and unconcernedness; "Though after my skin" (which is already wasted and gone, none of it remaining but the skin of my teeth, ver. 20) "they destroy" (they that are appointed to destroy it, the grave, and the worms in it, of whom he had spoken, ch. xvii. 14) "this body." The word body is added. Though they destroy this, this skeleton, this shadow, ch. xvii. 7, this that I lay my hand upon,—or, pointing perhaps to his weak and withered limbs, this that you see, call it what you will,—I expect that shortly it will be a feast for the worms. Christ's body saw not corruption, but ours must. And Job mentions this that the glory of the resurrection he believed and hoped for might shine the more bright. Note, It is good for us often to think, not only of the approaching death of our bodies, but of their destruction and dissolution in the grave; yet let not that discourage our hope of their resurrection, for the same power that made man's body at first out of common dust can raise it out of its own dust. This body we now take such care about, and make such provision for, will in a little time be destroyed; even "my reins," saith Job, "shall be consumed within me," ver. 27; the innermost part of the body, which perhaps putrefies first.

2nd. He comforts himself with the hopes of happiness on the other side death and the grave. 'After I shall awake,' (so the margin reads it,) 'though this body be destroyed, yet out of my flesh shall I see God.'

First. Soul and body shall come together again. That body which must be destroyed in the grave shall be raised again a glorious body, "yet in my flesh I shall see God." The separate soul has eyes wherewith to see God, eyes of the mind; but Job speaks of seeing him with eyes of flesh; In my flesh, with mine eyes. The same body that died shall rise again, a true body, but a glorified body, fit for the employments and entertainments of that world, and therefore a spiritual body, 1 Cor. xv. 44. Let us therefore glorify God with our bodies, because there is such a glory designed for them.

Secondly. Job and God shall come together again; "In my flesh shall I see God;" that is, the glorified Redeemer, who is God. 'I shall see God in my flesh,' so some read it: the Son of God clothed with a body which will be visible even to eyes of flesh. Though the body in the grave seem despicable and miserable, yet it shall be dignified and made happy in the vision of God. Job now complained that he could not get a sight of God, ch. xxiii. 8, 9, but hopes to see him shortly, never more to lose the sight of him; and that sight of him will be the more welcome after the present darkness and distance. Note, It is the blessedness of the blessed that they shall see God, shall see him as he is, see him face to face, and no longer through a glass darkly. See with what pleasure holy Job enlargeth upon this, ver. 27, "Whom I shall see for myself;" that is, see and enjoy, see to my own unspeakable comfort and satisfaction. I shall see him as mine, as mine with an appropriating sight; Rev. xxi. 3, "God himself shall be with them, and be their God;" they shall be like him, for they shall see him as he is, that is seeing for themselves, 1 Jno. iii. 3. "Mine eyes shall behold him, and not another." 1st. He, and not another for him, shall be seen; not a type or figure of him, but he himself. Glorified saints are perfectly sure that they are not imposed upon; it is no deceptio visus,—'illusion of the senses.' 2nd. I, and not another for me, shall see him. Though my flesh and body be consumed, yet I shall not need a proxy, I shall see him with my own eyes. This is what Job hoped for, and what he earnestly desired, which some think is the meaning of the last clause, 'My reins are spent in my bosom;' that is, all my desires are summed up and concluded in this, this will crown and complete them all; let me have this, and I shall have nothing more to desire; it is enough, it is all. With this the prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended.

Fourthly. The application of this to his friends. His creed spoke comfort to himself, but warning and terror to them that set themselves against him.

1. It was a word of caution to them not to proceed and persist in their unkind usage of him, ver. 28. He had reproved them for what they had said, and now tells them what they should say for the reducing of themselves and one another to a better temper. "Why persecute we him thus?" Why do we grieve him and vex him by censuring and condemning him, "seeing the root of the matter," or the root of the Word, "is found in him?" Let this direct us, 1st. In our care concerning ourselves. We are all concerned to see to it, that the root of the matter be found in us. A living, quickening, commanding principle of grace in the heart is the root of the matter, as necessary to our religion as the root to the tree, to which it owes both its fixedness and its fruitfulness. Love to God and our brethren, faith in Christ, hatred of sin, this is the root of the matter; other things are but leaves in comparison with this: serious godliness is the one thing needful. 2nd. In our carriage towards our brethren. We are to believe that many have the root of the matter in them who are not in every thing of our mind, who have their follies, and weaknesses, and mistakes; and, to conclude, it is at our peril if we persecute any such. Woe be to him that offends one of those little ones, God will resent and revenge it. Job and his friends differed in some notions concerning the methods of providence, but they agreed in the root of the matter, the belief of another world, and therefore should not persecute one another for these differences.

2. It was a word of terror to them. Christ's second coming will be very dreadful to those that are found smiting their fellow-servants, Mat. xxiv. 49; and therefore, ver. 29, "Be ye afraid of the sword," the flaming sword of God's justice, which turns every way; fear lest you make yourselves obnoxious to it. Good men need to be frightened from sin by the terrors of the Almighty, particularly from the sin of rashly judging their brethren, Mat. vii. 1; Jas. iii. 1. Those that are peevish and passionate with their brethren, censorious of them, and malicious towards them, let them know, not only that their wrath, whatever it pretends, works not the righteousness of God, but, 1st. They may expect to smart for it in this world; it brings the punishments of the sword. Wrath leads to such crimes as expose men to the sword of the magistrate; however, God often takes vengeance for it, and those that shewed no mercy shall find no mercy. 2nd. If they repent not, that will be an earnest of worse. By these you may know there is a judgment, not only a present government, but a future judgment, in which hard speeches must be accounted for.

CHAPTER XX.

One would have thought that such an excellent confession of faith as Job made in the close of the foregoing chapter should have satisfied his friends, or, at least, have mollified them; but they do not seem to have taken any notice of it, and therefore Zophar here takes his turn, enters the lists with Job, and attacks him with as much vehemence as before. I. His preface is short, but hot, ver. 2, 3. II. His discourse is long, and all upon one subject; the very same that Bildad was large upon, ch. xviii.: the certain misery of wicked people, and the ruin that awaits them: 1. He asserts in general that the prosperity of the wicked is short, and their ruin sure, ver. 4—9; 2. He proves the misery of his condition by many instances: that he shall have a diseased body, a troubled conscience, a ruined estate, a beggared family, an infamous the various expressions used in these verses we may infer that inscriptions were made in different ways; indeed, we know that writing, stamping, and engraving were all very early practised. The iron pen would be, not a pen to write with, but a graver; the lead would either be the substance engraven upon, or used for filling up the incisions made in the stone by means of the iron graving tool. In Egypt, in Assyria, and in the Arabian desert, as well as in other ancient centres of civilisation, inscriptions dating from a very remote period still exist. With respect to those in the Sinaitic wilderness, which some have thought were made as far back as the time of Moses, it is now generally admitted that they are much more recent.

xix. 25—29. Upon the interpretation of these verses a vast amount of labour has been expended. It is impossible, in the compass of a brief note, to mention the various explanations which have been proposed, but some of them are enumerated on page 101.

xx. 3. When Zophar says, "I have heard the check of my reproach," name, and he himself shall perish under the weight of Divine wrath. All this is most curiously described here in lofty expressions, and lively similitudes; and it often proves true in this world, and always in another, without repentance, ver. 10—29. But the great mistake was, and, as Bishop Patrick expresseth it, all the flaw in his discourse,—which was common to him with the rest,—that he imagined God never varied from this method; and therefore Job was, without doubt, a very bad man, though it did not appear he was, any other way but by his infelicity.

THEN answered Zophar the Naamathite, and said,
2 Therefore do my thoughts cause me to answer,
And for this I make haste
3 I have heard the check of my reproach,
And the spirit of my understanding causeth me to answer.
4 Knowest thou not this of old,
Since man was placed upon earth,
5 That the triumphing of the wicked is short,
And the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment?
6 Though his excellency mount up to the heavens,
And his head reach unto the clouds;
7 Yet he shall perish for ever like his own dung:
They which have seen him shall say, Where is he?
8 He shall fly away as a dream, and shall not be found:
Yea, he shall be chased away as a vision of the night.
9 The eye also which saw him shall see him no more;
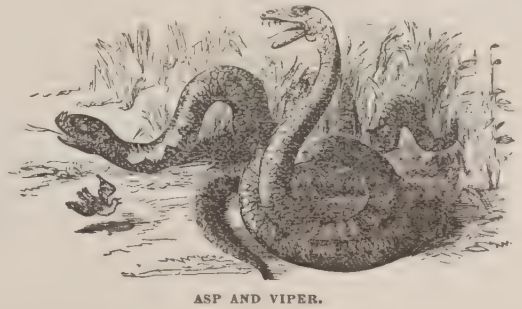
Neither shall his place any more behold him.

Here, First. Zophar begins very passionately, and seems to be in a great heat at what Job had said. Being resolved to condemn Job for an ill man, he was much displeased that he talked so like a good man, and as it should seem, broke in upon him and began abruptly; ver. 2, "Therefore do my thoughts cause me to answer." He takes no notice of what Job had said to move their pity, or to evidence his own integrity, but fastens upon the reproof he gave them in the close of his discourse, counts that a reproach; and, thinks himself therefore obliged to answer, because Job had bidden them be afraid of the sword, that he might not seem to be frightened by his menaces. The best counsel is too often ill taken from an antagonist, and therefore usually may be as well spared. Zophar seemed more in haste to speak than became a wise man, but he excuseth it with two things: 1. That Job had given him a strong provocation, ver. 3, "I have heard the check of my reproach," and cannot bear to hear it any longer. Job's friends, I doubt, had spirits too high to deal with a man in his low condition; and high spirits are impatient of contradiction, but think themselves affronted if all about them do not say as they say. They cannot bear a check, but they call it the check of their reproach; and then they are bound in honour to return it, if not to draw upon him that gave it. 2. That his own heart gave him a strong instigation. His thoughts caused him to answer, ver. 2, for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks; but he fathers it, ver. 3, upon "the spirit of his understanding." That, indeed, should cause us to answer; we should rightly apprehend a thing, and duly consider it before we speak to it; but whether it did so here or no is a question. Men often mistake the dictates of their passion for the dictates of their reason, and therefore think they do well to be angry.

Secondly. Zophar proceeds very plainly to shew the ruin and destruction of wicked people, insinuating that, because Job was destroyed and ruined, he was certainly a wicked man and a hypocrite. Observe,

1. How this doctrine is introduced, ver. 4, where he appeals, 1st. To Job's own knowledge and conviction, "Knowest thou not this?" Canst thou be ignorant of a truth so plain? or canst thou doubt of a truth which has been confirmed by the suffrage of all mankind? Those know little who do not know that the wages of sin is death. 2nd. To the experience of all ages. It was known of old since man was placed upon the earth, that is, ever since man was made, he has had this truth written in his heart, that the sin of sinners will be their ruin; and ever since there were instances of wickedness (which there were soon after man was placed on the earth) there were instances of the punishments of it: witness the exclusions of Adam and Cain. When sin entered into the world, death entered with it. All the world knows that evil pursues sinners, that vengeance suffers not to live, Acts xxviii. 4; and subscribes to that, Isa. iii. 11, "Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with him," sooner or later.



2. How it is laid down; "That the triumphing of the wicked is short, and the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment." Observe, 1st. He asserts the misery not only of those that are openly wicked and profane, but of hypocrites, who secretly practise wickedness under a show and profession of religion; because such a wicked man he looked upon Job to be: and it is true, that a form of godliness, if it be made use of for a cloak of maliciousness, doth but make ill worse. Dissembled piety is double iniquity, and the ruin that attends it will be accordingly. The hottest place in hell will be the portion of hypocrites, as our Saviour intimates, Mat. xxiv. 51. 2nd. He grants that wicked men may for a time prosper, may be secure and easy, and very merry. You may see them in triumph and joy, triumphing and rejoicing in their wealth and power, their grandeur and success; triumphing and rejoicing over their poor honest neighbours, whom they vex and oppress. They feel no evil, they fear none. Job's friends were loath to own at first that wicked people might prosper at all, ch. iv. 9, till Job proved it plainly, ch. ix. 24; xii. 6; and now Zophar yields it. But, 3. He lays it down for a certain truth that they will not prosper long. Their joy is but for a moment, and will quickly end in endless sorrow. Though he be never so great, and rich, and jovial, he will be humbled, and mortified, and made miserable.

3. How it is illustrated, ver. 6, &c.

1st. He supposeth his prosperity to be very high, as high as you can imagine, ver. 6. It is not his wisdom and virtue, but his worldly wealth and greatness, that he accounts his excellency, and values himself by. We will suppose that to mount up to the heavens; and, since his spirit always riseth with his condition, you may suppose that with it "his head reacheth to the clouds." He is every way advanced, the world has done the utmost it can for him, he looks down upon all about him with disdain, while they look up to him with admiration, envy, or fear. We will suppose him to bid fair for a universal monarchy; and, though he cannot but have made himself many enemies before he arrived to this pitch of prosperity, yet he thinks himself as much out of the reach of their darts as if he were in the clouds.

2nd. He is confident his ruin will accordingly be very great, and his fall the more dreadful for his having risen so high. "He shall perish for ever," ver. 7. His pride and security were the certain presages of his misery. This will certainly be true of all impenitent sinners in the other world, they shall be undone, for ever undone. But Zophar means his ruin in this world; and sometimes, indeed, notorious sinners are remarkably cut off by present judgments. They have reason enough to fear what Zophar here threatens even the triumphant sinner with. First. A shameful destruction. "He shall perish like his own dung," or dunghill, so loathsome is he to God and all good men, and so willing will the world be to part with him, Ps. cxix. 119; Isa. lxvi. 24. Secondly. A surprising destruction. He will be brought into desolation in a moment, Ps. lxxiii. 19; so that those about him, that saw him just now, will ask, Where is he? Could he that made so great a figure vanish and expire so suddenly? Thirdly. A swift destruction, ver. 8. He shall fly away upon the wings of his own terrors, and be chased away by the just imprecations of all about him, who would gladly be rid of him. Fourthly. An utter destruction. It will be total: he shall go away like a dream, or vision of the night, which was a mere phantasm, and whatever in it pleased the fancy it is quite gone, and nothing of it remains but what serves us to laugh at the folly of. It will be final, ver. 9; the eye that saw him, and was ready to adore him, shall see him no more, and the place he filled shall no more behold him, having given him an eternal farewell when he went to his own place, as Judas, Acts i. 25.

10 His children shall seek to please the poor,
And his hands shall restore their goods.
11 His bones are full of the sin of his youth,
Which shall lie down with him in the dust.
12 Though wickedness be sweet in his mouth,
Though he hide it under his tongue;
13 Though he spare it, and forsake it not;
But keep it still within his mouth:
14 Yet his meat in his bowels is turned,
It is the gall of asps within him.
15 He hath swallowed down riches,
And he shall vomit them up again:
God shall cast them out of his belly
16 He shall suck the poison of asps:
The viper's tongue shall slay him.

ASP AND VIPER.

17 He shall not see the rivers, the floods.
The brooks of honey and butter
18 That which he laboured for shall he restore,
And shall not swallow it down:
According to his substance shall the restitution be,
And he shall not rejoice therein.
19 Because he hath oppressed and hath forsaken the poor;
Because he hath violently taken away an house which he builded not;
20 Surely he shall not feel quietness in his belly,
He shall not save of that which he desired.
21 There shall none of his meat be left;
Therefore shall no man look for his goods.
22 In the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be in straits:
Every hand of the wicked shall come upon him.

The instances here given of the miserable condition of the wicked man in this world are expressed with a great fulness and fluency of language, and the same thing returned to again, and repeated in other words. Let us therefore reduce the particulars to their proper heads, and observe,

First. What his wickedness is for which he is punished.

1. The lusts of the flesh, here called the sins of his youth, ver. 11; for those are the sins which in that age people are most tempted to. The forbidden pleasures of sense are said to be sweet in his mouth, ver. 12; he indulgeth himself in all the gratifications of the carnal appetite, and takes an inordinate complacency in them, as yielding the most agreeable delights. That is the satisfaction which he hides under his tongue, and rolls there as the most dainty delicate thing that can be. He keeps it still within his mouth, ver. 13; let him have that and he desires no more, he will never part with that for the spiritual and Divine pleasures of religion, which he has no relish of, nor affection for. His keeping it still in his mouth notes both his obstinate persisting in his sin,—he spares it when he should kill and mortify it, and forsakes it not, but holds it fast, and goes on frowardly in it; and also his reacting of his sin by revolving he alludes to the reproof which his rebuke had received from Job; so at least we understand our translation. But with regard to the original, many adopt the idea of Bishop Patrick, "I have heard myself rather shamefully reproached;" thus Ewald, "He hears from Job a contemptuous, wounding reproof of himself;" so Barnes, "I have heard thy injurious rebuke." There is no doubt that the words may be closely rendered, "I will hear correction of my reproach;" but, in accordance with the idiom of this ancient document, we might, perhaps, more clearly express the sense by saying, with Rodwell, "I hear a chiding to my shame," which brings us back to the sense conveyed by Patrick in his paraphrase.

xx. 11. The words, "his bones are full of the sin of his youth," do not precisely agree with the Hebrew, which is merely, "his bones are full of his youth," that is, "full of vigour." Barnes translates, "his bones are full of his secret sins," for which a plausible reason may be alleged, but the other is most exact and literal.

it, and remembering it with pleasure. As that adulterous woman, Eze. xxiii. 19, that multiplied her whoredoms by calling to remembrance the days of her youth, so doth this wicked man here. Or, his hiding it and keeping it under his tongue notes his industrious concealment of his beloved lust. Being a hypocrite, that he may save the credit of his profession, his haunts of sin are secret; but He that knows what is in the heart knows what is under the tongue too, and will discover it shortly.

2. The love of the world, and the wealth of it. That is it in which he placeth his happiness, and which, therefore, he sets his heart upon. See here, 1st. How greedy he is of it; ver. 15, "He hath swallowed down riches," as eagerly as ever a hungry man swallowed down meat, and is still crying, Give, give. It is that which he desired, ver. 20; it was in his eye the best gift, and that which he coveted earnestly. 2nd. What pains he takes for it; it is that which he laboured for, ver. 18; not by honest diligence in a lawful calling, but by an unwearied prosecution of all ways and methods, 'right or wrong,'—per fas, per nefas, to be rich. We must not labour to be rich, Pr. xxiii. 4, but to be charitable; that we may have to give, Eze. iv. 28, not to spend. 3rd. What great things he promiseth himself from it, intimated in "the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter," ver. 17; his being disappointed of them supposeth he had flattered himself with the hopes of them. He expected rivers of sensual delights.

3. Violence, and oppression, and injustice to his poor neighbours, ver. 19. This was the sin of the giants of the old world, and a sin that as much as any other brings God's judgments upon nations and families. It is charged upon this wicked man, 1st. That he hath forsaken the poor, taken no care of them, shewed no kindness to them, nor made any provision for them. At first, perhaps, for a pretence, he gave alms, like the Pharisees, to gain a reputation, but when he had served his turn with it he left it off, and forsook the poor, whom before he seemed to be concerned for. Those who do good, but not from a good principle, though they may abound in it, will not abide in it. 2nd. That he has oppressed them, crushed them, taken all advantages against them to do them a mischief. To enrich himself he has robbed the spital, and made the poor poorer. 3rd. That he hath violently taken away their houses, which he had no right to, as Ahab took Naboth's vineyard, not by secret fraud, by forgery, periury, or some trick in law, but avowedly, and by open violence.

Secondly. What his punishment is for this wickedness.

1. He shall be disappointed in his expectations, and shall not find that satisfaction in his worldly wealth which he vainly promised himself; ver. 17, "He shall never see the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter," with which he hoped to glut himself. The world is not that to those who love it, and court it, and admire it, which they fancy it will be. The enjoyment sinks far below the raised expectation.

2. He shall be diseased and distempered in his body. And what little comfort can a man have in wealth if he have not health; sickness and pain, especially if they be in extremity, embitter all his enjoyments. This wicked man has all the delights of sense wound up to the height of pleasurableness; but what the nearer, when "his bones are full of the sins of his youth," ver. 11, that is, of the effects of those sins? By his drunkenness and gluttony his uncleanness and wantonness, when he was young, he contracted those diseases which are painful to him long after, and perhaps made his life very miserable, and, as Solomon speaks, "consume his flesh and his body," Pr. v. 11. Perhaps he was given to fight when he was young, and then made nothing of a cut or a bruise in a fray, but he feels it in his bones long after. But can he get no ease, no relief? No, he is like to carry his pains and diseases with him to the grave, or, rather, they are likely to carry him thither, and so the sins of his youth shall lie down with him in the dust. The very putrefying of his body in the grave is to him the effect of sin, ch. xxiv. 19; so that his iniquity is upon his bones there, Eze. xxxii. 27. The sin of sinners follows them to the other side death.

3. He shall be disquieted and troubled in his mind. "Surely he shall not feel quietness in his belly," ver. 20. He has not that ease in his own mind that people think he has, but is in a continual toss. The ill-got wealth which he hath swallowed down makes him sick at his stomach, and, like undigested meat, is always upbraiding him. Let none expect to enjoy that comfortably which they have got unjustly. The unquietness of his mind ariseth, 1st. From his conscience looking back, and filling him with fear of the wrath of God against him for his wickedness. Even that wickedness which was sweet in the commission, and was rolled under the tongue as a delicate morsel, becomes bitter in the reflection, and, when it is reviewed, fills him with horror and vexation. In his bowels it is turned, ver. 14; like John's book, in his mouth as sweet as honey, but when he had eaten it his belly was bitter, Rev. x. 10. Such a thing is sin, it is turned into the gall of asps, than which nothing is more bitter; the poison of asps, ver. 16, than which nothing more fatal; and so it will be to him. What he sucked so sweetly, and with so much pleasure, will prove to him the poison of asps; so will all unlawful gains be. The fawning tongue will prove the viper's tongue. All the charming graces that are thought to be in sin, when conscience is awakened, will turn into so many raging furies. 2nd. From his cares, looking forwards; ver. 22, "In the fulness of his sufficiency," when he thinks himself most happy, and most sure of the continuance of his happiness, "he shall be in straits;" that is, he shall think himself so through the anxieties and perplexities of his own mind, as that rich man who, when his ground brought forth plentifully, cried out, "What shall I do?" Lu. xii. 17.

4. He shall be dispossessed of his estate. That shall sink and dwindle away to nothing, so that he shall not rejoice therein, ver. 18. He shall not only never rejoice truly, but not long enjoy it at all.

1st. What he has unjustly swallowed he shall be compelled to disgorge; ver. 15, "He hath swallowed down riches," and then thought himself sure of them, and that they were as much his own as the meat he has eaten; but he is deceived, "he shall vomit them up again." His own conscience, perhaps, may make him so uneasy in the keeping of what he has got, that for the quiet of his own mind he shall make restitution, and that not with the pleasure of a virtue, but the pain of a vomit, and with the utmost reluctancy. Or, if he do not himself refund what he has violently taken away, God shall by his providence force him to it, and bring it about one way or other, that ill-gotten goods shall return to the right owners. "God shall cast them out of his belly," while yet the love of the sin is not cast out of his heart. So loud shall the clamours of the poor be against him whom he has impoverished, that he shall be forced to send his children to them to speak them fair, and beg their pardon: ver. 10, "His children shall seek to please the poor," whilst his own hands shall restore them their goods with shame; ver. 18, "That which he laboured for" by all the arts of oppression, "shall he restore," and shall not so swallow it down as to digest it; it shall not stay with him, but, "according to his shame shall the restitution be." Having gotten a great deal unjustly he shall restore a great deal, so that, when everybody has their own, he will have but a little left for himself. To be made to restore what was unjustly gotten, by the sanctifying grace of God, as Zacchæus was, is a great mercy; he voluntarily and cheerfully restored fourfold, and yet had a great deal left to give to the poor, Lu. xix. 8. But to be forced to restore, as Judas was, merely by the horrors of a despairing conscience, has none of that benefit and comfort attending it, for he "threw down the pieces of silver, and went and hanged himself."

2nd. He shall be stripped of all he has, and become a beggar. He that spoiled others shall himself be spoiled, Isa. xxxiii. 1, for "every hand of the wicked shall be upon him." The innocent whom he has wronged sit down by their loss, saying, as David, "Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked, but my hand shall not be upon him," 1 Sam. xxiv. 13. But though they have forgiven him, though they will make no reprisals, Divine justice will, and oftentimes makes the wicked to avenge the quarrel of the righteous, and squeezes and crushes one ill man by the hand of another upon him. Thus, when he is plucked of all sides, "he shall not save of that which he desired," ver. 20. Not only not save it all, but save nothing of it. "There shall none of his meat" (which he coveted so much, and fed upon with so much pleasure) "be left," ver. 21. All his neighbours and relations shall look upon him to be in such ill circumstances, that when he is dead no man shall look for his goods, none of his kindred shall expect to be a penny the better for him, nor be willing to take out letters of administration of what he leaves behind him. In all this Zophar reflects upon Job, who had lost all, and was reduced to the last extremity.

23 When he is about to fill his belly,
God shall cast the fury of his wrath upon him,
And shall rain it upon him while he is eating.
24 He shall flee from the iron weapon,
And the bow of steel shall strike him through.
25 It is drawn, and cometh out of the body;
Yea, the glittering sword cometh out of his gall:
Terrors are upon him.
26 All darkness shall be hid in his secret places:
A fire not blown shall consume him;
It shall go ill with him that is left in his tabernacle.
27 The heaven shall reveal his iniquity;
And the earth shall rise up against him.
28 The increase of his house shall depart,
And his goods shall flow away in the day of his wrath.
29 This is the portion of a wicked man from God,
And the heritage appointed unto him by God.

Zophar, having described the many embarrassments and vexations which commonly attend the wicked practices of oppressors and cruel men, here comes to show their utter ruin at last.

First. Their ruin will take its rise from God's wrath and vengeance, ver. 23. The hand of the wicked was upon him, ver. 22; every hand of the wicked. His hand was against every one, and therefore every man's hand will be against him; and yet, in grappling with these, he might go near to make his part good; but his heart cannot endure, nor his hands be strong, when God shall deal with him, Eze. xxii. 14, when God shall "cast the fury of his wrath upon him, and rain it upon him." Every word here speaks terror. It is not only the justice of God that is engaged against him, but his wrath, the deep resentment of provocations given to himself; it is the "fury of his wrath," incensed to the highest degree. It is "cast upon him" with force and fierceness; it is "rained upon him" in abundance, it comes on his head like the fire and brimstone upon Sodom, to which the psalmist also refers, Ps. xi. 6, "On the wicked God shall rain fire and brimstone;" and there is no fence against it but only in Christ, who is the only covert from the storm and tempest, Isa. xxxii. 2. This wrath shall be cast upon him "when he is about to fill his belly," just going to glut himself upon what he has got, and promising himself abundant satisfaction in it. Then, when he is eating, shall this tempest surprise him, when he is secure and easy, and in apprehension of no danger; as the ruin of the old world and Sodom came when they were in the depth of their security, and the height of their sensuality, as Christ observes, Lu. xvii. 26, &c. Perhaps Zophar here reflects on the death of Job's children when they were eating and drinking.

Secondly. Their ruin will be inevitable, and there will be no possibility of escaping it; ver. 24, "He shall flee from the iron weapon." Flight argues guilt. He will not humble himself under the judgments of God, nor seek means to make his peace with him, all his care is to outrun the vengeance that pursues him; but in vain. If he escape the sword, yet "the bow of steel shall strike him through." God has weapons of all sorts, he has both whet his sword and bent his bow, Ps. vii. 12, 13; can deal with his enemies cominus vel eminus,—'at hand or afar off.' He has a sword for those that think to fight it out with him by their strength, and a bow for those that think to avoid him by their craft; see Isa. xxiv. 17, 18; Jer. xlviii. 43, 44. He that is marked for ruin, though he may escape one judgment, will find another ready for him.

Thirdly. It will be a total, terrible ruin. When the dart that has struck him through (for when God shoots he is sure to hit his mark, when he strikes he strikes home) comes to be drawn out of his body, when the glittering sword, (the lightning, so the word is,) the flaming sword, the sword that is bathed in heaven, (Isa. xxxiv. 5,) when this comes out of his gall, O what terrors are upon him! How strong are the convulsions, how violent the dying agonies! How terrible are the arrests of death to a wicked man!

Fourthly. Sometimes it is a ruin that comes upon him insensibly, ver. 26. 1. The darkness he is wrapped up in is a hidden darkness; it is all darkness, utter darkness, without the least mixture of light; and it is hid in his secret place, whither he is retreated, and where he hopes to shelter himself. He never retires into his own conscience, but he finds himself in the dark, and perfectly at a loss. 2. The fire he is consumed by is a fire not blown, kindled without noise, a consumption which every body sees the effect of, but nobody sees the cause of. It is plain the gourd is withered, but the worm at the root that withers it is out of sight. He is wasted by a soft, gentle fire, surely, but very slowly. When the fuel is very combustible, the fire needs no blowing, and that is his case; he is ripe for ruin. The proud, and they that do wickedly, shall be stubble, Mal. iv. 1. An unquenchable fire shall consume him, so some read it: and that is certainly true of hell fire.

Fifthly. It is a ruin not only to himself, but to his family. "It shall go ill with him that is left in his tabernacle;" for the curse shall reach him, and he shall be cut off perhaps by the same grievous disease. There is an entail of wrath upon the family, which will destroy both his heirs and his inheritance, ver. 28. 1. His posterity will be rooted out. The increase of his house shall depart; shall either be cut off by untimely deaths, or forced to run their country. Numerous and growing families, if wicked and vile, are soon reduced, dispersed, and extirpated by the judgments of God. 2. His estate will be sunk. His goods shall flow away from his family as fast as ever they flowed into it, when the xx. 14, 16. The word here translated "asps," pethen (plural, pethannim), is in two texts rendered "adder;" but in the four other places where it occurs, it is explained as here. The custom of charming mentioned in connection with it, in Psa. lviii. 5, is thought to prove that the well-known cobra di capello is meant, because that is the serpent usually employed by the charmers. The word eph'eh, translated "viper," is possibly identical with the ephah or leffah of the Arabs, a small poisonous snake found in the Sahara; but Dr. Tristram thinks it is the sand viper, a snake about a foot long, which occurs in Arabia and Syria, and which is decidedly venomous.

xx. 17. The expression, "brooks of honey and butter," is, of course, figurative, and, like "a land flowing with milk and honey," means a well-watered and fruitful region.

xx. 24. For a "bow of steel" here we must substitute a "bow of brass," because brass or bronze is certainly intended; nor have we any indication that the use of steel was then generally known.

day of God's wrath comes; for which, all the while his estate was in the getting by fraud and oppression, he was treasuring up wrath.

Sixthly. It is a ruin which will manifestly appear to be just and righteous, and what he has brought upon himself by his own wickedness; for, ver. 27, "the heaven shall reveal his iniquity," that is, the God of heaven, who sees all the secret wickedness of the wicked, will, by some means or other, let all the world know what an ill man he has been, that they may own the justice of God in all that is brought upon him. "The earth" also "shall rise up against him," both to discover his wickedness, and to avenge it. "The earth shall disclose her blood," Isa. xxvi. 21. "The earth riseth up against him," (as the stomach rises against that which is loathsome to spit it out,) and will no longer keep him; "the heaven reveals his iniquity," and therefore will not receive him, whither, then, must he go but to hell? If the God of heaven and earth be his enemy, neither heaven nor earth will shew him any kindness, but all the hosts of both are, and will be, at war with him.

Lastly. Zophar concludes like an orator; ver. 29, "This is the portion of a wicked man from God;" it is allotted him, it is designed him as his portion. He will have it at last, as a child has his portion, and he will have it for a perpetuity, it is what he must abide by; 'this is the heritage of his decree from God;' it is the settled rule of his judgment, and fair warning is given of it. "O wicked man, thou shalt surely die," Eze. xxxiii. 8. Though impenitent sinners do not always fall under such temporal judgments as are here described, (therein Zophar was mistaken,) yet the wrath of God abides upon them, and they are made miserable by spiritual judgments which are much worse, their consciences being either on the one hand a terror to them, and then they are in continual amazement, or on the other hand seared and silenced, and then they are given up to a reprobate sense, and bound over to eternal ruin. Never was any doctrine better explained, nor worse applied, than this here by Zophar, who intended by all this to prove Job a hypocrite. Let us receive the good explication, and make a better application, for warning to ourselves to stand in awe, and not to sin.

CHAPTER XXI.

This is Job's reply to Zophar's discourse; in which he complains less of his own miseries than he had done in his former discourses, finding that his friends were not moved by his complaints to pity him in the least, and comes closer to the general question that was in dispute betwixt him and them,—whether outward prosperity, and the continuance of it, was a mark of the true church, and the true members of it; so that the ruin of a man's prosperity is sufficient to prove him a hypocrite, though no other evidence appear against him. This they asserted; but Job denied. I. His preface here is designed for the moving of their affections, that he might gain their attention, ver. 1—6. II. His discourse is designed for the convincing of their judgments and the rectifying of their mistakes. He owns that God does sometimes hang up a wicked man, as it were, in chains, in terrorem by some visible, remarkable judgment in this life, but denies that he always doth so; nay, he maintains that commonly he doth otherwise, suffering even the worst of sinners to live all their days in prosperity, and to go out of the world without any visible mark of his wrath upon them: 1. He describes the great prosperity of wicked people, ver. 7—13; 2. He shews their great impiety, in which they are hardened by their prosperity, ver. 14—16; 3. He foretells their ruin at length, but after a long reprieve, ver. 17—21; 4. He observes a very great variety in the ways of God's providence towards men, even towards bad men, ver. 22—26; 5. He overthrows the ground of their severe censures of him, by shewing that the destruction is reserved for the other world; but that they many times escape to the last in this world, ver. 27—34. And in this Job was clearly in the right.

BUT Job answered and said,
2 Hear diligently my speech,
And let this be your consolations.
3 Suffer me that I may speak;
And after that I have spoken, mock on.
4 As for me, is my complaint to man?
And if it were so, why should not my spirit be troubled?
5 Mark me, and be astonished,
And lay your hand upon your mouth.
6 Even when I remember I am afraid,
And trembling taketh hold on my flesh.

Job here recommends himself, both his case and his discourse, both what he suffered and what he said, to the compassionate consideration of his friends.

First. That which he begs of them is very fair, that they would suffer him to speak, ver. 3, and not break in upon him, as Zophar had done, in the midst of his discourse. Losers, of all men, may have leave to speak; and if those that are accused and censured may not speak for themselves, they are wronged without remedy, and have no way to come at their right. That they would hear diligently his speech, ver. 2, as those that were willing to understand him, and, if they were under a mistake, to have it rectified. And that they would mark him, ver. 5; for as good not hear as not heed and observe what we hear.

Secondly. That which he urgeth for this is very reasonable. 1. They came to comfort him; now, saith he, "Let this be your consolations," ver. 2. If you have no other comforts to administer to me, yet deny me not this, be so kind, so just, as to give me a patient hearing, and that shall pass for your consolations of me. Nay, they could not know how to comfort him if they would not give him leave to open his case, and tell his own story. Or, it will be a consolation to yourselves in the reflection, to have dealt tenderly with your afflicted friend, and not harshly. 2. He would hear them speak when it came to their turn. "After I have spoken," you may go on with what you have to say, and I will not hinder you, no, though you go on to mock me. Those that engage in controversy must count upon having hard words given them, and resolve to bear it patiently; for generally they that mock will mock on, whatever is said to them.

Thirdly. He hoped to convince them. If you will but give me a fair hearing, "mock on," if you can; but I believe I shall say that which will change your note, and make you pity me rather than mock me.

Fourthly. They were not his judges; ver. 4, "Is my complaint to man?" No, if it were, I see it would be to little purpose to complain. But my complaint is to God, and to him do I appeal. Let him be judge between you and me! Before him we stand upon even terms, and therefore I have the privilege of being heard as well as you. If my complaint were to man, my spirit would be troubled. for they would not regard me, nor rightly understand me; but my complaint is to God, who will suffer me to speak, though you will not. It would be sad if God should deal as unkindly with us as our friends sometimes do.

Fifthly. There was that in his case which was very surprising and astonishing, and therefore both needed and deserved their most serious consideration. It was not a common case, but very extraordinary. 1. He himself was amazed at it, at the troubles God had laid upon him, and the censures of his friends concerning him; ver. 6, "When I remember" that terrible day in which I was on a sudden stripped of all my comforts, that day in which I was stricken with sore boils, when I remember all the hard speeches with which you have grieved me, I confess "I am afraid, and trembling takes hold of my flesh," especially when I compare this with the prosperous condition of many wicked people, and the applauses of their neighbours, with which they pass through the world. Note, The providences of God in the government of the world are sometimes very astonishing, even to wise and good men, and bring them to their wits' end. 2. He would have them wonder at it; ver. 5, "Mark me, and be astonished." Instead of expounding my troubles, you should awfully adore the unsearchable mysteries of Providence in afflicting one thus whom you know no ill by; you should therefore "lay your hand upon your mouth," silently wait the issue, and judge nothing before the time. "God's way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters." When we cannot account for what he doth in suffering the wicked to prosper, and the godly to be afflicted, nor fathom the depth of those proceedings, it becomes us to sit down and admire them. "Upright men shall be astonied at this," ch. xvii. 8; be you so.

7 Wherefore do the wicked live,
Become old, yea, are mighty in power?
8 Their seed is established in their sight with them,
And their offspring before their eyes.
9 Their houses are safe from fear,
Neither is the rod of God upon them.
10 Their bull gendereth, and faileth not;
Their cow calveth, and casteth not her calf.
11 They send forth their little ones like a flock,
And their children dance.
12 They take the timbrel and harp,
And rejoice at the sound of the organ.
13 They spend their days in wealth,
And in a moment go down to the grave.
14 Therefore they say unto God, Depart from us;
For we desire not the knowledge of thy ways.
15 What is the Almighty, that we should serve him?
And what profit should we have, if we pray unto him?
16 Lo, their good is not in their hand:
The counsel of the wicked is far from me.

All Job's three friends in their last discourses had been very large in describing the miserable condition of a wicked man in this world. It is true, saith Job, remarkable judgments are sometimes brought upon notorious sinners, but not always; for we have many instances of the great and long prosperity of those that are openly and avowedly wicked; though they are hardened in their wickedness by their prosperity, yet they are still suffered to prosper.

First. He here describes their prosperity, both to the height, and breadth, and length of it. If this be true, as you say, pray tell me "wherefore do the wicked live?" ver. 7. The matter of fact is taken for granted, for we see instances of it every day. 1. They live, and are not suddenly cut off by the strokes of Divine vengeance. They yet speak who have set their mouths against the heavens; they yet act who have stretched out their hands against God. Not only they live, that is, they are reprieved, but they live in prosperity, 1 Sam. xxv. 6. Nay, 2. They "become old," they have the honour, satisfaction, and advantage of living long, time enough to raise their families and estates. We read of a sinner a hundred years old, Isa. lxv. 20. But this is not all. 3. They "are mighty in power," are preferred to places of authority and trust, and not only make a great figure, but bear a great sway. Virit imo, et in senatum venit,—'He not only lives, but appears in the senate.' Now, wherefore is it so? Note, It is worth while to inquire into the reasons of the outward prosperity of wicked people. It is not because God has forsaken the earth, because he doth not see, or doth not hate, or cannot punish their wickedness; but it is because the measure of their iniquities is not full. This is the day of God's patience, and some wise or other he makes of them and their prosperity, to serve his own counsels, while it ripens them for ruin; but the chief reason is, because he will make it to appear there is another world, which is the world of retribution, and not this. The prosperity of the wicked is here described to be,

1st. Complete and consummate. First. They are multiplied, and their family is built up, and they have the satisfaction of seeing it; ver. 8, "Their seed is established in their sight." This is put first, as that which gives both a pleasant enjoyment and a pleasant prospect. Secondly. They are easy and quiet, ver. 9. Whereas Zophar had spoken of their continual frights and terrors, Job saith, "Their houses are safe," both from danger, and from the fear of it, ver. 9; and so far are they from the killing wounds of God's sword or arrows, that they do not feel the smart of so much as "the rod of God upon them." Thirdly. They are rich, and thrive in their estates; of this he gives only one instance; ver. 10, their cattle increase, and they meet with no disappointment in them, not so much as a cow casts her calf; and then their much must needs grow more. This is promised, Ex. xxiii. 26; Deu. vii. 14. Fourthly. They are merry, and live a jovial life; ver. 11, 12. "They send forth their little ones" abroad among their neighbours, "like a flock," in great numbers, to sport themselves. They have their balls and music-meetings, at which "their children dance;" and dancing is fittest for children, who know not how better to spend their time, and whose innocency guards them against the mischiefs that commonly attend it. And though the parents are not so very youthful and frolicsome as to dance themselves, yet they "take the timbrel and harp;" they pipe, and their children dance after their pipe, and they know no grief to put their instruments out of tune, or to "withhold their hearts from any joy." Some observe that this is an instance of their vanity, as well as of their prosperity. Here is none of that care taken of their children which Abraham took of his; to "teach them the way of the Lord," Gen. xviii. 19. Their children do not pray, or say their catechism; but dance, and sing, and "rejoice at the sound of the organ."

xx. 29. It may be noted that in this chapter Zophar has pursued precisely the course adopted by Bildad in chap. xviii., that is, he has enumerated a long list of calamities, ascribing them to the retributive justice of God, and implying that the men who so suffer must be bad men. Thus Job is again condemned and not comforted.

xxi. 7. Job, in opposition to his friends, proceeds to show that wicked men prosper, and that, therefore, a man's character cannot be determined by his condition in this world.

xxi. 12. We may accept the translation of this verse so far as timbrel and harp are concerned, but "organ" conveys an altogether erroneous idea. The 'Ugab was a wind instrument, but it was merely a reed, pipe, or flute. The same word is wrongly rendered "organ" in Job xxx. 31; Psa. cl. 4. Jerome introduced the term organum, but no doubt the word then had scarcely lost its original meaning of instrument. The Syriac here has a word meaning music in general, and perhaps the word "music" would be the best.

Sensual pleasures are all the delights of carnal people, and as men are themselves so they breed their children.

2nd. Continuing and constant; ver. 13, "They spend their days," all their days, "in wealth," and never know what it is to want; in mirth, and never know what sadness means; and, at last, without any previous alarms to frighten them, without any anguish or agony, "in a moment" they "go down to the grave," and there are no bands in their death. And, if there were not another life after this, it were most desirable to die by the quickest, shortest strokes of death. Since we must "go down to the grave," if that were the farthest of our journey, we would wish to go down in a moment; to swallow the bitter pill, and not chew it.

Secondly. He shews how they abuse their prosperity, and are confirmed and hardened by it in their impiety, ver. 14, 15. Their gold and silver serves to steel and brazen them; to make them more insolent, and more impudent in their wickedness. Now he mentions this either, 1. To increase the difficulty. It is strange that any wicked people should prosper thus; but, especially that those should prosper who are arrived to such a pitch of wickedness as openly to bid defiance to God himself, and tell him to his face they care not for him: nay, and that their prosperity should be continued, though they bear up themselves upon that, in their opposition to God; with that weapon they fight against him, and yet are not disarmed. Or, 2. To lessen the difficulty. God suffers them to prosper; but let us not wonder at it, for "the prosperity of fools destroys them," by hardening them in sin, Pr. i. 32; Ps. lxxiii. 7—9. See how light these prospering sinners make of God and religion; as if, because they have so much of this world, they had no need to look after another.

1st. See how ill-affected they are to God and religion; they abandon them, and cast off the thoughts of them. First. They dread the presence of God; they say unto him, Depart from us, let us never be troubled with the apprehension of our being under God's eye, nor be restrained by the fear of him. Or, they bid him depart, as one they do not need, nor have any occasion to make use of. The world is the portion they have chosen and take up with, and think themselves happy in; and while they have that, they can live without God. Justly will God say to them, Depart, Mat. xxv. 41, who have bidden him depart; and justly doth he now take them at their word. Secondly. They dread the knowledge of God, and of his will, and of their duty to him; "We desire not the knowledge of thy ways." They that are resolved not to walk in God's ways desire not to know them, because their knowledge will be a continual reproach to their disobedience, Jno. iii. 19.

2nd. See how they argue against God and religion; ver. 15, "What is the Almighty?" Strange, that ever creatures should speak so insolently, that ever reasonable creatures should speak so absurdly and unreasonably. The two great bonds by which we are drawn and held to religion are those of duty and interest; now they here endeavour to break both these bonds asunder. First. They will not believe it is their duty to be religious; "What is the Almighty that we should serve him?" like Pharaoh, Ex. v. 2, "Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice?" Observe how slightly they speak of God; "What is the Almighty?" as if he were a mere name, a mere cypher, or one they have nothing to do with, and that has nothing to do with them. How hardly they speak of religion! They call it a service, and mean a hard service. Is it not enough, they think, to keep up a fair correspondence with the Almighty, but they must serve him, which they look upon as a task and a drudgery. Observe also how highly they speak of themselves; "that we should serve him:" we who are rich and mighty in power, shall we be subject and accountable to him? No, we are lords, Jer. ii. 31. Secondly. They will not believe it is their interest to be religious; "What profit shall we have if we pray unto him?" All the world are for what they can get; and, therefore, wisdom's merchandise is neglected, because they think there is nothing to be got by it; "It is vain to serve God," Mal. iii. 13, 14. Praying will not pay debts, nor portion children; nay, perhaps, serious godliness may balk a man's preferment, and expose him to losses; and, what then? Is nothing to be called gain but the wealth and honour of this world? If we obtain the favour of God, and spiritual and eternal blessings, we have no reason to complain of losing by our religion. But if we have not profit by prayer it is our own fault, Isa. lviii. 3, 4; it is because we ask amiss, Jas. iv. 2. Religion itself is not a vain thing; if it be so to us we may thank ourselves for resting in the outside of it, Jas. i. 26.

Thirdly. He shews their folly herein, and utterly disclaims all concurrence with them; ver. 19, "Lo, their good is not in their hand;" that is, they did not get it without God, and therefore they are very ungrateful to slight him thus. It was not their might, nor the power of their hand, that got them this wealth; and, therefore, they ought to remember God who gave it them. Nor can they keep it without God; and therefore they are very unwise to lose their interest in him, and bid him to depart from them. Some give this sense of it: their good is in their barns and their bags, hoarded up there, it is not in their hand to do good to others with it; and then what good doth it do them? And, therefore, saith Job, "The counsel of the wicked is far from me." Far be it from me that I should be of their mind; say as they say, do as they do, and take my measures from them. Their posterity approve their sayings, though their way be their folly, Ps. xlix. 13; but I know better things than to walk in their counsel.

17 How oft is the candle of the wicked put out!
And how oft cometh their destruction upon them!
God distributeth sorrows in his anger.
18 They are as stubble before the wind,
And as chaff that the storm carrieth away.
19 God layeth up his iniquity for his children:
He rewardeth him, and he shall know it.
20 His eyes shall see his destruction,
And he shall drink of the wrath of the Almighty.
21 For what pleasure hath he in his house after him,
When the number of his months is cut off in the midst?
22 Shall any teach God knowledge?
Seeing he judgeth those that are high.
23 One dieth in his full strength,
Being wholly at ease and quiet.
24 His breasts are full of milk,
And his bones are moistened with marrow.
25 And another dieth in the bitterness of his soul,
And never eateth with pleasure.
26 They shall lie down alike in the dust,
And the worms shall cover them.

Job had largely described the prosperity of wicked people; now in these verses,

First. He opposeth this to what his friends had maintained concerning their certain ruin in this life; Tell me how often do you see the candle of the wicked put out? Do you not as often see it burn down to the socket, until it goes out of itself? ver. 17. How often do you see their destruction come upon them, or God distributing sorrows in his anger among them? Do you not as often see their mirth and prosperity continuing to the last? Perhaps there are as many instances of notorious sinners ending their days in pomp as ending them in misery. Which observation is sufficient to invalidate their arguments against Job; and to shew that no certain judgment can be made of men's character by their outward condition.

Secondly. He reconciles this to the holiness and justice of God. Though wicked people prosper thus all their days, yet we are not therefore to think that God will let their wickedness always go unpunished. No:

1. Even while they prosper thus they are "as stubble and chaff before the stormy wind," ver. 18. They are light and worthless, and of no account, either with God or with wise and good men. They are fitted to destruction, and continually lie exposed to it; and in the height of their pomp and power there is but a step between them and ruin.

2. Though they spend all their days in wealth, "God is laying up their iniquity for their children," ver. 19; and he will visit it upon their posterity when they are gone. The oppressor lays up his goods for his children, to make them gentlemen; but God lays up his iniquity for them, to make them beggars. He keeps an exact account of the father's sins; "seals them up among his treasures," Deu. xxxii. 34; and will justly punish the children, while the riches, to which the curse cleaves, are found as assets in their hands.

3. Though they prosper in this world, yet they shall be reckoned with in another world. God rewardeth him according to his deeds at last, ver. 19; though the sentence passed against his evil works be not executed speedily. Perhaps he may not now be made to fear the wrath to come, but he may flatter himself with hopes that he shall have peace, though he go on. But he shall be made to feel it in the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God; "he shall know it," ver. 19; "his eyes shall see his destruction," which he would not be persuaded to believe. They "will not see, but they shall see," Isa. xxvi. 11. The eyes that have been wilfully shut against the grace of God shall be opened to see his destruction; and "he shall drink of the wrath of the Almighty," that shall be "the portion of his cup:" compare Ps. xi. 6, with Rev. xiv. 10. The misery of damned sinners is here set forth in a few words, but very terrible ones. They lie under the wrath of an almighty God, who in their destruction both shews his wrath, and makes his power known.

And, if this will be his condition in the other world, what good will his prosperity in this world do him? ver. 21, "What pleasure has he in his house after him?" Our Saviour has let us know how little pleasure the rich man in hell had in his house after him, when the remembrance of the good things he had received in his lifetime would not cool his tongue, but added much to his misery, as did also the sorrow he was in lest his five brethren whom he left in his house after him should follow him to that place of torment, Lu. xvi. 25—28. So little will the gain of the world profit him that has lost his soul.

Thirdly. He resolves this difference which Providence makes between one wicked man and another into the wisdom and sovereignty of God; ver. 22, "Shall any" pretend to "teach God knowledge?" Dare we arraign God's proceedings, or blame his conduct? Shall we take upon us to tell God how he should govern the world, what sinner he should spare, and what he should punish? He hath both authority and ability to judge those that are high. Angels in heaven, princes and magistrates on earth, are accountable to God; and must receive their doom from him; he manages them, and makes what use he pleaseth of them. Shall he then be accountable to us, or receive advice from us? He is the Judge of all the earth, and therefore, no doubt, he shall do right, Gen. xviii. 25; Rom. iii. 6; and those proceedings of his providence which seem to contradict one another he can make not only mutually to agree, but jointly to serve his own purposes.

The little difference there is between one wicked man's dying impenitent in peace and pomp and another wicked man's dying so in pain and misery, when both will at last meet in hell, he illustrates by the little difference there is between one man's dying suddenly and another's dying slowly, when they will both meet shortly in the grave. So vast is the disproportion between time and eternity, that, if hell be the lot of every sinner at last, it breaks no squares if one goes singing thither and another sighing. See,

1. How various the circumstances of people's dying are. There is one way into the world, we say, but many out; yet, as some are born by quick and easy labour, others by that which is hard and lingering, so dying is to some much more terrible than to others. And, since the death of the body is the birth of the soul into another world, deathbed agonies may not unfitly be compared to childbed throes. Observe the difference. 1st. "One dies" suddenly, "in his full strength;" not weakened by age or sickness, (ver. 23,) being "wholly at ease and quiet," under no apprehension at all of the approach of death, nor in any fear of it. But, on the contrary, because "his breasts are full of milk," and his "bones moistened with marrow," (ver. 24,) that is, he is healthful and vigorous, and of a good constitution, like a milch cow that is fat and in good liking, he counts upon nothing but to live many years in mirth and pleasure. Thus fair doth he bid for life, and yet cut off in a moment by the stroke of death. Note, It is a common thing for persons to be taken away by death when they are in their full strength, in the highest degree of health, when they least expect death; and think themselves best armed against it, and are ready not only to set death at a distance, but to set it at defiance. Let us, therefore, never be secure; for we have known many well and dead in the same week, the same day, the same hour, nay, perhaps the same minute. Be we therefore always ready. 2nd. Another dies slowly, and with a great deal of previous pain and misery, ver. 25, "in the bitterness of his soul," such as poor Job was himself now in, and never eats with pleasure, has no appetite to his food, nor any relish of it, through sickness, or age, or sorrow of mind. What great reason have those to be thankful that are in health, and always eat with pleasure! and what little reason have they to complain who sometimes do not, when they hear of many that never do!

2. How undiscernible this difference is in the grave. As rich and poor, so healthful and unhealthful, meet there; ver. 26, "They shall lie down alike in the dust, and the worms shall cover them," and feed sweetly on them. Thus, if one wicked man die in a palace, and another in a dungeon, they will meet in the congregation of the dead and damned; and the worm that dies not, and the fire that is not quenched, will be the same to them, which makes those differences inconsiderable, and not worth perplexing ourselves about.

xxi. 13. Wealth in this verse does not signify riches, but welfare, and general prosperity and happiness. The new American version is, "In prosperity they spend their days, and in a moment go down to the under-world." The word sheol, which our translators usually render hell, or grave, seems often to mean the unseen world, hades, or the under-world, and not simply the grave; but it never signifies a future state of suffering, such as we now call hell.

xxi. 17. This verse is correctly printed as a series of questions, though our translation only allows of two interrogatives. The new American version is, "How oft does the lamp of the wicked go out, and their destruction come upon them, or He in His anger distribute sorrows?" The old English version recognised the interrogatives, "How oft shall the candle of the wicked be put out? and their destruction come upon them? He will divide their lines in His wrath." The printed copies here read lives, which is quite wrong, as the translator could not have intended "lives," though he might have

27 Behold, I know your thoughts,
And the devices which ye wrongfully imagine against me.
28 For ye say, Where is the house of the prince?
And where are the dwelling places of the wicked?
29 Have ye not asked them that go by the way?
And do ye not know their tokens,
30 That the wicked is reserved to the day of destruction?
They shall be brought forth to the day of wrath.
31 Who shall declare his way to his face?
And who shall repay him what he hath done?
32 Yet shall he be brought to the grave,
And shall remain in the tomb.
33 The clods of the valley shall be sweet unto him,
And every man shall draw after him,
As there are innumerable before him.
34 How then comfort ye me in vain,
Seeing in your answers there remaineth falsehood?

In these verses,

First. Job opposeth the opinion of his friends, which he saw they still adhered to, that wicked people are sure to fall into such visible and remarkable ruin as Job was now fallen into, and none but they; upon which principle they condemned Job as a wicked man. "I know your thoughts," (saith Job, ver. 27,) I know you will not agree with me; for your judgments are tinctured and biassed by your piques and prejudices against me, "and the devices which you wrongfully imagine against" my comfort and honour. And how can such men be convinced? Job's friends were ready to say, in answer to his discourse concerning the prosperity of the wicked, "Where is the house of the prince?" ver. 28: Job's house, or the house of his eldest son, in which his children were feasting. Inquire what are the circumstances of Job's house and family, and then inquire, "Where are the dwelling-places of the wicked?" and compare them together, and you will soon see that Job's house is in the same predicament with the houses of tyrants and oppressors, and may therefore conclude that doubtless he was such a one.

Secondly. He lays down his own judgment to the contrary, and for proof of it appeals to the sentiments and observations of all mankind. So confident is he that he is in the right, that he is willing to refer the cause to the next man that comes by; ver. 29, "Have ye not asked them that go by the way;" any indifferent person, any that will answer you; and not only "to which of the saints," to whom Eliphaz appealed, (ch. v. 1,) but to which of the children of men, "will you turn?" Turn to which you will, and you will find them all of my mind; that the punishment of sinners is designed more for the other world than for this, according to the prophecy of Enoch, the seventh from Adam, Jude 14. "Do you not know the tokens" of this truth, which all that have made any observations upon the providences of God concerning mankind in this world can furnish you with? Now what is it that Job here asserts? Two things:

1. That impenitent sinners will certainly be punished in the other world, and ordinarily their punishment is put off until then.

2. That, therefore, we are not to think it strange if they prosper greatly in this world, and fall under no visible token of God's wrath. Therefore they are spared now, because they are to be punished then; therefore "the workers of iniquity flourish, that they may be destroyed for ever," Ps. xcii. 7. This sinner is here supposed,

1st. To live in a great deal of power, so as to be not only "the terror of the mighty in the land of the living," Eze. xxxii. 27, but the terror of the wise and good too, whom he keeps in such awe that none dares "declare his way to his face," ver. 31. None will take the liberty to reprove him, to tell him of the wickedness of his way, and what will be in the end thereof, so that he sins securely, and is not made to know either shame or fear. "The prosperity of fools destroys them," by setting them, in their own conceit, above reproofs, by which they might be brought to that repentance which alone will prevent their ruin. Those are marked for destruction that are let alone in sin, Hos. iv. 17. And if none dares "declare his way to his face," much less dare any "repay him what he has done," and make him refund there where he has done wrong. He is one of those great flies which break through the cobwebs of the law, that hold only the little ones. This emboldens sinners in their sinful ways, that they can browbeat justice, and make it afraid to meddle with them. But there is a day coming when those shall be told of their faults that now would not bear to hear of them; shall have their sins set in order before them, and their way declared to their face, to their everlasting confusion, that would not have it done here to their conviction; when those who would not repay the wrongs they had done shall have them repaid to them.

2nd. To die and be buried in a great deal of pomp and magnificence, ver. 32, 33. There is no remedy; he must die, that is the lot of all men; but every thing you can think of shall be done to take off the reproach of death. First. He shall have a splendid funeral. A poor thing for any man to be proud of the prospect of; yet with some it passeth for a mighty thing. Well, "he shall be brought unto the grave" in state, surrounded with all the honours of the herald's office, and all the respects his friends can then pay to his remains; "The rich man died and was buried," but no mention is made of the poor man's burial, Lu. xvi. 22. Secondly. He shall have a stately monument erected over him; "He shall remain in the tomb," with a Hic jacet,—'here lies,' over him, and a large encomium. Perhaps it is meant of the embalming of his body to preserve it, which was a piece of honour anciently done by the Egyptians to their great men. 'He shall watch in the tomb,' so the word is, shall abide solitary and quiet there, as a watchman in his tower. Thirdly. "The clods of the valley shall be sweet to him;" there shall be as much done as can be with rich odours to take off the noisomeness of the grave, as by lamps to set aside the darkness of it, which, perhaps, was referred to in the foregoing phrase of watching in the tomb. But it is all a jest. What is the light, or what the perfume, to a man that is dead? Fourthly. It shall be alleged for the lessening of the disgrace of death, that it is the common lot; he has only truckled to fate; "and every man shall draw after him, as there are innumerable before him." Note, Death is the way of all the earth. When we are to cross that darksome valley we must consider, 1st. That there are innumerable before us; it is a tracked road, which may help to take off the terror of it. To die is ire ad plures,—'to go with the crowd.' 2*nd.* That every man shall draw after us. As there is a plain track before, so there is a long train behind; we are neither the first nor the last that pass through that dark entry. Every one must go in his own order, the order appointed of God.

Lastly. From all this Job infers the impertinency of their discourses, ver. 34. 1. Their foundation is rotten, and they went upon a wrong hypothesis. "In your answers there remaineth falsehood;" what you have said stands not only unproved but disproved, and lies under such an imputation of falsehood as you cannot clear it from. 2. Their building was therefore weak and tottering; You comfort me in vain. All you have said gives me no relief; you tell me I shall prosper again if I turn to God, but you go upon this presumption, that piety shall certainly be crowned with prosperity, which is false; and, therefore, how can your inference from it yield me any comfort? Note, Where there is not truth, there is little comfort to be expected.

CHAPTER XXII.

Eliphaz here leads on a third attack upon poor Job, in which Bildad followed him; but Zophar drew back and quitted the field. It was one of the unhappinesses of Job, as it is of many an honest man, to be misunderstood by his friends. He had spoken of the prosperity of wicked men in this world as a mystery of Providence; but they took it for a reflection upon Providence, as countenancing their wickedness, and fell foul upon him accordingly. In this chapter, I. Eliphaz checks him for his complaints of God, and of his dealings with him, as if he thought God had done him wrong, ver. 2—4. II. He charged him with many high crimes and misdemeanours, for which he supposeth God was now punishing him: oppression and injustice, ver. 5—11; Atheism and infidelity, ver. 12—14. III. He compares his case to that of the old world, ver. 15—20. IV. He gives him very good counsel, assuring him that, if he would take it, God would return in mercy to him, and he should return to his former prosperity, ver. 21—30.

THEN Eliphaz the Temanite answered and said,
2 Can a man be profitable unto God,
As he that is wise may be profitable unto himself?
3 Is it any pleasure to the Almighty, that thou art righteous?
Or is it gain to him, that thou makest thy ways perfect?
4 Will he reprove thee for fear of thee?
Will he enter with thee into judgment?

Eliphaz here insinuates that, because Job complained so much of his afflictions, he thought God was unjust in afflicting him. But it was a strained innuendo, Job was far from thinking so. What Eliphaz saith here is therefore unjustly applied to Job, but in itself it is very true and good.

First. That when God doth us good, it is not because he is indebted to us; if he were, there might be some colour to say, when he afflicts us, he doth not deal fairly with us. But whoever pretends that he has by any meritorious action made God his debtor, let him prove his debt, and he shall be sure not to lose it; Rom. xi. 35, "Who has given to him, and it shall be recompensed to him again?" But Eliphaz here shews that the righteousness and perfection of the best man in the world is no real benefit or advantage to God, and, therefore, cannot be thought to merit any thing from him.

1. Man's piety is no profit to God, no gain, ver. 1, 2. If we could by any thing merit from God, it would be by our piety, our being righteous, and making our way perfect. If that will not merit, to be sure nothing else will. If a man cannot make God his debtor by his godliness and honesty, and obedience to his laws, much less can he by his wit and learning, and worldly policy. Now Eliphaz here asks, 1st. Whether any man can possibly be profitable to God? No, by no means. "He that is wise may be profitable to himself." Note, Our wisdom and piety is that which we ourselves are, and are likely to be, great gainers by. "Wisdom is profitable to direct," Eccl. x. 10; "godliness is profitable to all things," 1 Tim. iv. 8; "If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself," Pr. ix. 12. The gains of religion are infinitely greater than the losses of it, and so it will appear when they are balanced. But can a man be thus profitable to God? No, for such is the perfection of God, that he cannot receive any benefit or advantage by men; what can be added to that which is infinite? And such is the weakness and imperfection of man, that he cannot offer any benefit or advantage to God. Can the light of a candle be profitable to the sun, or the drop of the bucket to the ocean? He that is wise is profitable to himself, for his own direction and defence, his own credit and comfort; he can with his wisdom entertain himself, and enrich himself; but can he so be profitable to God? No; God needs not us or our services. We are undone, for ever undone, without him; but he is happy, for ever happy, without us. "Is it any gain to him," any real addition to his glory or wealth, "if we make our way perfect?" Suppose it were absolutely perfect, yet what is God the better? much less when it is so far short of being perfect.

2. It is no pleasure to him. God hath indeed expressed himself in his Word well pleased with the righteous; his countenance beholds them, and his delight is in them and their prayers. But all that adds nothing to the infinite satisfaction and complacency which the Eternal Mind hath in itself. God can enjoy himself without us, though we could have but little enjoyment of ourselves without our friends. This magnifies his condescension, in that, though our services be no real profit or pleasure to him, yet he invites, encourages, and accepts of them.

Secondly. That when God restrains or rebukes us, it is not because he is in danger by us, or jealous of us; ver. 4, "Will he reprove thee for fear of thee?" and take thee down from thy prosperity lest thou shouldst grow too great for him; as princes sometimes have thought it a piece of policy to curb the growing greatness of a subject, lest he should become formidable. Satan indeed suggested to our first parents, that God forbade them the tree of knowledge for fear of them, lest they should be as gods, and so become rivals with him; but it was a base insinuation. God rebukes the good, because he loves them; but he never rebukes the great because he fears them. He doth not enter into judgment with men, that is, pick a quarrel with them, and seek occasion against them, for fear they should eclipse his honour, or endanger his interest. Magistrates punish offenders for fear of them; Pharaoh oppressed Israel because he feared them; it was for fear that Herod slew the children of Bethlehem; that the Jews persecuted Christ and his apostles. But God doth not, as they did, pervert justice for fear of any: see ch. xxxv. 5—8.

5 Is not thy wickedness great?
And thine iniquities infinite?
6 For thou hast taken a pledge from thy brother for nought,
And stripped the naked of their clothing.

readily fallen into the mistake of "lines," for "sorrows." Some translators regard the verse as a series of exclamations, in which case it has a meaning quite contrary to the other. The ambiguity of the Hebrew arises from the absence of what we call notes of interrogation and of admiration.

xxi. 22. "Those that are high," the lofty, may be either angels or men, or both. Rodwell says "angels," Gesenius thinks the "proud" are meant, and Fürst "the height of heaven." Our translation is right.

xxi. 29. Rodwell translates the first part of this verse, "Have ye never asked men of travel?" Similarly, Barnes, "Have ye not inquired of the travellers?" The "tokens" of the travellers are the facts and details supplied by them.

xxi. 32. Instead of "shall remain in the tomb," we prefer the rendering, "one shall watch at his tomb," that is, men who bemoan him will keep watch there. Other explanations proposed are, "he shall cause a watch to be kept over his tomb," "he looks forward to

7 Thou hast not given water to the weary to drink,
And thou hast withholden bread from the hungry.
8 But as for the mighty man, he had the earth;
And the honourable man dwelt in it.
9 Thou hast sent widows away empty,
And the arms of the fatherless have been broken.
10 Therefore snares are round about thee,
And sudden fear troubleth thee;
11 Or darkness, that thou canst not see;
And abundance of waters cover thee.
12 Is not God in the height of heaven?
And behold the height of the stars, how high they are!
13 And thou sayest, How doth God know?
Can he judge through the dark cloud?
14 Thick clouds are a covering to him, that he seeth not;
And he walketh in the circuit of heaven.

Eliphaz and his companions had condemned Job in general, as a wicked man and a hypocrite; but none of them had descended to particulars, nor drawn up any articles of impeachment against him, till Eliphaz did it here, where he positively and expressly charges him with many high crimes and misdemeanours, which if he had really been guilty of they might well have justified themselves in their harsh censures of him. Come, saith Eliphaz, we have been too long beating about the bush, too tender of Job, and afraid of grieving him, which has but confirmed him in his self-justification; it is high time to deal plainly with him. We have condemned him by parables, but that doth not answer the end, he is not prevailed with to condemn himself; we must therefore plainly tell him, "Thou art the man," the tyrant, the oppressor, the atheist, we have been speaking of all this while. "Is not thy wickedness great?" Certainly it is, or thy troubles would not be so great. I appeal to thyself, and thy own conscience, "are not thine iniquities infinite," both in number and heinousness? Strictly taken, nothing is infinite but God. But he means this, his sins were more than could be counted, and more heinous than could be conceived. Sin being committed against an Infinite Majesty, has in it a kind of infinite malignity. But when Eliphaz charges Job thus high, and ventures to descend to particulars too, laying to his charge that which he knew not, we may take occasion from hence, 1. To be angry at those who do unjustly censure and condemn their brethren. For aught I know, Eliphaz, in accusing Job falsely as he doth here, was guilty of as great a sin, and as great a wrong to Job, as the Sabeans and Chaldeans that robbed him; for a man's good name is more precious and valuable than his wealth. It is against all the laws of justice, charity, and friendship, either to raise or receive calumnies, jealousies, and evil surmises concerning others; and it is the more base and disingenuous if we thus vex those that are in distress, and add to their affliction. Eliphaz could produce no instances of Job's guilt in any of the particulars that follow here, but seems resolved to calumniate boldly, and throw all the dirt he could on Job, not doubting but some would stick. 2. To pity those that are thus censured and condemned. Innocency itself will be no security against a false and foul tongue. Job, whom God himself praised as the best man in the world, is here represented by one of his friends, and he a wise and good man too, as one of the greatest villains in nature. Let us not think it strange if at any time we be thus blackened, but learn how to pass by evil report as well as good, and commit our cause, as Job did, to him that judgeth righteously. Let us see the particular articles of this charge:

First. He charges him with oppression and injustice; that when he was in prosperity, he not only did no good with his wealth and power, but did a great deal of hurt with it. This was utterly false, as appears by the account Job gives of himself, ch. xxix. 12, &c., and the character God gave of him, ch. i. And yet,

1. Eliphaz branches out this charge into divers particulars, with as much assurance as if he could call witnesses to prove upon oath every article of it. He tells him, 1st. That he had been cruel and unmerciful to the poor. As a magistrate he ought to have protected them, and seen them provided for; but Eliphaz suspects that he never did them any kindness, but all the mischief his power enabled him to do. That for an inconsiderable debt he demanded and carried away by violence a pawn of great value, even from his brother, whose honesty and sufficiency he could not but know; ver. 6, "Thou hast taken a pledge from thy brother for nought;" or, as the Seventy read it, 'Thou hast taken thy brethren for pledges,' and that for nought; imprisoned them, enslaved them, because they had nothing to pay. That he had taken the very clothes of his insolvent tenants and debtors, all they had to their backs; so that he had stripped them naked, and left them so. The law of Moses forbade this, Ex. xxii. 26; Deu. xxiv. 13. That he had not been charitable to the poor; no, not to poor travellers, and poor widows; "Thou hast not given" so much as a cup of cold water, which would have cost thee nothing, "to the weary to drink," when he begged for it, ver. 7, and was ready to perish for want of it. Nay, thou hast "withholden bread from the hungry" in their extremity; hast not only not given it, but hast forbidden the giving of it, which is withholding good from those to whom it is really due, Pr. iii. 27. Poor widows, that while their husbands were living troubled nobody, but now were forced to seek relief, thou hast sent away empty from thy doors with a sad heart, ver. 9. Those that came to thee for justice thou didst send them away unheard, unhelped; nay, though they came to thee full, thou didst squeeze them, and send them away empty. And, worst of all, the arms of the fatherless have been broken; those that could help themselves but little, thou hast quite disabled to help themselves. This, which is the blackest part of the charge, is but insinuated; "The arms of the fatherless have been broken;" he doth not say, Thou hast broken them, but he would have it understood so. And if they be broken, and those that have power do not relieve them, they are chargeable with it. They have been broken by those under thee, and thou hast connived at it, which brings thee under the guilt. 2nd. That he had been partial to the rich and great; ver. 8, "As for the mighty man," if he were guilty of any crime, yet he should never be questioned for it; "he had the earth, he dwelt in it." If he brought an action never so unjustly, or if an action were never so justly brought against him, yet he was sure to carry his cause in thy courts. The poor were fed not at thy door, while the rich were feasted at thy table. Contrary to this is Christ's rule for hospitality, Lu. xiv. 12—14; and Solomon saith, "He that gives to the rich shall come to poverty."

2. He attributes all his present troubles to these supposed sins, ver. 10, 11. Those that are guilty of such practices as these commonly bring themselves into just such a condition as thou art now in, and therefore we conclude thou hast been thus guilty. 1st. God's providence useth to cross and embarrass such, and snares are accordingly round about thee; so that, which way soever thou steppest or lookest, thou findest thyself in distress; and others are as hard upon thee as thou hast been upon the poor. 2nd. Their own consciences use to terrify and accuse them. No sin makes a louder cry there than unmercifulness. And accordingly "sudden fear troubleth thee;" and, though thou wilt not own it, it is guilt of this kind that creates thee all this terror. Zophar had insinuated this, ch. xx. 19, 20. 3rd. They are brought to their wits' end, so amazed and bewildered that they know not what to do. And that also is thy case; for thou art in "darkness that thou canst not see" wherefore God contends with thee, nor what is the best course for thee to take; "for abundance of waters cover thee," that is, thou art in a mist, in the midst of "dark waters in the thick clouds of the sky." Note, Those that have not shewed mercy may justly be denied the comfortable hopes that they shall find mercy; and then what can they expect but snares, and darkness, and continual fear.

Secondly. He chargeth him with atheism, infidelity, and gross impiety, and thought this was at the bottom of his injustice and oppressiveness; he that did not fear God did not regard man. He would have it thought that Job was an epicurean, who did indeed own the being of God, but denied his providence, and fancied that he confined himself to the entertainments of the upper world, and never concerned himself in the inhabitants and affairs of this.

1. Eliphaz observes a good truth, which, he thought, if Job would duly consider, he would not be so passionate in his complaints, nor so bold in justifying himself; ver. 12, "Is not God in the height of heaven?" Yes, no doubt he is; no heaven so high but God is there. And in the highest heavens, the heavens of the blessed, the residence of his glory, is in a special manner; there he is pleased to manifest himself in a way peculiar to the upper world, and thence he is pleased to manifest himself in a way suited to this lower world: there is his throne; there is his court: he is called the Heavens, Dan. iv. 26. Thus Eliphaz proves that a man cannot be profitable to God, ver. 2, and that he ought not to contend with God; it is his folly if he does. And that we ought always to address ourselves to God with very great reverence; for when we "behold the height of the stars, how high they are," we might at the same time also consider the transcendent majesty of God, who is above the stars, and how high he is.

2. He chargeth it upon Job that he made an ill use of this doctrine, which he might have made so good a use of, ver. 13. This is holding the truth in unrighteousness, fighting against religion with its own weapons, and turning its own artillery upon itself. Thou art willing to own that God is in the height of heaven, but from thence thou inferrest, "how doth God know?" Bad men expel the fear of God out of their hearts, by banishing the eye of God out of the world, Eze. viii. 12; and care not what they do, if they can but persuade themselves that God doth not know. Eliphaz suspects that Job had such notions as this of God, that because he is in the height of heaven, 1st. It is therefore impossible for him to see and hear what is done at so great a distance as this earth; especially since there is a dark cloud, ver. 13, many thick clouds, ver. 14, that come between him and us, and are a covering to him, so that he cannot see, much less can he judge of the affairs of this lower world; as if God had eyes of flesh, ch. x. 4; the interposing firmament is to him as transparent crystal, Eze. i. 22. Distance of place creates no difficulty to him who is immense, no more than distance of time to him who is eternal. Or, 2nd. That it is therefore below him, and a diminution to his glory, to take cognizance of this inferior part of the creation. He "walks in the circuit of heaven," and hath enough to do to enjoy himself and his own perfections and glory in that bright and quiet world; why should he trouble himself about us? This is gross absurdity, as well as gross impiety, which Eliphaz here fathers upon Job; for it supposeth that the administration of government is a burthen and disparagement to the Supreme Governor; and the acts of justice and mercy were a toil to a mind infinitely wise, holy, and good. If the sun, a creature, and inanimate, can with his light and influence reach this earth, and every part of it, Ps. xix. 6, even from that vast height of the visible heavens in which he is, and in the circuit of which he walks, and that through many a thick and dark cloud, shall we question it concerning the Creator?

15 Hast thou marked the old way
Which wicked men have trodden?
16 Which were cut down out of time,
Whose foundation was overflown with a flood:
17 Which said unto God, Depart from us:
And what can the Almighty do for them?
18 Yet he filled their houses with good things:
But the counsel of the wicked is far from me.
19 The righteous see it, and are glad:
And the innocent laugh them to scorn.
20 Whereas our substance is not cut down,
But the remnant of them the fire consumeth.

Eliphaz having endeavoured to convict Job, by setting his sins (as he thought) in order before him, here endeavours to awaken him to a sight and sense of his misery and danger by reason of sin; and this he doth by comparing his case with that of the sinners of the old world; as if he had said, Thy condition is bad now, but unless thou repent it will be worse, as theirs was. Theirs, who were overflown with a flood, as the old world, ver. 16; and theirs, the remnant of whom the fire consumed, ver. 20, namely, the Sodomites, who, in comparison of the old world, were but a remnant. And these two instances of the wrath of God against sin and sinners are more than once put together for warning to a careless world, as by our Saviour, Lu. xvii. 26, &c., and the apostle, 2 Pet. ii. 5, 6. Eliphaz would have Job to mark "the old way which wicked men have trodden," ver. 15, and see what came of it, what the end of their way was. Note, There is an old way which wicked men have trodden; religion had but newly entered when sin immediately followed it. But though it is an old way, a broad way, a tracked way, it is a dangerous way, and it leads to destruction; and it is good for us to mark it, that we may not dare to walk in it. Eliphaz here puts Job in mind of it, perhaps in opposition to what he had said of the prosperity of the wicked; as though he would say, Thou canst find out here and there a single instance, it may be, of a wicked man ending his days in peace; but what is that to those two great instances of the final perdition of ungodly men, the drowning of the whole world, and the burning of Sodom? destructions by wholesale, in which he thinks Job may, as in a glass, see his own face. Observe,

First. The ruin of those sinners; ver. 16, "They were cut down out of time;" that is, they were cut off in the midst of their days; when, as man's time then the tomb and is anxious to have a splendid funeral," "he still survives upon his tomb," "he still keeps watch at his tomb," &c.

xxi. 33. The clods are "sweet," or pleasant; he reposes in perfect peace and quiet. The rest of the verse is literally, "and after him every man shall draw, and before him numberless." We see no reason for seeking a recondite sense: this grandee is a type of humanity; every man will follow him to the grave, as innumerable men have preceded him thither.

xxii. 2, 3. These verses illustrate what is a peculiarity of the Book of Job; the word for "God" is El, and the word for "Almighty" is Shaddai. Eloah, another word for God (e.g., verse 12), also occurs in this book, like El and Shaddai, more often than elsewhere.

xxii. 16. Some have seen here a reference to the deluge, but it is very doubtful whether the language is not figurative, as in Psa. xc. 5. The word nahar may mean an overflowing river, but not such a catastrophe as the Noachic deluge.

went, many of them might in the course of nature have lived some hundreds of years longer, which made their immature extirpation the more grievous. They were cut down out of time to be hurried into eternity; and their foundation, the earth on which they built themselves, and all their hopes, was overflown with a flood, the flood which was brought in upon the world of the ungodly, 2 Pet. ii. 5. Note, Those who build upon the sand choose a foundation which will be overflown, when the rains descend, and the floods come, Mat. vii. 27; and then their building must needs fall, and they perish in the ruins of it, and repent their folly when it is too late.

Secondly. The sin of those sinners which brought that ruin; ver. 17, "They said unto God, Depart from us." Job had spoke of some who said so, and yet prospered, ch. xxi. 14; but these did not, saith Eliphaz, they found to their cost what it was to set God at defiance. Those that were resolved to lay the reins in the neck of their appetites and passions began with this; they said unto God, "Depart;" they abandoned all religion, hated the thoughts of it, and desired to live without God in the world; they shunned his Word, and silenced conscience, his deputy. "And what can the Almighty do for them?" Some make this to speak the justness of their punishment: they said to God, "Depart from us," and then what else could the Almighty do with them, but cut them off? Those that will not submit to God's golden sceptre, what is to be expected but that they should be broken to pieces with his iron rod? Others make it to speak the injustice of their sin: But what hath the Almighty done against them? what iniquity have they found in him? or wherein has he wearied them? Mic. vi. 3; Jer. ii. 5. Others make it to speak the reason of their sin: they say unto God, Depart, asking what the Almighty can do to them: What has he done to oblige us? what can he do in a way of wrath to make us miserable? or in a way of favour to make us happy? as they argue, Zeph. i. 12, "The Lord will not do good, neither will he do evil." Eliphaz shews the absurdity of this in one word, and that is calling God the Almighty; for, if he be so, what cannot he do? But it is not strange if those cast off all religion who neither dread God's wrath nor desire his favour.

Thirdly. The aggravation of this sin; "Yet he had filled their houses with good things," ver. 18. Both those of the old world and those of Sodom had great plenty of all the delights of sense; for "they ate, they drank, they bought, they sold," &c., Lu. xvii. 27. So that they had no reason to ask what the Almighty could do for them; for they lived upon his bounty: no reason to bid him depart from them who had been so kind to them. Many have their houses full of goods, but their hearts empty of grace, and thereby are marked for ruin.

Fourthly. The protestation which Eliphaz makes against the principles and practices of those wicked people; "But the counsel of the wicked is far from me." Job had said so, ch. xxi. 16, and Eliphaz will not be behind with him. If they cannot agree in their own principles concerning God, yet they agree in renouncing the principles of those that live without God in the world. Note, Those that differ from each other in some matters of religion, and are engaged in disputes about them, yet ought unanimously and vigorously to appear against atheism and irreligion, and to take great care that their disputes do not hinder either their vigour or unanimity in that common cause of God, that righteous cause.

Fifthly. The pleasure and satisfaction which the righteous shall have in this. 1. In seeing the wicked destroyed, ver. 19. They shall see it, that is, observe it, and take notice of it, Hos. xiv. 9; and they shall be glad, not to see their fellow-creatures miserable, or any secular turn of their own served, or point gained, but to see God glorified, the word of God fulfilled, the power of oppressors broken, and thereby the oppressed relieved; to see sin shamed, atheists and infidels confounded, and fair warning given to all others to shun such wicked courses. Nay, they shall laugh them to scorn, that is, they justly might do it; they shall do it as God doth it, in a holy manner, Ps. ii. 4; Pr. i. 26. They shall take occasion from thence to expose the folly of sinners, and shew how ridiculous their principles are, though they call themselves wits. "Lo this is the man that made not God his strength;" and see what comes of it, Ps. lii. 7. Some understand this of righteous Noah and his family, who beheld the destruction of the old world, and rejoiced in it, as he had grieved for their impiety. And Lot, who saw the ruin of Sodom, had the same reason to rejoice, 1 Pet. ii. 8. 2. In seeing themselves distinguished; ver. 20, "Whereas our substance is not cut down," as theirs was, and as thine is; we continue to prosper, which is a sign we are the favourites of Heaven, and in the right. The same rule that served him to condemn Job by served him to magnify himself and his companions by: His substance is cut down, therefore he is a wicked man: ours is not, therefore we are righteous. But it is a deceitful rule to judge by; for none knows love or hatred by all that is before him. If others be consumed, if the very remnant of them be consumed, and we be not, instead of censuring them, and lifting up ourselves as Eliphaz doth here, we ought to be thankful to God, and take it for a warning to ourselves to prepare for the like calamities.

21 Acquaint now thyself with him, and be at peace:
Thereby good shall come unto thee.
22 Receive, I pray thee, the law from his mouth,
And lay up his words in thine heart.
23 If thou return to the Almighty, thou shalt be built up,
Thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacles.
24 Then shalt thou lay up gold as dust,
And the gold of Ophir as the stones of the brooks.
25 Yea, the Almighty shall be thy defence,
And thou shalt have plenty of silver.
26 For then shalt thou have thy delight in the Almighty,
And shalt lift up thy face unto God.
27 Thou shalt make thy prayer unto him, and he shall hear thee,
And thou shalt pay thy vows
28 Thou shalt also decree a thing,
And it shall be established unto thee:
And the light shall shine upon thy ways.
29 When men are cast down,
Then thou shalt say, There is lifting up;
And he shall save the humble person.
30 He shall deliver the island of the innocent:
And it is delivered by the pureness of thine hands

Methinks I can almost forgive Eliphaz his hard censures of Job, which we had in the beginning of the chapter, though they were very unjust and unkind, for this good counsel and encouragement which he gives him in these verses, with which he closeth his discourse, and than which nothing could be better said, or more to the purpose. Though he thought him a bad man, yet he saw reason to have hopes concerning him: that for all this he would be both pious and prosperous. But it is strange that out of the same mouth, and almost in the same breath, both sweet waters and bitter should proceed. Good men, though they may perhaps be put into a heat, yet sometimes will talk themselves into a better temper, and, it may be, sooner than another could talk them into it. Eliphaz had laid before Job the miserable condition of a wicked man, that he might frighten him to repentance. Here, on the other hand, he shews him the happiness which those may be sure of that do repent, that he might allure and encourage him to it. Ministers must try both ways in dealing with people, must speak to them from mount Sinai by the terrors of the law, and from mount Zion by the comforts of the Gospel; must set before them both life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse. Now here observe,

First. The good counsel which Eliphaz gives to Job; and good counsel it is to us all, though as to Job it was built upon a false supposition that he was a wicked man, and now a stranger and enemy to God.

1. "Acquaint now thyself with God;" 'acquiesce in God,' so some. And our great duty it is at all times, especially when we are in affliction, to accommodate ourselves to, and quiet ourselves in, all the disposals of the Divine providence. 'Join thyself to him,' so some; fall in with his interests, and act no longer in opposition to him. Ours renders it very well, "Acquaint thyself with him." Be not such a stranger to him as thou hast made thyself by casting off the fear of him, and restraining prayer before him. It is the duty and interest of every one of us to acquaint ourselves with God. We must get the knowledge of him, fix our affections on him, join ourselves to him in a covenant of friendship, and then set up and keep up a constant correspondence with him, in the ways he has appointed. It is our honour that we are made capable of this acquaintance; our misery that by sin we have lost it; our privilege that through Christ we are invited to return to it; and it will be our unspeakable happiness to contract and cultivate this acquaintance.

2. "Be at peace." At peace with thyself, not fretful and uneasy, and in confusion; let not thy heart be troubled; but be quiet and calm, and well composed. Be at peace with thy God; be reconciled to him: do not carry on this unholy war. Thou complainest God is thine enemy: be thou friends with him. It is the great concern of every one of us to make our peace with God, and it is necessary in order to our comfortable acquaintance with him; for "can two walk together except they be agreed?" Am. iii. 3. This we must do quickly, now, before it be too late. Agree with thine adversary while thou art in the way. This we are earnestly urged to do. Some read it, 'Acquaint thyself, I pray thee, with him, and be at peace.' God himself beseeches us; ministers in Christ's stead pray us to be reconciled. Can we gainsay such entreaties?

3. "Receive the law from his mouth," ver. 22. Having made thy peace with God, submit to his government, and resolve to be ruled by him, that thou mayst keep thyself in his love. We receive our being and maintenance from God; from him we hope to receive our bliss, and from him we must receive law; "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" Acts ix. 6. Which way soever we receive the intimations of his will, we must have our eye to him; whether he speaks by Scripture, ministers, conscience, or providence, we must take the word as from his mouth, and bow our souls to it. Though in Job's time we do not know that there was any written word, yet there was a revelation of God's will to be received. Eliphaz looked upon Job as an ill man; and was pressing him to repent and reform. And herein consists the conversion of a sinner, his receiving the law from God's mouth, and no longer from the world and the flesh. Eliphaz being now in contest with Job, appeals to the Word of God for the ending of the controversy; Receive that, and be determined by it. "To the law and to the testimony."

4. "Lay up his word in thine heart." It is not enough to receive it, but we must retain it, Pr. iii. 18. We must lay it up as a thing of great value, that it may be safe; and we must lay it up in our hearts as a thing of great use, that it may be ready to us when there is occasion, and we may neither lose it wholly nor be at a loss for it in a time of need.

5. "Return to the Almighty," ver. 23. Do not only turn from sin, but turn to God and thy duty. Do not only turn towards the Almighty in some good inclinations and good beginnings, but return to him, (return home to him, quite to him, so as to reach to the Almighty, so Mr. Poole,) by a universal reformation, an effectual, thorough change of thy heart and life, and a firm resolution to cleave to him.

6. "Put away iniquity far from thy tabernacle." This was the advice Zophar gave him, ch. xi. 14, "Let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacle." Put iniquity far off, the farther the better, not only from thy heart and hand, but from thy house. Thou must not only not be wicked thyself, but reprove and restrain sin in those that are under thy charge. Note, Family reformation is needful reformation; we and our house must serve the Lord.

Secondly. The good encouragement which Eliphaz gives Job, that he should be very happy if he would but take this good counsel. In general, "thereby good shall come unto thee," ver. 21. The good that is now departed from thee, all the good thy heart can desire, temporal, spiritual, eternal good shall come to thee. God shall come to thee, into covenant and communion with thee, and he brings all good with him, all good in him. Thou art now ruined and brought down; but if thou return to God thou shalt be built up again, and thy present ruins shall be repaired. Thy family shall be built up in children, thy estate in wealth, and thy soul in holiness and comfort. The promises which Eliphaz here encourageth Job with are reducible to three heads:

1. That his estate should prosper, and temporal blessings should be bestowed abundantly upon him; for godliness hath the promise of the life that now is. It is promised,

1st. That he shall be very rich; ver. 24, "Thou shalt lay up gold as dust," in such great abundance, "and shalt have plenty of silver," ver. 25, whereas now thou art poor and stripped of all. Job had been rich; Eliphaz suspected he got his riches by fraud and oppression, and therefore they were taken from him. But if he would return to God and duty, First. He should have more wealth than ever he had; not only thousands of sheep and oxen, the wealth of farmers, but thousands of gold and silver, the wealth of princes, ch. iii. 15. There is abundantly more riches, true riches, to be got by the service of God than by the service of the world. Secondly. He should have it more sure to him; Thou shalt lay it up, in good hands, and hold that which is got by thy piety by a surer tenure than that which thou gottest by thine iniquity. Thou shalt have 'silver of strength,' for so the word is, which, being honestly got, will wear well; silver like steel. Thirdly. He should, by the grace of God, be xxii. 18. Barnes regards this as sarcasm, but we think Eliphaz introduces it to illustrate the ingratitude and sin of the wicked, as well as the Divine bounty: though they repudiated God, he gave them abundance; and though he enriched them, they rejected him; at last, however, they came to ruin, whereat the righteous were glad.

xxii. 24. Modern translations differ a good deal from ours here. Thus the new American is, "And cast to the dust the precious ore, and the gold of Ophir to the stones of the brooks." Barnes gives a similar rendering; so others. Delitzsch says that the old versions, which regard it as a promise instead of exhortation, grossly misinterpret. It must be admitted that the critics are greatly divided among themselves as to the precise explanation, but the majority agree in the general sense. We take it to mean that the golden ore is to be returned to the dust out of which it was taken, and to the water-courses among the stones whereof it was found. The word Ophir is properly the name of a place, but is here used for gold.

kept from setting his heart so much upon it as Eliphaz thought he had done. And then wealth is a blessing indeed when we are not ensnared with the love of it. "Thou shalt lay up gold:" but how? not as thy treasure and portion, but "as dust, and as the stones of the brooks." So little shalt thou value it, or expect from it, thou shalt lay it at thy feet, (Acts iv. 35,) not in thy bosom.

2nd. That yet he shall be very safe. Whereas men's riches usually expose them to danger, and he had owned that in his prosperity he was not in safety, ch. iii. 26, now he might be secure, for "The Almighty shall be thy defender;" nay, he "shall be thy defence," ver. 25. He 'shall be thy gold,' so it is in the margin; and it is the same word that is used, ver. 24, for gold, but it signifies also a stronghold, because "money is a defence," Eccl. vii. 12. Worldlings make gold their god, saints make God their gold; and they that are enriched with his favour and grace may truly be said to have abundance of the best gold, and best laid up. We read it, he "shall be thy defence" against the incursions of neighbouring spoilers. Thy wealth shall not then lie exposed as it did to Sabeans and Chaldeans; which some think is the meaning of that, "Thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacle;" taking it as a promise, The iniquity or wrong designed against thee shall be put off, and shall not reach thee. Note, Those must needs be safe, and they be secure, that have Omnipotence itself for their defence. Ps. xci. 1—3.

2. That his soul should prosper, and he should be enriched with spiritual blessings, which are the best blessings.

1st. That he should live a life of complacency in God; ver. 26, "For then shalt thou have thy delight in the Almighty;" and thus the Almighty comes to be thy gold, by thy delighting in him, as worldly people delight in their money. He shall be thy wealth, thy defence, thy dignity; for he shall be thy delight. The way to have our heart's desire is to make God our heart's delight, Ps. xxxvii. 4. If God give us himself to be our joy, he will deny us nothing that is good for us. Now God is a terror to thee; he is so by thine own confession, ch. vi. 4; xvi. 9; xix. 11. But if thou wilt return to him, then, and not till then, he will be thy delight; and it shall be as much a pleasure to thee to think of him as ever it was a pain. No delight is comparable to the delight which gracious souls have in the Almighty. And those that acquaint themselves with him, and submit themselves entirely to him, shall find his favour to be not only their strength, but their song.

2nd. That he should have an humble, holy confidence towards God, such as they are said to have whose hearts condemn them not, 1 Jno. iii. 21. Then shalt thou "lift up thy face to God" with boldness, and not be afraid, as thou now art, to draw near to him. Thy countenance is now fallen, and thou lookest dejected; but when thou hast made thy peace with God, thou shalt blush no more, tremble no more, as now thou dost, and hang thy head no more, but shalt cheerfully, and with a gracious assurance, shew thyself to him, pray before him, and expect blessings from him.

3rd. That he should maintain a constant communion with God. The correspondence, once settled, shall be kept up to thine unspeakable satisfaction. Letters shall be both statedly and occasionally interchanged between thee and heaven, ver. 27. First. Thou shalt, by prayer, send letters to God: "Thou shalt make thy prayer" (the word is, 'thou shalt multiply' thy prayers) unto him, and he will not think thy letters troublesome, though many and long. The oftener we come to a throne of grace, the more welcome. Under all thy burthens, in all thy wants, cares, and fears, thou shalt send to heaven for guidance and strength, wisdom, comfort, and good success. Secondly. He shall, by his providence and grace, answer those letters, and give thee what thou askest of him, either in kind or kindness: "He shall hear thee," and make it to appear he doth so, by what he doth for thee, and in thee. Thirdly. Then thou shalt, by thy praises, reply to the gracious answers which he sent thee: "Thou shalt pay thy vows," and that shall be acceptable to him, and fetch in farther mercy. Note, When God performs that which in our distress we prayed for, we must make conscience of performing that which we then promised, else we do not deal honestly. If we promised nothing else, we promised to be thankful; and that is enough, for it includes all, Ps. cxvi. 14.

4th. That he should have inward satisfaction in the management of all his outward affairs; ver. 28, "Thou shalt decree a thing, and it shall be established unto thee;" that is, thou shalt frame all thy projects and purposes with so much wisdom and grace, and resignation to the will of God, that the issue of them shall be to thy heart's content, just as thou wouldst have it to be. Thou shalt commit thy works unto the Lord, by faith and prayer, and then thy thoughts shall be established; thou shalt be easy and pleased, whatsoever comes, Pr. xvi. 3. This the grace of God shall work in thee; nay, sometimes the providence of God shall give thee the very thing thou didst desire and pray for, and give it thee in thy own way, and manner, and time: "Be it unto thee even as thou wilt." When at any time an affair succeeds just according to the scheme we laid, and our measures are in nothing broken, nor are we put upon new counsels, then we must own the performance of this promise, "Thou shalt decree a thing, and it shall be established unto thee." Whereas now thou complainest of darkness round about thee, then "the light shall shine on thy ways;" that is, God shall guide and direct thee, and then it will follow of course that he shall prosper and succeed thee in all thine undertakings. God's wisdom shall be thy conduct, and his favour thy comfort; and thy ways shall be so under both those lights, as that thou shalt have a comfortable enjoyment of what is present, and a comfortable prospect of what is future, Ps. xc. 17.

5th. That even in times of common calamity and danger he should have abundance of joy and hope; ver. 29, "When men are cast down" round about thee, cast down in their affairs, sinking, desponding, and ready to despair, "then shalt thou say, There is lifting up." Thou shalt find that in thyself which will not only bear thee up under thy troubles, and keep thee from fainting, but lift thee up above thy troubles, and enable thee to rejoice evermore. When men's hearts fail them for fear, then shall Christ's disciples lift up their heads for joy, Lu. xxi. 26, 28. Thus are they made to ride upon the high places of the earth, Isa. lviii. 14, and that which will lift them up is the belief of this, that God will save the humble person. They that humble themselves shall be exalted, not only in honour, but in comfort.

3. That he should be a blessing to his country, and an instrument of good to many; ver. 30, "God shall," in answer to thy prayers, "deliver the island of the innocent," and have a regard therein to "the pureness of thy hands," which is necessary to the acceptableness of our prayers, 1 Tim. ii. 8. But, because we may suppose the innocent not to need deliverance,—it was guilty Sodom that wanted the benefit of Abraham's intercession,—I incline to the marginal reading, 'The innocent shall deliver the island,' by their advice, Eccl. ix. 14, 15, and by their prayers and their interest in heaven, Acts xxvii. 24. Or, 'He shall deliver those that are not innocent, and they are delivered by the pureness of thy hands;' so it may be read, and most probably. Note, A good man is a public good. Sinners fare the better for saints, whether they are aware of it or no. If Eliphaz intended hereby, as some think he did, to insinuate that Job's prayers were not prevailing, nor his hands pure, for then he would have relieved others, much more himself, he was afterwards made to see his error, when it appeared that Job had a better interest in Heaven than he had; for he and his three friends, who in this matter were not innocent, were delivered by the pureness of Job's hands, ch. xlii. 8.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The chapter begins Job's reply to Eliphaz; and in this reply he takes no notice of his friends, either because he saw it was to no purpose, or because he liked the good counsel Eliphaz gave him in the close of his discourse so well, that he would make no answer to the peevish reflections he began with. But he appeals to God; begs to have his cause heard, and doubts not but to make it good; having the testimony of his own conscience concerning his integrity. Here seems to be a struggle between flesh and spirit, fear and faith, throughout this chapter. I. He complains of his calamitous condition, and especially of God's withdrawings from him, so that he could not get his appeal heard, ver. 2—5; nor discern the meaning of God's dealings with him, ver. 8, 9; nor gain any hope of relief, ver. 13, 14; and this made deep impressions of trouble and terror upon him, ver. 15—17. But, II. In the midst of these complaints he comforts himself with the assurance of God's clemency, ver. 6, 7; and his own integrity, which God himself was a witness to, ver. 10—12. Thus was the light of his day, like that spoken of Zec. xiv. 6, 7, neither perfectly clear nor perfectly dark, but at evening time it was light.

THEN Job answered and said,

2 Even to day is my complaint bitter:
My stroke is heavier than my groaning.
3 Oh that I knew where I might find him!
That I might come even to his seat!
4 I would order my cause before him,
And fill my mouth with arguments.
5 I would know the words which he would answer me,
And understand what he would say unto me.
6 Will he plead against me with his great power?
No; but he would put strength in me.
7 There the righteous might dispute with him;
So should I be delivered for ever from my judge.

Job is satisfied that he has wrong done him by his friends, and therefore, as ill as he is, he will not give up the cause, nor let them have the last word. Here,

First. He justifies his own resentments and remonstrances of his trouble; ver. 2, "Even to day," I own, "my complaint is bitter;" for the affliction, the cause of the complaint is so; there is wormwood and gall in the affliction and misery, my soul has them still in remembrance, and is embittered by them, Lam. iii. 19, 20. 'Even to day is my complaint counted rebellion,' so some read it. His friends construed the innocent expressions of his grief, as reflections upon God and his providence, and called them rebellion. But, saith he, I do not complain more than there is cause, "for my stroke is heavier than my groaning." Even to day, after all you have said to convince and comfort me, still the pain of my body, and the wounds of my spirit are such, that I have reason enough for my complaints, if they were more bitter than they are. We wrong God, if our groaning be heavier than our stroke; like froward children, who, when they cry for nothing, have justly something given them to cry for; but we do not wrong ourselves, though our stroke be heavier than our groaning, for little said is soon amended.

Secondly. He appeals from the censures of his friends to the just judgment of God; and this he thought was an evidence for him that he was not a hypocrite, for then he durst not have made such an appeal as this. St. Paul comforts himself in this, that he that judged him was the Lord, and therefore he valued not man's judgment, 1 Cor. iv. 3, 4, but he is willing to wait till the appointed day of decision comes; whereas Job is impatient, and passionately wishes to have the judgment day anticipated, and to have his cause tried quickly, as it were, by a special commission of Oyer and Terminer. The apostle found it necessary to press it much upon suffering Christians patiently to expect the Judge's coming, Jas. v. 7—9.

1. He is so sure of the equity of God's tribunal, that he longs to appear before it; ver. 3, "O that I knew where I might find him!" This may properly speak the pious breathings of a soul convinced it has by sin lost God, and is undone for ever if it recover not its interest in his favour. O that I knew how I might recover his favour! how I might come into covenant and communion with him! Mic. vi. 6, 7. It is the cry of a poor deserted soul, "Saw ye him whom my soul loveth? O that I knew where I might find him!" O that he who has laid open the way to him would direct me into it, and lead me in it! But Job here seems to speak it too boldly, that his friends wronged him, and he knew not which way to apply himself to God to have justice done him, else he would come, even to his seat, to demand it. A patient waiting for death and judgment is our wisdom and duty, and, if we duly consider things, that cannot be without a holy fear and trembling; but a passionate wishing for death or judgment, without any such fear and trembling, is our sin and folly, and ill becomes us. Do we know what death and judgment are, and are we so very ready for them, that we need not time to get readier? "Woe to them that," thus in a heat, "desire the day of the Lord," Am. v. 18.

2. He is so sure of the goodness of his own cause, that he longs to be opening it at God's bar; ver. 4, "I would order my cause before him," and set it in a true light; I would produce the evidences of my sincerity in a proper method, and "would fill my mouth with arguments" to prove it. We may apply this to the duty of prayer, in which we have boldness to enter into the holiest, and to come even to the footstool of the throne of grace; and we have not only liberty of access, but liberty of speech. We have leave, 1st. To be particular in our requests, to order our cause before God, to speak the whole matter, to lay before him all our grievances, in what method we think most proper. We durst not be so free with earthly princes, as an humble, holy soul may be with God. 2nd. To be importunate in our requests. We are allowed not only to pray, but to plead; not only to ask, but to argue; nay, to fill our mouths with arguments. Not to move God,—he is perfectly apprised of the merits of the cause without our shewing,—but to move ourselves, to excite our fervency, and encourage our faith in prayer.

3. He is so sure of a sentence in favour of him, that he even longed to hear it; ver. 5, "I would know the words which he would answer me;" that is, I would gladly hear what God will say to this matter in dispute between you and me, and will entirely acquiesce in his judgment. This becomes us in all controversies. Let the Word of God determine them; let us know what he answers, and understand what he saith. Job knew well enough what his friends would answer him; they would condemn him, and run him down, but, saith he, I would fain know what God would answer me; for I am sure his judgment is according to truth, which theirs is not. I cannot understand them, xxii. 25. For "plenty of silver" some have "silver sought with toil;" others, "silver of the brightest lustre." The Hebrew is ambiguous; Gesenius favours the idea of "toiled for," and Fürst that of glittering, which Ewald has adopted.

xxii. 30. "The island of the innocent" is justly called an absurd rendering, and not much of an improvement on the old version, "the innocent shall deliver the island." Pagninus is said to have originated the blunder, which has been perpetuated among us. Diodati translates, "he shall deliver the guilty," which is correct in sense, the literal version being, "he shall deliver him that is not innocent."

xxiii. 2. Various opinions have been expressed as to the meaning of this verse, where some of the ancient copies appear to have had a different reading. We think that the sense of the passage is, "You still regard my complaining as rebellion, whereas my suffering exceeds my groans." The Hebrew for "my stroke" is "my hand;" that is, the hand which is upon me to afflict, as in Psa. xxxii. 4.

they talk so little to the purpose; but what he saith I should understand, and therefore be fully satisfied in.

Thirdly. He comforts himself with hopes that God would deal favourably with him in this matter, ver. 6, 7. Note, It is of great use to us, in every thing wherein we have to do with God, to keep up good thoughts of him. He believes,

1. That God would not overpower him; that he would not deal with him either by absolute sovereignty or in strict justice; not with a high hand, nor with a strong hand. "Will he plead against me with his great power?" No. Job's friends pleaded against him with all the power they had, but will God do so? No; his power is all just and holy, whatever men's is. Against those that are obstinate in their unbelief and impenitency, God will plead with his great power, their destruction will come from the glory of his power; but with his own people, that love him and trust in him, he will deal in tender compassion.

2. That, on the contrary, he would empower him to plead his own cause before God; "He would put strength in me," to support me and bear me up, in maintaining mine integrity. Note, The same power that is engaged against proud sinners is engaged for humble saints, who prevail with God by strength derived from him, as Jacob did, Hos. xii. 3: see Ps. lxviii. 35.

3. That the issue would certainly be comfortable; ver. 7, "There," in the court of heaven, when the final sentence is to be given, "the righteous might dispute with him," and come off in his righteousness. Now even the upright are often chastened of the Lord, and they cannot dispute against it. Integrity itself is no fence either against calamity or calumny. But in that day they shall not be condemned with the world, though God may afflict by prerogative. "Then you shall discern between the righteous and the wicked," Mal. iii. 18. So vast will be the difference between them in their everlasting state, whereas now we can scarce distinguish them, so little is the difference between them as to their outward condition, "for all things come alike to all." Then, when the final doom is given, "I shall be delivered for ever from my judge;" that is, I shall be saved from the unjust censures of my friends, and from that Divine sentence which is now so much a terror to me. Those that are delivered up to God as their owner and ruler, shall be for ever delivered from him as their judge and avenger; and there is no flying from his justice but by flying to his mercy.

8 Behold, I go forward, but he is not there;
And backward, but I cannot perceive him:
9 On the left hand, where he doth work,
But I cannot behold him:
He hideth himself on the right hand,
That I cannot see him:
10 But he knoweth the way that I take:
When he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold.
11 My foot hath held his steps,
His way have I kept, and not declined. [lips;
12 Neither have I gone back from the commandment of his
I have esteemed the words of his mouth more than my necessary food.

Here, First. Job complains that he cannot understand the meaning of God's providences concerning him, but was quite at a loss about them; ver. 8, 9, "I go forward, but he is not there," &c. Eliphaz had bid him acquaint himself with God; So I would with all my heart, saith Job, if I knew how to get acquainted with him. He had himself a great desire to appear before God, and get a hearing of his case; but the judge was not to be found. Look which way he would he could see no sign of God's appearing for him, to clear up his innocency. Job no doubt believed that God is every where present; but three things he seems to complain of here: 1. That he could not fix his thoughts, nor form any clear judgment of things in his own mind. His mind was so hurried and discomposed with his troubles, that he was like a man in a fright or at his wits' end, that runs this way and that way, but, being in confusion, brings nothing to a head. By reason of the disorder and tumult his spirit was in, he could not fasten upon that which he knew to be in God, and which, if he could but mix faith with it, and dwell upon it in his thoughts, would be a support to him. It is the common complaint of those who are sick or melancholy, that when they would think of that which is good they can make nothing of it. 2. That he could not find out the cause of his troubles, nor the sin which provoked God to contend with him. He took a view of his whole conversation, turned to every side of it, and could not perceive wherein he had sinned more than others, for which he should thus be punished more than others; nor could he discern what other end God should aim at in afflicting him thus. 3. That he could not foresee what would be in the end hereof, whether God would deliver him at all; nor, if he did, when, or which way. He saw not his signs, nor was there any to tell him how long: as the church complains, Ps. lxxiv. 9. He was quite at a loss what to think God would do with him; and, whatever conjecture he advanced, still something or other appeared against it.

Secondly. He satisfies himself with this, that God himself was a witness to his integrity; and, therefore, did not doubt but the issue would be good. After Job had almost lost himself in the labyrinth of the Divine counsels, how contentedly doth he sit down at length with this thought, Though I know not the way that he takes,—for "his way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters," his thoughts and ways are infinitely above ours, and it would be presumption in us to pretend to judge of them,—yet "he knows the way that I take," ver. 10. That is, 1. He is acquainted with it. His friends judged of that which they did not know, and therefore charged him with that which he was never guilty of; but God, who knew every step he had taken, would not do so, Ps. cxxxix. 3. Note, It is a great comfort to those who mean honestly, that God understands their meaning, though men do not, cannot, or will not. 2. He approves of it. He knows that, however I may sometimes have taken a false step, yet I have still taken a good way; have chosen the way of truth; and therefore he knows it: that is, he accepts it, and is well pleased with it, as he is said to know the way of the righteous, Ps. i. 6. This comforted the prophet; Jer. xii. 3, "Thou hast tried my heart towards thee." From this Job infers, "When he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold." They that keep the way of the Lord may comfort themselves, when they are in affliction, with these three things: 1st. That they are but tried. It is not intended for their hurt, but for their honour and benefit; it is the trial of their faith, 1 Pet. i. 7. 2nd. That when they are sufficiently tried they shall come forth out of the furnace, and not be left to consume in it, as dross or reprobate silver. The trial will have an end; "God will not contend for ever." 3rd. That they shall come forth as gold, pure in itself, and precious to the refiner. They shall come forth as gold approved and improved: found to be good, and made to be better. Afflictions are to us as we are; those that go gold into the furnace will come out no worse.

Now that which encouraged Job to hope that his present troubles would thus end well was, the testimony of his conscience for him that he had lived a good life, in the fear of God.

1. That God's way was the way he walked in; ver. 11, "My foot hath held his steps," that is, held to them, held close to them; the steps he takes. I have endeavoured to conform myself to his example. Good people are followers of God. Or, I have accommodated myself to his providence, and endeavoured to answer all the intentions of that,—to follow providence step by step. Or, his steps are the steps he hath appointed me to take: the way of religion and serious godliness, that way I have kept, and have not declined from it; not only not turned back from it, by a total apostacy, but not turned aside out of it by any wilful transgression. His holding God's steps, and keeping his way, intimates that the tempter had used all his arts by fraud and force to draw him aside; but with care and resolution he had by the grace of God hitherto persevered; and those that will do so must hold and keep,—hold with resolution, and keep with watchfulness.

2. That God's Word was the rule he walked by, ver. 12. He governed himself by the commandment of God's lips; and would not go back from that, but go forward according to it. Whatever difficulties we may meet with in the way of God's commandments, though they lead us through a wilderness, yet we must never think of going back, but must press on towards the mark. Job kept close to the law of God in his conversation, for both his judgment and his affection led him to it; "I have esteemed the words of his mouth more than my necessary food;" that is, he looked upon it as his necessary food; could as well have lived without his daily bread as without the Word of God. 'I have laid it up,' so the word is, as those that lay up provision for a siege, or as Joseph laid up corn before the famine. Eliphaz had bid him lay up God's words in his heart, ch. xxii. 22. So I do, saith he, and always did, that I might not sin against him; and that, like the good householder, I might bring forth for the good of others. Note, The Word of God is to our souls as our necessary food is to our bodies, it sustains the spiritual life, and strengthens us for the actions of life; it is that which we cannot subsist without, and which nothing else can make up the want of. And we ought therefore so to esteem it, to take pains for it, hunger after it, feed upon it with delight, and nourish our souls with it; and this will be our rejoicing in the day of evil, as it was Job's here.

13 But he is in one mind, and who can turn him?
And what his soul desireth, even that he doeth.
14 For he performeth the thing that is appointed for me:
And many such things are with him.
15 Therefore am I troubled at his presence:
When I consider, I am afraid of him.
16 For God maketh my heart soft,
And the Almighty troubleth me:
17 Because I was not cut off before the darkness,
Neither hath he covered the darkness from my face.

Some make Job to complain here, that God dealt unjustly and unfairly with him, in proceeding to punish him, without the least relenting or relaxation, though he had such incontestable evidences to produce of his innocency. I am loath to think holy Job would charge the holy God with iniquity; but his complaint is indeed bitter, and peevish enough, and he reasons himself into a sort of patience perforce, which he cannot do without reflecting upon God as dealing hardly with him; but he must bear it, because he cannot help it. The worst he saith is, that God deals unaccountably with him.

First. He lays down good truths, and which were capable of a good improvement, ver. 13, 14.

1. That God's counsels are immutable; "He is in one mind, and who can turn him?" 'He is one,' so some read it; or 'in one.' He has no counsellors by whose interest he might be prevailed with to alter his purpose. He is one with himself, and never alters his mind, never alters his measures. Prayer has prevailed to change God's way and his providence, but never was his will or purpose changed; for known unto God are all his works.

2. That his power is irresistible; "What his soul desireth," or designs, "even that he doth;" and nothing can stand in his way, or put him upon new counsels. Men desire many things, which either they may not do, or cannot do, or dare not do, but God has an incontestable sovereignty; his will is so perfectly pure and right that it is highly fit that he should be arbitrary. And he has an uncontrollable power: "None can stay his hand. Whatever the Lord pleased, that he did," Ps. cxxxv. 6; and always will, for it is always best.

3. That all he doth is according to the counsel of his will; ver. 14, "He performeth the thing that is appointed for me." Whatever happens to us, it is God that performs it, Ps. lvii. 2; and an admirable performance the whole will appear to be when the mystery of God shall be finished. He performs all that, and that only, that was appointed, and in the appointed time and method. This may silence us; for what is appointed cannot be altered. But to consider that when God was appointing us to eternal life and glory, as our end, he was appointing to this condition, this affliction, whatever it is, in our way; this may do more than silence us, it may satisfy us, that it is all for the best; and though what he doth we know not now, yet we shall know hereafter.

4. That all he doth is according to the custom of his providence; "Many such things are with him;" that is, he doth many things in the course of his providence which we can give no account of, but must resolve into his absolute sovereignty. Whatever trouble we are in others have been in the like; our case is not singular, "the same afflictions are accomplished in our brethren," 1 Pet. v. 9. Are we sick, or sore, impoverished and stripped, children removed by death, or friends unkind, this is what God has appointed for us, and many such things are with him. "Shall the earth be forsaken for us?"

Secondly. He makes but a bad use of these good truths. Had he duly considered them he might have said, Therefore am I easy and pleased, and well reconciled to the way of my God concerning me; therefore will I rejoice, in hope that my troubles will issue well at last. No, "Therefore am I troubled at his presence" ver. 15. Those are indeed of troubled spirits who are troubled at the presence of God; as the psalmist, who "remembered God, and was troubled," Ps. lxxvii. 3. See what confusion poor Job was now in, for he contradicted himself. Just now he was troubled for God's absence, ver. 8, 9, now he is troubled at his presence; "When I consider, I am afraid of him." What he now felt made him fear worse. There is indeed that which, if we consider, xxiii. 8, 9. For "forward," "backward," "on the left hand," and "on the right hand," some versions have east, west, north, and south. The American translators consider the majesty of the passage obscured by our version, but we are not sure that it should be altered. As in some other cases, the Hebrew words are capable of two renderings, and here our translators have adopted the literal one.

xxiii. 11. The words, "my foot hath held his steps," mean much the same as "my feet ha e kept in his tracks." Thus Rodwell, "my foot hath held to his tracks." The second clause of the verse repeats the idea, with the incidental allusion to the fact that his course had been consistent, that he had not turned aside.

xxiii. 13, 14. Although the word "mind" is not in the Hebrew, there can be little doubt that the unity of the Divine purpose is meant by the first clause of verse 13, as the fulfilment of it is denoted by the second. For "desireth" we should substitute "wills" or "purposes."

we shall see cause to be afraid of God, his infinite justice and purity, compared with our own sinfulness and vileness; but if withal we consider his grace in a Redeemer, and our compliance with that grace, the fears will vanish, and we shall see cause to hope in him.

See what impressions were made upon him by the wounds of his spirit. 1. He was very fearful, ver. 14. The Almighty troubled him, and so made his heart soft; that is utterly unable to bear any thing, and afraid of every thing that stirred. There is a gracious softness, like that of Josiah, whose heart was tender, and trembled at the word of God. This is meant of a grievous softness, which apprehends every thing that is present to be pressing, and every thing future to be threatening. 2. He was very fretful, peevish indeed, for he quarrels with God, ver. 17. 1st. Because he did not die before his troubles, that he might never have seen them; "Because I was not cut off before the darkness." And yet, if in the height of his prosperity he had received a summons to the grave, he would have thought it hard. This may help to reconcile us to death, whenever it comes, that we do not know what evil we may be taken away from. But, when trouble is come, it is folly to wish we had not lived to see it; and it is better to make the best of it. 2nd. Because he was left to live so long in his troubles, and the darkness was not covered from his face, by his being hid in the grave. We should bear the darkness better than thus if we would but remember that to the upright there sometimes ariseth a marvellous light in the darkness. However, there is reserved for them a more marvellous light after it.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Job, having by his complaints in the foregoing chapter given vent to his passion, and thereby gained some ease, breaks them off abruptly; and now applies himself to a farther discussion of the doctrinal controversy between him and his friends, concerning the prosperity of wicked people. That many live at ease who yet are ungodly and profane, and despise all the exercises of devotion, he had shewed, ch. xxi. Now here he goes farther, and shews that many who are mischievous to mankind, and live in open defiance to all the laws of justice and common honesty, yet thrive and succeed in their unrighteous practices; and we do not see them reckoned with in this world. What he had said before, ch. xii. 6, "The tabernacles of robbers prosper," he here enlargeth upon; he lays down his general proposition, ver. 1, that the punishment of wicked people is not so visible and apparent as his friends supposed, and then proves it by an induction of particulars. I. Those that openly do wrong to their poor neighbours are not reckoned with, nor the injured righted, ver. 2—12; though they are very barbarous, ver. 21, 22. II. Those that secretly practise mischief often go undiscovered and unpunished, ver. 13—17. III. That God punisheth such by secret judgments, and reserves them for future judgments, ver. 18—20, and ver. 23—25; so that, upon the whole matter, we cannot say that all that are in trouble are wicked, for it is certain all that are in prosperity are not righteous.

WHY, seeing times are not hidden from the Almighty,
Do they that know him not see his days?
2 Some remove the landmarks;
They violently take away flocks, and feed thereof
3 They drive away the ass of the fatherless,
They take the widow's ox for a pledge.
4 They turn the needy out of the way:
The poor of the earth hide themselves together.
5 Behold, as wild asses in the desert, go they forth to their work;
Rising betimes for a prey: [children.
The wilderness yieldeth food for them and for their 6 They reap every one his corn in the field:
And they gather the vintage of the wicked.
7 They cause the naked to lodge without clothing,
That they have no covering in the cold.
8 They are wet with the showers of the mountains,
And embrace the rock for want of a shelter.
9 They pluck the fatherless from the breast,
And take a pledge of the poor.
10 They cause him to go naked without clothing,
And they take away the sheaf from the hungry;
11 Which make oil within their walls,
And tread their winepresses, and suffer thirst
12 Men groan from out of the city,
And the soul of the wounded crieth out:
Yet God layeth not folly to them.

Job's friends had been very positive in it, that they should soon see the fall of wicked people, how much soever they might prosper for a while. By no means, saith Job; though times are not hidden from the Almighty, yet they that know him do not presently see his day, ver. 1. 1. He takes it for granted that times are not hidden from the Almighty; past times are not hid from his judgment, Eccl. iii. 15; present times are not hid from his providence, Mat. x. 29; future times are not hid from his prescience, Acts xv. 18. God governs the world, and therefore we may be sure he takes cognizance of it. Bad times are not hid from him, though the bad men that make the times bad say one to another that he has forsaken the earth, Ps. xciv. 6, 7. Every man's times are in his hand, and under his eye, and therefore it is in his power to make the times of wicked men in this world miserable. He foresees the time of every man's death, and therefore, if wicked men die before they are punished for their wickedness, we cannot say they escaped him by surprise; he foresaw it, nay, he ordered it. Before Job will inquire into the reasons of the prosperity of wicked men, he asserts God's omniscience, as one prophet in a like case asserts his righteousness, Jer. xii. 1; another his holiness, Hab. i. 13; another his goodness to his own people, Ps. lxxiii. 1. General truths must be held fast, though we may find it difficult to reconcile them to particular events. 2. He yet asserts that they that know him, that is, wise and good people that are acquainted with him, and with whom his secret is, do not see his days, not the day of his judging for them. This was the thing he complained of in his own case, ch. xxiii. 8, that he could not see God appearing on his behalf to plead his cause; nor the day of his judging against open and notorious sinners: that is called his day, Ps. xxxvii. 13. We believe that day will come, but we do not see it, because it is future, and its presages secret. 3. Though this is a mystery of providence, yet there is a reason for it, and we shall shortly know when and wherefore the judgment is deferred; and even the wisest, and those that know God best, do not yet see it. God will exercise their faith and patience, and excite their prayers for the coming of his kingdom, for which they are to cry day and night to him, Lu. xviii. 7. For the proof of this, that wicked people prosper, he instanceth in two sorts of unrighteous ones, whom all the world saw thriving in their iniquity.

First. Tyrants, and those that do wrong under pretence of law and authority. It is a melancholy sight which has often been seen under the sun, "wickedness in the place of judgment," Eccl. iii. 16; the unregarded tears of the oppressed, while "on the side of the oppressors there was power," Eccl. iv. 1; the violent perverting of justice and judgment, Eccl. v. 8.

1. They disseize their neighbours of their real estates, which came to them by descent from their ancestors. They "remove the landmarks," under pretence that they were misplaced, ver. 2, and so they encroached upon their neighbour's rights; and think they effectually secure that to their posterity which they have got wrongfully, by making that to be an evidence for them which should have been an evidence for the rightful owner. This was forbidden by the law of Moses, Deu. xix. 14; under a curse, Deu. xxvii. 17. Forging or destroying deeds is now a crime equivalent to this here.

2. They dispossess them of their personal estates under colour of justice; "they violently take away flocks," pretending they are forfeited, "and feed thereof;" as the rich man took the poor man's ewe-lamb, 2 Sam. xii. 4. If a poor fatherless child hath but an ass of his own to get a little money with, they find some colour or other to take it away, because the owner is not able to contest with them. It is all one if a widow has but an ox, for what little husbandry she hath, under pretence of distraining for some small debt, or arrears of rent, this ox shall be taken for a pledge, though perhaps it is the widow's all. God has taken it among the titles of his honour to be "a Father of the fatherless, and a Judge of the widows;" and therefore those will not be reckoned his friends that do not to their utmost protect and help them; but those he will certainly reckon with as his enemies that vex and oppress them.

3. They take all occasions to offer personal abuses to them, ver. 4. They will mislead them if they can when they meet them on the highway, so that the poor and needy are forced to hide themselves from them; having no other way to secure themselves from them. They love in their hearts to banter people, and to make fools of them, and do them a mischief if they can; especially to triumph over a poor body, whom they turn out of the way of getting relief, threaten to punish them as vagabonds, and so force them to abscond, and laugh at them when they have done. Some understand those barbarous actions, ver. 9, 10, to be done by those oppressors that pretend law for what they do. "They pluck the fatherless from the breast;" that is, having made poor infants fatherless, they make them motherless too; having taken away the father's life, they break the mother's heart, and so starve the children, and leave them to perish. Pharaoh and Herod plucked the children from the breast to the sword; and we read of children brought forth to the murderers, Hos. ix. 13: and those are inhuman murderers indeed that can with so much pleasure suck innocent blood. "They take a pledge of the poor," and so they rob the spital; nay, they take the poor themselves for a pledge, as some read it: and probably it was under this pretence that "they plucked the fatherless from the breast," distraining them for slaves, as Neh. v. 5. Cruelty to the poor is great wickedness, and cries aloud for vengeance. Those who shew no mercy to them that lie at their mercy shall themselves have judgment without mercy. Another instance of their barbarous usage of those they have advantage against is, that they take from them even their necessary food and raiment. They squeeze them so with their extortion that they make them "go naked without clothing," ver. 10, and so catch their death. And if a poor hungry family has gleaned a sheaf of corn, to make a little cake of, that they may eat it and die; even that they take away from them, being well pleased to see them perish for want, while they themselves are fed to the full.

4. They are very oppressive to the labourers they employ in their service. They not only give him no wages, though the labourer is worthy of his hire, and this is a crying sin, Jas. v. 4; but they will not so much as give them meat and drink. 'Those that carry their sheaves are hungry,' so some read it, ver. 10, and it agrees with ver. 11, that those who make oil within their walls, and with a great deal of toil labour at the winepresses, yet suffer thirst; which was worse than muzzling the mouth of the ox that treads out the corn. Those masters forget that they have a Master in heaven who will not allow the necessary supports of life to their servants and labourers, not caring whether they can live by their labour.

5. It is not only among the poor country people, but in the cities also, that we see the tears of the oppressed; ver. 12, "Men groan from out of the city," where the rich merchants and traders are as cruel with their poor debtors as the landlords in the country are with their poor tenants. In cities such cruel actions as these are more observed than in obscure corners of the country, and the wronged have easier access to justice to right themselves, and yet the oppressors there fear neither the restraints of the law nor the just censures of their neighbours; but the oppressed groan and cry out like wounded men, and can no more ease and help themselves, for the oppressors are inexorable, and deaf to their groans.

Secondly. He speaks of robbers and rapparees, and those that do wrong by downright force, as the bands of the Sabeans and Chaldeans which had lately plundered him. He doth not instance particularly in them, lest he should seem partial to his own cause, and to judge of men (as we are apt to do) by what they are to us; but among the Arabians, the children of the East, (Job's country,) there were those that lived by spoil and rapine, making incursions upon their neighbours, and robbing travellers. See how they are described here, and what mischief they do, ver. 5—8. 1. Their character is that they are "as wild asses in the desert," untamed, untractable, unreasonable; Ishmael's character, Gen. xvi. 13; fierce and furious, and under no restraint of law or government, Jer. ii. 23, 24. They choose the deserts for their dwelling, that they may be lawless and unsociable, and that they may have opportunity of doing the more mischief. The desert is indeed the fittest place for such wild people, ch. xxxix. 6. But no desert can set men out of the reach of God's eye and hand. 2. Their trade is to steal, and to make a prey of all about them. They have chosen it as their trade; it is their work, because there is more to be got by it, and it is got easier, than by an honest calling. They follow it as their trade, they follow it close; they go forth to it as their work, as "man goes forth to his labour," Ps. civ. 23. They are diligent and take pains at it, they rise betimes for a prey; if a traveller be out early, they will be out as soon to rob him. They live by it as a man lives by his trade; "the wilderness," not the grounds there, but the xxiii. 17. Job was not cut off before the darkness of affliction overtook him, nor preserved from the sight of misfortunes.

xxiv. 1. Recent translators especially differ from the rendering of our version here. For example, Barnes: "Why, since no events are hidden from the Almighty, do not his friends see his judgments?" Rodwell: "Why are not times (of retribution) reserved by Shaddai? and why do they who know him, not see his days?" The new American version: "Why, if times are not hidden from the Almighty, do they that know him not see his days?" Bernard: "Why is it thus? Events are not hidden from the Almighty, yet they that love him do not see his days." Patrick says, "If punishments from the Almighty be so apparent and visible upon the wicked, why do not they who are truly pious see these public and open judgments?"

xxiv. 12. The word rendered "folly" here may be understood to mean a "prayer;" hence the new American version has, "and God heeds not the prayer," which is probably correct.

roads there, "yieldeth food for them and for their children." They maintain themselves and their families by robbing on the highway; and bless themselves in it without any remorse of compassion or conscience, and with as much security as if it were honestly got, as Ephraim, Hos. xii. 7, 8. 3. See the mischief they do to the country. They not only rob travellers, but they make incursions upon the neighbours, and "reap every one his corn in the field," ver. 6; that is, they enter upon other people's ground, cut their corn, and carry it away as freely as if it were their own. Even 'the wicked gather the vintage, and it is their wickedness:' or, as we read it, "they gather the vintage of the wicked," and so one wicked man is made a scourge to another. What the wicked got by extortion, which is their way of stealing, these robbers get from them in their way of stealing. Thus oftentimes are the spoilers spoiled, Isa. xxxiii. 1. 4. The misery of those that fall into their hands; ver. 7, 8, "They cause the naked," whom they have stripped, not leaving them the clothes to their backs, "to lodge," in the cold nights, "without clothing," so that "they are wet with the showers of the mountains," and, for want of a better shelter, embrace the rock, and are glad of a cave or den in it to preserve them from the injuries of the weather. Eliphaz had charged Job with such inhumanity as this, concluding that Providence would not thus have stripped him if he had not first stripped the naked of their clothing, ch. xxii. 6; Job here tells him there were those that were really guilty of those crimes with which he was unjustly charged, and yet prospered and had success in their villanies; the curse they laid themselves under working invisibly. And Job thinks it more just to argue as he did, from an open, notorious course of wickedness, to infer a secret and future punishment, than to argue as Eliphaz did, who, from nothing else but a present trouble, inferred a past course of secret wickedness.

The impunity of these oppressors and spoilers is expressed in one word; ver. 12, "Yet God layeth not folly to them;" that is, he doth not immediately prosecute them with his judgments for these crimes, nor make them examples, and so evince their folly to all the world. "He that gets riches, and not by right, at his end shall be a fool," Jer. xvii. 11: but while he prospers he passes for a wise man, and God lays not folly to him till he saith, "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee," Lu. xii. 20.

13 They are of those that rebel against the light;
They know not the ways thereof,
Nor abide in the paths thereof.
14 The murderer rising with the light
Killeth the poor and needy,
And in the night is as a thief.
15 The eye also of the adulterer waiteth for the twilight,
Saying, No eye shall see me:
And disguiseth his face.
16 In the dark they dig through houses,
Which they had marked for themselves in the daytime:
They know not the light.
17 For the morning is to them even as the shadow of death:
If one know them, they are in the terrors of the shadow of death.

These verses describe another sort of sinners, who therefore go unpunished, because they go undiscovered. "They rebel against the light," ver. 13. Some understand it figuratively; they sin against the light of nature, the light of God's law, and that of their own consciences. They profess to know God, but they rebel against the knowledge they have of him, and will not be guided and governed, commanded and controlled, by it. Others understand it literally: they have the daylight, and choose the night as the most advantageous season for their wickedness. Sinful works are therefore called works of darkness, because he that doth evil hates the light, Jno. iii. 20; knows not the ways thereof, that is, keeps out of the way of it; or, if he happen to be seen, he abides not where he thinks he is known. So that he here describes the worst of sinners: 1. That sin wilfully, and against the convictions of their own consciences, whereby they add rebellion to their sin. 2. That sin deliberately, and with a great deal of plot and contrivance, using a thousand arts to conceal their villanies, fondly imagining that if they can but hide them from the eye of men they are safe; but forgetting that there is no darkness or shadow of death in which the workers of iniquity can hide themselves from God's eye, ch. xxxiv. 22. He instances in three sorts of sinners that shun the light:

First. Murderers, ver. 14. They rise with the light, as soon as ever the day breaks, to kill the poor travellers that are up early, and abroad about their business, going to market with a little money or goods; and, though it is so little that they are really to be called poor and needy, that with much ado get a sorry livelihood by their marketings, yet to get it the murderer will both take his neighbour's life, and venture his own; will rather play at such small game than sit out. Nay, he kills for killing sake, thirsting more for blood than booty. See what care and pains wicked men take to compass their wicked designs, and let it shame us out of our negligence and slothfulness in doing good.

Ut jugulent homines, surgunt de nocte latrones,
Tuque ut te serves non expergisceris?—
'Rogues nightly rise to murder men for pelf,
Will you not rouse you to preserve yourself?'

Secondly. Adulterers. The eyes that are full of adultery, 2 Pet. ii. 14, the unclean and wanton eyes, wait for the twilight, ver. 15. The eye of the adultress did so, Pr. vii. 9. Adultery hides its head for shame. The sinners themselves, even the most impudent, do what they can to hide it. Si non caste, tamen caute,—'if not chastely, yet cautiously;' and after all the wretched endeavours of the factors for hell to take away the reproach of it, it is and ever will be "a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret," Eph. v. 12. It hides its head also for fear, knowing that jealousy is the rage of a husband, who will not spare in the day of vengeance, Pr. vi. 34, 35. See what pains those take that make provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts of it! Pains to compass, and then to conceal, that provision, which after all will be death and hell at last. Less pains would serve to mortify and crucify the flesh, which would be life and heaven at last. Let the sinner change his heart, and then he needs not disguise his face, but may lift it up without spot.

Thirdly. Housebreakers, ver. 16. These mark houses in the daytime, mark the avenues of a house, and on which side they can most easily force their entrance, and then in the night dig through them, either to kill or steal, or commit adultery. The night favours the assault, and makes the defence the more difficult; for "the goodman of the house knows not what hour the thief will come," and therefore is asleep, Lu. xii. 39, and he and his lie exposed. For this reason our law makes burglary, which is the breaking and entering of a dwelling house in the night time, with a felonious intent, to be felony without benefit of clergy. And,

Lastly. Job observes (and perhaps observes it as part of the present, though secret punishment of such sinners as these) that they are in a continual terror for fear of being discovered; ver. 17, "the morning is to them even as the shadow of death." The light of the day, which is welcome to honest people, is a terror to ill people: they curse the sun, not as the Moors, because it scorcheth them, but because it discovers them. "If one know them," their consciences fly in their faces, and they are ready to become their own accusers; for "they are in the terrors of the shadow of death." Shame came in with sin, and everlasting shame is at the end of it. See the misery of sinners, they are exposed to continual frights, and yet their folly, that they are afraid of coming under the eye of men, but have no dread of God's eye, which is always upon them; and that they are not afraid of doing that which yet they are so terribly afraid of being known to do.

18 He is swift as the waters;
Their portion is cursed in the earth:
He beholdeth not the way of the vineyards.
19 Drought and heat consume the snow waters:
So doth the grave those which have sinned.
20 The womb shall forget him;
The worm shall feed sweetly on him;
He shall be no more remembered;
And wickedness shall be broken as a tree.
21 He evil entreateth the barren that beareth not:
And doeth not good to the widow.
22 He draweth also the mighty with his power:
He riseth up, and no man is sure of life. [resteth;
23 Though it be given him to be in safety, whereon he Yet his eyes are upon their ways. [brought low;
24 They are exalted for a little while, but are gone and
They are taken out of the way as all other,
And cut off as the tops of the ears of corn.
25 And if it be not so now, who will make me a liar,
And make my speech nothing worth?

Job here in the conclusion of his discourse,

First. Gives some farther instances of the wickedness of these cruel bloody men. 1. Some are pirates and robbers at sea. To this many learned interpreters apply those difficult expressions, ver. 18, "He is swift upon the waters." Privateers choose those ships that are the best sailers. In these swift ships they cruise from one channel to another to pick up prizes; and this brings them in so much wealth that "their portion is cursed in the earth," and they "behold not the way of the vineyards;" that is, as Bishop Patrick explains it, they despise the employment of those who till the ground and plant vineyards, as poor and unprofitable. But others make this a farther description of the carriage of those sinners that are afraid of the light; if they be discovered, they get away as fast as they can, and choose to look not in the vineyards for fear of being discovered, but in some cursed portion, a lonely desolate place, which nobody looks after. 2. Some are abusive to those that are in trouble, and add affliction to the afflicted. Barrenness was looked upon as a great reproach; and those that fall under that affliction they upbraid them with it, as Peninnah did Hannah, on purpose to vex them and make them to fret, which is a barbarous thing. This is evil intreating the barren that beareth not, ver. 21; or those that are childless, and so want the arrows others have in their quiver, which enable them to deal with their enemy in the gate, Ps. cxxvii. 5. He takes that advantage against, and is oppressive to, them. As the fatherless, so the childless are in some degree helpless; and for the same reason it is a cruel thing to hurt the widow, to whom he ought to do good. And not doing good when it is in our power, is doing hurt. 3. There are those who, by inuring themselves to cruelty, come at last to be so exceedingly boisterous that they are the terror of the mighty in the land of the living, ver. 22. He draws the mighty into a snare with his power, even the greatest are not able to stand before him, when he is in his mad fits. He riseth up in his passion, and lays about him with so much fury that no man is sure of his life; nor can he at the same time be sure of his own, for his hand is against every man, and every man's hand against him, Gen. xvi. 12. One would wonder how any man can take pleasure in making all about him afraid of him, yet there are those that do.

Secondly. He shews that these daring sinners prosper, and are at ease for awhile; nay, and many times end their days in peace, as Ishmael, who, though he was a man of such a character as is here given, yet both lived and died in the presence of all his brethren, as we are told, Gen. xvi. 12; xxv. 18. Of these sinners here it is said, 1. That it is given them to be in safety, ver. 23; they seem to be under the special protection of the Divine providence; and one would wonder how they escape with life through so many dangers as they run themselves into. 2. That they rest upon this; that is, they rely upon this as sufficient to warrant all their violences. "Because sentence against their evil works is not executed speedily," they think there is no great evil in them, and that God is not displeased with them, nor will ever call them to an account. Their prosperity is their security. 3. That they are exalted for awhile; they seem to be the favourites of Heaven, and value themselves as making the best figure on earth. They are set up in honour, set up, as they think, out of the reach of danger, and lifted up in the pride of their own spirits. 4. That at length they are carried out of the world very silently and gently, and without any remarkable disgrace or terror. 'They go down to the grave as easily as snow water sinks into the dry ground when it is melted by the sun.' So Bishop Patrick explains ver. 19. And to the same purpose he paraphraseth ver. 20, "The womb shall forget him," &c. 'God sets no such mark of his displeasure upon him, but that his mother may soon forget him. The hand of justice doth not hang him on a gibbet for the birds to feed on; but he is carried to his grave like other men, to be the sweet food of worms. There he lies quietly, and neither he nor his wickedness are any more remembered than a xxiv. 13. This verse must be read in connection with the preceding. It may be very literally rendered, "These are with those that rebel against the light; they know not its ways, and they abide not in its paths." Men who perform deeds of darkness hate the light in more ways than one; and those about to be described hate it literally, and avoid it when pursuing their evil courses. Such sinners are those who are enumerated in this and the four following verses, namely, the murderer, the adulterer, and the burglar.

xxiv. 17. Daylight is odious to the wicked, and fatal to their designs. The second member of this verse is very obscurely translated, and almost unintelligible. Barnes renders it, "For they are familiar with the terrors of the shadow of death;" and Rodwell, "Then is it that each feels terror of death-shade." Delitzsch has, "For they know the terrors of the depth of night;" and Benisch, "Yea, they recognise the terrors of the shadow of death." Any of these versions is better than ours, which is encumbered by additions.

tree which is broken to shivers. And, ver. 24, "They are taken out of the way as all other;" that is, 'they are shut up in their graves like all other men; nay, they die as easily (without those tedious pains which some endure) as an ear of corn is cropped with your hand.' Compare this with Solomon's observation, Eccl. viii. 10, "I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone from the place of the holy, and they were forgotten."

Thirdly. He foresees their fall, however, and that their death, though they die in ease and honour, will be their ruin; "God's eyes are upon their ways," ver. 23. Though he keep silence and seem to connive at them, yet he takes notice, and keeps account of all their wickedness, and will make it to appear shortly, that their most secret sins, which they thought no eye should see, (ver. 15,) were under his eye, and will be called over again. Here is no mention of the punishment of these sinners in the other world; but it is intimated in the particular notice taken of the consequence of his death. 1. The consumption of the body in the grave, though common to all, yet to him is in the nature of a punishment for his sin. The grave shall consume those that have sinned; that land of darkness will be the lot of those that love darkness rather than light. The bodies they pampered shall be a feast for worms, which shall feed as sweetly on them as ever they fed on the pleasures and gains of their sins. 2. Though they thought to make themselves a great name by their wealth and power, and mighty achievements, yet "their memorial is perished with them," Ps. ix. 6. He that made himself so much talked of, when he is dead shall be no more remembered with honour, his name shall rot, Pr. x. 7. They that durst not give him his due character while he lived shall not spare him when he is dead; so that the womb that bare him, his own mother, shall forget him: that is, shall avoid making mention of him, and shall think that the greatest kindness she can do him, since no good can be said of him. That honour which is got by sin will soon turn into shame. 3. The "wickedness" they thought to establish in their families "shall be broken as a tree;" all their wicked projects shall be blasted, and all their wicked hopes dashed and buried with them. 4. Their pride shall be brought down, and laid in the dust, ver. 24; and in mercy to the world they shall be taken out of the way, and all their power and prosperity shall be cut off; you may seek him, and he shall not be found. Job owns that wicked people will be miserable at last; miserable on the other side death, but utterly denies what his friends asserted, that ordinarily they are miserable in this life.

Lastly. He concludes with a bold challenge to all that were present to disprove what he had said if they could; ver. 25, "If it be not so now," as I have opened, and if it do not from thence follow that I am unjustly condemned and censured, let them that can, undertake to prove that my discourse is either, 1. False in itself, and then they prove me a liar; or, 2. Foreign, and nothing to the purpose, and then they prove my speech frivolous and nothing worth. That indeed which is false is nothing worth; where there is not truth how can there be goodness? But they that speak the words of truth and soberness need not fear having what they say brought to the test; but can cheerfully submit it to a fair examination, as Job doth here.

CHAPTER XXV.

Bildad here makes a very short reply to Job's last discourse, as one that began to be sick of the cause. He drops the main question concerning the prosperity of wicked men, as being unable to answer the proofs Job had produced in the foregoing chapter; but, because he thought Job had made too bold with the Divine majesty, in his appeals to the Divine tribunals, ch. xxiii., he, in a few words, shews the infinite distance there is between God and man, teaching us, I. To think highly and honourably of God, ver. 2, 3, 5. II. To think meanly of ourselves, ver. 4, 6; which, however misapplied to Job, are two good lessons for us all to learn.

THEN answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said,
2 Dominion and fear are with him,
He maketh peace in his high places.
3 Is there any number of his armies?
And upon whom doth not his light arise?
4 How then can man be justified with God?
Or how can he be clean that is born of a woman?
5 Behold even to the moon, and it shineth not;
Yea, the stars are not pure in his sight.
6 How much less man, that is a worm?
And the son of man, which is a worm?

Bildad is to be commended here for two things: 1. For speaking no more to the matter about which Job and he differed. Perhaps he began to think Job was in the right; and then it was justice to say no more to it, as one that contended for truth not for victory, and therefore for the finding of truth would be content to lose the victory. Or, if he still thought himself in the right, yet he knew when he had said enough, and would not wrangle endlessly for the last word. And it may be one reason why he and the rest of them let fall this debate was, because they perceived that Job and they did not differ so much in opinion as they thought. They owned that wicked people might prosper awhile, and Job owned they would be destroyed at last, and how little then was the difference! If disputants would understand one another better, perhaps they would find themselves nearer one another than they imagined. 2. For speaking so well to the matter about which Job and he were agreed. If we would all get our hearts filled with awful thoughts of God, and humble thoughts of ourselves, we should not be so apt as we are to fall out about matters of doubtful disputation, which are trifling or intricate. Two ways Bildad takes here to exalt God and abase man:

First. He shews how bright, and blessed, and glorious, God is; and from thence infers how guilty and impure man is before him, ver. 2—4. Let us see then,

1. What great things are here said of God; designed to possess Job with a reverence of him, and to check his reflections upon him, and upon his dealings with him.

1st. God is the Sovereign Lord of all, and with him is terrible majesty. "Dominion and fear are with him," ver. 2. He that gave being has an incontestable authority to give laws, and can enforce the laws he gives. He that made all has a right to dispose of all according to his own will, with an absolute sovereignty. Whatever he will do, he doth, and may do, and none can say unto him, What dost thou? or why dost thou so? Dan. iv. 34. His having dominion (or being Dominus,—'Lord') speaks him both owner and ruler of all the creatures. They are all his, and they are all under his direction, and at his disposal. From hence it follows that he is to be feared, that is, reverenced and obeyed, and that he is feared by all that know him,—the seraphim cover their faces before him; and that first or last all will be made to fear him: men's dominion is often despicable, often despised, but God is always terrible.

2nd. The glorious inhabitants of the upper world are all perfectly observant of him, and entirely acquiesce in his will; "He maketh peace in his high places." He enjoys himself in a perfect tranquillity. The holy angels never quarrel with him, nor with one another, but entirely acquiesce in his will; and unanimously execute it without murmuring or disputing. Thus the will of God is done in heaven; and thus we pray it may be done by us and others on earth. The sun, moon, and stars, keep their courses, and never clash with one another. Nay, even in this lower region, which is often disturbed with storms and tempests, yet, when God pleaseth, he commandeth peace by making the storm a calm, Ps. cvii. 29; lxv. 7. Observe, the high places are his high places; for "the heavens, even the heavens are the Lord's" in a peculiar manner. Peace is God's work; where it is made it is he that makes it, Isa. lvii. 19. In heaven there is perfect peace; for there is perfect holiness, and there is God, who is love.

3rd. He is a God of irresistible power. "Is there any number of his armies?" ver. 3. The greatness and power of princes is judged of by their armies. God is not only himself almighty, but he has numberless numbers of armies at his beck and disposal; standing armies, that are never disbanded; regular troops, and well disciplined, that are never to seek, never at a loss, never mutiny; veteran troops, that have been long in the service; victorious troops, that never failed of success, nor were ever foiled. All the creatures are his hosts, angels especially; he is Lord of all, Lord of hosts. He hath numberless armies, and yet maketh peace; he could make war upon us, but is willing to be at peace with us; and even the heavenly hosts were sent to proclaim peace on earth, and good-will towards men, Lu. ii. 14.

4th. His providence extends itself to all. "Upon whom doth not his light arise?" The light of the sun is communicated to all parts of the world, and, take the year round, to all equally: see Ps. xix. 6. That is a faint resemblance of the universal cognizance and care God takes of the whole creation, Mat. v. 45. All are under the light of his knowledge, and are naked and open before him. All partake of the light of his goodness; it seems especially to be meant of that. He is good to all; the earth is full of his goodness. He is Deus optimus,—'God the best of beings,' as well as maximus,—'the greatest;' has power to destroy, but his pleasure is to shew mercy. All the creatures live upon his bounty.

2. What ill things are here said of man, and very truly and justly; ver. 4, "How then can man be justified with God? or how can he be clean?" Man is not only mean, but vile; not only earthy, but filthy: he cannot be justified, he cannot be clean, 1st. In comparison with God. Man's righteousness and holiness at the best is nothing to God's, Ps. lxxxix. 6. 2nd. In debate with God. He that will quarrel with the word and providence of God must unavoidably go by the worst. God will be justified, and then man must be condemned, Ps. li. 4; Rom. iii. 4. There is no error in God's judgment, and therefore there lies no exception against it, nor appeal from it. 3rd. In the sight of God. If God be so great and glorious, how can man, who is guilty and impure, appear before him? Note, First. Man by reason of his actual transgressions is obnoxious to God's justice, and cannot in himself be justified before him. He can neither plead not guilty, nor plead any merit of his own, to balance or extenuate his guilt; "the Scripture has concluded all under sin." Second y. Man by reason of his original corruption, as he is born of a woman, is odious to God's holiness, and cannot be clean in his sight. God sees his impurity, and it is certain by it he is rendered utterly unfit for communion and fellowship with God here, and for the vision and fruition of him in glory hereafter. We have need therefore to be born again of water and of the Holy Ghost, and to be bathed again and again in the blood of Christ, that fountain opened.

Secondly. He shews how dark and defective even the heavenly bodies are in the sight of God, and in comparison with him; and from thence infers how little, and mean, and worthless, man is.

1. The lights of heaven, though beauteous creatures, are before God but as clods of earth; ver. 5, "Behold, even to the moon," walking in brightness; and the stars, those glorious lamps of heaven, which the heathen were so charmed with the lustre of that they worshipped them; yet, in God's sight, in comparison with him, they shine not. They are not pure; they have no glory by reason of the glory which excelleth; as a candle, though it burn, yet doth not shine when it is set in the clear light of the sun. Even the glory of God shining in his providences eclipseth the glory of the brightest creatures; Isa. xxiv. 23, "The moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in mount Zion." The heavenly bodies are often clouded; we plainly see spots in the moon, and with the help of glasses may sometimes discern spots on the sun too. But God sees spots in them that we do not see. And how durst Job then so confidently appeal to God, who would discover that amiss in him which he was not aware of in himself?

2. The children of men, though noble creatures, are before God but as worms of the earth; ver. 6, "How much less" doth "man" shine in honour, how much less is he pure in righteousness, "that is a worm, and the son of man," whoever he be, "that is a worm!" A vermin, so some; not only mean and despicable, but noxious and detestable. A mite, so others; the smallest animal, which cannot be discerned with the naked eye, but through a magnifying glass. Such a thing is man. 1st. So mean and little and inconsiderable in comparison with God, and with the holy angels. So worthless and despicable, having his original in corruption, and hastening to corruption. What little reason has man then to be proud, and what great reason to be humble! 2nd. So weak and impotent, and so easily crushed; and, therefore, a very unequal match for Almighty God. Shall man be such a fool to contend with his Maker, who can tread him to pieces easier than he can a worm? 3rd. So dirty and filthy. Man is not pure; for he is a worm, hatched in putrefaction, and therefore odious to God. Let us, therefore, wonder at God's condescension in taking such worms as we are into covenant and communion with himself; especially at the condescension of the Son of God in emptying himself so far as to say, "I am a worm, and no man," Ps. xxii. 6.

CHAPTER XXVI.

This is Job's short reply to Bildad's short discourse; in which he is so far from contradicting him, that he confirms what he had said; and outdoes him in magnifying God, and setting forth his power, to shew what reason he had still to say as he did, ch. xiii. 2, "What ye know, the same do I know also." I. He shews that Bildad's discourse was foreign to the matter he was discoursing of; though very true and good, yet not to the purpose, ver. 2—4. II. That it was needless to the person he was discoursing with; for he knew it, and believed it, and could speak of it as well as he, and better, and could add to the proofs which he had produced of God's power and greatness, which he doth in the rest of his discourse, ver. 5—13; concluding that, when they had both said what they could, all came short of the merit of the subject, and it was still far from being exhausted, ver. 14.

xxiv. 18. For "he is swift as the waters," the Hebrew has "he is swift upon the face of the waters." The idea is, that the wicked swiftly pass away, as if carried along by a rapid stream; but the comparison is not expressed in the original. What follows means that such a man's possessions are involved in his own ruin, and he visits them no more. The two next verses continue the description of his doom. The figures employed point to a certain rather than a violent end—an irresistible rather than a sudden fate.

xxiv. 21—25. These verses appear to set forth the character and course of a man who employs his position and influence in perpetrating wrongs upon his fellows. Some critics, however, put a different construction upon them, connecting verse 21 with the preceding, and applying verses 22 and 23 to God's providential care of men. In that case, verse 24 is viewed as intimating that, after all their sins and successes, they perish. We regard all the verses as spoken of the wicked, with the exception of verse 23, which may fairly be explained

BUT Job answered and said,
2 How hast thou helped him that is without power?
How savest thou the arm that hath no strength?
3 How hast thou counselled him that hath no wisdom?
And how hast thou plentifully declared the thing as it is?
4 To whom hast thou uttered words?
And whose spirit came from thee?

One would not have thought that Job, now he was in so much pain and misery, should banter his friend as he doth here, and make himself merry with the impertinency of his discourse. Bildad thought he had made a fine speech, that the matter was so weighty, and the language so fine, that he had gained the reputation both of an oracle and of an orator; but Job peevishly enough shews that his performance was not so valuable as he thought it, and ridicules him for it. He shews,

First. That there was no great matter to be found in it; ver. 3, "How hast thou plentifully declared the thing as it is?" This is spoken ironically, upbraiding Bildad with the good conceit he himself had of what he had said. 1. He thought he had spoken very clearly, had declared the thing as it is. He was very fond, as we are all apt to be, of his own notions, and thought they only were right and true, and intelligible, and all other notions of the thing were false, mistaken and confused. Whereas, when we speak of the glory of God, we cannot declare the thing as it is; for we see it through a glass darkly, or but by reflection, and shall not see him as he is till we come to heaven. Here "we cannot order our speech concerning him," ch. xxxvii. 19. 2. He thought he had spoken very fully, though in few words, that he had plentifully declared it; and, alas! it was but poorly and scantily that he declared it, in comparison with the vast compass and copiousness of the subject.

Secondly. That there was no great use to be made of it; cui bono?—'What good hast thou done' by all that thou hast said? ver. 2, "How hast thou," with all this mighty flourish, "helped him that is without power?" ver. 3, "How hast thou," with thy grave dictates, "counselled him that hath no wisdom?" Job would convince him, 1. That he had done God no service by it, nor made him in the least beholden to him. It is indeed our duty, and will be our honour, to speak on God's behalf; but we must not think that he needs our service, or is indebted to us for it, nor will he accept it if it come from a spirit of contention and contradiction, and not from a sincere regard to God's glory. 2. That he had done his cause no service by it. He thought his friends were mightily beholden to him, for helping them at a dead lift to make their part good against Job, when they were quite at a loss, and had no strength, no wisdom. Even weak disputants, when warm, are apt to think truth more beholden to them than really it is. 3. That he had done him no service by it. He pretended to convince, instruct, and comfort Job; but, alas! what he had said was so little to the purpose, that it would not avail to rectify any mistakes, nor to assist him either in bearing his afflictions or in getting good by them; ver. 4, "To whom hast thou uttered words?" Was it to me that thou didst direct thy discourse? and dost thou take me for such a child as to need these instructions? Or, dost thou think them proper for one in my condition? Every thing that is true and good is not suitable and seasonable. To one that was humbled, and broken, and grieved in spirit, as Job was, he ought to preach of the grace and mercy of God, rather than of his greatness and majesty; to lay before him the consolations rather than the terrors of the Almighty. Christ knows how to speak what is proper for the weary, Isa. l. 4; and his ministers should learn rightly to divide the word of truth, and not make those sad whom God would not have made sad, as Bildad did. And therefore, Job asks him, "Whose spirit came from thee?" that is, What troubled soul would ever be revived and relieved, and brought to itself, by such discourses as these? Thus are we often disappointed in our expectations from our friends that should comfort us; but the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, never mistakes in his operation, nor misseth of his end.

5 Dead things are formed from under the waters,
And the inhabitants thereof.
6 Hell is naked before him,
And destruction hath no covering.
7 He stretcheth out the north over the empty place,
And hangeth the earth upon nothing.
8 He bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds;
And the cloud is not rent under them.
9 He holdeth back the face of his throne,
And spreadeth his cloud upon it.
10 He hath compassed the waters with bounds,
Until the day and night come to an end.
11 The pillars of heaven tremble
And are astonished at his reproof.
12 He divideth the sea with his power,
And by his understanding he smiteth through the proud.
13 By his spirit he hath garnished the heavens;
His hand hath formed the crooked serpent.
14 Lo, these are parts of his ways: but how little a portion is heard of him?
But the thunder of his power who can understand?

The truth received a great deal of light from the dispute between Job and his friends concerning those points about which they differed; but now they are upon a head in which they were all agreed, the infinite glory and power of God. How doth truth triumph, and how bright doth it shine, when there appears no other strife between the contenders but which shall speak most highly and honourably of God, and be most large in shewing forth his praise! It were well if all disputes about matters of religion might end thus, in glorifying God as Lord of all, and our Lord, with one mind, and one mouth, Rom. xv. 6; for to that we have all attained, in that we are all agreed.

First. Many illustrious instances are here given of the wisdom and power of God in the creation and preservation of the world.

1. If we look about us, to the earth and waters here below, we shall see mighty instances of omnipotence, which we may gather up out of these verses:

1st. "He hangs the earth upon nothing," ver. 7. The vast terraqueous globe neither rests upon any pillars, nor hangs upon any axletree; and yet, by the almighty power of God, is firmly fixed in its place, poised with its own weight. The art of man could not hang a feather upon nothing, yet the Divine wisdom hangs the whole earth so. It is ponderibus librata suis,—'poised by its own weight,' so saith the poet; it is upheld by the word of God's power, so saith the apostle. What is hung upon nothing may serve us to set our feet on, and bear the weight of our bodies; but it will never serve us to set our hearts on, nor bear the weight of our souls.

2nd. He "sets bounds to the waters of the sea," and compasseth them in, ver. 10, that they may not return to cover the earth; and these bounds shall continue unmoved, unshaken, unworn, "till the day and night come to an end," when time shall be no more. Herein appears the dominion which Providence hath over the raging waters of the sea; and so it is an instance of his power, Jer. v. 22, and the care which Providence takes of the poor sinful inhabitants of the earth, who, though obnoxious to his justice, and lying at his mercy, are thus preserved from being overwhelmed, as they were once by the waters of a flood; and will continue to be so, because they are reserved unto fire.

3rd. He "forms dead things under the waters;" rephaim,—'giants are formed under the waters,' that is, vast creatures of prodigious bulk, as whales, giant-like creatures, among the innumerable inhabitants of the water; so Bishop Patrick.

4th. By mighty storms and tempests he shakes the mountains, which are here called "the pillars of heaven," ver. 11; and even divideth the sea, and smiteth through its proud waves, ver. 12. At the presence of the Lord the sea flies, and the mountains skip, Ps. cxiv. 3, 4: see Hab. iii. 6, &c. A storm furrows the waters, and doth as it were divide them; and then a calm smites through the waves, and lays them flat again: see Ps. lxxxix. 10. Those who think Job lived at or after the time of Moses apply this to the dividing of the Red sea before the children of Israel, and the drowning of the Egyptians in it. "By his understanding he smiteth through Rahab," so the word is, and Rahab is often put for Egypt, as Ps. lxxxvii. 4; Isa. li. 9.

2. If we consider hell beneath, though it is out of our sight, yet we may conceive the instances of God's power there. By hell and destruction, ver. 6, we may understand not only the grave and those that are buried in it,—that they are under the eye of God, though laid out of our sight, which may strengthen our belief of the resurrection of the dead, (God knows where to find, and whence to fetch, all the scattered atoms of the consumed body,)—but we may take it as meant also of the place of the damned, where the separate souls of the wicked are in misery and torment. That is hell and destruction, which are said to be before the Lord, Pr. xv. 11, and here to be naked before him; to which it is probable there is an allusion, Rev. xiv. 10, where sinners are said to be tormented in the presence of the holy angels, who attended the Shechinah, and in the presence of the Lamb. And this may give light to ver. 5, which some ancient versions read thus, (and, I think, more agreeable to the signification of the word rephaim,) 'Behold the giants groan under the waters, and those that dwell with them' and then follows, "hell is naked before him," typified by the drowning of the giants of the old world; so the learned Mr. Joseph Mede understands it, and with it illustrates Pr. xxi. 16, where hell is called "the congregation of the dead;" and it is the same word which is here used, and which he would there have rendered 'the congregation of the giants,' in allusion to the drowning of the sinners of the old world: and is there any thing in which the majesty of God appears more dreadful than in the eternal ruin of the ungodly, and the groans of the inhabitants of the land of darkness? Those that will not with angels fear and worship, shall for ever with devils fear and tremble, and God will therein be glorified.

3. If we look up to heaven above, we shall see instances of God's sovereignty and power.

1st. "He stretcheth out the north over the empty place," ver. 7. So he did at first. Then "he stretched out the heavens like a curtain," Ps. civ. 2; and still continues to keep them stretched out, and will do so till the general conflagration, when they shall be "rolled together as a scroll," Rev. vi. 14. He instanceth in the north, because his country, as ours, lay in the northern hemisphere; and the air is the empty place over which it is stretched out: see Ps. lxxxix. 12. What an empty place is this world in comparison with the other!

2nd. He keeps the waters that are said to be above the firmament from pouring down upon the earth, as once they did; ver. 8, "He bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds," as if they were tied close in a bag, till there is occasion to use them; and, notwithstanding the mighty weight of water so raised and laid up, yet "the cloud is not rent under them," for then they would burst, and pour out as a spout; but they do as it were distil through the cloud, and so come drop by drop, in mercy to the earth, in small rain or great rain, as he pleaseth.

3rd. He conceals the glory of the upper world, the dazzling lustre of which we poor mortals could not bear; ver. 9, "He holds back the face of his throne," that light in which he dwells, "and spreads a cloud upon it," through which he judgeth, ch. xxii. 13. God will have us to live by faith, not by sense, for that is agreeable to a state of probation. It were not a fair trial if the face of God's throne were as visible now as it will be in the great day.

'Lest his high throne, above expression bright,
With deadly glory should oppress our sight;
To break the dazzling force, he draws a screen
Of sable shades, and spreads his clouds between.'—Sir R. Blackmore.

4th. The bright ornaments of heaven are the work of his hands; ver. 13, "By his Spirit," the Eternal Spirit that moved upon the face of the waters, "the breath of his mouth," Ps. xxxiii. 6, "he hath garnished the heavens," not only made them, but beautified them; has curiously bespangled them with stars by night, and painted them with the light of the sun by day. God having made man to look upward, (os homini sublime dedit,—'to man he gave an erect countenance,') has therefore garnished the heavens to invite him to look upwards; that, by pleasing his eye with the dazzling light of the sun, and the sparkling light of the stars, their number, order, and various magnitudes, which as so many golden studs beautify the canopy which is drawn over our heads, he may be led to admire the great Creator, the father and fountain of lights, and to consider, if the pavement be so richly inlayed, what is the palace! If the visible heavens be so glorious, what are those that are out of sight! From the beauteous garniture of the antichamber we may infer the precious furniture of the presence chamber. If stars be so bright, what are angels! What is meant here by the crooked serpent which his hands have formed, is not certain. Some make it part of the garnishing of the heavens; the milky-way, say some; some particular constellation so called, say others. It is the same word that is used for leviathan, Isa. xxvii. 1; and probably may be meant of the whale or crocodile, in which appears much of the power of the Creator; and why may not Job conclude with that inference, when God himself doth so? ch. xli.

that God gives security to the sinful, but marks the course they follow; so that, while they participate in his common goodness, they incur his displeasure.

xxv. 1—6. Upon this brief chapter Barnes says, "Bildad does not attempt to meet the appeals which Job had made to facts, or reply to his arguments. He does not even reproach Job, as he and his friends had done before, or express his conviction that he was a wicked man. The speech is evidently that of one who felt that he must say something, but who did not know how to meet the course of argument which Job had pursued. He asserts, in a lofty strain the majesty, dominion, and infinite perfection of the Deity; and then repeats the proposition that, in the sight of such a God, the whole universe must be regarded as impure. It would seem to be implied that he supposed that Job's arguments went on the supposition that man was pure, and that all that was necessary to be said was to re-affirm the impossibility that any should be holy in the sight of God."

Secondly. He concludes at last with an awful et cætera; ver. 14, "Lo, these are parts of his ways," the outgoings of his wisdom and power; the ways in which he walks, and by which he makes himself known to the children of men. Here, 1. He acknowledgeth with adoration the discoveries that were made of God. These things which he himself had said, and which Bildad had said, are his ways, and this is heard of him; this is something of God. But, 2. He admires the depth of that which is undiscovered. This that we have said is but part of his ways, a small part. What we know of God is nothing in comparison with what is in God, and what God is. After all the discoveries which God has made to us, and all the inquiries we have made after God, still we are much in the dark concerning him, and must conclude, "Lo, these are but parts of his ways." Something we hear of him by his works, and by his Word; but, alas, "how little a portion is heard of him!" heard by us, heard from us. We know but in part, we prophesy but in part. When we have said all we can concerning God, we must even do as St. Paul doth, Rom. xi. 33; despairing to find the bottom, sit down at the brink, and adore the depth: "O the depth of the wisdom and knowledge of God!" It is but a little portion that we hear and know of God in our present state. He is infinite and incomprehensible; our understandings and capacities are weak and shallow, and the full discoveries of the Divine glory are reserved for the future state. Even "the thunder of his power," that is, his powerful thunder, one of the lowest of his ways, here in our own region, we cannot understand: see ch. xxxvii. 4, 5. Much less can we understand the utmost force and extent of his power, the terrible efforts and operations of it, and particularly "the power of his anger," Ps. xc. 11. God is great, and we know him not.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Job had sometimes complained of his friends, that they were so eager in disputing that they would scarce let him put in a word; "Suffer me that I may speak:" and "O that you would hold your peace;" but now it seems they were out of breath, and left him room to say what he would. Either they were themselves convinced that Job was in the right, or they despaired of convincing him that he was in the wrong, and therefore they threw down the cudgels, and gave up the cause. Job was too hard for them, and forced them to quit the field; for great is the truth, and will prevail. What Job had said, ch. xxvi., was a sufficient answer to Bildad's discourse; and now Job paused awhile, to see whether Zophar would take his turn again, but, declining it, Job himself went on, and without any interruption or vexation given him, said all he desired to say in this matter. I. He begins with a solemn protestation of his integrity, and of his resolution to hold it fast, ver. 2—6. II. He expresseth the dread he had of that hypocrisy which they charged him with, ver. 7—10. III. He shews the miserable end of wicked people, notwithstanding their long prosperity, and the curse that attends them, and is entailed upon their families, ver. 11—23.

MOREOVER Job continued his parable, and said,
2 As God liveth, who hath taken away my judgment;
And the Almighty, who hath vexed my soul;
3 All the while my breath is in me,
And the spirit of God is in my nostrils;
4 My lips shall not speak wickedness,
Nor my tongue utter deceit.
5 God forbid that I should justify you:
Till I die I will not remove mine integrity from me.
6 My righteousness I hold fast, and will not let it go:
My heart shall not reproach me so long as I live.

Job's discourse here is called a parable, (mashal,) the title of Solomon's proverbs, because it was grave and weighty, and very instructive; and "he spake as one having authority." It comes from a word that signifies to rule, or have dominion; and some think it intimates that Job now triumphed over his opponents, and spake as one that had baffled them. We say of an excellent preacher that he doth dominari in concionibus,—'he commands his hearers.' Job did so here. A long strife there had been between Job and his friends; they seemed disposed to have the matter compromised; and therefore, since "an oath for confirmation is an end of strife," Heb. vi. 16, Job here backs all he had said in maintenance of his own integrity with a solemn oath, to silence contradiction, and take the blame entirely upon himself, if he did prevaricate. Observe,

First. The form of his oath; ver. 2, "As God liveth, who hath taken away my judgment." Here, 1. He speaks highly of God, in calling him the living God, which means everliving, the eternal God, that has life in himself; and in appealing to him as the sole and sovereign Judge. We can swear by no greater, and it is an affront to him to swear by any other. 2. Yet he speaks hardly of him, and unbecomingly, in saying that he had taken away his judgment, that is, denied to do him justice in this controversy, and to appear in defence of him, and by continuing his troubles, on which his friends grounded their censures of him, had taken from him the opportunity he hoped ere now to have had of clearing himself. Elihu reproved him for this word, ch. xxxiv. 3; for God is righteous in all his ways, and takes away no man's judgment. But see how apt we are to despair of favour, if it be not shewed us presently; so short-sighted are we, and so soon weary of waiting God's time. He also chargeth it upon God that he had vexed his soul; had not only not appeared for him, but had appeared against him, and by laying such grievous afflictions upon him had quite embittered his life to him, and all the comforts of it. We, by our impatience, vex our own souls, and then complain of God that he has vexed them. Yet see Job's confidence in the goodness both of his cause and of his God; that, though God seemed to be angry with him, and to act against him for the present, yet he could cheerfully commit his cause to him.

Secondly. The matter of his oath, ver. 3, 4. 1. That he would not speak wickedness, nor utter deceit; that, in general, he would never allow himself in the way of lying; that as in this debate he had all along spoke as he thought, so he would never wrong his conscience by speaking otherwise; he would never maintain any doctrine, nor assert any matter of fact, but what he believed to be true; nor would he deny the truth, how much soever it might make against him. And whereas his friends charged him with being a hypocrite, he was ready to answer upon oath to all their interrogatories, if called to it. On the one hand, he would not for all the world deny the charge, if he knew himself guilty; but would declare the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and take to himself the shame of his hypocrisy. On the other hand, since he was conscious to himself of his integrity, and that he was not such a man as his friends represented him, he would never betray his integrity, nor charge himself with that which he was innocent of; he would not be brought, no, not by the rack of their unjust censures, falsely to accuse himself. If we must not bear false witness against our neighbour, then not against ourselves 2. That he would stick to this resolution as long as he lived; ver. 3, "All the while my breath is in me." Our resolutions against sin should be thus constant resolutions for life. In things doubtful and indifferent it is not safe to be thus peremptory; we know not what reason we may see to change our mind, God may reveal even that unto us which now we are not aware of; but in so plain a thing as this we cannot be too positive that we will never speak wickedness. Something of a reason for his resolution is here implied, that our breath will not be always in us; we must shortly breathe our last, and therefore while our breath is in us we must never breathe wickedness and deceit, nor allow ourselves to say or do any thing which will make against us when our breath shall depart. The breath in us is called the Spirit of God, because he breathed it into us; and that is another reason why we must not speak wickedness. It is God that gives us life and breath, and therefore while we have breath we must praise him.

Thirdly. The explication of his oath; ver. 5, 6, "God forbid that I should justify you" in your uncharitable censures of me, by owning myself a hypocrite. No, "till I die, I will not remove my integrity from me; my righteousness I hold fast, and will not let it go." 1. He would always be an honest man, would hold fast his integrity, and not curse God, as Satan by his wife urged him to do, ch. ii. 9. Job here thinks of dying, and of getting ready for death; and therefore resolves never to part with his religion, though he had lost all he had in the world. Note, The best preparative for death is perseverance to death in our integrity. Till I die; that is, though I die by this affliction, I will not thereby be put out of conceit with my God and my religion. "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." 2. He would always stand to it that he was an honest man; he would not remove, he would not part with, the conscience, and comfort, and credit of his integrity; he was resolved to defend it to the last. God knows, and my own heart knows, that I always meant well, and did not allow myself in the omission of any known duty, or the commission of any known sin; this is my rejoicing, and no man shall rob me of it; I will never lie against my right. It has often been the lot of upright men to be censured and condemned as hypocrites; but it well becomes them to bear up boldly against such censures, and not to be discouraged by them, or think the worse of themselves for them; as the apostle, Heb. xiii. 18, "We have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly."

Hic murus aheneus esto, nil conscire sibi.
'Be this thy brazen bulwark of defence,
Still to preserve thy conscious innocence.'

Job complained much of the reproaches of his friends; but, saith he, "My heart shall not reproach me;" that is, I will never give my heart cause to reproach me, but will keep a conscience void of offence; and while I do so I will not give my heart leave to reproach me. Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? it is God that justifies. To resolve that our hearts shall not reproach us when we give them cause to do so, is to affront God, whose deputy conscience is, and to wrong ourselves; for it is a good thing, when a man hath sinned, to have a heart within him to smite him for it, 2 Sam. xxiv. 10. But to resolve that our hearts shall not reproach us, while we still hold fast our integrity, is to baffle the designs of the evil spirit, who tempts good Christians to question their adoption, "If thou be the Son of God," and to concur with the operations of the good Spirit, who witnesseth to their adoption.

7 Let mine enemy be as the wicked,
And he that riseth up against me as the unrighteous.
8 For what is the hope of the hypocrite,
Though he hath gained, when God taketh away his soul?
9 Will God hear his cry
When trouble cometh upon him?
10 Will he delight himself in the Almighty?
Will he always call upon God?

Job, having solemnly protested the satisfaction he had in his integrity, for the farther clearing of himself, here expresseth the dread he had of being found a hypocrite.

First. He tells us how he startled at the thought of it; for he looked upon the condition of a hypocrite and a wicked man to be certainly the most miserable condition that any man could be in, ver. 7; "Let mine enemy be as the wicked;" a proverbial expression, like that Dan. iv. 19, "The dream be to them that hate thee." Job was so far from indulging himself in any wicked way, and flattering himself in it, that, if he might have leave to wish the greatest evil he could think of to the worst enemy he had in the world, he would wish him the portion of a wicked man; knowing that worse he could not wish him. Not that we may lawfully wish any man to be wicked, or that any man who is not wicked should be treated as wicked, but we should all choose to be in the condition of a beggar, an outlaw, a galley-slave, any thing rather than in the condition of the wicked, though in never so much outward pomp and prosperity.

Secondly. He gives us the reasons of it.

1. Because the hypocrite's hope will not be crowned; ver. 8, "For what is the hope of the hypocrite?" Bildad had condemned it, ch. viii. 13, 14, and Zophar, ch. xi. 20, and Job here concurs with them, and reads the death of the hypocrite's hope with as much assurance as they had done; and this fitly comes in as a reason why he would not remove his integrity, but still hold it fast. Note, The consideration of the miserable condition of wicked people, and especially hypocrites, should engage us to be upright, for we are undone, for ever undone, if we be not; and also to get the comfortable evidence of our uprightness; for how can we be easy if the great concern lie at uncertainties? Job's friends would persuade him that all his hope was but the hope of the hypocrite, ch. iv. 6. Nay, saith he, I would not for all the world be so foolish as to build upon such a rotten foundation; "for what is the hope of the hypocrite?" See here, 1st. The hypocrite deceived. He hath gained, and he hath hope; this is his bright side. It is allowed that he has gained by his hypocrisy, has gained the praise and applause of men, and the wealth of this world. Jehu gained a kingdom by his hypocrisy, and the Pharisees many a widow's house. Upon this gain he builds his hopes, such as it is; he hopes he is in good circumstances for another world, because he finds he is so for this, and he blesseth himself in his own way. 2nd. The hypocrite undeceived. He will at last see himself wretchedly cheated; for, First. God shall take away his soul sore against his will; Lu. xii. 20, "Thy soul shall be required of thee." God, as the judge, takes it away, to be tried and determined to its everlasting state; he shall then fall into the hands of the living God, to be dealt with immediately. Secondly. What will his hope be then? It will be vanity and a lie; it will stand him in no stead. The wealth of this world, which he hoped in, he must leave behind him, Ps. xlix. 17. The happiness of the other world, which he hoped for, he will certainly miss of; xxvi. 5. Our translators have missed the sense of this verse. The word rephaim does not mean "dead things," but the souls of the departed—"the shades," as sometimes they are called. The whole verse must be rendered, "The shades tremble; the waters beneath, and the inhabitants thereof." God is feared in the under-world, and in the abysses of the ocean.

xxvi. 6. "Hell," or sheol, here also denotes the under-world, the regions of the dead; and "destruction" (Hebrew, abaddon) is by many good critics understood to mean the ocean depths; but we prefer to take it as signifying the same as sheol.

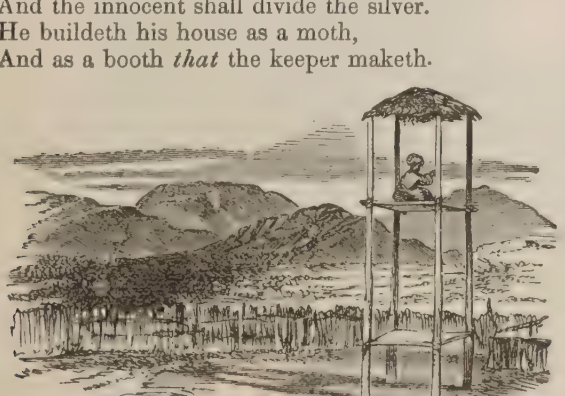
xxvi. 12. For "he divideth the sea" we must translate "he restraineth the sea," or "he stilleth the sea." In the second clause, "he smiteth through the proud" should be rendered "he smiteth its pride."



xxvi. 13. For "crooked serpent" we must translate "fleeing serpent." Job may here refer to one of the constellations.

hoped to go to heaven, but he will be shamefully disappointed; he will plead his external profession, privileges, and performances, but all his pleas will be overruled as frivolous; "Depart from me, I know you not." So that, upon the whole matter, it is certain a formal hypocrite, with all his gains and all his hopes, will be certainly miserable in a dying hour.

2. Because the hypocrite's prayer will not be heard; ver. 9, "Will God hear his cry when trouble comes upon him?" No, he will not; it cannot be expected he should. If true repentance come upon him, God will hear his cry, and accept him, Isa. i. 18; but if he continue impenitent and unchanged let him not think to find favour with God. Observe, 1st. Trouble will come upon him; certainly it will. Troubles in the world often surprise those that are most secure of an uninterrupted prosperity. However, death will come, and trouble with it, when he must leave the world and all his delights in it. The judgment of the great day will come; fearfulness will surprise the hypocrites, Isa. xxxiii. 14. 2nd. Then he will cry to God; will pray, and pray earnestly. Those that in prosperity slighted God, either prayed not at all, or were cold and careless in prayer, when trouble comes will make their application to him, and cry as men in earnest. But, 3rd. Will God hear him then, in the troubles of this life? God hath told us that he will not hear the prayers of those that regard iniquity in their hearts, Ps. lxvi. 18, and set up their idols there, Eze. xiv. 4; nor of those that turn away their ear from hearing the law, Pr. xxviii. 9; "Get you to the gods whom you have served," Jud. x. 14. In the judgment to come, it is certain God will not hear the cry of those that lived and died in their hypocrisy. Their doleful lamentations will all be unpitied, "I will laugh at your calamity;" their importunate petitions will all be thrown out, and their pleas rejected. Inflexible justice cannot be biassed, nor the irreversible sentence revoked: see Mat. vii. 22, 23; Lu. xiii. 26; and the case of the foolish virgins, Mat. xxv. 11.

3. Because the hypocrite's religion is neither comfortable nor constant; ver. 10, "Will he delight himself in the Almighty?" No, not at any time; for his delight is in the profits of the world, and the pleasures of the flesh, more than in God; especially not in time of trouble. "Will he always call upon God?" No; in prosperity he will not call upon God, but slight him; in adversity he will not call upon God, but curse him. He is weary of his religion when he gets nothing by it, or is in danger of losing. Note, 1st. Those are hypocrites who, though they profess religion, neither take pleasure in it, nor persevere in it; that reckon their religion a task and a drudgery, a weariness, and snuff at it; that make use of it only to serve a turn, and lay it aside when the turn is served; that will call upon God while it is in fashion, or while the pang of devotion lasts, but give it off when they fall into other company, or when the hot fit is over. 2nd. The reason why hypocrites do not persevere in religion is, because they have no pleasure in it. They that do not delight themselves in the Almighty will not always call upon him. The more comfort we find in our religion the more close we shall cleave to it. Those that have no delight in God are easily inveigled by the pleasures of sense, and so drawn away from their religion; and they are easily run down by the crosses of this life, and so driven away from their religion, and will not "always call upon God."

11 I will teach you by the hand of God:
That which is with the Almighty will I not conceal.
12 Behold, all ye yourselves have seen it;
Why then are ye thus altogether vain?
13 This is the portion of a wicked man with God,
And the heritage of oppressors,
Which they shall receive of the Almighty.
14 If his children be multiplied, it is for the sword:
And his offspring shall not be satisfied with bread.
15 Those that remain of him shall be buried in death:
And his widows shall not weep.
16 Though he heap up silver as the dust,
And prepare raiment as the clay;
17 He may prepare it, but the just shall put it on,
And the innocent shall divide the silver.
18 He buildeth his house as a moth,
And as a booth that the keeper maketh.

WATCH BOOTH.

19 The rich man shall lie down, but he shall not be gathered:
He openeth his eyes, and he is not.
20 Terrors take hold on him as waters,
A tempest stealeth him away in the night.
21 The east wind carrieth him away, and he departeth:
And as a storm hurleth him out of his place.
22 For God shall cast upon him, and not spare:
He would fain flee out of his hand.
23 Men shall clap their hands at him,
And shall hiss him out of his place

Job's friends had seen a great deal of the misery and destruction that attends wicked people, especially oppressors; and Job, while the heat of disputation lasted, had said as much, and with as much assurance, of their prosperity; but, now the heat of the battle was pretty well over, he was willing to own how far he agreed with them, and where the difference between his opinion and theirs lay. 1. He agreed with them that wicked people are miserable people; that God will certainly reckon with cruel oppressors, and one time or other, one way or other, his justice will make reprisals upon them for all the affronts they have put upon God, and all the wrongs they have done to their neighbours. This truth is abundantly confirmed by the entire concurrence even of these angry disputants in it. But, 2. In this they differed: they held that these deserved judgments are presently and visibly brought upon wicked oppressors; that "they travail with pain all their days;" that in prosperity "the destroyer comes upon them;" that they "shall not be rich," nor their "branch green;" and that "their destruction shall be accomplished before their time:" so Eliphaz, ch. xv. 20, 21, 29, 32. That the "steps of their strength shall be straitened;" that "terrors shall make them afraid on every side:" so Bildad, ch. xviii. 7, 11. That he himself "shall vomit up his riches," and that "in the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be in straits:" so Zophar, ch. xx. 15, 22. Now Job held that many times judgments do not fall upon them quickly, but are deferred for some time. That vengeance strikes slowly he had already shewed, ch. xxi.; xxiv.; now he comes to shew that it strikes surely and severely, and that reprieves are no pardons.

First. Job here undertakes to set this matter in a true light; ver. 11, 12, "I will teach you." And we must not disdain to learn even of those that are sick and poor, yea, and peevish too, if they deliver what is true and good. Observe, 1. What he would teach them. "That which is with the Almighty;" that is, the counsels and purposes of God concerning wicked people, which are hid with him, and which you cannot hastily judge of; and the usual methods of his providence concerning them; This, saith Job, "will I not conceal." What God has not concealed from us we must not conceal from those we are concerned to teach; "things revealed belong to us and our children." 2. How he would teach them. "By the hand of God;" that is, by his strength and assistance. Those that undertake to teach others must look to the hand of God to direct them, to open their ear, (Isa. l. 4,) and to open their lips. Those whom God teacheth with a strong hand are best able to teach others, Isa. viii. 11. 3. What reason they had to learn those things which he was about to teach them, ver. 12. That it was confirmed by their own observation; "You yourselves have seen it;" but what we have heard, and seen, and known we have need to be taught, that we may be perfect in our lesson. And that it would set them to rights in their judgment concerning him; "Why then are ye thus altogether vain," to condemn me for a wicked man, because I am afflicted? Truth, rightly understood and applied, would cure us of that vanity of mind which ariseth from our mistakes. That particularly which he offers now to lay before them is, "the portion of a wicked man with God," particularly of oppressors, ver. 13; compare ch. xx. 29. Their portion in the world may be wealth and preferment, but their portion with God is ruin and misery. They are above the control of any earthly power, it may be; but the Almighty can deal with them.

Secondly. He doth it by shewing that wicked people may in some instances prosper; but ruin follows them in those very instances, and that is their portion, that is their heritage, that is it which they must abide by.

1. They may prosper in their children, but ruin attends them. "His children," perhaps, "are multiplied," ver. 14, or magnified, so some; they are very numerous, and are raised to honour and great estates. Worldly people are said to be "full of children," Ps. xvii. 14; and, as it is in the margin there, 'their children are full;' in them the parents hope to live, and in their preferment to be honoured. But the more children they leave, and the greater prosperity they leave them in, the more and the fairer marks do they leave for the arrows of God's judgments to be levelled at; his three sore judgments, sword, famine, and pestilence, 2 Sam. xxiv. 13. 1st. Some of them shall die by the sword, the sword of war, perhaps. They brought them up to live by their sword, as Esau, Gen. xxvii. 40; and those that do so commonly die by the sword, first or last: or by the sword of justice, for their crimes; or the sword of the murderer, for their estates. 2nd. Others of them shall die by famine; ver. 14, "His offspring shall not be satisfied with bread." He thought he had secured to them large estates, but it may happen, that they may be reduced to poverty, so as not to have the necessary supports of life, at least not to live comfortably. They shall be so needy that they shall not have a competency of necessary food, and so greedy, or so discontented, that what they have they shall not be satisfied with, because not so much, or not so dainty, as what they have been used to. "Ye eat, but ye have not enough," Hag. i. 6. 3rd. "Those that remain shall be buried in death," that is, shall die of the plague, which is called death, Rev. vi. 8; and be buried privately, and in haste, as soon as they are dead, without any solemnity; "buried with the burial of an ass." And even their widows shall not weep; they shall not have wherewithal to put them in mourning. Or it notes that these wicked men, as they lived undesired, so they die unlamented; and even their widows will think themselves happy that they are got rid of them.

2. They may prosper in their estates, but ruin attends them too, ver. 16—18. 1st. We will suppose them to be rich in money and plate, in clothing and furniture. "They heap up silver" in abundance, "as the dust, and prepare raiment as the clay." They have heaps of clothes about them, as plentiful as heaps of clay; or it intimates, that they have such abundance of clothes that they are even a burthen to them: they "lade themselves with thick clay," Hab. ii. 6. See what is the care and business of worldly people, to heap up worldly wealth. Much would have more, till the silver is cankered, and the garments moth-eaten, Jas. v. 2, 3. But what comes of it? He shall never be the better for it himself; death will strip him, death will rob him, if he be not robbed and stripped sooner, Lu. xii. 20. Nay, God will so order it, that the just shall wear his raiment, and the innocent shall divide his silver. First. They shall have it, and divide it among themselves. Some way or other Providence shall so order it, that good men shall come honestly by that wealth which the wicked man came dishonestly by; "The wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just," Pr. xiii. 22. God disposeth of men's estates as he pleaseth, and often xxvii. 1. The word "parable," or proverb, here means a discourse, elevated in style, and sententious in form.

xxvii. 6. "My heart," that is, "my conscience," a sense which the word very often bears.

xxvii. 7. "Let mine enemy:" better, "may mine enemy," because of the word "he" in the next clause.

xxvii. 11. "By the hand of God" here means of or concerning that which His hand does.

xxvii. 15. "Buried in death," that is, "at their death," or when they die of whom he speaks.

xxvii. 18. The house of a moth is a delicate fabric, constructed out of the garment which the moth eats. Some translations give "spider" instead of moth, but wrongly. The booth or hut of a watchman, erected to shelter him in a field or vineyard, is a frail affair for a temporary purpose, and easily destroyed.

xxvii. 20. Terrors overtake the wealthy sinner like a flood.

makes their wills against their wills. The just, whom he hated and persecuted, shall have rule over all his labours, and, in due time, recover with interest what was violently taken from him. The Egyptians' jewels were the Israelites' pay. Solomon observes (Eccl. ii. 26) that God makes the sinners drudges to the righteous; for to "the sinner he gives travail to gather and heap up, that he may give to him that is good before God." Secondly. They shall do good with it. The innocent shall not hoard the silver, as he did that gathered it, but shall divide it to the poor; shall "give a portion to seven, and also to eight," which is laying up the best securities. Money is like muck, good for nothing if it be not spread. When God enricheth good men, they must remember they are but stewards, and must give an account. What bad men bring a curse upon their families with the ill getting of, good men bring a blessing upon their families with the well using of. "He that by unjust gain increaseth his substance shall gather it for him that will pity the poor," Pr. xxviii. 8. 2nd. We will suppose them to have built them strong and stately houses; but they are like the house which the moth makes for herself in an old garment, out of which she will soon be shaken, ver. 18. He is very secure in it, as a moth, and has no apprehension of danger, but it will prove of as short continuance as a booth which the keeper makes, which will quickly be taken down and gone, and his place shall know him no more.

3. Destruction attends their persons, though they lived long in health and at ease; ver. 19, "The rich man shall lie down" to sleep, to repose himself in the abundance of his wealth,—"Soul, take thine ease;" shall lie down in it as his strong city, and seem to others to be very happy, and very easy; "but he shall not be gathered," that is, he shall not have his mind composed and settled, and gathered in to enjoy his wealth. He doth not sleep so contentedly as people think he doth; he lies down, but "his abundance will not suffer him to sleep," at least not so sweetly as the labouring man, Eccl. v. 12. He lies down, but he is full of tossings to and fro, till the dawning of the day, and then "he opens his eyes, and he is not;" he sees himself and all he has hastening away, as it were, in the twinkling of an eye. His cares increase his fears, and both together make him uneasy. So that, when we attend him to his bed, we do not find him happy there; but in the close we are called to attend his exit, and see how miserable he is in death, and after death.

1st. He is miserable in death; it is to him the king of terrors, ver. 20, 21. When some mortal disease seizeth him, what a fright is he in! "Terrors take hold on him, as waters," as if he were surrounded by the flowing tides. He trembles to think of leaving this world, and much more of removing to another. This mingles sorrow and wrath with his sickness, as Solomon observes, Eccl. v. 17. These terrors put him either, First. Into a silent and sullen despair, and then the tempest of God's wrath, the tempest of death, may be said to steal him away in the night, when no one is aware, or takes any notice of it. Or, Secondly. Into an open and clamorous despair, and then he is said to be carried away, and hurled out of his place, as with a storm, and with an east wind, violent and noisy, and very dreadful. Death to a godly man is like a fair gale of wind to transport him to the heavenly country; but to a wicked man it is like an east wind, a storm, a tempest, that hurries him away in confusion and amazement to destruction.

2nd. He is miserable after death. First. His soul falls under the just indignation of God, and the terror of that puts him into such amazement at the approach of death; ver. 22, "For God shall cast upon him, and not spare." While he lived he had the benefit of sparing mercy, but now the day of God's patience is over, and he will not spare, but pour out upon him the full vials of his wrath. What God casts down upon a man there is no flying from, nor bearing up under. We read of his casting down great stones from heaven upon the Canaanites, Jos. x. 11, which made terrible execution among them; but what was that to his casting down his anger in its full weight upon the sinner's conscience, like the talent of lead? Zec. v. 7, 8. The damned sinner, seeing the wrath of God break in upon him, "would fain flee out of his hand," but he cannot, the gates of hell are locked and barred, and the great gulf fixed; and it will be in vain to call for the shelter of rocks and mountains. Those that will not be persuaded now to fly to the arms of Divine grace, which are stretched out to receive them, will not be able to flee from the arms of Divine wrath, which will shortly be stretched out to destroy them. Secondly. His memory falls under the just indignation of all mankind; ver. 23, "Men shall clap their hands at him," that is, they shall rejoice in the judgments of God, by which he is cut off, and be well pleased in his fall. "When the wicked perish, there is shouting," Pr. xi. 10. When God hurleth him, men shall hiss him, out of his place, and leave on his name perpetual marks of infamy. In the same place where he has been caressed and cried up he shall be laughed at, Ps. lii. 7, and his ashes shall be trampled on.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The strain of this chapter is very unlike the rest of this book. Job forgets his sores, and all his sorrows, and talks like a philosopher, or a virtuoso. Here is a great deal both of natural philosophy and moral in this discourse; but the question is, How it comes in here? Doubtless it was not merely for an amusement, or diversion from the controversy, (and if it had been only so perhaps it had not been much amiss,—when disputes grow hot, better lose the question than lose our temper,) but this is pertinent, and to the business in hand. Job and his friends had been discoursing about the dispensations of Providence towards the wicked and the righteous. Job had shewed that some wicked men live and die in prosperity, while others are presently and openly arrested by the judgments of God. But if any ask the reason why some are punished in this world, and not others, they must be told, it is a question that cannot be resolved. The knowledge of the reasons of state in God's government of the world is kept from us, and we must neither pretend to it nor reach after it. Zophar had wished that God would shew Job the secrets of wisdom, ch. xi. 6. No, saith Job, secret things belong not to us, but things revealed, Deu. xxix. 29. And here he shews, I. Concerning worldly wealth, how industriously that is sought for, and pursued by the children of men, what pains they take, what contrivances they have, and what hazards they run to get it, ver. 1—11. II. Concerning wisdom, ver. 12; in general, the price of it is very great, it is of inestimable value, ver 15—19; the place of it is very secret, ver. 14, 20, 22; in particular, there is a wisdom which is hid in God, ver. 23—27; and there is a wisdom which is revealed to the children of men, ver. 28. Our inquiries into the former must be checked, into the latter must be quickened, for that is it which is our concern.

SURELY there is a vein for the silver,
And a place for gold where they fine it.
2 Iron is taken out of the earth,
And brass is molten out of the stone
3 He setteth an end to darkness,
And searcheth out all perfection:
The stones of darkness, and the shadow of death.
4 The flood breaketh out from the inhabitant;
Even the waters forgotten of the foot:
They are dried up, they are gone away from man.
5 As for the earth, out of it cometh bread:
And under it is turned up as it were fire
6 The stones of it are the place of sapphires:
And it hath dust of gold.
7 There is a path which no fowl knoweth,
And which the vulture's eye hath not seen:
8 The lion's whelps have not trodden it,
Nor the fierce lion passed by it.
9 He putteth forth his hand upon the rock;
He overturneth the mountains by the roots.
10 He cutteth out rivers among the rocks;
And his eye seeth every precious thing.
11 He bindeth the floods from overflowing;
And the thing that is hid bringeth he forth to light.

WORKERS IN METAL.—ver. 2.

Here Job shews, 1. What a great way the wit of man may go, in diving into the depths of nature, and seizing the riches of it; what a great deal of knowledge, and a great deal of wealth, men may by their ingenious and industrious searches make themselves masters of. But doth it therefore follow that men may by their wit comprehend the reasons why some wicked people prosper, and others are punished? why some good people prosper, and others are afflicted? No, by no means. The caverns of the earth may be discovered, but not the counsels of Heaven. 2. What a great deal of care and pains worldly men take to get riches. He had observed, concerning the wicked man, ch. xxvii. 16, that he "heaped up silver as the dust," now here he shews whence that silver came, and how it was come by, which he is so fond of, to shew what little reason wicked rich men have to be proud of their wealth and pomp. Observe here,

First. The wealth of this world is hid in the earth; thence the silver and the gold which afterwards they refine is fetched, ver. 1. There it lay, mixed with a great deal of dirt and dross, like a worthless thing, of no more account than common earth; and abundance of it will so lie neglected till the earth and all the works therein shall be burned up. Holy Mr. Herbert, in his poem called Avarice, takes notice of this, to shame men out of the love of money.

'Money, thou bane of bliss, thou source of woe,
Whence com'st thou that thou art so fresh and fine?
I know thy parentage is base and low;
Man found thee poor and dirty in a mine.

Surely thou didst so little contribute
To this great kingdom which thou now hast got,
That he was fain, when thou wast destitute,
To dig thee out of thy dark cave and grot.

Man calleth thee his wealth, who made thee rich,
And while he digs out thee, falls in the ditch.'

Iron and brass, though less valuable, but more serviceable metals, are "taken out of the earth," ver. 2, and are there found in great abundance, which abates their price indeed, but is a great kindness to man, who could much better be without gold than without iron. Nay, "out of the earth comes bread," that is bread-corn, the necessary support of life, ver. 5. Thence man's maintenance is fetched to mind him of his own original; he is of the earth, and is hastening to the earth. "Under it is turned up as it were fire;" precious stones that sparkle as fire; brimstone, that is apt to take fire; coal, that is proper to feed fire. As we have our food, so we have our fuel, out of the earth. There the sapphires and other gems are, and thence gold dust is digged up, ver. 6. The wisdom of the Creator has placed these things, 1. Out of our sight, to teach us not to set our eyes upon them, Pr. xxiii. 5. 2. Under our feet, to teach us not to lay them in our bosoms, not to set our hearts upon them, but to trample upon them with a holy contempt. See how full the earth is of God's riches, Ps. civ. 24, and infer from thence not only how great a God he is whose the earth is and the fulness thereof, Ps. xxiv. 1, but how full heaven must needs be of God's riches, which is the city of the great King, in comparison with which this earth is a poor country.

Secondly. The wealth that is hid in the earth cannot be come at, but with a great deal of difficulty. It is hard to be found out; there is but here and there a vein for the silver, ver. 1. The precious stones, though bright themselves, yet, because buried in obscurity, and out of sight, are called stones of darkness, and the shadow of death. Men may search long before they light on them; when found out, it is hard to be fetched out; men's wits must be set on work to contrive ways and means to get this hid treasure into their hands, they must with their lamps set an end to darkness; and if one expedient miscarry, one method fail, they must try another, until they have searched out all perfection, and turned every stone to effect it, ver. 3. They must grapple with subterraneous waters, ver. 4, 10, 11; and force their way through rocks which are as it were the roots of the mountains, ver. 9. Now God has made the getting of gold and silver and precious stones so difficult, 1, For the exciting and engaging of industry. Dii laboribus omnia vendunt,—'Labour is the price which the gods affix to all things.' If valuable things were too easily come by, men would never xxvii. 21. The Greek and Latin versions understand the east wind here of the simoom, or hot wind, so much dreaded by travellers in the desert.

xxviii. 1—11. This remarkable chapter has furnished critics and commentators with abundant employment. Some have even thought it was uttered by Zophar, but there is no real ground for the opinion. In verses 1 and 2 Job illustrates the results of human skill and labour in obtaining gold, silver, iron, and copper. In verses 2—11 he enumerates the difficulties and perils which miners encounter in their search for metals and gems. Everything in the passage must be explained in accordance with this idea. That mining operations were carried on by or under the Egyptian Government, in very ancient times, in the Sinaitic peninsula and elsewhere, we know very well, and Job may have been acquainted with their works in this department. The miner is deterred by no obstacle; he puts an end to darkness, and searches everywhere. The sense of verse 4 is very learn to take pains. But the difficulty of gaining the riches of this earth may suggest to us what violence the kingdom of heaven suffers. 2. For the checking and restraining of pomp and luxury. What is for necessity is had with a little labour from the surface of the earth, but what is for ornament must be digged with a great deal of pains out of the bowels of it. To be fed is cheap, but to be fine is chargeable.

Thirdly. Though the subterraneous wealth is thus hard to come by, yet men will have it. He that loveth silver is not satisfied with silver, and yet is not satisfied without it; but they that have much must needs have more. See here, 1. What inventions men have to get this wealth; they search out all perfection, ver. 3. They have arts and engines to dry up the waters and carry them off when they break in upon them in their mines, and threaten to drown the work, ver. 4. They have pumps and pipes and canals to clear their way; and, obstacles being removed, they tread "the path which no fowl knoweth," ver. 7, 8. Unseen by the vulture's eye, which is piercing and quick-sighted, and untrodden by the lion's whelpe, that traverse all the paths of the wilderness. 2. What pains men take, and what vast charge they are at, to get this wealth; they work their way through the rocks, and undermine the mountains, ver. 10. 3. What hazards they run. They that dig in the mines have their lives in their hands; for they are fain to bind "the floods from overflowing," ver. 11; and are continually in danger of being suffocated by damps, or crushed or buried alive by the fall of the earth upon them. See how foolish man adds to his own burthen: he is sentenced to eat bread in the sweat of his face; but, as if that were not enough, he will get gold and silver in the peril of his life, though the more is gotten the less valuable it is: for in Solomon's time silver was as stones. But, 4. Observe what it is that carries men through all this toil and peril; "their eye sees every precious thing," ver. 10. Silver and gold are precious things with them; and they have them in their eye in all these pursuits. They fancy they see them glittering before their faces, and, in the prospect of laying hold on them, they make nothing of all these difficulties; for, lastly, they make something of it at last: "that which is hid bringeth he forth to light," ver. 11. What was hid under ground is laid upon the bank; the metal that was hid in the ore is refined from its dross, and brought forth pure out of the furnace, and then he thinks his pains well bestowed. Go to the miners then, thou sluggard in religion, consider their ways and be wise. Let their courage, diligence, and constancy in seeking the wealth that perisheth, shame us out of slothfulness and faint-heartedness in labouring for the true riches; "How much better is it to get wisdom than gold?" much easier, much safer; yet gold is sought for, but grace neglected. Will the hopes of precious things out of the earth, (so they call them, though really they are paltry and perishing,) be such a spur to industry, and shall not the certain prospect of truly precious things in heaven be much more so?

12 But where shall wisdom be found?
And where is the place of understanding?
13 Man knoweth not the price thereof;
Neither is it found in the land of the living.
14 The depth saith, It is not in me:
And the sea saith, It is not with me.
15 It cannot be gotten for gold,
Neither shall silver be weighed for the price thereof.
16 It cannot be valued with the gold of Ophir,
With the precious onyx, or the sapphire.
17 The gold and the crystal cannot equal it:
And the exchange of it shall not be for jewels of fine gold.

GOLDEN ORNAMENTS.

18 No mention shall be made of coral, or of pearls:
For the price of wisdom is above rubies.
19 The topaz of Ethiopia shall not equal it,
Neither shall it be valued with pure gold.

Job, having spoken of the wealth of the world, which men put such a value upon, and take so much pains for, here comes to speak of another more valuable jewel, and that is wisdom and understanding, the knowing and enjoying of God and ourselves. They that found out all those ways and means to enrich themselves thought themselves very wise. But Job will not own that to be wisdom; he supposeth them to gain their point, and to bring to light what they sought for, ver. 11, and yet asks, Where is wisdom? for it is not here; "this their way is their folly." We must, therefore, seek it somewhere else, and it will be found nowhere but in the principles and practices of religion. There is more true knowledge, satisfaction, and happiness in sound divinity, which shews us the way to the joys of heaven, than in natural philosophy or mathematics, which help us to find a way into the bowels of the earth. Two things cannot be found out concerning this wisdom:

First. The price of it; for that is inestimable, its worth infinitely more than all the riches in this world. "Man knows not the price thereof," ver. 13; that is, 1. Few put a due value upon it. Men know not the worth of it; its innate excellency, their need of it, and of what unspeakable advantage it will be to them; and, therefore, though they have many a price in their hand to get this wisdom, yet they have no heart to it, Pr. xvii. 16. The cock in the fable knew not the value of the precious stone he found in the dunghill, and therefore would rather have lighted on a barleycorn. Men know not the worth of grace, and therefore will take no pains to get it. 2. None can possibly give a valuable consideration for it, with all this wealth the world can furnish them with. This Job is large upon, ver. 15, &c., where he makes an inventory of the bona notabilia,—'the most valuable treasures' of this world. Gold is five times mentioned; silver comes in also; and then divers precious stones, the onyx and sapphire, pearls and rubies, and the topaz of Ethiopia; these are the things that are highest prized in the world's markets. But if a man would give, not only these, heaps of these, but "all the substance of his house," all he is worth in the world, for wisdom, "it would utterly be contemned." These may give a man some advantage in seeking wisdom, as they did to Solomon, but there is no purchasing wisdom with these. It is a gift of the Holy Ghost, which cannot be bought with money, Acts viii. 20; as it doth not run in the blood, and so come to us by descent, so it cannot be got for money, nor doth it come to us by purchase. Spiritual gifts are conferred without money, and without price, because no money can be a price for them. Wisdom is likewise a more valuable gift to him that has it, makes him richer and happier, than gold or precious stones. It is "better to get wisdom than gold." Gold is another's, wisdom our own; gold is for the body and time, wisdom is for the soul and eternity. Let that which is most precious in God's account be so in ours: see Pr. iii. 14, &c.

Secondly. The place of it; for that is undiscoverable. "Where shall wisdom be found?" ver. 12. He asks this,

1. As one that truly desired to find it. This is a question we should all put; while the most of men are asking where shall money be found, we should ask where may wisdom be found, that we may seek it and find it. Not vain philosophy, or carnal policy, but true religion; for that is the only true wisdom, that is it which best improves our faculties, and best secures our spiritual and eternal welfare. This is that which we should cry after, and dig for, Pr. ii. 3, 4.

2. As one that utterly despaired of finding it anywhere but in God, and any way but by Divine revelation. "It is not found in the land of the living," ver. 13. We cannot attain to a right understanding of God and his will, of ourselves, and our duty and interest, by reading any books or men but God's book and the men of God. Such is the degeneracy of the human nature, that there is no true wisdom to be found with any but those that are born again, and through grace partake of a Divine nature. As for others, even the most ingenious and industrious, they can tell us no tidings of this lost wisdom. 1st. Ask the miners, and by them "the depth will say, It is not in me," ver. 14. Those that dig into the bowels of the earth, to rifle the treasures there, cannot in these dark recesses find this rare jewel, nor with all their art make themselves masters of it. 2nd. Ask the mariners, and by them the sea will say, "It is not in me." It can never be got either by trading on the waters or diving into them; can never be sucked from the abundance of the seas or the treasures hid in the sand. Where there is a vein for the silver there is no vein for wisdom, none for grace. Men can easier break through the difficulties they meet with in getting worldly wealth than through those they meet with in getting heavenly wisdom; and they will take more pains to learn how to live in this world than how to live for ever in a better world. So blind and foolish is man become, that it is in vain to ask him, "Where is the place of wisdom?" and which is the road that leads to it?

20 Whence then cometh wisdom?
And where is the place of understanding?
21 Seeing it is hid from the eyes of all living,
And kept close from the fowls of the air.
22 Destruction and death say,
We have heard the fame thereof with our ears
23 God understandeth the way thereof,
And he knoweth the place thereof.
24 For he looketh to the ends of the earth,
And seeth under the whole heaven;
25 To make the weight for the winds;
And he weigheth the waters by measure.
26 When he made a decree for the rain,
And a way for the lightning of the thunder:
27 Then did he see it, and declare it;
He prepared it, yea, and searched it out.
28 And unto man he said, Behold,
The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom;
And to depart from evil is understanding.

The same question he had asked, ver. 12, he asks again here; for it is too worthy, too weighty, to be let fall until we speed in the inquiry. Concerning this we must seek until we find, until we get some satisfactory account of it. And by a diligent prosecution of this inquiry he brings it at length to this issue, that there is a twofold wisdom; one hid in God, which is secret, and belongs not to us; the other made known by him, and revealed to man, which belongs to us and to our children.

First. The knowledge of God's secret will. The will of his providence is out of our reach, and what God has reserved to himself; it belongs to the Lord our God. To know the particulars of what God will do hereafter, and the reasons of what he is doing now, is the knowledge he first speaks of.

1. This knowledge is hid from us. It is high, we cannot attain unto it; ver. 21, 22, "It is hid from the eyes of all living," even of philosophers, politicians, and saints; it is "kept close from the fowls of the air," though they fly high, and in the open firmament of heaven; though they seem somewhat nearer that upper world where the source of this wisdom is; though their eyes behold afar off, ch. xxxix. 29. yet they cannot penetrate into the counsels of God No; man is wiser than the fowls of heaven; and yet comes short of this wisdom.

obscure. The common version is certainly wrong, and many moderns explain it in accordance with the rendering of Rodwell: "He sinks a shaft away from dwellings; of him who walks above are they forgotten, they swing suspended afar from men." The word "fire," in verse 5, seems to refer to the brilliancy of gems disclosed by the miner's light. The miner's path is alluded to in verses 7 and 8.

xxviii. 12—19. Wealth is not wisdom; and men who find the first may miss the second, which is far more precious. Four different words are used for gold in verses 15—17, to denote that it is precious, hoarded, bright, and refined. By coral, in verse 18, some understand gems in general; but others, red coral. For pearls some would read diamonds, and for rubies pearls. The mention of so many precious stones suggests that they were not only highly esteemed and sought after, but were polished and wrought. Ethiopia, or Cush, in verse 19, was probably in Southern Arabia, because the topaz is recorded to have been found there.

Even those who in their speculations soar highest, and think themselves, like the fowls of the air, above the heads of other people, yet cannot pretend to this knowledge. Job and his friends had been arguing about the methods and reasons of the dispensations of Providence in the government of the world. Why, what fools are we, saith Job, to fight in the dark thus; to dispute about that which we do not understand! The line and plummet of human reason can never fathom the abyss of the Divine counsels. Who can undertake to give a rationale of Providence; or account for the maxims, measures, and methods of God's government, those arcana imperii,—'the cabinet counsels' of Divine wisdom? Let us then be content not to know the future events of Providence, until time discover them, Acts i. 7; and not to know the secret reasons of Providence until eternity discovers them. God is now a God that hideth himself, Isa. xlv. 15; "clouds and darkness are round about him." Though this wisdom be hid from all living, yet "Destruction and death say they have heard the fame of it." Though they cannot give an account of it themselves, for there is "no wisdom, nor device, nor knowledge at all in the grave," much less this, yet there is a world on the other side death and the grave, on which those dark regions border, and to which we must pass through them, and there we shall see clearly what we are now in the dark about. Have a little patience, saith Death to the inquisitive soul, I will fetch thee shortly to a place where even this wisdom will be found. When "the mystery of God shall be finished," it will be laid open, and we shall know as we are known; when the veil of flesh is rent, and the interposing clouds are scattered, we shall know what God doth, though we know not now, Jno. xiii. 7.

5. This knowledge is hid in God, as the apostle speaks, Eph. iii. 9. "Known unto God are all his works," though they are not known to us, Acts xv. 18. There are good reasons for what he doth, though we cannot assign them; ver. 23, "God understands the way thereof." Men sometimes do they know not what; but God never doth. Men do what they did not design to do; new occurrences put them upon new counsels, and oblige them to take new measures; but God doth all according to the purpose which he purposed in himself, and which he never alters. Men sometimes do that which they cannot give a good reason for; but in every will of God there is a counsel. He knows both what he doth and why he doth it; the whole series of events, and the order and place of every occurrence. This knowledge he has in perfection, but keeps to himself. Two reasons are here given why God must needs understand his own way, and he only:

1st. Because all events are now directed by an all-seeing and almighty Providence, ver. 24, 25. He that governs the world, is, First. Omniscient: "for he looks to the ends of the earth," both in place and time; distant ages, distant regions, are under his view. We do not understand our own way, much less can we understand God's way, because we are short-sighted; how little do we know of what is doing in the world, much less of what will be done! But "the eyes of the Lord are in every place;" nay, they "run to and fro through the earth." Nothing is or can be hid from him; and, therefore, the reasons why some wicked people prosper remarkably, and others are remarkably punished in this world, which are secret to us, are known to him. One day's events and one man's affairs have such a reference to, and such a dependence upon, another's, that he only to whom all events and all affairs are naked and open, and who sees the whole at one entire and certain view, is a competent judge of every part. Secondly. He is omnipotent: he can do every thing, and is very exact in all he doth. For proof of this, he instanceth in the winds and waters; ver. 25, What is lighter than the wind? yet God hath ways of poising it; he knows how "to make the weight for the winds," which he "brings out of his treasuries," Ps. cxxxv. 7; keeping a very particular account of what he draws out, as men do of what they pay out of their treasuries, not at random, as men bring out of their trash. Nothing sensible is to us more unaccountable than the wind; we "hear the sound of it, yet cannot tell whence it comes, or whither it goes." But God gives it out by weight, wisely ordering both from what point it shall blow and with what strength. The waters of the sea, and the rain waters, he both weighs and measures; allotting the proportion of every tide, and every shower. A great and constant communication there is between clouds and seas, the waters above the firmament, and those under it; vapours go up, rains come down; air is condensed into water, water rarified into air. But the great God keeps an exact account of all the stock with which this trade is carried on for the public benefit, and sees that none of it be lost. Now if in these things Providence be so exact, much more in dispensing frowns and favours, rewards and punishments, to the children of men, according to the rules of equity.

2nd. Because all events were from eternity designed and determined by an infallible prescience, and immutable decree, ver. 26, 27. When he settled the course of nature, he foreordained all the operations of his government. First. He settled the course of nature: for this he instanceth in "a decree for the rain, and a way for the thunder and lightning;" the general manner and method, and the particular uses and tendencies, of these strange performances. Both their causes and their effects were appointed by the Divine purpose; hence he is said to "prepare lightnings for the rain," Ps. cxxxv. 7; Jer. x. 13. Secondly. When he did that, he laid all the measures of his providence, and drew an exact scheme of the whole work from first to last. Then from eternity did he see in himself, and declare to himself, the plan of his proceedings; then he prepared it, fixed it, and established it, set every thing in readiness for all his works; so that when any thing was to be done nothing was to seek, nor could any thing unforeseen occur to put it either out of its method or out of its time, for all was ordered as exactly as if he had studied it, and searched it out: so that, whatever he doth, "nothing can be put to it, or taken from it," and, therefore, "it shall be for ever," Eccl. iii. 14. Some make Job to speak of wisdom here as a person, and translate it, 'Then he saw her, and shewed her,' &c.; and then it is parallel with that of Solomon, concerning the essential wisdom of the Father, the eternal Word, Pr. viii. 22, &c., Before the earth was, then was I by him, Jno. i. 1, 2.

Secondly. The knowledge of God's revealed will, the will of his precept; and this is within our reach, it is level to our capacity, and will do us good; ver. 28, "Unto man he said, Behold the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom." Let it not be said that, when God concealed his counsels from man, and forbade him that tree of knowledge, it was because he grudged him any thing that would contribute to his real bliss and satisfaction; no, he let him know as much as he was concerned to know in order to his duty and happiness. He shall be intrusted with as much of his sovereign mind as was needful and fit for a subject, but he must not think himself fit to be a privy counsellor. 'He said to Adam,' so some, to the first man, in the day in which he was created he told him plainly, it was not for him to amuse himself with over curious searches into the mysteries of creation, nor to pretend to solve all the phenomena of nature; he would find it neither possible nor profitable to do so. No less wisdom, saith Archbishop Tillotson, than that which made the world can thoroughly understand the philosophy of it. But let him look upon this as his wisdom, to fear the Lord and to depart from evil; let him learn that, and he is learned enough, let this knowledge serve his turn. When God forbade man the tree of knowledge, he allowed him the tree of life; and this is that tree, Pr. iii. 18. We cannot attain true wisdom but by Divine revelation; "the Lord giveth wisdom," Pr ii. 6. Now the matter of that is not the secrets of nature or providence, but the rules of our own practice; "unto man he said," not, Go up to heaven to fetch happiness thence; or, Go down to the deep to draw it up thence. No; "the word is nigh thee," Deu. xxx. 11. "He hath shewed thee, O man," not what is great, but "what is good;" not what the Lord thy God designs to do with thee, but what he "requires of thee," Mic. vi. 8. "Unto you, O men, I call," Pr. viii. 4. Lord, what is man, that he should be thus minded, thus visited! "Behold," mark, take notice of this; he that hath ears let him hear what the God of heaven saith to the children of men, "The fear of the Lord, that is the wisdom." Here is, 1. The description of true religion, pure religion, and undefiled; it is to "fear the Lord, and depart from evil," which agrees with God's character of Job, ch. i. 1. "The fear of the Lord" is the spring and summary of all religion. There is a slavish fear of God, springing from hard thoughts of him, which is contrary to religion, Mat. xxv. 24. There is a selfish fear of God, springing from dreadful thoughts of him, which may be a good step towards religion, Acts ix. 5. But there is a filial fear of God, springing from great and high thoughts of him, which is the life and soul of all religion. And wherever this reigns in the heart, it will appear by a constant care to depart from evil, Pr. xvi. 6. This is essential to religion; we must first "cease to do evil," or we shall never "learn to do well." Virtus est vitium fugere,—'Even in our flight from vice some virtue lies.' 2. The commendation of religion. It is wisdom and understanding; to be truly religious is to be truly wise. As the wisdom of God appears in the institution of it, so the wisdom of man appears in the practice and observance of it: it is understanding, for it is the best knowledge of truth; it is wisdom, for it is the best conduct of our affairs. Nothing more surely guides our way, and gains our end, than being religious.

CHAPTER XXIX.

After that excellent discourse concerning wisdom in the foregoing chapter, Job sat down and paused a while, not because he had tasked himself out of breath, but because he would not without the leave of the company engross the talk to himself, but would give room for his friends, if they pleased, to make their remarks on what he had said; but they had nothing to say, and therefore, after he had recollected himself a little, he went on with his discourse, concerning his own affairs, in this and the two following chapters. In which, I. He describes the height of the prosperity from which he was fallen. And, II. The depth of the adversity into which he was fallen; and this he doth to move the pity of his friends, and to justify, or at least excuse, his own complaints. But then, III. To obviate his friends' censures of him, he makes a very ample and particular protestation of his own integrity notwithstanding. In this chapter he looks back to the days of his prosperity; and shews, 1. What comfort and satisfaction he had in his house and family, ver. 1—6. 2. What a great deal of honour and power he had in his country, and what respect was paid him by all sorts of people, ver. 7—10. 3. What abundance of good he did in his place as a magistrate, ver. 11—17. 4. What a just prospect he had of the continuance of his comfort at home, ver. 18—20; and of his interest abroad, ver. 21—25. All this he enlargeth upon, to aggravate his present calamities; like Naomi, I went out full, but am brought home again empty.

MOREOVER Job continued his parable, and said,
2 Oh that I were as in months past,
As in the days when God preserved me;
3 When his candle shined upon my head,
And when by his light I walked through darkness;
4 As I was in the days of my youth,
When the secret of God was upon my tabernacle;
5 When the Almighty was yet with me,
When my children were about me;
6 When I washed my steps with butter,
And the rock poured me out rivers of oil;

Losers may have leave to speak, and there is nothing they speak of more feelingly than of the comforts they are stripped of. Their former prosperity is one of the most pleasing subjects of their thoughts and talk; it was so to Job here, who begins with a wish, ver. 2, "O that I were as in months past!" So he brings in this account of his prosperity. His wish is, 1. O that I were in as good a state as I was then; that I had as much wealth, honour, and pleasure as I had then. This he wisheth, not so much from a concern he had for his ease, as for his reputation and the glory of his God; which he thought was eclipsed by his present sufferings. Oh! that I might be restored to my prosperity, and then the censures and reproaches of my friends would be effectually silenced, even upon their own principles, and for ever rolled away. If this be our end in desiring life, health, and prosperity, that God may be glorified, and the credit of our holy profession rescued, preserved, and advanced, the desire is not only natural but spiritual. 2. O that I were in as good a frame of spirit as I was then. That which Job complained most of now, was a load upon his spirits, through God's withdrawing from him; and therefore he wishes he now had his spirit as much enlarged and encouraged in the service of God as he had had then; and that he had as much freedom and fellowship with him, as he then thought himself happy in. This was in the days of his youth, ver. 4, when he was in the prime of his time for the enjoyment of those things, and could relish them with the highest gust. Note, Those that prosper in the days of their youth know not what black and cloudy days they are yet reserved for. Two things made the months past pleasant to Job:

First. That he had comfort in his God. This was the chief thing he rejoiced in in his prosperity, as the spring of it and the sweetness of it, that he had the favour of God, and the tokens of that favour. He did not attribute his prosperity to a happy turn of fortune, or to his own might, or the power of his own hand; but makes the same acknowledgment that David doth, Ps. xxx. 7, "Thou, by thy favour, hast made my mountain stand strong." A gracious soul delights in God's smiles, not in the smiles of this world. Four things were then very pleasant to holy Job:

1. The confidence he had in the Divine protection. They were "the days when God preserved me," ver. 2. Even then he saw himself exposed, and did not make his wealth his strong city, nor trusted in the abundance of his riches; but the name of the Lord was his strong tower, and in that only he thought himself safe; and to that he ascribed it that he was then safe, and his comforts were preserved to him. The devil saw a hedge about him of God's making, ch. i. 10; and Job saw it himself, and owned it was God's visitation that preserved his spirit, ch. x. 12. Those only whom God protects are safe, and may be secure; and, therefore, those who have never so much of this world must not think themselves safe unless God preserve them.

2. The complacency he had in the Divine favour; ver. 3. God's candle xxviii. 20—28. The question returns, Where can this wisdom, so precious and beyond the reach of man's unaided intellect, be found? In what does it consist? Neither the world of the living nor the world of the dead can answer. The discovery must come from God, who has manifested his wisdom in his works. True wisdom is religion and personal goodness. Thus, according to this, real wisdom reaches man as a Divine revelation: "Unto man he said, Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom," &c. It has been asked to what particular revelation this refers; but we think no special communication is intended. The general truth which is embodied in the Divine messages to man is the one here emphatically asserted.

xxix. 4. For "youth" Delitzsch gives "vintage;" Benisch, "plenteousness;" Barnes, "strength;" Rodwell, "autumn." Our translators have given what is usually understood to be the idea meant to be conveyed. The word "secret" should rather be "counsel:" God consulted his welfare, or showed him favour.

shined upon his head; that is, God lifted up the light of his countenance upon him, gave him the assurances and sweet relishes of his love. The best of the communications of the Divine favour to the saints in this world is but the candlelight, compared with what is reserved for them in the future state. But such abundant satisfaction did Job take in the Divine favour, that by the light of that he walked through darkness; that guided him in his doubts, comforted him in his griefs, bore him up under his burthens, and helped him through all his difficulties. Those that have the brightest sunshine of outward prosperity, must yet expect some moments of darkness; they are sometimes crossed, sometimes at a loss, sometimes melancholy, but they that are interested in the favour of God, and know how to value it, can by the light of that, walk cheerfully and comfortably through all the darkness of this vale of tears. That puts gladness into the heart, enough to balance all the grievances of this present time.

3. The communion he had with the Divine Word; ver. 4, "The secret of God was upon my tabernacle;" that is, when God conversed freely with him, as one bosom friend with another; he knew God's mind, and was not in the dark about it, as of late he had been. "The secret of the Lord is" said to be "with them that fear him;" for he shews them that in his covenant which others see not, Ps. xxv. 14. God communicates his favour and grace to his people, and receives the returns of their devotion, in a way secret to the world. Some read it, 'when the society of God was in my tabernacle;' which rabbi Solomon understands of an assembly of God's people that used to meet at Job's house for religious worship in which he presided; this he took a great deal of pleasure in, and the scattering of it was a trouble to him. Or it may be understood of the angels of God pitching their tents about his habitation.

4. The assurance he had of the Divine presence; ver. 5, "The Almighty was yet with me." Now he thought God was departed from him, but in those days he was with him, and that was all in all to him. God's presence with a man in his house, though it be but a cottage, makes it both a castle and a palace.

Secondly. That he had comfort in his family; every thing was agreeable there. He had both mouths for his meat and meat for his mouths; the want of either is a great affliction. 1. He had a numerous offspring to enjoy his estate; "My children were about me." He had many children, enough to compass him round, and they were observant of him, and obsequious to him; they were about him to know what he would have, and wherein they might serve him. It is a comfort to tender parents to see their children about them; Job speaks very feelingly of this comfort, now he was deprived of it. He thought it an instance of God's being with him, that his children were about him; and yet we reckon wrong, if, when we have lost our children, we cannot comfort ourselves with this, that we have not lost our God. 2. He had a plentiful estate for the support of this numerous family, ver. 6. His dairy abounded to that degree, that he might if he pleased wash his steps with butter; and his oliveyards were so fruitful, beyond expectation, that it seemed as if the rock poured him out rivers of oil. He reckons his wealth, not by his silver and gold, which were for hoarding, but by his butter and oil, which were for use. For what is an estate good for, unless we take the good of it ourselves, and do good with it to others?

7 When I went out to the gate through the city,
When I prepared my seat in the street!
8 The young men saw me, and hid themselves:
And the aged arose, and stood up.
9 The princes refrained talking,
And laid their hand on their mouth.
10 The nobles held their peace,
And their tongue cleaved to the roof of their mouth
11 When the ear heard me, then it blessed me;
And when the eye saw me, it gave witness to me:
12 Because I delivered the poor that cried,
And the fatherless, and him that had none to help him.
13 The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me:
And I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.
14 I put on righteousness, and it clothed me:
My judgment was as a robe and a diadem
15 I was eyes to the blind,
And feet was I to the lame.
16 I was a father to the poor:
And the cause which I knew not I searched out.
17 And I brake the jaws of the wicked,
And plucked the spoil out of his teeth.

We have here Job in a post of honour and power; though he had comfort enough in his own house, yet he did not confine himself to that: we are not born for ourselves, but for the public. When any business was to be done in the gate, the place of judgment, Job went out to it through the city, ver. 7; not in an affectation of pomp, but in affection to justice. Observe, judgment was administered in the gate, in the street, in the places of concourse, to which every man might have a free access; that who would might be a witness to all that was said and done, and that, when judgment was given against the guilty, others might hear and fear. Job being a prince, a judge, a magistrate, a man in authority among the children of the East, we are here told,

First. What a great deal of respect was paid him by all sorts of people, not only for the dignity of his place, but for his personal merit, his eminent prudence, integrity, and good management. 1. The people honoured him, and stood in awe of him, ver. 8. The gravity and majesty of his looks and mien, and his known strictness in animadverting upon every thing that was evil and indecent, commanded all about him into a due decorum. "The young men," that could not keep their countenances, or it may be were conscious to themselves of something amiss, "hid themselves," and got out of his way; "and the aged," though they kept their ground, yet would not keep their seats, they "arose, and stood up," to do obeisance to him. They who expected honour from others gave honour to him. Virtue and piety challenge respect from all, and ordinarily have it: but they that not only are good, but do good, are worthy of double honour. Modesty becomes those that are young and in subjection, as much as majesty becomes those that are aged and in power. Honour and fear are due to magistrates, and must be rendered to them, Rom. xiii. 7; but if a great and good man was thus reverenced, how is the great and good God to be feared! 2. The princes and nobles paid a mighty deference to him, ver. 9, 10. Some think these were inferior magistrates under him; and the respect they paid him was due to his place, as their sovereign and supreme. It should rather seem they were his equals in place, and joined in commission with him, and the peculiar honour they gave him was gained by his extraordinary abilities and services. It was agreed that he excelled them all in quickness of apprehension, soundness of judgment, closeness of application, clearness and copiousness of expression; and, therefore, he was among his fellows an oracle of law, and counsel, and justice, and what he said all attended to, and acquiesced in. When he came into court, especially when he stood up to speak to any business, "the princes refrained talking; the nobles held their peace," that they might the more diligently hearken to what he said, and might be sure to take his meaning. They that had been forward to speak their own thoughts, loved to hear themselves talk, and cared not much what any body else said, yet, when it came to Job's turn to speak, were as desirous to know his thoughts as ever they had been to vent their own. They that suspected their own judgment were satisfied in his, and admired with what dexterity he split the hair, and untied the knots, which puzzled them, and which they knew not what to make of. When the princes and nobles wrangled among themselves, all agreed to refer the matters in dispute to Job, and to abide by his judgment. Happy the men that are blest with such eminent gifts as these; they have great opportunities of honouring God, and doing good, but have great need to watch against pride. Happy the people that are blest with such eminent men; it is a token for good to them.

Secondly. What a great deal of good he did in his place. He was very serviceable to his country with the power he had; and here we shall see what it was which Job valued himself by in the day of his prosperity. It is natural to men to have some value for themselves, and we may judge something of our own character by observing what that is upon which we value ourselves. Job valued himself, not by the honour of his family, the great estate he had, his large income, his full table, the many servants he had at his command, the ensigns of his dignity, his equipage and retinue, the splendid entertainments he gave, and the court that was made to him, but by his usefulness. Goodness is God's glory, and it will be ours; be merciful as God is, and we are perfect as he is.

1. He valued himself by the interest he had in the esteem, affections, and prayers of sober people; not by the studied panegyrics of the wits and poets, but the natural praises of all about him. All that heard what he said, and saw what he did, how he laid out himself for the public good, with all the authority and tender affection of a father to his country, blessed him, and gave witness to him, ver. 11. Many a good word they said of him, and many a good prayer they put up for him. He did not think it an honour to make every body fear him, (Oderint dum metuant,—'Let them hate, provided they also fear,') nor to be arbitrary, and to have his own will and way, not caring what people said of him; but, like Mordecai, to be "accepted of the multitude of his brethren," Est. x. 3. He did not so much value the applauses of those at a distance as the attestations of those that were the witnesses of his conduct, that constantly attended him, saw him, and heard him, and could speak of their own knowledge; especially theirs who had themselves been the better for him, and could speak by their own experience; such was "the blessing of him that was ready to perish," ver. 13, and who, by Job's means, was rescued from perishing. Let great men, and men of estates, thus do good, and they shall have praise of the same; and let those who have good done to them look upon it as a just debt they owe to their protectors and benefactors, to bless them and give witness to them; to use their interest on earth for their honour, and in heaven for their comfort; to praise them, and pray for them. Those are ungrateful indeed who grudge these small returns.

2. He valued himself by the care he took of those that were least able to help themselves, the poor and the needy, the widows and fatherless, the blind and lame, who could not be supposed either to merit his favour or ever to be in a capacity to recompense it. 1st. If the poor were injured or oppressed, they might cry to Job, and, if he found the allegations of their petitions true, they had not only his ear and his bowels, but his hand too; he "delivered the poor that cried," ver. 12, and would not suffer them to be trampled upon and run down. Nay, ver. 16, he was "a father to the poor;" not only a judge to protect them, and to see that they were not wronged, but a father to provide for them, and to see that they did not want; to counsel and direct them, and to appear and act for them upon all occasions. It is no disparagement to the son of a prince to be a father to the poor. 2nd. The fatherless, that had none to help them, found Job ready to them; and, if they were in straits, to deliver them. He helped them to make the best of what little they had; helped them to pay what they owed, and to get in what was owing to them; helped them out into the world, helped them into business; helped them to it, and helped them in it: thus should the fatherless be helped. 3rd. Those that were ready to perish he saved from perishing; relieving them that were hungry and ready to perish for want; taking care of them that were sick, that were outcasts, that were falsely accused, or in danger of being turned out of their estates unjustly, or upon any other account were ready to perish. And the extremity of the peril, as it quickened Job to appear the more vigorously for them, so it made his seasonable kindness the more affecting, and the more obliging, and brought their blessings the more abundantly upon him. 4th. The widows that were sighing for grief, and trembling for fear, he made to sing for joy; so carefully did he protect them, and provide for them, and so heartily did he espouse their interest. It is a pleasure to a good man, and should be so to a great man, to give those occasion to rejoice who are most acquainted with grief. 5th. Those that were upon any account at a loss Job gave suitable and seasonable relief to; ver. 15, "I was eyes to the blind," counselling and advising those for the best that knew not what to do; "and feet to the lame," assisting those with money and friends that knew what they should do, but knew not how to compass it. Those we best help whom we help out in that very thing wherein they are defective and most need help. We may come to be blind or lame ourselves, and therefore should pity and succour those that are so, Isa. xxxv. 3, 4; Heb. xii. 13.

3. He valued himself by the conscience he made of justice and equity in all his proceedings. His friends had unjustly censured him as an oppressor. So far from that, saith he, that I always made it my business to maintain and support right. 1st. He devoted himself to the administration of justice; ver. 14, "I put on righteousness, and it clothed me;" that is, he had an habitual disposition to execute justice, and put on a fixed resolution to do it. It was the girdle of his loins, Isa. xi. 5. It kept him tight and steady in all his motions; he always appeared in it, as in his clothing, and never without it. They that put on righteousness it will clothe them, it will keep them warm, and be comfortable to themselves; it will keep them safe, and fence them against the injuries of the season; it will adorn them, and recommend them to the favour both of God and man. 2nd. He took pleasure in it, and, as I may say, a holy pride. He looked upon it as his greatest glory to do justice to all, and xxix. 6. Job had enjoyed abundance: "a rich blessing surrounded him wherever he tarried or went, and flowed to him wonderfully beyond desire and comprehension." The word for "butter" rather means "cream," or milk of a creamy consistence. The language is highly figurative.

xxix. 7—17. In these verses Job enumerates the advantages which he had enjoyed and been enabled to dispense. Every detail has reference to the judicial position which he had occupied. In accordance with Oriental custom, he went from his house to the gate where magisterial decisions were pronounced, and he sat upon the seat of judgment in the open space by the gate. On such occasions he was treated with respect by young and old, and men of the most exalted rank stood aside and were silent. The popular voice bore witness to his high character and generous dealings. He took up the cause of the distressed when they complained, and of the friendless orphans when they came before him. The perishing blessed him for his injury to none; "My judgment was as a robe and a diadem." Perhaps he did not himself wear a robe and a diadem, he was very indifferent to those ensigns of honour,—they were most fond of them that had least intrinsic worth to recommend them,—but the settled principles of justice, by which he was governed, and did govern, were to him instead of all those ornaments. If a magistrate do the duty of his place, that is an honour to him far beyond his gold or purple, and should be accordingly his delight; and truly if he do not make conscience of his duty, and in some measure answer the end of his elevation, his robe and diadem, his crown and cap, his sword and mace, are but a reproach, like the purple robe and crown of thorns with which the Jews studied to ridicule our Saviour. For, as clothes on a dead man will never make him warm, so robes on an ill man will never make him honourable. 3rd. He took pains in the business of his place; ver. 16, "The cause which I knew not, I searched out." He diligently inquired into the matters of fact, patiently and impartially heard both sides, set every thing in its true light, and cleared it from false colours; he laid all circumstances together, that he might find out the truth, and the merits of every cause, and then, and not till then, gave judgment upon it. He never answered a matter before he heard it, nor did he judge a man to be righteous, however he seemed, for his being first in his own cause, Pr. xviii. 17.

4. He valued himself by the check he gave to the violence of proud and evil men; ver. 17, "I brake the jaws of the wicked." He doth not say he broke their necks, he did not take away their lives, but he broke their jaws; he took away their power of doing mischief, he humbled them, mortified them, and curbed their insolence, and so "plucked the spoil out of their teeth;" delivered the persons and estates of honest men from being made a prey of by them. When they had got the spoil between their teeth, and were greedily swallowing it down, he bravely rescued it, as David did the lamb out of the mouth of the lion; not fearing, though they roared and raged like a lion disappointed of his prey. Good magistrates must thus be a terror and restraint to evil doers, and a protection to the innocent; and, in order to this, they have need to arm themselves with zeal and resolution, and an undaunted courage. A judge upon the bench has as much need to be bold and brave as a commander in the field.

18 Then I said, I shall die in my nest,
And I shall multiply my days as the sand.
19 My root was spread out by the waters,
And the dew lay all night upon my branch
20 My glory was fresh in me,
And my bow was renewed in my hand.
21 Unto me men gave ear, and waited,
And kept silence at my counsel.
22 After my words they spake not again;
And my speech dropped upon them.
23 And they waited for me as for the rain;
And they opened their mouth wide as for the latter rain.
24 If I laughed on them, they believed it not;
And the light of my countenance they cast not down.
25 I chose out their way, and sat chief,
And dwelt as a king in the army,
As one that comforteth the mourners

That which crowned Job's prosperity was the pleasing prospect he had of the continuance of it. Though he knew, in the general, he was liable to trouble, and therefore was not secure, ch. iii. 26, "I was not in safety, neither had I rest," yet he had no particular occasion for fear, but as much reason as ever any man had to count upon the lengthening out of his tranquillity.

First. See here what his thoughts were in his prosperity; ver. 18, "Then I said, I shall die in my nest." Having made himself a warm and easy nest, he hoped nothing would disturb him in it, nor move him out of it till death removed him. He knew he had never stolen any coal from the altar which might fire his nest; he saw no storm arising to shake down his nest, and therefore concluded, that to-morrow shall be as this day; as David, Ps. xxx. 6, "My mountain stands strong, and shall not be moved." Observe, 1. In the midst of his prosperity he thought of dying, and the thought was not uneasy to him. He knew, though his nest was high, it did not set him out of the reach of the darts of death. 2. Yet he flattered himself with vain hopes, 1st. That he should live long, should multiply his days as the sand. He means as the sand on the seashore; whereas we should rather reckon our days by the sand in the hour-glass, which will be run out in a little time. See how apt even good people are to think of death as a thing at a distance, and to put far from them that evil day, which will really be to them a good day. 2nd. That he should die in the same prosperous state in which he had lived. If such an expectation as this arise from a lively faith in the providence and promise of God, it is well; but if from a conceit of our own wisdom, and the stability of these earthly things, it is ill grounded, and turns into sin. We hope Job's confidence was like David's, Ps. xxvii. 1, "Whom shall I fear?" not like the rich fool's, Lu. xii. 19, "Soul, take thine ease."

Secondly. See what was the ground of these thoughts.

1. If he looked at home, he found he had a good bottom. His stock was all his own, and none of all his neighbours had any demand upon him. He found no bodily distemper growing upon him, his estate did not lie under any incumbrance, nor was he sensible of any worm at the root of it. He was getting forward in his affairs, and not going behindhand; he lost no reputation, but gained rather; he knew no rival that threatened either to eclipse his honour, or abridge his power. See how he describes this, ver. 19, 20. He was like a tree, whose root is not only spread out, which fixeth it and keeps it firm, so that it is in no danger of being overturned, but spread out by the waters, which feed it, and make it fruitful and flourishing, so that it is in no danger of withering. And, as he thought himself blessed with the fatness of the earth, so also with the kind influences of heaven too; for the dew lay all night upon his branch. Providence favoured him, and made all his enjoyments comfortable, and all his enterprises successful. Let none think to support their prosperity with what they draw from this earth, without that blessing which is derived from above. God's favour being continued to Job, in the virtue of that his glory was still fresh in him. Those about him had still something new to say in his praise, and needed not to repeat the old stories. And it is only by constant goodness that men's glory is thus preserved fresh, and kept from withering and growing stale. His bow also was renewed in his hand; that is, his power to protect himself, and annoy those that assailed him, still increased; so that he thought he had as little reason as any man to fear the insults of the Sabeans and Chaldeans.

2. If he looked abroad, he found he had a good interest, and well confirmed. As he had no reason to dread the power of his enemies, so neither had he any reason to distrust the fidelity of his friends. To the last moment of his prosperity they continued their respects to him, and their dependence on him. What had he to fear who so gave counsel as in effect to give law to all his neighbours? Nothing sure could be done against him, when really nothing was done without him.

1st. He was the oracle of his country. He was consulted as an oracle, and his dictates were acquiesced in as oracles, ver. 21. When others could not be heard, all men gave ear to him, and kept silence at his counsel, knowing that, as nothing could be said against it, so nothing needed to be added to it; and, therefore, after his words they spake not again, ver. 22. Why should men meddle with a subject that has already been exhausted?

2nd. He was the darling of his country. All about him were well pleased with every thing he said and did, as David's people were with him, 2 Sam. iii. 36. He had the hearts and affections of all his neighbours, all his servants, tenants, subjects; never was man so much admired, nor so well beloved. First. They were thought happy to whom he spoke, and they thought themselves so. Never were the dews of heaven so acceptable to the parched ground as his wise discourses were to them that attended on them, especially to whom they were particularly accommodated and directed. His "speech dropped upon them," and they "waited for it as for the rain," ver. 22, 23; wondering at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth, catching at them, laying hold on them, and treasuring them up as apophthegms. His servants that stood continually before him to hear his wisdom would not have envied Solomon's. Those are wise, or are likely to be so, that know how to value wise discourse, that wish for it, and wait for it, and drink it in as the earth doth the rain that comes often upon it, Heb. vi. 7. And those who have such an interest as Job had in the esteem of others, whose ipse dixit goes so far, as they have a great opportunity of doing good, so they must take great care lest they do hurt; for an ill word out of their mouths is very infectious. Much more happy were they thought on whom he smiled, and they thought themselves so; ver. 24, "If I laughed on them," designing thereby to shew myself pleased in them, or pleasant with them, it was such a favour, that "they believed it not" for joy, or because it was so rare a thing to see this grave man smile. "Many seek the ruler's favour." Job was a ruler whose favour was courted, and valued at a high rate. He to whom a great prince gave a kiss was envied by another to whom he only gave a golden cup. Familiarity often breeds contempt; but, if Job at any time saw fit, for his own diversion, to make himself free with those about him, yet it did not in the least diminish the veneration they had for him; "the light of his countenance they cast not down." So wisely did he dispense his favours as not to make them cheap, and so wisely did they receive them as not to make themselves unworthy of them another time.

3rd. He was the sovereign of his country; ver. 25, he "chose out their way sat at the helm, and steered for them; all referring themselves to his conduct, and submitting themselves to his command. To this, perhaps, in many countries, monarchy owed its rise. Such a man as Job, that so far excelled all his neighbours in wisdom and integrity, could not but sit chief, and the fool will, of course, be servant to the wise in heart; and if the wisdom did but for a while run in the blood, the honour and power would certainly attend it, and so by degrees become hereditary. Two things recommended Job to the sovereignty: First. That he had the authority of a commander, or general; he "dwelt as a king in the army," giving orders which were not to be disputed. Every one that has the spirit of wisdom has not the spirit of government; but Job had both, and, when there was occasion, could take on as the king in the army doth, and say, Go, Come, and Do this, Mat. viii. 9. Secondly. That yet he had the tenderness of a comforter. He was as ready to succour those in distress as if it had been his office to comfort the mourners. Eliphaz himself owned he had been very good at that; ch. iv. 3, "Thou hast strengthened the weak hands;" and this he now reflected upon with pleasure when he was himself a mourner. But we find it easier to comfort others with the comforts wherewith we ourselves have been formerly comforted, than to comfort ourselves with thos comforts wherewith we have formerly comforted others.

I know not but we may look upon Job as a type and figure of Christ in his power and prosperity. Our Lord Jesus is such a king as Job was; the poor man's king, who loveth righteousness and hateth iniquity, and upon whom the blessing of a world ready to perish comes: see Ps. lxxii. 2, &c. To him, therefore, let us give ear, and let him sit chief in our hearts.

CHAPTER XXX.

It is a melancholy "but now" which this chapter begins with. Adversity is here described as much to the life as prosperity was there, and the height of that did but increase the depth of this. God sets the one over against the other, and so did Job, that his afflictions might appear the more grievous, and consequently his case the more piteous. I. He had lived in great honour, but now he had fallen into disgrace, and was much vilified, even by the meanest, as ever he had been magnified by the greatest; this he insists much on, ver. 1—14. II. He had had much inward comfort and delight, but now he was a terror and burthen to himself, ver. 15, 16, and overwhelmed with sorrow, ver. 26—31. III. He had long enjoyed a good state of health, but now he was sick and in pain, ver. 17—19, 29, 30. IV. Time was when the secret of God was with him, but now his communication with Heaven was cut off, ver. 20—22. V. He had promised himself a long life, but now he saw death at the door, ver. 23. One thing he mentions, which aggravated his affliction, that it surprised him when he looked for peace. But two things gave him some relief: 1. That his troubles would not follow him to the grave, ver. 24. 2. That his conscience witnessed for him, that in his prosperity he had sympathised with those that were in misery, ver. 25.

BUT now they that are younger than I have me in derision,
Whose fathers I would have disdained to have set with the dogs of my flock.
2 Yea, whereto might the strength of their hands profit me,
In whom old age was perished?

intervention, and the widow was cheered by his decisions. He ever acted justly, and showed compassion to the blind, the lame, the poor, and the stranger. He punished the wicked, and compelled them to make restitution.

xxix. 18. Some Jewish authors, followed by a few Christian critics, have imagined that the Hebrew word for "sand" means the fabulous bird "phœnix." The Greek version is, "And I said, My age shall grow old, like the stem of a palm-tree. I shall live a long time."

It so happens that the Greek for "palm" is phœnix, and hence in all probability the Jewish fancy. Delitzsch goes at length into the reasons for thinking the phœnix is meant here, but they for the most part amount to this, that certain Jewish writers have said so. Dr. S. Davidson strangely affirms, without even suggesting a doubt, that the phœnix is referred to, and mentions it as an objection to the plenary inspiration of the book. Perhaps he thinks, like Herder, that the phœnix is "obviously intended here." This is not criticism,

POOR BEDOUIN ARAB.

Here Job makes a very large and sad complaint of the great disgrace he was fallen into, from the height of honour and reputation, which was exceeding grievous and cutting to such an ingenuous spirit as Job's was. Two things he insists upon, as very aggravating:

First. The meanness of the persons that affronted him. As it added much to his honour in the day of his prosperity that princes and nobles shewed him respect, and paid a deference to him, so it added no less to his disgrace in his adversity that he was kicked by the footmen, and trampled upon by those that were not only every way his inferiors, but were the meanest and most contemptible of all mankind. None can be represented more base than they are here represented who insulted Job, upon all accounts.

1. They were young, younger than he, ver. 1; the youth, ver. 12; who ought to have behaved themselves respectfully towards him for his age and gravity. Even the children in their play played upon him, as the children of Bethel upon the prophet; "Go up, thou baldhead." Children soon learn to be scornful, when they see their parents so.

2. They were of a mean extraction. Their fathers were so very despicable that such a man as Job would have disdained to take them into the lowest service about his house, as that of tending the sheep, and attending the shepherds with the dogs of his flock, ver. 1. They were so shabby that they were not fit to be seen among his servants, so silly that they were not fit to be employed, and so false that they were not fit to be trusted in the meanest post. Job here speaks what he might have done, not what he did. He was not of such a spirit as to set any of the children of men with the dogs of his flock, he knew the dignities of the human nature better than so.

3. They and their families were the unprofitable burthens of the earth, and good for nothing. Job himself, with all his prudence and patience, could make nothing of them, ver. 2. The young were not fit for labour, they were so lazy, and went about their work so awkwardly; "Whereto might the strength of their hands profit me?" The old were not to be advised with in the smallest matters, for in them was old age indeed, but their old age was perished, they were twice children.

4. They were extreme poor, ver. 3; they were ready to famish, for they would not dig, and to beg they were ashamed. Had they been brought to necessity by the providence of God, their neighbours would have sought them out as proper objects of charity, and would have relieved them; but, being brought into straits by their own slothfulness and wastefulness, nobody was forward to relieve them, but they were forced to flee into the deserts, both for shelter and sustenance, and were put to sorry shifts indeed, when they "cut up mallows by the bushes," and were glad to eat them, for want of food that was fit for them, ver. 4. See what hunger will bring men to; one half of the world doth not know how the other half lives, yet those that have abundance ought to think sometimes of those whose fare is very coarse, and who are brought to a short allowance of that too; but we must own the righteousness of God, and not think it strange if slothfulness clothes men with rags, and the idle soul be made to suffer hunger. This beggarly world is full of the devil's poor.

5. They were very scandalous wicked people, not only the burthens, but the plagues of the places where they lived, arrant scoundrels, and the scum of the country, "They were driven forth from among men," ver. 5. They were such lying, thieving, lurking, mischievous people, that the best service the magistrates could do was to rid the country of them, while the very mob "cried after them as after a thief:" Away with such fellows from the earth, it is not fit they should live. They were lazy, and would not work, and therefore they were exclaimed against as thieves; and justly, for they that do not earn their own bread by honest labour do in effect steal the bread out of other people's mouths. An idle fellow is a public nuisance; but it is better drive such into a workhouse than, as here, into a wilderness, which will punish them indeed, but never reform them. They were forced to dwell in caves of the earth, and they brayed like asses among the bushes, ver. 6, 7. See what is the lot of those that have the cry of the country, the cry of their own conscience, against them, they cannot but be in a continual terror and confusion. 'They groan among the trees,' so Broughton, 'and smart among the nettles;' they are stung and scratched there, where they hoped to be sheltered and protected. See what miseries wicked people bring themselves to in this world; yet this is nothing to what is in reserve for them in the other world.

6. They were all that is base, ver. 8. They had nothing at all in them to recommend them to any man's esteem. They were a vile kind; yea, a kind without fame; people that nobody could give a good word to, nor had a good wish for; they were banished from the earth, as being viler than the earth. One would not think it possible that ever the human nature should sink so low, and degenerate so far as it did in these people. When we thank God we are men, we have reason to thank him that we are not such men. But such as these were abusive to Job, 1st. In revenge; because, when he was in prosperity and power, like a good magistrate, he put the laws in execution which were in force against vagabonds and rogues, and sturdy beggars, which these base people now remembered against him. 2nd. In triumph over him; because they thought he was now become like one of them: alluding to Isa. xiv. 10, 11. The abjects, men of mean spirits, insult over the miserable, Ps. xxxv. 15.

Secondly. The greatness of the affronts that were given him. It cannot be imagined how abusive they were.

1. They made ballads of him, with which they made themselves and their companions merry; ver. 9, "I am their song, and their byword." Those have a very base spirit that turn the calamities of their honest neighbours into a jest, and can sport themselves with their griefs.

2. They shunned him as a loathsome spectacle, abhorred him, fled far from him, ver. 10, as an ugly monster, or as one infected. They that were themselves driven out from among men, would have him driven out; for,

3. They expressed the greatest scorn and indignation against him that could be. They spat in his face, or were ready to do so; they tripped up his heels, pushed away his feet, ver. 12; kicked him, either in wrath, because they hated him, or in sport, to make themselves merry with him, as they did with their companions at foot-ball. The best of saints have sometimes received the worst of injuries and indignities from a spiteful, scornful, wicked world, and must not think it strange. Our Master himself was thus abused.

4. They were very malicious against him, and not only made a jest of him, but made a prey of him; not only affronted him, but set themselves to do him all the real mischief they could devise. "They raise up against me the ways of their destruction;" or, as some read it, 'They cast upon me the causes of their woe,' that is, they lay the blame of their being driven out upon me; and it is common for criminals to hate the judges and laws by which they are punished. But under this pretence, 1st. They accused him falsely, and misrepresented his former conversation, which is here called marring his path. They reflected upon him as a tyrant and an oppressor, because he had done justice upon them; and perhaps Job's friends grounded their uncharitable censures of him, ch. xx. 6, &c., upon the unjust and unreasonable clamours of these sorry people; and it was an instance of their great weakness and inconsideration, for who can be innocent if the accusations of such fellows may be heeded? They not only triumphed in his calamity, but set it forward, and did all they could to add to his miseries, and make them more grievous to him. It is a great sin to forward the calamity of any, especially of good people. In this they have no helper, nobody to set them on, or to countenance them in it; nobody to bear them out, or to protect them; but they do it of their own accord. They are fools in other things, but wise enough to do mischief, and need no help in inventing that; some read it thus, 'They hold my heaviness a profit, though they be never the better.' Wicked people, though they get nothing by the calamities of others, yet rejoice in them.

5. They that did him all this mischief were numerous, unanimous, and violent; ver. 14, "They came upon me as a wide breaking in of waters," when the dam is broken; or, they come as soldiers into a broad breach which they have made in the wall of a besieged city, pouring in upon me with the utmost fury; and in this they took a pride and a pleasure; "in the desolation they rolled themselves," as a man rolls himself in a soft and easy bed, and they rolled themselves upon him with all the weight of their malice.

Thirdly, All this contempt put upon him was caused by the troubles he was in; ver. 11, "Because he hath loosed my cord;" hath taken away the honour and power with which I was girded, ch. xii. 18, hath scattered what I had got together, and untwisted all my affairs; "because he hath afflicted me, therefore they have let loose the bridle before me," that is, have given themselves a liberty to say and do what they please against me. They that by Providence are stripped of their honour may expect to be loaded with contempt by inconsiderate ill-natured people. 'Because he has loosed his cord,' (the original has that reading also,) that is, because he hath taken off his bridle of restraint from off their malice, 'they cast away the bridle from me,' that is, they make no account of my authority, nor stand in any awe of me. It is owing to the hold God has of the consciences, even of bad men, and the restraints he lays upon them, that we are not continually thus insulted and abused; and if at any time we meet with such ill treatment, we must acknowledge the hand of God in taking off those restraints; as David did when Shimei cursed him, "So let him curse, for the Lord has bidden him."

Now in all this, 1. We may see the uncertainty of worldly honour, and particularly of popular applause; how suddenly a man may fall from the height of dignity into the depth of disgrace. What little cause therefore have men to be ambitious or proud of that which may be so easily lost, and what little confidence is to be put in it! They that to-day cry, Hosanna, may to-morrow cry, Crucify; but there is an honour which comes from God, which if we secure, we shall find it not thus changeable and loseable. 2. We may see that it has often been the lot of very wise and good men to be trampled upon and abused. And, 3. That those who look only at the things that are seen despise those whom the world frowns upon, though they are never so much the favourites of Heaven. Nothing is more grievous in poverty than that it renders men contemptible;

The only serious reason for supposing some bird to be meant, lies in the mention of a nest earlier in the verse, and the long life which Job promised to himself. These, however, are just as appropriate under the common view as under the other. The earliest traces of the fable of the phœnix are among the Egyptians, according to Herodotus (book ii. 73). We conclude with Gesenius: "There is no cause for departing from the ordinary signification" of the word rendered "sand" in this text.

xxix. 23. "The latter rain" was rather the close of the rainy season than a distinct time of rain. As spring advances, men are intensely anxious for abundant showers before the rain wholly ceases for the summer, especially if the fall has been below the average.

xxix. 24. Many explanations of the first clause have been offered, but the common translation is very close. Job meant to say that his own seriousness and the respect in which he was held were such that when he laughed to others they could not believe it.

Turba Remi, sequitur fortunam, ut semper odit damnatos,—'The Roman populace, faithful to the turns of fortune, still persecute the fallen.' 4. We may see in Job a type of Christ, who was thus made a reproach of men, and despised of the people, Ps. xxii. 6; Isa. liii. 3; and who hid not his face from shame and spitting, but bore it better than Job did.

15 Terrors are turned upon me:
They pursue my soul as the wind:
And my welfare passeth away as a cloud.
16 And now my soul is poured out upon me;
The days of affliction have taken hold upon me.
7 My bones are pierced in me in the night season:
And my sinews take no rest.
18 By the great force of my disease is my garment changed:
It bindeth me about as the collar of my coat
19 He hath cast me into the mire,
And I am become like dust and ashes.
20 I cry unto thee, and thou dost not hear me:
I stand up, and thou regardest me not
21 Thou art become cruel to me:
With thy strong hand thou opposest thyself against me.
22 Thou liftest me up to the wind; [substance.
Thou causest me to ride upon it, and dissolvest my 23 For I know that thou wilt bring me to death,
And to the house appointed for all living.
24 Howbeit he will not stretch out his hand to the grave,
Though they cry in his destruction.
25 Did not I weep for him that was in trouble?
Was not my soul grieved for the poor?
26 When I looked for good, then evil came unto me:
And when I waited for light, there came darkness
27 My bowels boiled, and rested not:
The days of affliction prevented me
28 I went mourning without the sun:
I stood up, and I cried in the congregation.
29 I am a brother to dragons,
And a companion to owls.
30 My skin is black upon me,
And my bones are burned with heat.
31 My harp also is turned to mourning,
And my organ into the voice of them that weep.

In this second part of Job's complaint, which is very bitter, and has a great many sorrowful accents upon it, we may observe a great deal that he complains of, and some little that he comforts himself with.

First. Here is a great deal that he complains of.

1. In general, it was a day of great affliction and sorrow. 1st. Affliction seized him, and surprised him. It seized him; ver. 16, "The days of affliction have taken hold upon me;" have 'caught me,' so some. They have arrested me, as the bailiff arrests the debtor, claps him on the back, and lays him by the heels. When trouble comes with commission, it will take fast hold, and not lose its hold. It surprised him; ver. 27, "The days of affliction prevented me;" that is, they came upon me without giving me any previous warning; I did not expect them, nor make any provision for such an evil day. Observe, he reckons his affliction by days, which will soon be numbered and finished, and are nothing to the ages of eternity, 2 Cor. iv. 17. 2nd. He was in great sorrow by reason of it. His bowels boiled with grief, and rested not, ver. 27. The sense of his calamities was continually preying upon his spirits without any intermission. He went mourning from day to day, always sighing, always weeping, and such a cloud was constantly upon his mind, that he went in effect without the sun, ver. 28. He had nothing that he could take any comfort in; he abandoned himself to a perpetual sorrow, as one that, like Jacob, resolved to go to the grave mourning. He walked out of the sun, (so some,) in dark shady places, as melancholy people use to do. If he went into the congregation, to join with them in solemn worship, instead of standing up calmly to desire their prayers, he stood up and cried aloud, through pain of body, or anguish of mind, like one half distracted. If he appeared in public to receive visits, when the fit came upon him, he could not contain himself, nor maintain any thing of a decorum, but stood up and shrieked aloud. Thus he was a brother to dragons and owls, ver. 29; both in choosing solitude and retirement, as they do, Isa. xxxiv. 13, and in making a fearful hideous noise, as they do; his inconsiderate complaints were fitly compared to their inarticulate ones.

2. The terror and trouble that seized his soul was the sorest part of his calamity, ver. 15, 16. 1st. If he looked forward, he saw every thing frightful before him; if he endeavoured to shake off his terrors, they turned furiously upon him; if he endeavoured to outrun them, they pursued his soul, as swiftly and violently as the wind. He complained at first of the terrors of God setting themselves in array against him, ch. vi. 4; and still, which way soever he looked, they turned upon him; which way soever he fled, they pursued him. "My soul;" (Hebrew 'my principal one,' 'my princess;') for the soul is the principal part of the man; it is our glory; it is every way more excellent than the body, and, therefore, that which pursues the soul, and threatens that, should be most dreaded. 2nd. If he looked back, he saw all the good he had formerly enjoyed removed from him, and nothing left him but the bitter remembrance of it; My welfare and prosperity passeth away as suddenly, swiftly, and irrecoverably as a cloud. 3rd. If he looked within, he found his spirit quite sunk, and unable to bear his infirmity; not only wounded, but poured out upon him, ver. 16. He was not only weak as water, but in his own apprehension lost as water spilt upon the ground. Compare Ps. xxii. 14, "My heart is melted like wax."

3. His bodily diseases were very grievous; for, 1st. He was full of pain, piercing pain; pain that went to the bone, to all his bones, ver. 17. It was a sword in his bones, which pierced him in the night season, when he should have been refreshed with sleep; his nerves were affected with strong convulsions, his sinews took no rest. By reason of his pain he could take no rest, but sleep departed from his eyes. His bones were burnt with heat, ver. 30. He was in a constant fever, which dried up the radical moisture, and even consumed the marrow in his bones. See how frail our bodies are, which carry in themselves the seeds of our own disease and death. 2nd. He was full of sores. Some that are pained in their bones, yet sleep in a whole skin, but Satan's commission against Job extending both to his bone and to his flesh, he spared neither. His skin was black upon him, ver. 30. The blood settled; the sores suppurated, and by degrees scabbed over, which made his skin look black. Even his garment had its colour changed with the continual running of his boils; and the soft clothing he used to wear was now grown so stiff that all his garments were like his collar, ver. 18. It would be noisome to describe what a condition poor Job was in for want of clean linen, and good attendance; and what filthy rags all his clothes were. Some think that among other diseases Job was ill of a quinsey, or swelling in his throat, and that was it which bound him about like a stiff collar. Thus was he "cast into the mire," ver. 19; 'compared to mire,' so some; his body looked more like a heap of dirt than any thing else. Let none be proud of their clothing, nor proud of their cleanness; they know not but some disease or other may change their garments, and even throw them into the mire, and make them noisome both to themselves and others; "instead of sweet smell there shall be stink," Isa. iii. 24. We are but dust and ashes at the best, and our bodies vile bodies; but we are apt to forget it, till God by some sore disease make us sensibly to feel and own what we are; I am become already like that dust and ashes into which I must shortly be resolved. Wherever I go, I carry my grave about with me.

4. That which afflicted him most of all was, that God seemed to be his enemy, and to fight against him. It was he that cast him into the mire, ver. 19, and seemed to trample on him when he had him there. This cut him to the heart more than any thing else. 1st. That God did not appear for him. He addressed to him, but gained no grant; appealed to him, but gained no sentence; he was very importunate in his applications, but in vain; ver. 20, "I cry unto thee," as one in earnest; "I stand up" and cry, as one waiting for an answer, but "thou hearest not," "thou regardest not," for any thing I can perceive. If our most fervent prayers bring not in speedy and sensible returns, we must not think it strange. Though the seed of Jacob did never seek in vain, yet they have often thought they did, and that God has not only been deaf, but angry at the prayers of his people, Ps. lxxx. 4. 2nd. That God did appear against him. It is one of the worst words that ever Job spoke, that which he lets chargeth upon God; ver. 21, "Thou art become cruel to me." Far be it from the God of mercy and grace, that he should be cruel to any, his compassions fail not; but especially that he should be so to his own children. Job was unjust and ungrateful when he said so of him; but harbouring hard thoughts of God was the sin which did at this time most easily beset him. Here, First. He thought God fought against him, and stirred up his whole strength to ruin him; "With thy strong hand thou opposest thyself," or art an adversary "against me." He had better thoughts of God, ch. xxiii. 6, when he concluded he would not plead against him with his great power. God has an absolute sovereignty, and an irresistible strength; but he never useth either the one or the other for the crushing or oppressing of any. Secondly. He thought he insulted over him; ver. 22, "Thou liftest me up to the wind," as a feather, or the chaff which the wind plays with; so unequal a match did Job think himself for Omnipotence, and so unable was he to help himself when he was made to ride—not in triumph, but in terror—upon the wings of the wind; and the judgments of God did even dissolve his substance, as a cloud is dissolved and dispersed by the wind. Man's substance, take him in his best estate, is nothing before the power of God; it is soon dissolved.

5. He expected no other now but that God, by these troubles, would shortly make an end of him; If I be made to ride upon the wind, I can count upon no other but to break my neck shortly; and he speaks as if God had no other design upon him, but that, in all his dealings with him, "I know that thou wilt bring me," with so much the more terror, "to death," though I might have been brought thither without all this ado, for it is "the house appointed for all living," ver. 23. The grave is a house, a narrow, dark, cold, ill-furnished house; but it will be our residence, where we shall rest and be safe; it is our long home, our own home, for it is our mother's lap, and in it we are gathered to our fathers. It is a house appointed for us by Him that has appointed us the bounds of all our habitations. It is appointed for all living. It is the common receptacle, where rich and poor meet; it is appointed for the general rendezvous; we must all be brought thither shortly. It is God that brings us, for the keys of death and the grave are in his hand, and we may all know that, sooner or later, he will bring us thither. It would be well for us if we would duly consider it. "The living know that they shall die;" let us, each of us, know it with application.

6. There were two things that aggravated his trouble, and made it the less tolerable: 1st. That it was a very great disappointment to his expectation; ver. 26, "When I looked for good," for more good, or at least the continuance of what I had, "then evil came." Such uncertain things are all our worldly enjoyments, and such a folly is it to feed ourselves with great expectations from them. They that wait for light from the sparks of their creature comforts will be wretchedly disappointed, and will make their bed in the darkness. 2nd. That it was a very great change in his condition; ver. 31, "My harp is" not only laid by, and hung upon the willow trees, but it is "turned to mourning, and my organ into the voice of them that weep." Job, in his prosperity, had taken the timbrel and harp, and "rejoiced at the sound of the organ," ch. xxi. 12. Notwithstanding his gravity and grace, he had found time to be cheerful, but now his tune was altered. Let those, therefore, that rejoice be as though they rejoiced not; for they know not how soon their laughter will be turned into mourning, and their joy into heaviness.

Thus we see how much Job complains of; but,

Secondly. Here is something, in the midst of all, with which he comforts himself; and it is but little. 1. He foresees, with comfort, that death will be the period of all his calamities, ver. 24. Though God now, with a strong hand, opposed himself against him, yet, saith he, "He will not stretch out his hand to the grave." The hand of God's wrath would bring him to death, but would not follow him beyond death; his soul would be safe and happy in the world of spirits, his body safe and easy in the dust. Though men cry in his destruction, (though, when they are a dying, there is a great deal of agony and outcry, many a sigh, and groan, and complaint,) yet in the grave they feel nothing, they fear nothing, but all is quiet there. Though in hell, which is called destruction, they cry, yet not in the grave; and I, being delivered from the second death, the first will to me be an effectual relief. Therefore, he wished he might be hid in the grave, ch. xiv. 13. 2. He reflects, with comfort, upon the concern xxix. 25. On the latter clause Rodwell says, "That is, occupying a raised seat, and surrounded by mourners seated on the ground. This custom still obtains among the Jews."

xxx. 1. Sheep-dogs are a very ancient institution; and Job thought some dogs better than some men. To set men with the dogs of a flock is either to set them over the dogs, or to compare them with the dogs, or to trust them equally with the dogs. We take the last to be the correct explanation.

xxx. 4. Those whom Job describes were often reduced to the necessity of gathering wild herbs and roots. By "mallows" some understand "salt-wort," and others "purslain," but the exact species is uncertain. By "juniper" a kind of broom is meant, one the roots of which are sought for by the Bedouins, and burned to make charcoal, by the sale of which a wretched subsistence is procured. The language of Job seems to imply that the roots were used for food.

he always had for the calamities of others, when he was himself at ease; ver. 25, "Did not I weep for him that was in trouble?" Some think he herein complains of God, thinking it very hard that he who had shewed mercy to others should not himself find mercy. I would rather take it as a quieting consideration to himself; his conscience witnessed for him, that he had always sympathized with persons in misery, and done what he could to help them, and therefore had reason to expect that, at length, both God and his friends would pity him. They who mourn with them that mourn will bear their own sorrows the better, when it comes to their turn to drink of the bitter cup. 'Did not my soul burn for the poor?' so some read it, comparing it with that of St. Paul, 2 Cor. xi. 29, "Who is offended, and I burn not?" As they who have been unmerciful and hard-hearted to others, may expect to hear of it from their own consciences, when they are themselves in trouble, so they who have considered the poor, and succoured them, the remembrance of that will make their bed easy in their sickness, Ps. xli. 1, 3.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Job had often protested his integrity in general, here he doth it in particular instances; not in a way of commendation, for he doth not here proclaim his good deeds, but in his own just and necessary vindication, to clear himself from those crimes with which his friends had falsely charged him, which is a debt every man owes to his own reputation. Job's friends had been particular in their articles of impeachment against him, and therefore he is so in his protestation, which seems especially to refer to what Eliphaz had accused him of, ch. xxii. 6, &c. They had produced no witnesses against him, neither could they prove the things whereof they now accused him, and therefore he may well be admitted to purge himself upon oath, which he doth very solemnly, and with many awful imprecations of God's wrath if he were guilty of those crimes. This protestation confirms God's character of him, that there was none like him in the earth. Perhaps some of his accusers durst not have joined with him; for he not only acquits himself from those gross sins which lie open to the eyes of the world, but from many secret sins, which, though he had been guilty of them, nobody could have charged him with, because he will prove himself no hypocrite. Nor doth he only maintain the cleanness of his practices, but shews also that in them he went upon good principles; that the reason of his eschewing evil was because he feared God, and his piety was at the bottom of his justice and charity; and this crowns the proof of his sincerity. The sins from which he here acquits himself are, 1. Wantonness and uncleanness of heart, ver. 1—4; 2. Fraud and injustice in commerce, ver. 4—8; 3. Adultery, ver. 9—12; 4. Haughtiness and severity towards his servants, ver. 13—15; 5. Unmercifulness to the poor, the widows, and the fatherless, ver. 16—23; 6. Confidence in his worldly wealth, ver. 24, 25; 7. Idolatry, ver. 26—28; 8. Revenge, ver. 29—31; 9. Neglect of poor strangers, ver. 32; 10. Hypocrisy in concealing his own sins, and cowardice in conniving at the sins of others, ver. 33, 34; 11. From oppression, and the violent invasion of other people's rights, ver. 38—40; and towards the close he appeals to God's judgment concerning his integrity, ver. 35—37. Now in all this we may see, I. The sense of the patriarchal age, concerning good and evil, and what was so long ago condemned as sinful, that is, both hateful and hurtful. II. A noble pattern of piety and virtue proposed to us for our imitation, which, if our consciences can witness for us that we conform to it, will be our rejoicing, as it was Job's, in the day of evil.

I MADE a covenant with mine eyes;
Why then should I think upon a maid?
2 For what portion of God is there from above?
And what inheritance of the Almighty from on high?
3 Is not destruction to the wicked?
And a strange punishment to the workers of iniquity?
4 Doth not he see my ways,
And count all my steps?
5 If I have walked with vanity,
Or if my foot hath hasted to deceit;
6 Let me be weighed in an even balance,
That God may know mine integrity
7 If my step hath turned out of the way,
And mine heart walked after mine eyes,
And if any blot hath cleaved to mine hands;
8 Then let me sow, and let another eat;
Yea, let my offspring be rooted out.

The lusts of the flesh and the love of the world are the two fatal rocks on which multitudes split; against these Job protests he was always careful to stand upon his guard.

First. Against the lusts of the flesh. He not only kept himself clear from adultery, defiling his neighbours' wives, ver. 9, but from all lewdness with any women whatsoever. He kept no concubine, no mistress, but was inviolably faithful to the marriage-bed, though his wife was none of the wisest, best, or kindest. "From the beginning it was so," that a man should have but one wife, and cleave to her only; and Job kept close to that institution, and abhorred the thought of transgressing it; for, though his greatness might tempt him to it, his goodness kept him from it. Job was now in pain and sickness of body, and under that affliction it is in a particular manner comfortable if our consciences can witness for us that we have been careful to preserve our bodies in chastity, and to possess those vessels in sanctification and honour, pure from the lusts of uncleanness. Now observe here,

1. What the resolutions were which, in this matter he kept to; ver. 1, "I made a covenant with mine eyes," that is, I watched against the occasions of the sin, "why then should I think upon a maid?" that is, by that means, through the grace of God, I kept myself from the very first step towards it. So far was he from wanton dalliances, or any act of lasciviousness, that, 1st. He would not so much as admit a wanton look. He made a covenant with his eyes; made this bargain with them, that he would allow them the pleasure of beholding the light of the sun, and the glory of God shining in the visible creation, provided they would never fasten upon any object that might occasion any impure imaginations, much less any impure desires in his mind; and under this penalty, that if they did, they must smart for it in penitential tears. Note, Those that would keep their hearts pure, must guard their eyes, which are both the outlets and inlets of uncleanness; hence we read of wanton eyes, Isa. iii. 16, and "eyes full of adultery," 2 Pet. ii. 14. The first sin began in the eye, Gen. iii. 6. What we must not meddle with we must not lust after: and what we must not lust after we must not look at, not the forbidden wealth, Pr. xxiii. 5; not the forbidden wine, Pr. xxiii. 31; not the forbidden woman, Mat. v. 28. 2nd. He would not so much as allow a wanton thought; "Why then should I think upon a maid," with any unchaste fancy, or desire toward her? Shame and sense of honour might restrain him from soliciting the chastity of a beautiful virgin; but only grace and the fear of God would restrain him from so much as thinking of it. Those are not chaste that are not so in spirit as well as body, 1 Cor. vii. 34. See how agreeable Christ's exposition of the seventh commandment is with the ancient sense of it, and how much better Job understood it than the Pharisees, though they sat in Moses' chair.

2. What the reasons were which in this matter he was governed by. It was not for fear of reproach among men, though that is to be considered, Pr. vi. 33; but for fear of the wrath and curse of God. He knew very well,

1st. That uncleanness is a sin that forfeits all good, and shuts us out from the hope of it; ver. 2, "What portion of God is there from above?" What blessing can such impure sinners expect from the pure and holy God, or what token of his favour? "what inheritance of the Almighty" can they look for "from on high?" There is no portion, no inheritance, no true happiness, for a soul but what is in God, in the Almighty, and what comes from above, from on high. But those that wallow in uncleanness render themselves utterly unfit for communion with God, either in grace here or in glory hereafter, and become allied to unclean spirits, which are for ever separated from him; and then what portion, what inheritance, can they have with God? No unclean thing shall enter into the new Jerusalem, that holy city.

2nd. It is a sin that incurs Divine vengeance, ver. 3. It will certainly be the sinner's ruin, if it be not repented of in time. "Is not destruction," a swift and sure destruction, to those wicked people, "and a strange punishment to the workers of" this "iniquity?" Fools make a mock at this sin, make a jest of it; it is with them a peccadillo, a trick of youth, but they deceive themselves with vain words, for "because of these things," how light soever they make of them, "the wrath of God," the insupportable wrath of the eternal God, "comes upon the children of disobedience," Eph. v. 6. There are some sinners whom God sometimes goes out of the common road of providence to meet with; such are these. The destruction of Sodom is a strange punishment. 'Is there not alienation,' so some read it, 'to the workers of iniquity?' This is the sinfulness of the sin, that it alienates the mind from God, Eph. iv. 18, 19; and this is the punishment of the sinners, that they shall be eternally set at a distance from him, Rev. xxii. 15.

3rd. It cannot be hidden from the all-seeing God. A wanton thought cannot be so close, nor a wanton look so quick, as to escape his cognizance, much less any act of uncleanness so secretly done as to be out of his sight. If Job was at any time tempted to this sin, he restrained himself from it, and all approaches to it, with this pertinent thought, ver. 4, "Doth not he see my ways?" as Joseph did, Gen. xxxix. 9, "How can I do it, and sin against God?" Two things Job had an eye to: First. God's omniscience. It is a great truth, that God's eyes are "upon all the ways of men," Pr. v. 20, 21; but Job here mentions it with application to himself and his own actions, "Doth not he see my ways?" "O God, thou hast searched me and known me." God sees what rule we walk by, what company we walk with, what end we walk towards, and therefore what ways we walk in. Secondly. His observance. He doth not only see, but takes notice; he "counts all my steps," all my false steps in the way of duty, all my bysteps into the way of sin. He not only sees our ways in general, but takes cognizance of our particular steps in these ways; every action, every motion. He keeps count of all, because he will call us to account; will bring every work into judgment. God takes a more exact notice of us than we do of ourselves, for who ever counted his own steps? Yet God doth; let us therefore walk circumspectly.

Secondly. He stood upon his guard against the love of the world, and carefully avoided all sinful, indirect means of getting wealth. He dreaded all forbidden profit, as much as all forbidden pleasure. Let us see,

1. What his protestation is. In general, that he had been honest and just in all his dealings; and never to his knowledge did any body any wrong. 1st. He never walked with vanity, that is, he never durst tell a lie to get a good bargain. It was never his way to banter or equivocate, or make many words in his dealings. Some men's constant walk is a constant cheat. They either make what they have more than it is, that they may be trusted, or, less than it is, that nothing may be expected from them: but Job was none of those, his wealth was not gotten by vanity, though now diminished, Pr. xiii. 11. 2nd. He never hasted to deceit. Those that deceive must be quick and sharp; but Job's quickness and sharpness were never turned that way. He never made haste to be rich by deceit; but always acted cautiously, lest through inconsideration he should do an unjust thing. Note, What we have in the world may be either used with comfort or lost with comfort, if it was honestly got. 3rd. His steps never turned out of the way, the way of justice and fair dealing, from that he never deviated, ver. 7. He not only took care not to walk in a constant course and way of deceit, but he did not so much as take one step out of the way of honesty. In every particular action and affair we must closely tie ourselves up to the rules of righteousness. 4th. His heart did not walk after his eyes; that is, he did not covet what he saw that was another's, nor wish it his own. Covetousness is called the lust of the eye, 1 Jno. ii. 16. Achan saw, and then took the accursed thing. That heart must needs wander that walks after the eyes; for then it looks no farther than the things that are seen, whereas it ought to be in heaven, whither the eyes cannot reach. It should follow the dictates of religion and right reason; if it follow the eye it will be misled to that for which God will bring men into judgment, Eccl. xi. 9. 5th. That no blot had cleaved to his hands; that is, he was not chargeable with getting any thing dishonestly, or keeping that which was another's, whenever it appeared to be so. Injustice is a blot, a blot to the estate, a blot to the owner; it spoils the beauty of both, and therefore is to be dreaded. Those that deal much in the world may perhaps have a blot come upon their hands, but they must wash it off again by repentance and restitution, and not let it cleave to their hands: see Isa. xxxiii. 15.

2. How he ratifies his protestation. So confident is he of his own honesty that, 1st. He is willing to have his goods searched; ver. 6, "Let me be weighed in an even balance," that is, Let what I have got be inquired into, and it will be found to weigh well; a sign it was not gotten by vanity, for then tekel had been written on it, weighed in the balance and found too light. An honest man is so far from dreading a trial, that he desires it rather; being well assured that God doth know his integrity, and will approve it, and the trial of it would be to his praise and honour. 2nd. He is willing to forfeit the whole cargo, if there were found among them any prohibited, contraband goods, any thing but what he came honestly by; ver. 8, "Let me sow, and let another eat," which was already agreed to be the doom of oppressors, ch. v. 5; xviii. 9; and let my offspring, all the trees that I have planted, be rooted out. This intimates that he believed the sin did deserve this punishment, that ordinarily it is thus punished, but that, though now his estate was ruined, and then, if ever, his conscience would have brought it to his mind, yet he knew himself innocent; that he would venture all the poor remains of his estate upon the issue of the trial.

xxx. 6. The phrase, "the cliffs of the valleys," might be fairly rendered "frightful ravines." Traces of ancient cave-dwellers and rock-dwellers are numerous in Egypt and Western Asia.

xxx. 7. The rude and incoherent utterances of these outcasts is compared to braying. The word rendered "nettles" has been thought to mean thorns or thistles; but nettles may be correct. Rodwell translates the expression thus: "are huddled together under nettles."

xxx. 8. Our version is weak. Better, "Sons of the worthless, yea, sons of the nameless, they were expelled from the land."

xxx. 14. The sense is better expressed by Rodwell: "They come on as by a wide breach, they roll themselves along beneath the ruins." They come in like the rushing waters when an embankment gives way.

xxx. 17. For "my sinews take no rest" render "my gnawing pain does not cease." Some think aching teeth or jaws are meant.

9 If mine heart have been deceived by a woman,
Or if I have laid wait at my neighbour's door;
10 Then let my wife grind unto another,
And let others bow down upon her.
11 For this is an heinous crime;
Yea, it is an iniquity to be punished by the judges
12 For it is a fire that consumeth to destruction,
And would root out all mine increase.
13 If I did despise the cause of my manservant
Or of my maidservant, when they contended with me;
14 What then shall I do when God riseth up?
And when he visiteth, what shall I answer him?
15 Did not he that made me in the womb make him?
And did not one fashion us in the womb?

Two more instances we have here of Job's integrity.

First. That he had a very great abhorrence of the sin of adultery. As he did not wrong his own marriage-bed by keeping a concubine,—he did not so much as think upon a maid, ver. 1,—so he was careful not to offer any injury to his neighbour's marriage-bed. Let us see here,

1. How clear he was from this sin, ver. 9. 1st. He did not so much as covet his neighbour's wife, for even his heart was not deceived by a woman. The beauty of another man's wife did not kindle in him any unchaste desires, nor was he ever moved by the allurements of an adulterous woman, such as is described, Pr. vii. 6, &c. See the original of all the defilements of the life, they come from a deceived heart. Every sin is deceitful, and none more so than the sin of uncleanness. 2nd. He never compassed or imagined any unchaste design. He never laid wait at his neighbour's door to get an opportunity to debauch his wife in his absence, when the good man was not at home, Pr. vii. 19: see ch. xxiv. 15.

2. What a dread he had of this sin, and what frightful apprehensions he had concerning the malignity of it. That it is a heinous crime, ver. 11; one of the greatest, vilest sins that a man can be guilty of, highly provoking to God, and destructive to the prosperity of the soul. And, concerning the mischievousness of it, and the punishment it deserved, he owns that if he were guilty of that heinous crime, 1st. His family might justly be made infamous in the highest degree; ver. 10, "Let my wife grind to another." Let her be a slave, so some; a harlot, so others. God often punisheth the sins of one with the sin of another, the adultery of the husband with the adultery of the wife, as in David's case, 2 Sam. xii. 11, which doth not in the least excuse the treachery of the adulterous wife; but how unrighteous soever she is, God is righteous: see Hos. iv. 12, "Your spouses shall commit adultery." Note, Those who are not just and faithful to their relations must not think it strange if their relations be unjust and unfaithful to them. 2nd. He himself might justly be made a public example: for "it is an iniquity to be punished by the judges;" yea, though they who be guilty of it are themselves judges, as Job was. Note, Adultery is a crime which the civil magistrate ought to take cognizance of, and punish. So it was adjudged even in the patriarchal age, before the law of Moses made it capital; it is an evil work to which the sword of justice ought to be a terror. 3rd. It might justly become the ruin of his estate; nay, he knew it would be so, ver. 12, "It is a fire;" lust is a fire in the soul. They that indulge in it are said to burn. It consumes all that is good there; the convictions, the comforts, and lays the conscience waste. It kindles the fire of God's wrath, which, if not extinguished by the blood of Christ, will burn to the lowest hell. It consumes the body, Pr. v. 11; consumes the substance, it "roots out all the increase." Burning lusts bring burning judgments. Perhaps it alludes to the burning of Sodom, which was intended for an "example to those who should afterwards in like manner live ungodly."

Secondly. That he had a very great tenderness for his servants, and ruled them with a gentle hand. He had a great household, and he managed it well. By this he evidenced his sincerity, that he had grace to govern his passion as well as his appetite; and he that in these two things hath the rule of his own spirit is better than the mighty, Pr. xvi. 32. Here observe,

1. What were Job's condescensions to his servants, ver. 13. He did not despise the cause of his manservant, no, nor of his maidservant, when they contended with him; that is, if they contradicted him in any thing he was willing to hear their reasons. If they had offended him, or were accused to him, he would patiently hear what they had to say for themselves in their own vindication or excuse. Nay, if they complained of any hardship he put upon them, he did not browbeat them, and bid them hold their tongues, but gave them leave to tell their story, and redress their grievances as far as it appeared they had right on their side. He was tender of them, not only when they served him and pleased him, but even when they contended with him. Herein he was a great example to masters to give unto their servants that which is just and equal; nay, to do the same things to them that they expect from them, Col. iv. 1; Eph. vi. 9; and not to rule them with rigour, and carry it with a high hand. Many of Job's servants were slain in his service, ch. i. 15—17; the rest were unkind and undutiful to him, and despised his cause, though he never despised theirs, ch. xix. 15, 16; but he had this comfort, that in his prosperity he had carried it well towards them. Note, When relations are either removed from us or embittered to us, the testimony of our consciences that we have done our duty to them will be a great support and comfort to us.

2. What were the considerations that moved him to treat his servants thus kindly. He had herein an eye to God, both as his Judge and as their Maker. 1st. As his Judge; he considered, If I should be imperious and severe with my servants, "what shall I do when God riseth up?" He considered that he had a Master in heaven, to whom he was accountable, who will rise up, and will visit, and we are concerned to consider what we shall do in the day of his visitation, Isa. x. 3. And, in consideration of this, that we are undone if God should then be strait and severe with us, we ought to be very mild and gentle towards all with whom we have to do. Consider what would become of us, if God should be extreme to mark what we do amiss, should take all advantages against us, and insist upon all his just demands from us; if he should visit every offence, and take every forfeiture, if he should always chide, and keep his anger for ever. And let not us be thus rigorous with our inferiors. Consider what will become of us if we be cruel and unmerciful to our brethren. The cries of the injured will be heard, the sin of the injurious will be punished, they that shewed no mercy shall find none, and what shall we do then? 2nd. As his and his servants' Creator, ver. 15; when he was tempted to be harsh with his servants, to deny them right, and turn a deaf ear to their reasonings, this thought came very seasonably into his mind, "Did not he that made me in the womb make him?" I am a creature as well as he, and my being is derived and depending as well as his He partakes of the same nature that I do, and is the work of the same hand; "Have we not all one Father?" Note, Whatever difference there is among men in their outward condition, in their capacity of mind, or strength of body, or place in the world, he that made the one made the other also; which is a good reason why we should not mock at men's natural infirmities, nor trample upon those that are any way our inferiors; but in every thing do as we would be done by. It is a rule of justice, ut parium par sit ratio,—'let equals be equally estimated and treated;' and, therefore, since there is so great a parity among men, they being all made of the same mould, by the same power, for the same end; notwithstanding the disparity of our outward condition, we are bound so far to set ourselves upon the level with those we deal with, as to do to them in all respects as we would they should do to us.

16 If I have withheld the poor from their desire,
Or have caused the eyes of the widow to fail;
17 Or have eaten my morsel myself alone,
And the fatherless hath not eaten thereof;
18 (For from my youth he was brought up with me, as with a father,
And I have guided her from my mother's womb;)
19 If I have seen any perish for want of clothing,
Or any poor without covering;
20 If his loins have not blessed me,
And if he were not warmed with the fleece of my sheep;
21 If I have lifted up my hand against the fatherless,
When I saw my help in the gate:
22 Then let mine arm fall from my shoulder blade,
And mine arm be broken from the bone.
23 For destruction from God was a terror to me,
And by reason of his highness I could not endure

Eliphaz had particularly charged Job with unmercifulness to the poor, ch. xxii. 6, &c.; Thou hast "withholden bread from the hungry, stripped the naked of their clothing, and sent widows away empty." Now one would think he could not have been so very positive and express in his charge, but there had been some truth in it, some ground for it; and yet it appears, by Job's protestation, it was utterly false and groundless; he was never guilty of any such thing. See here,

First. The testimony which Job's conscience gave in concerning his constant carriage towards the poor. He is most large upon this head, because in this matter he was most particularly accused. He solemnly protests,

1. That he had never been wanting to do good to them, as there was occasion, to the utmost of his ability. He was always compassionate to the poor, and careful of them; especially the widows and fatherless, that were destitute of help. 1st. He was always ready to grant their desires, and answer their expectations, ver. 16. If a poor body begged a kindness of him, he was ready to gratify him; if he could but perceive by the widow's mournful, craving look that she expected an alms from him, though she had not confidence enough to ask it, he had compassion enough to give it; and never "caused the eyes of the widow to fail." 2nd. He put a respect upon the poor, and did them honour; for he took the fatherless children to eat with him, at his own table. They should fare as he fared, and be familiar with him, and he would shew himself pleased with their company, as if they had been his own, ver. 17. As it is one of the greatest grievances of poverty that it exposeth to contempt, so it is none of the least supports to the poor to be respected. 3rd. He was very tender of them, and had a fatherly concern for them, ver. 18. He was a father to the fatherless; took care of orphans, brought them up with him under his own eye, and gave them not only maintenance, but education. He was a guide to the widow, who had lost the guide of her youth; he advised her in her affairs, took cognizance of them, and undertook the management of them. Those that need not our alms may yet have occasion for our counsel, and it may be a real kindness to them. This Job saith he did from his youth, from his mother's womb; that is, he had something of tenderness and compassion woven into his nature. He began betimes to do good, ever since he could remember; he had always some poor widow or fatherless child under his care. His parents taught him betimes to pity and relieve the poor, and brought up orphans with him. 4th. He provided food convenient for them; they ate of the same morsels that he did, ver. 17; did not only eat after him of the crumbs that fell from his table, but eat with him of the best dish upon his table. They that have abundance must not eat their morsels alone, as if they had none but themselves to take care of; nor indulge their appetite with a dainty bit by themselves, but take others to share with them, as David took Mephibosheth. 5th. He took particular care to clothe them that were without covering, which would be more expensive to him than feeding them, ver. 19. Poor people may perish for want of clothing as well as for want of food; for want of clothing to lie in by night, or to go abroad in by day. If Job knew of any that were in this distress, he was forward to relieve them; and, instead of giving rich and gaudy liveries to his servants, while the poor were turned off with rags that were ready to be thrown to the dunghill, he had good warm strong clothes made on purpose for them, of the fleece of his sheep, ver. 20. So that their loins, whenever they girt those garments about them, blessed him; they commended his charity, blessed God for him, and prayed God to bless him. Job's sheep were burned with fire from heaven, but this was his comfort, that when he had them he came honestly by them, and used them charitably; fed the poor with their flesh, and clothed them with their wool.

2. That he had never been accessary to the wronging of any that were poor. It might be said, perhaps he was kind here and there to a poor orphan that was a favourite, but to others he was oppressive. No, he was tender of all, and injurious to none. He never so much as lifted up his hand against the fatherless, ver. 21; never threatened or frightened them, or offered to strike them; never used his power to crush them that stood in his way, or squeeze what he could out of them, though he saw his help in the gate, that is, though he had interest enough, both in the people and in the judges, both to enable him to do it, and to bear him out when he had done it. Those that have it in their power to do an ill thing, and go through with it, and a prospect of getting by it, and yet do justly, and love mercy, and are firm to both, may afterwards reflect upon it with a great deal of comfort, as Job doth here.

xxx. 18. The idea rather is that his suffering had become like a close-fitting garment. Barnes: "By its great power (disease) has become my garment; it girds me about like the mouth of my tunic."

xxx. 24. Another difficult verse. The sense suggested by Gesenius is, "Prayers avail not when He stretches out His hand, nor when He destroys does outcry profit them." Other good authorities suggest, "Over the ruin He will not stretch out His hand, if when He destroys there is prayer among them." We prefer the former explanation.

xxx. 28. The first clause is to be rendered either as above or "dark, but not with the sun, I walk about." Compare verse 30.

xxx. 29. The words "dragons" and "owls" are wrong, and we must substitute "the jackal" and "the ostrich."

xxx. 31. For "organ" translate "pipe," "flute," or "fife."

xxxi. 2. The sense is, "What portion has God given me from above? What inheritance has been mine from the Almighty from on high?"

Secondly. The imprecation wherewith he confirms this protestation; ver. 22, If I have been oppressive to the poor, "let mine arm fall from my shoulder-blade, and mine arm be broken from the bone;" that is, let the flesh rot off from the bone, and one bone be disjointed and broken off from another. Had he not been perfectly clear in this matter, he durst not thus have challenged the Divine vengeance. And he intimates that it is a righteous thing with God to break the arm that is lifted up against the fatherless, as he withered Jeroboam's arm, that was stretched out against a prophet.

Thirdly. The principles by which Job was restrained from all uncharitableness and unmercifulness. He durst not abuse the poor; for, though with his help in the gate, he could overpower them, yet he could not make his part good against that God who is the patron of oppressed poverty, and will not let oppressors go unpunished; ver. 23, "Destruction from God was a terror to me," whenever I was tempted to this sin, and "by reason of his highness I could not endure" the thought of making him my enemy. He stood in awe, 1. Of the majesty of God; as a God above him. He thought of his highness, the infinite distance between him and God, which possessed him with such a reverence of him, as made him very circumspect in his whole conversation. They who oppress the poor, and pervert judgment and justice, forget that he who is higher than the highest regardeth, and there is a higher than they, who is able to deal with them, Eccl. v. 8; but Job considered this. 2. Of the wrath of God; as a God that would certainly be against him, if he should wrong the poor. Destruction from God, because it would be a certain and an utter ruin to him, if he were guilty of this sin, was a constant terror to him to restrain him from it. Note, Good men, even the best, have need to restrain themselves from sin with the fear of destruction from God, and all little enough. This should especially restrain us from all acts of injustice and oppression, that God himself is the avenger thereof. Even then when salvation from God is a comfort to us, yet destruction from God should be a terror to us. Adam, in innocency, was awed with a threatening.

24 If I have made gold my hope,
Or have said to the fine gold, Thou art my confidence;
25 If I rejoiced because my wealth was great,
And because mine hand had gotten much;
26 If I beheld the sun when it shined,
Or the moon walking in brightness;
27 And my heart hath been secretly enticed,
Or my mouth hath kissed my hand:
28 This also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge:
For I should have denied the God that is above.
29 If I rejoiced at the destruction of him that hated me,
Or lifted up myself when evil found him:
30 Neither have I suffered my mouth to sin
By wishing a curse to his soul.
31 If the men of my tabernacle said not,
Oh that we had of his flesh! we cannot be satisfied.
32 The stranger did not lodge in the street:
But I opened my doors to the traveller.

Four articles more of Job's protestation we have in these verses; which, as all the rest, not only assure us what he was and did, but teach us what we should be and do.

First. He protests that he never set his heart upon the wealth of this world, nor took the things of it for his portion and happiness. He had gold, he had fine gold; his wealth was great, and he had gotten much. Now our wealth is either advantageous or pernicious to us, according as we stand affected to it. If we make it our rest and our ruler, it will be our ruin; if we make it our servant, and an instrument of righteousness, it will be a blessing to us. Job here tells how he stood affected to his worldly wealth. 1. He put no great confidence in it: he did not make gold his hope, ver. 24. They are very unwise that do, and enemies to themselves, who depend upon it as sufficient to make them happy, who think themselves safe and honourable, and sure of comfort in having abundance of this world's goods. Some make it their hope and confidence for another world, as if it were a certain token of God's favour; and those who have so much sense as not to think so yet promise themselves that it will be a portion for them in this life; whereas the things themselves are uncertain, and our satisfaction in them much more so. It is hard to have riches, and not to trust in riches; and that is it which makes it so difficult for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God, Mat. xix. 23; Mar. x. 24. 2. He took no great complacency in it; ver. 25, "If I rejoiced because my wealth was great," and boasted that "my hand had gotten much." He took no pride in his wealth, as if it added any thing to his real excellency, nor did he think that his might and the power of his hand got it him, Deu. viii. 17. He took no pleasure in it in comparison with the spiritual things which were the delight of his soul; his joy did not terminate in the gift, but passed through it to the Giver. When he was in the midst of his abundance, he never said, "Soul, take thine ease" in these things, "eat, drink, and be merry," nor blessed himself in his riches. He did not inordinately rejoice in his wealth; and that helped him to bear the loss of it so patiently as he did. The way to weep as though we wept not is to rejoice as though we rejoiced not. The less pleasure the enjoyment is, the less pain the disappointment will be.

Secondly. He protests that he never gave that worship and glory to the creature which is due to God only; he was never guilty of idolatry, ver. 26—28. We do not find that Job's friends charged him with this; but there were those, it seems, at that time, who were so sottish as to worship the sun and moon, else Job would not have mentioned it. Idolatry is one of the old ways which wicked men have trodden; and the most ancient idolatry was the worshipping the sun and moon, to which the temptation was most strong; as appears, Deu. iv. 19, where Moses speaks of the danger which the people were in of being driven to worship them. But, as yet, it was practised secretly, and durst not appear in open view, as afterwards the most abominable idolatries did. Observe,

1. How far Job kept from this sin. He not only never bowed the knee to Baal, (which some think was designed to represent the sun,) never fell down and worshipped the sun; but he kept his eye, his heart, and his lips clean from this sin. 1st. He never so much as beheld the sun or the moon in their pomp and lustre with any other admiration of them than what led him to give all the glory of their brightness and usefulness to their Creator. Against spiritual as well as corporal adultery he made a covenant with his eyes; and this was his covenant, that, whenever he looked at the lights of heaven, he should by faith look through them, and beyond them, to the Father of lights. 2nd. He kept his heart with all diligence, that that should not be secretly enticed to think that there is a Divine glory in their brightness, or a Divine power in their influence, and that therefore Divine honours are to be paid to them. Here is the source of idolatry; it begins in the heart; every man is tempted to that, as to other sins, when he is drawn away by his own lust, and enticed. 3rd. He did not so much as put a compliment upon these pretended deities, did not perform the least and lowest act of adoration of them; "his mouth did not kiss his hand," which it is likely was a ceremony then commonly used, even by some that yet would not be thought idolaters. It is an old-fashioned piece of civil respect among ourselves, in making a bow, to kiss the hand; and it seems was anciently used in giving Divine honours to the sun and moon. They could not reach to kiss them, as "the men that sacrificed kissed the calves," Hos. xiii. 2; 1 Kin. xix. 18; but to shew their good-will they kissed their hand, reverencing those as their masters which God has made servants to this lower world, to hold the candle for us. Job never did it.

2. How ill Job thought of this sin, ver. 28. 1st. He looked upon it as an affront to the civil magistrate; it "were an iniquity to be punished by the judge," as a public nuisance, and hurtful to kings and provinces. Idolatry debauches men's minds, corrupts their manners, takes off the true sense of religion, which is the great bond of societies, and provokes God to give men up to a reprobate sense, and to send judgments upon a nation; and therefore the conservators of the public peace are concerned to restrain it by punishing it. 2nd. He looked upon it as a much greater affront to the God of heaven, and no less than high treason against his crown and dignity; for "I should have denied the God that is above," denied his being as God, and his sovereignty as God above. Idolatry is atheism in effect; hence, the Gentiles are said to be without God (atheists) in the world. Note, We should be afraid of every thing that doth but implicitly deny the God above, his providence or any of his perfections.

Thirdly. He protests that he was so far from doing or designing mischief to any, that he neither desired nor delighted in the hurt of the worst enemy he had. The forgiving of those that do us evil, it seems, was Old Testament duty. Look how the Pharisees came to lose it, who taught, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy," Mat. v. 43. Observe here,

1. Job was far from revenge. He did not only not return the injuries that were done him, not only not destroy those that hated him, but, 1st. He did not so much as rejoice when any mischief befell them, ver. 29. Many that would not wilfully hurt those who stand in their light, or have done them a diskindness, yet are secretly pleased, and laugh in their sleeve, as we say, when hurt is done them; but Job was not of that spirit. Though Job was a very good man, yet it seems there were those that hated him; but evil found them. He saw their destruction, and was far from rejoicing in it; for that would justly have brought the destruction upon him, as is intimated, Pr. xxiv. 17, 18. 2nd. He did not so much as wish in his own mind that evil might befall them, ver. 30; he never wished a curse to his soul; and curses to the soul are the worst of curses; never desired his death,—he knew if he did, it would turn into sin to him. He was careful not to offend with his tongue, Ps. xxxix. 1; would not suffer his mouth to sin, and therefore durst not imprecate any evil, no, not to his worst enemy. If others bear malice to us, that will not justify us in bearing malice to them.

2. He was violently urged to revenge, and yet he kept himself thus clear from it; ver. 31, "the men of his tabernacle," his domestics, his servants, and those about him, were so enraged at Job's enemy that hated him, that they could have eaten him, if Job would but have set them on, or given them leave; "Oh that we had of his flesh." Our master is satisfied to forgive him, but we cannot be so satisfied. See how well beloved Job was by his family; how heartily they espoused his cause, and what enemies they were to his enemies; but see what a strict hand Job kept upon his passions, that he would not revenge himself, though he had those about him that blew the coals of his resentment. Note, A good man commonly doth not lay the affronts that are done him so much to heart himself as his friends do for him. 2. Great men have commonly those about them that stir them up to revenge; David had so, 1 Sam. xxiv. 4; xxvi. 8; 2 Sam. xvi. 9. But if they keep their temper, notwithstanding the spiteful insinuations of those about them, afterwards it shall be no grief of heart to them, but shall turn very much to their praise.

Fourthly. He protests that he had never been unkind or inhospitable to strangers; ver. 32, "The stranger lodged not in the street;" as angels might lately have done in the streets of Sodom, if Lot alone had not entertained them. Perhaps by that instance Job was taught (as we are, Heb. xiii. 2,) not to be forgetful to entertain strangers. He that is at home, must consider those that are from home; and put his soul into their soul's stead, and then do as he would be done by. Hospitality is a Christian duty, 1 Pet. iv. 9; Job in his prosperity was noted for good housekeeping, 'he opened his door to the road,' so it may be read; he kept the street-door open that he might see who passed by, and invite them in, as Abraham, Gen. xviii. 1.

33 If I covered my transgressions as Adam,
By hiding mine iniquity in my bosom:
34 Did I fear a great multitude,
Or did the contempt of families terrify me,
That I kept silence, and went not out of the door?
35 Oh that one would hear me!
Behold, my desire is, that the Almighty would answer me
And that mine adversary had written a book.
36 Surely I would take it upon my shoulder,
And bind it as a crown to me.
37 I would declare unto him the number of my steps;
As a prince would I go near unto him.
38 If my land cry against me, or that the furrows likewise thereof complain;
39 If I have eaten the fruits thereof without money,
Or have caused the owners thereof to lose their life:
40 Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of The words of Job are ended. [barley.

xxxi. 6. "An even balance" is literally "balances of righteousness," that is, a just balance.

xxxi. 8. "Offspring" should be "produce," the crops which belonged to him. Compare verse 12.

xxxi. 10. The mill for grinding corn was usually turned by women. Job's idea is that of an abject menial.

xxxi. 13. "Contended," that is, at law.

xxxi. 21. The words, "when I saw my help in the gate," refer to the custom of deciding law cases at the city gate; and the sense is either "when I saw at the gate those who would have favoured and aided me in such a course," or "when my office of judge would have secured me immunity."

xxxi. 26—28. The worship of the sun and moon was very widespread in early antiquity; it was probably one of the oldest forms of idolatry. Not only were the sun, moon, and stars worshipped as symbols, but they were personified and worshipped by symbols. The re-

We have here Job's protestation against three more sins, together with his general appeal to God's bar, and his petition for a hearing there; which it is likely was intended to conclude his discourse, (and therefore we will consider it last,) but that another particular sin occurred from which he thought it requisite to acquit himself. He clears himself from the charge,

First. Of dissimulation and hypocrisy, which was the general crime his friends accused him of; that, under the cloak of a profession of religion, he had kept up secret haunts of sin, and that really he was as bad as other people, but had the art of concealing it. Zophar insinuated this, ch. xx. 12, that he hid his iniquity under his tongue; No, saith Job, that I never did, ver. 33, "I never covered my transgression as Adam;" never palliated a sin with frivolous excuses, nor made fig leaves the shelter of my shame, nor ever hid my iniquity in my bosom, as a fondling, a darling that I could by no means part with; or as stolen goods, which he dreaded the discovery of. It is natural to us to cover our sins; we have it by kind from our first parents. We are loath to confess our faults, willing to extenuate them, and make the best of ourselves; to devolve the blame upon others, as Adam on his wife, not without a tacit reflection upon God himself. But he that thus covers his sins shall not prosper, Pr. xxviii. 13. Job in this protestation intimates two things, which were certain evidences of his integrity: 1. That he was not guilty of any great transgression or iniquity, inconsistent with sincerity, which he had now industriously concealed. In this protestation he had dealt fairly, and, while he denies some sins, was not conscious to himself that he allowed himself in any. 2. That what transgression and iniquity he had been guilty of, (as who is there that lives, and sins not?) he had always been ready to own it; and, as soon as ever he perceived he had said or done amiss, he was ready to unsay it, and undo it as far as he could by repentance; confessing it both to God and man, and forsaking it. And this is doing honestly.

Secondly. From the charge of cowardice and base fear. His courage in that which is good he produceth as an evidence of his sincerity in it; ver. 34, "Did I fear a great multitude, that I kept silence?" No; all that knew Job knew him to be a man of undaunted resolution in a good cause; that boldly appeared, spoke, and acted in defence of religion and justice, and did not fear the face of man, nor was ever threatened or browbeaten out of his duty, but set his face as a flint. Observe, 1. What great conscience Job had made of his duty as a magistrate, or a man of reputation in the place where he lived. He did not, he durst not, keep silence when he had a call to speak in an honest cause, nor keep within doors when he had a call to go abroad to do good. The case may be such as that it may be our sin to be silent and retired; as when we are called to reprove sin, and bear our testimony against it, to vindicate the truths and ways of God, to do right to those who are injured or oppressed, or any way to serve the public, or do honour to our religion. 2. What little account Job made of the discouragements he met with in the way of his duty. He valued not the clamours of the mob, feared not a great multitude, nor did he value the menaces of the mighty; the contempt of families never terrified him. He was not deterred by the number or quality, the scorns or insults, of the injurious from doing justice to the injured,—no, he scorned to be swayed and biassed by any such considerations,—nor ever suffered a righteous cause to be run down by a high hand. He feared the great God, not the great multitude, and his curse, not the contempt of families.

Thirdly. From the charge of oppression and violence, and doing wrong to his poor neighbours. And here observe,

1. What his protestation is. That the estate he had he both got and used honestly; so that his land could not cry out against him, nor the furrows thereof complain, ver. 38; as they do against those who get the possession of them by fraud and extortion, Hab. ii. 9—11. The whole creation is said to groan under the sin of man; but that which is unjustly gained and held cries out against a man, and accuseth him, condemns him, and demands justice against him for the injury. Rather than his oppression shall go unpunished, the very ground and the furrows of it shall witness against him, and be his prosecutors. Two things he could safely say concerning his estate: 1st. That he 'never ate the fruits of it without money," ver. 39; what he purchased he paid for, as Abraham, for the land he bought, Gen. xxiii. 16; and David, 2 Sam. xxiv. 24. The labourers that he employed had their wages duly paid them; and, if he made use of the fruits of those lands that he let out, he paid his tenants for them, or allowed it in their rent. 2nd. That he never "caused the owners thereof to lose their life;" never got an estate, as Ahab got Naboth's vineyard, killing the heir, and seizing the inheritance; never starved those that held lands of him, nor killed them with hard bargains and hard usage. No tenant, no workman, no servant he had, could complain of him.

2. How he confirms his protestation. He doth it, as often before, with a suitable imprecation; ver. 40, If I have got my estate unjustly, "let thistles grow instead of wheat;" the worst of weeds instead of the best of grains. When men get estates unjustly they are justly deprived of the comfort of them, and disappointed in their expectations from them. They sow their land, but they sow not that body that shall be. God will give it a body; it was sown wheat, but shall come up thistles. What men do not come honestly by will never do them any good.

Job, towards the close of his protestation, appeals to the judgment-seat of God concerning the truth of it; ver. 34—36, "Oh that he would hear me, even that the Almighty would answer me!" This was what he often desired, and often complained that he could not obtain; and, now he had drawn up his own defence so particularly, he leaves it upon record, in expectation of a hearing, files it as it were, until his cause be called.

1st. A trial is moved for, and the motion earnestly pressed; 'Oh that one, any one, would hear me; my cause is so good, and my evidence so clear, that I am willing to refer it to any indifferent person whatsoever; but my desire is that the Almighty himself would determine it.' An upright heart doth not dread a scrutiny. He that means honestly wishes he had a window in his breast, that all men might see the intents of his heart. But an upright heart doth particularly desire to be determined in every thing by the judgment of God, which we are sure is according to truth. It was holy David's prayer, "Search me, O God, and know my heart;" and it was blessed Paul's comfort, "He that judgeth me is the Lord."

2nd. The prosecutor is called; the plaintiff summoned, and ordered to bring in his information, to say what he has to say against the prisoner, for he stands upon his deliverance. "Oh that mine adversary had written a book!" that my friends, who charge me with hypocrisy, would draw up their charge in writing, that it might be reduced to a certainty, and that we might the better join issue upon it. Job would be very glad to see the libel, to have a copy of his indictment; he would not hide it under his arm, but take it upon his shoulder, to be seen and read of all men; nay, he would bind it as a crown to him, would be pleased with it, and look upon it as his ornament. For, First. If it discovered to him any sin he had been guilty of which he did not yet see, he should be glad to know it, that he might repent of it, and get it pardoned. A good man is willing to know the worst by himself, and will be thankful to those that will faithfully tell him of his faults. Secondly. If it charge him with what was false, he doubted not but to disprove the allegations; that his innocency would be cleared up as the light, and he should come off with so much the more honour. But, Thirdly. He did believe that, when his adversaries came to consider the matter so closely as they must do if they put the charge in writing, the accusations would be trivial and minute, and every one that saw them would say, If this was all they had to say against him, it was a shame they had given him so much trouble.

3rd. The defendant is ready to make his appearance, and to give his accusers all the fair play they can desire. He will declare unto them the number of his steps, ver. 37. He will let them into the history of his own life, will shew them all the stages and scenes of it; he will give them a narrative of his conversation, what would make against him as well as what would make for him, and let them make what use they pleased of it. And so confident he is of his integrity that, as a prince to be crowned, rather than as a prisoner to be tried, he would go near to him, both to his accuser to hear his charge, and to his judge to hear his doom. Thus the testimony of his conscience was his rejoicing.

Hic murus aheneus esto, nil conscire sibi—
'Be this thy brazen bulwark of defence,
Still to preserve thy conscious innocence.'

Those that have kept their hands without spot from the world, as Job did, may lift up their faces without spot unto God, and may comfort themselves with the prospect of his judgment when they lie under the unjust censures of men. "If our hearts condemn us not, then have we confidence towards God."

And thus "the words of Job are ended;" that is, he has now said all he would say in answer to his friends. He afterwards said something in a way of self-reproach and condemnation, ch. xl. 4, 5; xlii. 2, &c.; but here ends what he had to say in a way of self-defence and vindication. If this suffice not, he will say no more; he knows when he hath said enough, and will submit himself to the judgment of the bench. Some think the manner of expression intimates that he concluded with an air of assurance and triumph. He now keeps the field, and doubts not but to win the field; "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifies."

CHAPTER XXXII.

The stage is clear, for Job and his three friends are set down, and neither he nor they have any thing more to say; it is therefore very seasonable for a moderator to interpose, and Elihu is the man. In this chapter we have, I. Some account of him, his parentage, his presence at this dispute, and his sentiments concerning it, ver. 1—5. II. The apology he made for his bold undertaking, to speak to a question which had been so largely and learnedly argued by his seniors. He pleads, 1. That, though he had not the experience of an old man, yet he had the understanding of a man, ver. 6—10; 2. That he had patiently heard all they had to say, ver. 11—13; 3. That he had something new to offer, ver. 14—17; 4. That his mind was full of this matter, and it would be a refreshment to him to give it vent, ver. 18—20; 5. That he was resolved to speak impartially, ver. 21, 22. And he did speak so well to this matter that Job made no reply to him, and God gave him no rebuke, when he checked both Job himself and his other three friends.

SO these three men ceased to answer Job, because he was righteous in his own eyes. 2 Then was kindled the wrath of Elihu the son of Barachel the Buzite, of the kindred of Ram: against Job was his wrath kindled, because he justified himself rather than God. 3 Also against his three friends was his wrath kindled, because they had found no answer, and yet had condemned Job. 4 Now Elihu had waited till Job had spoken, because they were elder than he. 5 When Elihu saw that there was no answer in the mouth of these three men, then his wrath was kindled.

Usually young men are the disputants, and old men the moderators. But here, when old men were the disputants, as a rebuke to them for their unbecoming heat, a young man is raised up to be the moderator. Divers of Job's friends were present, that came to visit him, and to receive instruction. Now here we have,

First. The reason why his three friends were now silent. They ceased to answer him, and let him have his saying, "because he was righteous in his own eyes;" that was the reason they gave why they said no more, because it was to no purpose to argue with a man that was so opinionative, ver. 1. Those that are self-conceited are indeed hard to be wrought upon; "there is more hope of a fool" (a fool of God's making) "than of them," (who are fools of their own making,) Pr. xxvi. 11. But they did not judge fairly concerning Job. He was really righteous before God, and not righteous only in his own eyes; so that it was only to save their own credit that they made this the reason of their silence, as peevish disputants commonly do when they find themselves run aground, and are not willing to own themselves unable to make their part good.

Secondly, The reasons why Elihu, the fourth, now spoke. His name, Elihu, signifies 'my God is he.' They had all tried in vain to convince Job, but 'my God is he' that can and will do it, and did it at last. None but he can open the understanding. He is said to be a Buzite, from Buz, Nahor's second son, Gen. xxii. 21; and of the kindred of Ram, that is, Aram, so some, Gen. xxii. 21, from whence the Syrians or Aramites descended, and were denominated 'of the kindred of Abram;' so the Chaldee paraphrase, supposing him to be first called Ram, 'high;' then Abram, 'a high father;' and lastly, Abraham, 'the high father of a multitude.' Elihu was not so well known as the rest, and therefore is more particularly described thus.

1. Elihu spoke because he was angry, and thought he had good cause to be so. When he had made his remarks upon the dispute, he did not go away and calumniate the disputants, striking them secretly with a malicious, censorious tongue, but what he had to say he would say it before it their faces, that they might vindicate themselves if they could.

1st. He was angry at Job because he thought he did not speak so reverently of God as he ought to have done, and that was too true; ver. 2, "he justified himself more than God;" that is, he took more care and pains to clear himself from the imputation of unrighteousness in being thus afflicted than to clear God from the imputation of unrighteousness in afflicting him, as if he were more concerned for his own honour than for God's; whereas he should in the first place have justified God, and cleared his glory, and then he might well searches of learned explorers have shown the immense variety of the forms in which these idolatries prevailed. The kissing of the hand to the sun and moon was an act of adoration.

xxxi. 31. "Flesh" here is either meat or Job's own flesh; but we have little doubt that common provisions are intended.

xxxi. 33. Instead of "as Adam," the margin has "after the manner of men." Critics and translators are divided as to the meaning; but opinion is mostly in favour of the marginal rendering.

xxxi. 35. This verse may be translated, "Oh, that He would hear me! Behold my token! let the Almighty answer me; and let my adversary at law write an indictment!" Job is ready to have his cause heard, his plea is prepared, and he longs for the indictment against him to be made known and determined. He is the defendant, but he invokes the plaintiff to bring matters to an issue.

xxxi. 36. Compare Exod. xiii. 9, 16; Deut. vi. 8; Prov. iii. 3, vi. 21, which seem to throw light on the images here employed.

enough have left his own reputation to shift for itself. Note, A gracious heart is jealous for the honour of God, and cannot but be angry when it is neglected or postponed, or any injury done it. Nor is it any breach of the law of meekness to be angry at our friends when they are offensive to God. "Get thee behind me, Satan," saith Christ to Simon. Elihu owned Job to be a good man, and yet would not say as he said, when he thought he said amiss. It is too great a compliment to our friends not to tell them of their faults.

2nd. He was angry at his friends, because he thought they had not carried it so charitably towards Job as they ought to have done; ver. 3, "They had found no answer, and yet had condemned Job." They had adjudged him to be a hypocrite, and a wicked man, and would not recede from that sentence concerning him, and yet they could not prove him so, nor disprove the evidences he produced of his integrity. They could not make good the premises, and yet held fast the conclusion. They had no reply to make to his arguments, and yet they would not yield, but, right or wrong, would run him down, and this is not fair. There is seldom any quarrel begun, and more seldom carried on to that length that this was, but there is a fault on both sides. Elihu, as became a moderator, took part with neither, but was equally displeased with the mistakes and mismanagements of both. Those that in good earnest seek for truth, must thus be impartial in their judgments concerning the contenders, and not reject what is true and good on either side for the sake of what is amiss, nor approve or defend what is amiss for the sake of what is true and good; but must learn to separate between the precious and the vile.

2. Elihu spoke because he thought it was time to speak, and that now at length it was come to his turn, ver. 4, 5. 1st. He had waited on Job's speeches, had patiently heard him out, till the words of Job were ended. 2nd. He had waited on his friends' silence. So that, as he would not interrupt him, so he would not prevent them; not because they were wiser than he, but because they were older than he, and therefore it was expected by the company that they should speak first, and Elihu was very modest, and would by no means offer to abridge them of their privilege. Some certain rules of precedency must be observed for the keeping of order. Though inward real honour will attend true wisdom and worth; but, because every man will think himself or his friend the wisest and worthiest, that can be no certain rule for the outward ceremonial honour, which, therefore, must attend the seniority either of age or office; and this respect the seniors may the better require because they paid it when they were juniors, and the juniors may the better pay because they shall have it when they come to be seniors.

6 And Elihu the son of Barachel the Buzite answered and said,

I am young, and ye are very old;
Wherefore I was afraid,
And durst not shew you mine opinion.
7 I said, Days should speak,
And multitude of years should teach wisdom.
8 But there is a spirit in man: [standing.
And the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them under-9 Great men are not always wise:
Neither do the aged understand judgment.
10 Therefore I said, Hearken to me;
I also will shew mine opinion
11 Behold, I waited for your words;
I gave ear to your reasons,
Whilst ye searched out what to say.
12 Yea, I attended unto you,
And, behold, there was none of you that convinced Job,
Or that answered his words:
13 Lest ye should say, We have found out wisdom:
God thrusteth him down, not man.
14 Now he hath not directed his words against me:
Neither will I answer him with your speeches.

Elihu here appears to be,

First. A man of great modesty and humility. Though a young man, and of pregnant parts, yet not pert and confident and assuming. His face shone, and, like Moses, he did not know it, which made it shine so much the brighter. Let it be observed by all, especially by young people, as worthy their imitation, 1. What a diffidence he had of himself, and of his own judgment; ver. 6, "I am young, and therefore I was afraid, and durst not shew you mine opinion," for fear I should either prove mistaken, or do that which was unbecoming me. He was so observant of all that passed, and applied his mind so close to what he heard, that he had formed in himself a judgment of it; he neither neglected it as foreign, nor declined it as intricate; but, how clear soever the matter was to himself, he was afraid to deliver himself upon it, because he differed in his sentiments from those that were older than he. Note, It becomes us to be suspicious of our own judgment in matters of doubtful disputation; to be swift to hear the sentiments of others, and slow to speak our own, especially when we go contrary to the judgment of those whom, upon the score of their learning and piety, we justly have a veneration for. 2. What a deference he paid to his seniors, and what great expectations he had from them; ver. 7, "I said, Days should speak." Note, Age and experience give a man great advantage in judging of things, both as they furnish a man with so much the more matter for his thoughts to work upon, and as they ripen and improve the faculties he is to work with; which is a good reason why old people should take pains both to learn themselves and to teach others, else the advantages of their age are a reproach to them; and why young people should attend on their instructions. It is good lodging with an old disciple, Acts xxi. 16; Tit. ii. 4.

Elihu's modesty appeared in the patient attention he gave to what his seniors said, ver. 11, 12. He waited for their words as one that expected much from them, agreeable to the opinion he had of these grave men. He gave ear to their reasons, that he might take their meaning, and fully understand what was the drift of their discourse, and what the force of their arguments. Yea, he attended to them with diligence and care. And this, 1. Though they were slow, and took up a deal of time in searching out what to say. Though they were often to seek for matter and words, paused and hesitated, and were unready at their work, yet he overlooked that, and gave ear to their reasons, which, if really convincing, he would not think the less so for the disadvantages of the delivery of them. 2. Though they trifled and made nothing of it, though they none of them answered Job's words, nor said what was proper to convince him, yet he attended to them in hopes they would bring it to some head at last. Many a time we must be willing to hear what we do not like, else we cannot prove all things. His patient attendance on their discourses he pleads, 1st. As that which entitled him to a liberty of speech in his turn, and empowered him to require their attention. Hanc veniam petimusque damusque vicissim,—'This liberty we mutually allow and ask.' They that have heard may speak, and they that have learned may teach. 2nd. As that which enabled him to pass a judgment upon what they had said. He had observed what they drove at, and therefore knew what to say to it. Let us be thoroughly apprized of the sentiments of our brethren before we censure them; for "he that answers a matter before he hears it," or when he has heard it but by the halves, "it is folly and shame to him," and speaks him both impertinent and imperious.

Secondly. He appears to have been a man of great sense and courage, and one that knew as well when and how to speak, as when and how to keep silence. Though he had so much respect to his friends as not to interrupt them with his speaking, yet he had so much regard to truth and justice (his better friends) as not to betray them by his silence. He boldly pleads,

1. That man is a rational creature, and therefore every man hath for himself a judgment of discretion, and ought to be allowed a liberty of speech in his turn. He means the same that Job did, ch. xii. 3, "But I have understanding as well as you," when he saith, ver. 8, "But there is a spirit in man;" only he expresseth it a little more modestly, that one man has understanding as well as another, and no man can pretend to have the monopoly of reason, or to engross all the trade of it. Had he meant, 'I have revelation as well as you,' (as some understand it,) he must have proved it; but if he mean only, 'I have reason as well as you,' they cannot deny it, for it is every man's honour, and it is no presumption to claim it, nor could they gainsay his inference from it, ver. 10, "Therefore hearken to me." Learn here, 1st. That the soul is a spirit, neither material itself, nor doth it depend upon matter, but is capable of conversing with things spiritual, which are not the objects of sense. 2nd. It is an understanding spirit. It is able to discover and receive truth, to discourse and reason upon it, and to direct and rule accordingly. 3rd. This understanding spirit is in every man. It is the light that lighteth every man, Jno. i. 9. 4th. It is "the inspiration of the Almighty" that gives us this understanding spirit; for he is the Father of spirits, and Fountain of understanding: see Gen. ii. 7; Eccl. xii. 7; Zec. xii. 1.

2. That those who are advanced above others in grandeur and gravity do not always proportionably go beyond them in knowledge and wisdom; ver. 9, "Great men are not always wise." It is pity but they were; for then they would never do hurt with their greatness, and would do so much the more good with their wisdom. Men should be preferred for their wisdom; and those that are in honour and power have most need of wisdom, and have the greatest opportunity of improving in it, and yet it doth not follow that great men are always wise, and therefore it is folly to subscribe to the dictates of any with an implicit faith. The aged do not always understand judgment, even they may be mistaken, and therefore must not expect to bring every thought into obedience to them; nay, therefore they must not take it as an affront to be contradicted, but rather take it as a kindness to be instructed by their juniors; "Therefore I said, Hearken to me," ver. 10. We must be willing to hear reason from those that are every way inferior to us, and to yield to it. He that has a good eye can see farther upon level ground than he that is purblind can from the top of the highest mountain. "Better is a poor and wise child than an old and foolish king," Eccl. iv. 13.

3. That it was requisite something should be said for the setting of this controversy in a true light, which by all that had hitherto been said was but rendered more intricate and perplexed, ver. 13. I must speak, "lest ye should say, We have found out wisdom;" lest you should think your argument against Job conclusive and irrefragable, and that Job cannot be convinced and humbled by any other argument but this of yours, that "God casteth him down, and not man;" that it appears by his extraordinary afflictions that God is his enemy, and therefore he is certainly a wicked man. I must shew you that this is a false hypothesis, and that Job may be convinced without maintaining it. Or, lest you should think you have found out the wisest way, to reason no more with him, but leave it to God to thrust him down. It is time to speak when we hear errors advanced and disputed for, especially under pretence of supporting the cause of God with them. It is time to speak when God's judgments are vouched for the patronizing of men's pride and passion, and their unjust, uncharitable censures of their brethren; then we must speak on God's behalf.

4. That he had something new to offer, and would endeavour to manage the dispute in a better manner than it had hitherto been managed, ver. 14. He thinks he may expect a favourable hearing; for, 1st. He will not reply to Job's protestations of his integrity, but allows the truth of them, and therefore doth not interpose as his enemy. "He hath not directed his words against me;" I have nothing to say against the main of his discourse, nor do I differ from his principles. I have only a gentle reproof to give him for his passionate expressions. 2nd. He will not repeat their arguments, nor go upon their principles; "Neither will I answer him with your speeches." Not with the same matter; should I only say what has been said, I might justly be silenced as impertinent. Nor in the same manner; I will not be guilty of that peevishness towards him myself which I dislike in you. The controversy that has already been fully handled a wise man will let alone, unless he can amend and improve what has been done. Why should he actum agere,—'do that which has been done already?'

15 They were amazed, they answered no more:
They left off speaking.
16 When I had waited, (for they spake not,
But stood still, and answered no more;)
17 I said, I will answer also my part,
I also will shew mine opinion.
18 For I am full of matter,
The spirit within me constraineth me.
19 Behold, my belly is as wine which hath no vent;
It is ready to burst like new bottles.
20 I will speak, that I may be refreshed:
I will open my lips and answer.

xxxi. 39. The phrase, "if I have eaten the fruits thereof without money," literally means "without silver," as in Isa. lv. 1, and signifies "without payment." Silver by weight was one of the earliest forms of a metal currency.

xxxi. 40. The word rendered "thistles" may denote thorny plants in general, but may mean the thistle in particular. For "cockle," the margin has "noisome weeds," which is better, for "ill weeds" would be a good translation.

xxxii. 1—5. Job's three counsellors were silent, less, perhaps, because they had nothing to say, than because they had no hope of convincing him. It is very doubtful who Elihu was, and hence, among other fancies, it has been supposed that he was not a mere man at all, but a being of superior order, which is sufficiently refuted by the fact that he was a Buzite, and therefore descended from Nahor. As for Ram, the Abraham of the Chaldee, the Rimmon of the Syriac, and the Rama of some Greek copies 21 Let me not, I pray you, accept any man's person,

Neither let me give flattering titles unto man.
22 For I know not to give flattering titles;
In so doing my maker would soon take me away.

Three things here apologize for Elihu's interposing as he doth in this controversy, which had already been canvassed by such acute and learned disputants:

First. That the stage was clear, and he did not break in upon any of the managers on either side; ver. 15, "they were amazed;" ver. 16, "they stood still, and answered no more." They not only left off speaking themselves, but they stood still, to hear if any of the company would speak their minds; so that (as we say) he had room and fair play given him. They seemed not fully satisfied themselves with what they had said, else they would have adjourned the court, and not have stood still, expecting what might farther be offered. And therefore "I said" (ver. 17) "I will answer also my part." I cannot pretend to give a definitive sentence; no, the judgment is the Lord's, and by him it must be determined who is in the right, and who in the wrong; but, since you have each of you shewed your opinion, I also will shew mine, and let it take its fate with the rest. When what is offered, even by the meanest, is offered thus modestly, it is pity but it should be fairly heard and considered. I see no inconvenience in supposing that Elihu here discovers himself to be the penman of this book; and that he here writes as an historian, relating the matter of fact, that after he had bespoke their attention in the foregoing verses, they were amazed, they left off whispering among themselves, did not gainsay the liberty of speech he desired, but stood still to hear what he would say, being much surprised at the admirable mixture of boldness and modesty that appeared in his preface.

Secondly. That he was uneasy, and even in pain to be delivered of his thoughts upon this matter. They must give him leave to speak, for he cannot forbear; while he is musing, the fire burns, Ps. xxxix. 3. Shut up in his bones, as the prophet speaks, Jer. xx. 9. Never did nurse, when her breasts were gorged, so long to have them drawn, as Elihu did to deliver his mind concerning Job's case, ver. 18—20. If any of the disputants would have hit that which he thought was the right joint, he would contentedly have been silent. But when he thought they all missed it, he was eager to be trying his hand at it. He pleads, 1. That he had a great deal to say; "I am full of matter," having made my remarks upon all that has hitherto been said, and taken rise from it for my own thoughts. When aged men are drawn dry, and have spent their stock in discoursing of the Divine providence, God can raise up others, even young men, and fill them with matter for the edifying of his church; for it is a subject that can never be exhausted, though they that speak to it may. 2. That he was under a necessity of saying it; "The Spirit within me" not only instructs me what to say, but puts me on to say it; so that if I have not vent (such a mighty ferment are my thoughts in) I shall burst like bottles of new wine when it is working, ver. 19. See what a great grief it is to a good minister to be silenced and thrust into a corner. He is full of matter, full of Christ, full of heaven, and would speak of these things for the good of others, but he may not. 3. That it would be an ease and satisfaction to himself to deliver his mind; ver. 20, "I will speak that I may be refreshed;" not only that I may be eased of the pain of stifling it, but that I may have the pleasure of endeavouring, according to my place and capacity, to do good. It is a great refreshment to a good man to have liberty to speak for the glory of God and the edification of others.

Thirdly. That he was resolved to speak with all possible freedom and sincerity what he thought was true, not what he thought would please; ver. 21, 22, "Let me not accept any man's person," as partial judges do, that aim to enrich themselves, not to do justice; I am resolved to flatter no man. He would not speak otherwise than he thought, either, 1. In compassion to Job, because he was poor and in affliction; would not make his case better than he really took it to be, for fear of increasing his grief, but, let him bear it as he can, he shall be told the truth. Those that are in affliction must not be flattered, but dealt faithfully with. When trouble is upon any, it is foolish pity to suffer sin upon them too, (Lev. xix. 17,) for that is the worst addition that can be to their trouble. "Thou shalt not countenance," no more than discountenance, "a poor man in his cause," Ex. xxiii. 3, nor regard a sad look any more than a big look, so as for the sake of it to pervert justice, for that is knowing faces. Or, 2. In compliment to Job's friends, because they were in prosperity and reputation. Let them not expect he should say as they said, any farther than he was convinced they said right, nor applaud their dictates for the sake of their dignities; no, though Elihu is a young man, and upon his preferment, he will not dissemble truth to court the favour of great men. It is a good resolution he has taken up, "I know not to give flattering titles to men." I never used myself to that language; and it is a good reason he gives for that resolution; "in so doing my Maker would soon take me away." It is good to keep ourselves in awe with a holy fear of God's judgments. He that made us will take us away in his wrath, if we do not carry ourselves as we should. He hates all dissimulation and flattery, and will soon put lying lips to silence, and cut off flattering lips, Ps. xii. 3. The more closely we eye the majesty of God as our Maker, and the more we dread his wrath and justice, the less danger shall we be in of a sinful fearing or flattering of men.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Pompous prefaces oftentimes, like the teeming mountain, introduce but poor performances; but Elihu's discourse here, doth not disappoint the expectations which his preface had raised: it is substantial and lively, and very much to the purpose. He had in the foregoing chapter, said what he had to say to Job's three friends; and now he comes up close to Job himself, and directs his speech to him. I. He bespeaks Job's favourable acceptance of what he should say, and desires he would take him for that person whom he had so often wished for, that would plead with him, and receive his plea on God's behalf, ver. 1—7. II. He doth in God's name, bring an action against him, for words, which in the heat of disputation he had spoken: reflecting upon God as dealing hardly with him, ver. 8—11. III. He endeavours to convince him of his fault and folly herein, by shewing him 1. God's sovereign dominion over man, ver. 12, 13. 2. The care God takes of man, and the various ways and means he useth to do his soul good: which we have reason to think he designs, when he lays bodily afflictions upon him, ver. 14. 1st. Job had sometimes complained of unquiet dreams, ch. vii. 14; Why, saith Elihu, God sometimes speaks conviction and instruction to men by such dreams, ver. 15—18. 2nd. Job had especially complained of his sicknesses and pains; and as to these he shews largely, that they were far from being tokens of God's wrath, as Job took them; or evidences of Job's hypocrisy, as his friends took them; that they were really wise and gracious methods, which Divine grace took for the increase of his acquaintance with God, to work patience, experience, and hope, ver. 19—30; and, lastly, he concludes with a request to Job, either to answer him, or give him leave to go on, ver. 31—33.

WHEREFORE, Job, I pray thee, hear my speeches.
And hearken to all my words
2 Behold, now I have opened my mouth,
My tongue hath spoken in my mouth.
3 My words shall be of the uprightness of my heart:
And my lips shall utter knowledge clearly
4 The Spirit of God hath made me,
And the breath of the Almighty hath given me life.
5 If thou canst answer me,
Set thy words in order before me, stand up.
6 Behold, I am according to thy wish in God's stead:
I also am formed out of the clay.
7 Behold, my terror shall not make thee afraid,
Neither shall my hand be heavy upon thee.

Several arguments Elihu here useth to persuade Job not only to give him a patient hearing, but to believe that he designed him a good office; and to take it kindly, and be willing to receive the instructions he was now about to give him. Let Job consider,

First. That Elihu doth not join with his three friends against him. He hath in the foregoing chapter declared his dislike of their proceedings, disclaimed their hypothesis, and quite set aside the method they took of healing Job. "Wherefore, Job, I pray thee, hear my speech," ver. 1. They were all in the same song, all spoke in the same strain; but I am trying a new way, "therefore hearken to all my words," and not to some of them only; for we cannot judge of a discourse unless we take it entire, and hearken to it all.

Secondly. That he intended to make a solemn business of it, not to put in a word by the by, or give a short repartee to shew his wit, but after long silence he opened his mouth, ver. 2, with deliberation and design. Upon mature consideration, he had already begun to speak, and was prepared to go on, if Job would encourage him by his attention.

Thirdly. That he was resolved to speak as he thought, and not otherwise; ver. 3, "My words shall be of the uprightness of my heart," the genuine product of my convictions and sentiments. There was reason to suspect that Job's three friends did not think in their consciences that Job was so ill a man as they had in their discourses represented him to be, merely for the support of their hypothesis; and that was not fair. It is a base thing to condemn those with our tongues, to serve a turn, whom at the same time, we cannot but in our consciences think well of. Elihu is an honest man, and scorns to do so.

Fourthly. That what he said should be easy, and not dark and hard to be understood. "My lips shall utter knowledge clearly." Job shall readily take his meaning, and find what he drives at. Those that speak of the things of God should carefully avoid all obscurity and perplexedness both of notion and expression, and speak as plainly and clearly as they can, for by that it will appear that they do themselves understand what they speak of, that they mean honestly, and design the edification of those they speak to.

Fifthly. That he would in his discourse make the best use he could of the reason and understanding God had given him, that life, that rational soul, which he received from the Spirit of God, and the breath of the Almighty, ver. 4. He owns himself unfit to enter the lists with his seniors, yet he desires they will not despise his youth, for he is God's workmanship as well as they, made by the same hand, endued with the same noble powers and faculties, and designed for the same great end; and therefore why may not the God that made him make use of him as an instrument of good to Job? With this consideration also we should quicken ourselves (and perhaps Elihu made that use of it) to do good in our places, according to our capacity: God has made us, and given us life, and therefore we should study to use our life to some good purpose, to spend it in glorifying God, and serving our generation according to his will, that we may answer the end of our creation, and it may not be said we were made in vain.

Sixthly. That he would be very willing to hear what Job could object against what he had to say; ver. 5, "If thou canst answer me," if thou hast so much strength and spirit left thee, and art not quite spent with the distemper and the dispute, "set thy words in order," and they shall have their due consideration. Those that can speak reason will hear reason.

Seventhly. That he had often wished for one that would appear for God, with whom he might freely expostulate, and to whom as arbitrator he might refer the matter, and such a one Elihu would be; ver. 6, "I am according to thy wish in God's stead." How pathetically had Job wished, ch. xvi. 21, "O that one might plead for a man with God!" and ch. xxiii 3, "O that I knew where I might find him!" only he would make in his bargain, that his dread should not make him afraid, ch. xiii. 21. Now, saith Elihu, look upon me this once as in God's stead; I will undertake to plead his cause with thee, and to shew thee wherein thou hast affronted him, and what he has against thee; and what appeals or complaints thou hast to make to God, make them to me.

Eighthly. That he was not an unequal match for him. "I also am formed out of the clay." I also as well as the first man, Gen. ii. 7, I also as well as thou. Job had urged this with God as a reason why he should not bear hard upon him; ch. x. 9, "Remember that thou hast made me as the clay;" Why, saith Elihu, I am formed out of the clay as well as thou; 'formed of the same clay,' so some read it. It is good for us all to consider that we are formed out of the clay; and well for us it is that those who are to us in God's stead are so; that he speaks to us by men like ourselves, according to Israel's wish upon a full trial, Deu. v. 24. God has wisely deposited the treasure in earthen vessels like ourselves, 2 Cor. iv. 7.

Lastly, That he would have no reason to be frighted at the assault he made upon him; ver. 7, "My terror shall not make thee afraid." 1. As thy friends have done with their arguings, I will not fall so foul upon thee as they have done, nor draw up such a heavy charge against thee. Nor, 2. As God would do if he should appear to reason with thee. I stand upon the same level with thee, and am made of the same mould, and therefore cannot impress that terror upon thee which thou mayest justly dread from the appearance of the Divine majesty. If we would rightly convince men, it must be by reason, not by terror; by fair arguing, not by a heavy hand.

8 Surely thou hast spoken in mine hearing,
And I have heard the voice of thy words, saying,
9 I am clean without transgression, I am innocent:

merely indicate the uncertainty which existed concerning him in ancient times. The opinion most favoured is that Ram is Aram (Gen. xxii. 21).

xxxii. 8. This language is emphatic, indicating the reality of the spirit that is in man, and of the Divine influence by which he is endued with understanding. The passage proves that mere breath is not meant by the word spirit, and some think it here refers to the Spirit of God as inspiring some men in a special sense. In any case, it is a spirit of wisdom, and not that boldness which we often call spirit.

xxxii. 18—20. Probably Elihu had been a silent listener, but had restrained all his strong impulses to speak until now. He can hold his peace no longer, and he declares at once the fulness of his thoughts and his inward eagerness to utter them. Vessels containing wine in a state of fermentation must have a vent, or they will burst. To this fact the speaker refers for a figure to describe

Neither is there iniquity in me.
10 Behold, he findeth occasions against me,
He counteth me for his enemy,
11 He putteth my feet in the stocks,
He marketh all my paths.
12 Behold, in this thou art not just:
I will answer thee, that God is greater than man.
13 Why dost thou strive against him?
For he giveth not account of any of his matters.

In these verses,

First. Elihu particularly chargeth Job with some indecent expressions that had dropped from him, reflecting upon the justice and goodness of God in his dealings with him. He doth not ground the charge upon report, but was himself an earwitness of what he here reproves him for; ver. 8, "Thou hast spoken it in my hearing," and in the hearing of all this company. He had it not at second hand; if so, he would have hoped it had not been so bad as it was represented. He did not hear it from Job in private conversation, then he would not have been so ill-bred as to repeat it thus publicly; but Job had said it openly, and therefore it was fit he should be openly reproved for it. "Them that sin before all, rebuke before all." When we hear any thing said that tends to God's dishonour, we ought publicly to bear our testimony against it. What is said amiss in our hearing, we are concerned to reprove, for ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord, to confront the accuser.

1. Job had represented himself as innocent; ver. 9, Thou hast said, "I am clean without transgression;" Job had not said this totidem verbis,—'in so many words;' nay, he had owned himself to have sinned, and to be impure before God; but he had indeed said, "Thou knowest that I am not wicked. My righteousness I hold fast," and the like, on which Elihu might ground this charge. It was true, that Job was "a perfect and an upright man," and not such a one as his friends had represented him; but he ought not to have insisted so much upon it, as if God had therefore done him wrong in afflicting him. Yet, it should seem, Elihu did not deal fairly in charging Job with saying that he was clean and innocent from all transgression, when he only pleaded that he was "upright and innocent from the great transgression;" but those that speak passionately and unwarily must thank themselves if they be misunderstood. They should have taken more care.

2. He had represented God as severe in marking what he did amiss, and taking all advantages against him, ver. 10, 11, as if he lay at catch to pick quarrels with him; "He findeth occasions against me," which supposeth seeking them. To this purpose Job had spoken, ch. xiv. 16, 17, "Dost thou not watch over my sin?" "He counteth me for his enemy;" so he had expressly said, ch. xiii. 24; xix. 11. "He putteth my feet in the stocks," that, as I cannot contend with him, so I may not be able to flee from him; this he had said. ch. xiii. 27, "And lookest narrowly unto all my paths," in the same place.

Secondly. He endeavours to convince him that he had spoken amiss in speaking thus, and that he ought to humble himself before God for it, and by repentance to unsay it; ver. 12, "Behold, in this thou art not just." 'Here thou art not in the right;' so some read it. See the difference between the charge which Elihu exhibited against Job and that which was preferred against him by his other friends. They would not own that he was just at all, but Elihu only saith, In this, in saying this, thou art not just. 1. Thou dost not deal justly with God. To be just is to render to all their due; now we do not render God his due, nor are we just to him, if we do not acknowledge his equity and kindness in all the dispensations of his providence towards us; that he is righteous in all his ways, and that, however it be, yet he is good. 2. Thou dost not speak the language of a righteous man. I do not deny but thou art such a one, but in this thou dost not make it to appear. Many that are just, yet in some particular instances do not speak and act like themselves; and as, on the one hand, we must not fail to tell even a good man wherein he mistakes and doth amiss, nor flatter him in his errors and passions, for in that we are not kind, so, on the other hand, we must not draw men's characters, nor pass a judgment on them by one instance, or some few misplaced words, for in that we are not just. In many things we all offend, and therefore must be candid in our censures.

Two things Elihu proposeth to Job's consideration, to convince him that he had said amiss:

1st. That God is infinitely above us; and therefore it is madness to contend with him, for if he plead against us with his great power we cannot stand before him. "I will answer thee," saith Elihu, in one word, which carries its own evidence along with it, "that God is greater than man;" no doubt he is infinitely greater. Between God and man there is no proportion. Job had himself said a great deal, and admirably well, concerning the greatness of God, his irresistible power and incontestable sovereignty, his terrible majesty and unsearchable immensity. Now, said Elihu, do but consider what thou thyself hast said concerning the greatness of God, and apply it to thyself. If he is greater than man, he is greater than me, and thou wilt see reason enough to repent of these ill-natured, ill-favoured reflections upon him, and to blush at thy folly, and tremble to think of thine own presumption. Note, There is enough in this one plain unquestionable truth, "that God is greater than man," if duly improved, for ever to put to silence and put to shame all our complaints of his providence, and our exceptions against his dealings with us. He is not only more wise and powerful than we are, and therefore it is to no purpose to contend with him, who will be too hard for us, but more holy, just, and good; for these are the transcendent glories and excellences of the Divine nature; in these "God is greater than man," and therefore, it is absurd and unreasonable to find fault with him, for he is certainly in the right.

2nd. That God is not accountable to us; ver. 13, "Why dost thou strive against him?" Those that complain of God strive against him, implead him, impeach him, bring an action against him; and why do they do so? for what cause? to what purpose? Note, It is an unreasonable thing for us, weak, foolish, sinful creatures, to strive with a God of infinite wisdom, power, and goodness. Woe to the clay that strives with the potter. "For he gives not account of any of his matters." He is under no obligation to shew us a reason for what he doth, neither to tell us what he designs to do,—in what method, at what time, by what instruments; nor to tell us why he deals thus with us. He is not bound either to justify his own proceedings, or to satisfy our demands and inquiries; his judgments will certainly justify themselves; if we do not satisfy ourselves in them it is our own fault. It is therefore daring impiety for us to arraign God at our bar, or challenge him to shew cause for what he doth, to say unto him, "What dost thou?" or, "why dost thou so?" 'He giveth not account of all his matters;' so some read it. He reveals as much as it is fit for us to know, as follows here, ver. 14. But still there are secret things, which belong not to us, which it is not for us to pry into.

14 For God speaketh once, yea twice,
Yet man perceiveth it not.
15 In a dream, in a vision of the night, [the bed;
When deep sleep falleth upon men, in slumberings upon 16 Then he openeth the ears of men,
And sealeth their instruction,
17 That he may withdraw man from his purpose,
And hide pride from man.
18 He keepeth back his soul from the pit,
And his life from perishing by the sword.

Job had complained that God kept him wholly in the dark concerning the meaning of his dealings with him; and therefore concluded he dealt with him as his enemy. No, saith Elihu, he speaks to you, but you do not perceive him, so that the fault is yours, not his; and is designing your real good, even in those dispensations which you put this harsh construction upon. Observe in general, ver. 14,

First. What a friend God is to our welfare. "He speaketh to us once, yea, twice." It is a token of his favour, that, notwithstanding the distance and quarrel between us and him, yet he is pleased to speak to us. It is an evidence he designs our good, that he is pleased to speak to us of our own concerns, to shew us what is our duty and what our interest, what he requires of us and what we may expect from him; to tell us of our faults, and warn us of our danger; to shew us the way, and to lead us in it. This he doth once, yea, twice, that is, again and again. When one warning is neglected, he gives another, "not willing that any should perish;" "Precept must be upon precept, and line upon line;" and so it is, that sinners may be left inexcusable.

Secondly. What enemies we are to our own welfare. "Man perceives it not," that is, he doth not heed it or regard it; he doth not discern or understand it; is not aware that it is the voice of God, nor doth he receive the things revealed, for they are foolishness to him; he stops his ear, stands in his own light, rejects the counsel of God against himself, and so is never the wiser, no, not for the dictates of wisdom itself. God speaks to us by conscience, by providences, and by ministers, of all which Elihu here discourseth at large, to shew Job that God was both telling him his mind and doing him a kindness, even now he seemed to keep him in the dark, and so treat him as a stranger, and to keep him in distress, and so treat him as an enemy. There was not then, that we know of, any Divine revelation in writing; and therefore that is not here mentioned among the ways by which God speaketh to men, though now it is the principal way. In these verses he shews how God teacheth and admonisheth the children of men by their own consciences. Observe,

1. The proper season and opportunity for these admonitions; ver. 15, "In a dream, in slumberings upon the bed." When men are retired from the world, and the business and conversation of it, then is a good time for them to retire into their own hearts, and commune with them, when they are upon their beds, solitary and still, Ps. iv. 4; and that time God takes for dealing personally with men. 1st. When he sent angels, extraordinary messengers on his errands, he commonly chose that time for the delivery of them, when by deep sleep falling on men the bodily senses were all locked up, and the mind more free to receive the immediate communications of Divine light. Thus he made his mind known to the prophets by visions and dreams, Num. xii. 6; thus he warned Abimelech, Gen. xx. 3; Laban, Gen. xxxi. 24; Joseph, Mat. i. 21; thus he made known to Pharaoh and Nebuchadnezzar, things that should come to pass hereafter. 2nd. When he stirred up conscience, that ordinary deputy of his in the soul, to do its office, he took that opportunity, either when deep sleep fell on men, (for, though dreams mostly come from fancy, some may come from conscience,) or in slumberings, when men are between sleep and awake, reflecting at night upon the business of the foregoing day, or projecting in the morning the business of the ensuing day, then is a proper time for their hearts to reproach them for what they have done ill, and to admonish them what they should do: see Isa. xxx. 21.

2. The power and force with which those admonitions come, ver. 16. When God designs men's good, by the convictions and dictates of their own consciences, 1st. He gives them the letting in, and makes them to be heeded. "Then he opens the ears of men," which were before shut against the voice of this charmer, Ps. lviii. 5. He opens the heart, as he opened Lydia's, and so opens the ears. He takes away that which stopped the ear, so that the conviction finds, or forces its way; nay, he works in the soul a submission to the regimen of conscience, and a compliance with its rules, for that follows upon God's opening the ear; Isa. l. 5, "God hath opened mine ear, and I was not rebellious." 2nd. He gives them the setting on, and makes them to abide: "he sealeth their instruction;" that is, the instruction that is designed for them, and is suited to them. This he makes their souls to receive the deep and lasting impression of, as the wax of the seal. When the heart is delivered into Divine instructions as into a mould, then the work is done.

Thirdly. The end and design of these admonitions that are sent.

1. To keep men from sin, and particularly the sin of pride; ver. 17, "That he may withdraw man from his purpose," that is, from his evil purposes; may change the temper of his mind, and the course of his life, his disposition and inclination, or prevent some particular sin he is in danger of falling into. May withdraw man from his work; may make him leave off man's work, which is working for the world and the flesh, and may set him to work the work of God. Many a man has been stopped in the full career of a sinful pursuit, by the seasonable checks of his own conscience, saying, "Do not this abominable thing which the Lord hates." Particularly, God doth by this means hide pride from man, that is, hide those things from him which are the matter of his pride, and take his mind off from dwelling upon them, by setting before him what reason he has to be humbled, that he may take away pride from man, so some read it; that he may pluck up that root of bitterness, which is the cause of so much sin. All those whom God has mercy in store for he will humble and hide pride from. Pride makes people eager and resolute in the prosecution of their purposes, they will have their way; therefore God withdraws them from their purposes, by mortifying their pride.

2. To keep men from ruin, ver. 18. While sinners are pursuing their evil purposes, and indulging their pride, their souls are hastening apace to the pit, to the sword, to destruction both in this world and that to come. But when God, by the admonitions of conscience, withdraws them from sin, he thereby keeps back their souls from the pit, from the bottomless pit, and saves them from perishing by the sword of Divine vengeance; so iniquity shall not be their ruin. That which turns men from sin, saves them from hell, saves a soul from death, Jas. v. 20. See what a mercy it is to be under the restraints of an awakened conscience; faithful are the wounds, and kind are the bonds of that friend, for the soul is kept from perishing eternally.

his own condition and feelings. Wine bottles were made of skin, but would burst if closed while containing fermenting wine. The Greek makes Elihu compare himself to the rent bellows of a smith, but the translators either followed a different reading or were mistaken.

xxxii. 22. For "in so doing my Maker would soon take me away," we may translate simply, "my Maker will soon take me away." The sense will then be, that he could not use flattery, because he must soon die and after death the judgment.

xxxiii. 6. Rodwell translates this, "Behold, I, like yourself, am of El; I, too, am moulded of clay." This sense is given in several other versions, and is preferable to that of our translation.

xxxiii. 7. The word rendered "hand" is obscure, and only found here. Some take it to mean "dignity," but the real idea seems to be that Elihu would not burden him and oppress him.

xxxiii. 14. The true meaning is rather, that God speaks once, yea, twice, or once and again, although man pays no attention.

19 He is chastened also with pain upon his bed,
And the multitude of his bones with strong pain:
20 So that his life abhorreth bread,
And his soul dainty meat.
21 His flesh is consumed away, that it cannot be seen;
And his bones that were not seen stick out.
22 Yea, his soul draweth near unto the grave,
And his life to the destroyers.
23 If there be a messenger with him,
An interpreter, one among a thousand,
To shew unto man his uprightness:
24 Then he is gracious unto him, and saith,
Deliver him from going down to the pit:
I have found a ransom
25 His flesh shall be fresher than a child's:
He shall return to the days of his youth: [him:
26 He shall pray unto God, and he will be favourable unto
And he shall see his face with joy:
For he will render unto man his righteousness.
27 He looketh upon men, and if any say,
I have sinned, and perverted that which was right,
And it profited me not;
28 He will deliver his soul from going into the pit,
And his life shall see the light.

God hath spoken once to sinners by their own consciences, to keep them from the paths of the destroyer, but they perceive it not; they are not aware that the checks their own hearts give them in a sinful way are from God, but they are imputed to melancholy, or the preciseness of their education; and therefore God speaketh twice; speaks a second time and tries another way to convince and reclaim sinners, and that is by providences, afflictive and merciful, in which he speaketh twice, and by the seasonable instructions of good ministers setting in with them. Job complained much of his diseases, and judged by them that God was angry with him; his friends did so too: but Elihu shews they were all mistaken, for God often afflicts the body in love, and with gracious designs of good to the soul, as appears in the issue, which here it is brought to; and of great use this part of Elihu's discourse will be to us, for the due improvement of sickness, in and by which God speaketh to men. Here is,

First. The patient described in his extremity. See what work sickness makes, ver. 19, when God sends it with commission: Do this, and it doth it.

1. The sick man is full of pain all over him; ver. 14, "He is chastened with pain upon his bed," such pain as confines him to his bed; or, so extreme the pain is, that he can get no ease, no, not on his bed, where he would repose himself. Pain and sickness will turn a bed of down into a bed of thorns, on which he that used to sleep now "tosseth to and fro, until the dawning of the day." The case as here put is very bad; pain is more hardly borne than sickness, and with that the patient here is chastened; not a dull, heavy pain, but strong and acute; and, many times, the stronger the patient, the stronger the pain; for the more sanguine the complexion is the more violent, commonly, the disease is. It is not the smarting of the flesh that is complained of, but the aching of the bones. It is an inward rooted pain; and not only the bones of one limb, but the multitude of the bones, are thus chastened. See what frail, what vile bodies we have, which, though receiving no external hurt, may be thus pained from causes within themselves. See what work sin makes, what mischief it doth. Pain is the fruit of sin; yet, by the grace of God, the pain of the body is often made a means of good to the soul.

2. He has quite lost his stomach; the common effect of sickness; ver. 20, "His life abhorreth bread," the most necessary food, "and dainty meat," which he most delighted in, and formerly relished with a great deal of pleasure. This is a good reason why we should not be desirous of dainties, because they are deceitful meat, Pr. xxiii. 3. We may be soon made as sick of them as we are now fond of them; and those who live in luxury when they are well, if ever they come, by reason of sickness, to loathe dainty meat, may with grief and shame read their sin in their punishment. Let us not inordinately love the taste of meat, for the time may come when we may even loathe the sight of meat. Ps. cvii. 18.

3. He is become a perfect skeleton; nothing but skin and bones, ver. 21. By sickness, perhaps a few days' sickness, his flesh, which was fat, and fair, and plump, "is consumed away that it cannot be seen;" it is strangely wasted and gone, and his bones, that were buried in flesh, now stick out; you may count his ribs, may tell all his bones. The soul that is well nourished with the bread of life, sickness will not make lean; but it soon makes a change in the body.

'He who before had such a beauteous air,
And pamper'd with his ease, seem'd plump and fair,
Doth all his friends (amazing change!) surprise,
With pale lean cheeks, and ghastly hollow eyes;
His bones, a horrid sight, start through his skin,
Which lay before in flesh and fat unseen.'—Sir R. Blackmore.

4. He is given up for gone, and his life despaired of; ver. 22, "His soul draws near to the grave;" that is, he has all the symptoms of death upon him, and in the apprehension of all about him, as well as in his own, he is a dying man. The pangs of death, here called the destroyers, are just ready to seize him; they compass him about, Ps. cxvi. 3. Perhaps it intimates the very dreadful apprehensions which those have of death as a destroying thing, when it stares them in the face, who when it was at a distance made light of it. All agree, when it comes to the setting to, whatever they thought of it before, that it is a serious thing to die.

Secondly. The provision made for his instruction, in order to a sanctified use of his affliction, that when God in that way speaketh to man he may be heard and understood, and not speak in vain, ver. 23. He is happy, "if there be a messenger with him" to attend him in his sickness, to convince, counsel, and comfort him; an interpreter to expound the providence, and give him to understand the meaning of it; a man of wisdom that knows the voice of the rod, and its interpretation; for many a time when God speaks by afflictions, we are so unversed in the language, that we have need of an interpreter; and it is well if we have such a one. The advice and help of a good minister is as needful and reasonable, and should be as acceptable in sickness, as of a good physician especially if he be well skilled in the art of explaining and improving providences; which, if he be, he is "one of a thousand," and to be valued accordingly; and his business at such a time is "to shew unto man his uprightness;" that is, God's uprightness, that in faithfulness he afflicts him, and doth him no wrong; which it is necessary we be convinced of, in order to our making a due improvement of the affliction. Or, rather, man's uprightness, or rectitude. 1. The uprightness that is. If it appear that the sick person is truly pious, the interpreter will not do as Job's friends had done,—make it his business to prove him a hypocrite because he is afflicted; but, on the contrary, will shew him his uprightness, notwithstanding his afflictions, that he may take the comfort of it, and be easy whatever the event is. 2. The uprightness, the reformation that should be, in order to life and peace. When men are made to see the way of uprightness to be the only way, and a sure way to salvation, and to choose it, and walk in it accordingly, the work is done.

Thirdly. God's gracious acceptance of him upon his repentance, ver. 24. When he sees that the sick person is indeed convinced that sincere repentance, and that uprightness which is Gospel perfection, is his interest as well as duty, then he that waits to be gracious, and shews mercy upon the first indication of true repentance, is gracious unto him, and takes him into his favour and thoughts for good. Wherever God finds a gracious heart, he will be found a gracious God; and, 1. He will give a gracious order for his discharge. He saith, Deliver him; that is, Let him be delivered from going down to the pit, from that death which is the wages of sin. When afflictions have done their work, they shall be removed. When we return to God in a way of duty, he will return to us in a way of mercy. Those shall be delivered from going down to the pit who receive God's messengers, and rightly understand his interpreters, so as to subscribe to his uprightness. 2. He will give a gracious reason for this order, "I have found a ransom, or propitiation; Jesus Christ is that ransom, so Elihu calls him, as Job had called him his Redeemer, for he is both the purchaser and the price, the priest and the sacrifice; so high was the value put upon souls, that nothing less would redeem them, and so great the injury done by sin, that nothing less would atone for it than the blood of the Son of God, who gave his life a ransom for many. This is a ransom of God's finding, a contrivance of infinite wisdom; we could never have found it ourselves, and the angels themselves could never have found it. It is "the wisdom of God in a mystery, the hidden wisdom;" and such an invention as is and will be the everlasting wonder of those principalities and powers that desire to look into it. Observe how God glories in the invention here, εὕρηκα, εὕρηκα,—'I have found, I have found' the ransom; I, even I, am he that hath done it.

Fourthly. The recovery of the sick man hereupon. Take away the cause, and the effect will cease. When the patient becomes a penitent, see what a blessed change follows.

1. His body recovers its health, ver. 25. This is not always the consequent of a sick man's repentance and return to God, but sometimes it is; and recovery from sickness is then a mercy indeed, when it arises from the remission of sin, then it is in love to the soul that the body is delivered from the pit of corruption, when God casts our sins behind his back, Isa. xxxviii. 17. That is the method of a blessed recovery; "Son, be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee," and then, "rise, take up thy bed and walk," Mat. ix. 2, 6. So here, interest him in the ransom, and then "his flesh shall be fresher than a child's," and there shall be no remains of his distemper, but "he shall return to the days of his youth," to the beauty and strength which he had then. When the distemper that oppressed nature is removed, how strangely doth nature help itself, in which the power and goodness of the God of nature must be thankfully acknowledged. By such merciful providences as these, which afflictions give occasion for, God speaketh once, yea twice, to the children of men, letting them know (if they would but perceive it) their dependence upon him, and his tender compassion of them.

2. His soul recovers its peace, ver. 26. 1st. The patient being a penitent, is a supplicant, and has learned to pray. He knows God will be sought unto for his favours, and therefore "he shall pray unto God," pray for pardon, pray for health. "Is any afflicted? any sick? let him pray." When he finds himself recovering, he shall not then think that prayer is no longer necessary, for we need the grace of God as much for the sanctifying of a mercy as for the sanctifying of an affliction. 2nd. His prayers are accepted. "God will be favourable to him," and be well pleased with him; his anger shall be turned away from him, and the light of God's countenance shall shine upon his soul; and then it follows, 3rd. That he has the comfort of communion with God. He shall now see the face of God, which before was hid from him, and he shall see it with joy, for what sight can be more reviving? (see Gen. xxiii. 10, "As though I had seen the face of God.") All true penitents rejoice more in the returns of God's favour, than in any instance whatsoever of prosperity or pleasure, Ps. iv. 6, 7. 4th. He has a blessed tranquillity of mind, arising from the sense of his justification before God, who will render unto this man his righteousness. He shall receive the atonement; that is, the comfort of it, Rom. v. 11. Righteousness shall be imputed to him, and peace thereupon spoken, the joy and gladness of which he shall then be made to hear, though he could not hear it in the day of his affliction. God will now deal with him as a righteous man, with whom it shall be well. He shall "receive the blessing from the Lord, even righteousness," Ps. xxiv. 5. God shall give him grace to go and sin no more. Perhaps this may speak the reformation of his life after his recovery. As he shall pray unto God, whom before he had slighted, so he shall render to men his righteousness, whom before he had wronged, shall make restitution, and for the future do justly.

Fifthly. The general rule which God will go by, in dealing with the children of men, inferred from this instance, ver. 27, 28. As sick people upon their submission are recovered, so all others that truly repent of their sins, shall find mercy with God. See here, 1. What sin is, and what reason we have not to sin. Would we know the nature of sin, and the malignity of it, It is "the perverting of that which is right;" it is a most unjust, unreasonable thing; it is the rebellion of the creature against the Creator, the usurped dominion of the flesh over the spirit, and a contradiction to the eternal rules and reasons of good and evil; it is perverting the right ways of the Lord, Acts xiii. 10, and therefore the ways of sin are called crooked ways, Ps. cxxv. 5. Would we know what is to be got by sin? It profiteth us not. The works of darkness are unfruitful works. When profit and loss come to be balanced, all the gains of sin, put them all together, will come far short of countervailing the damage. All true penitents are ready to own this; and it is a mortifying consideration, Rom. vi. 21, "What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed?" 2. See what repentance is, and what reason we have to repent. Would we approve ourselves true penitents? we must then, with a broken and contrite heart, confess our sins to God, 1 Jno. i. 9. Confess the fact of sin, "I have sinned;" and not deny the charge, or stand upon our own justifixxxiii. 17. The sense is probably to withdraw man from doing what is wrong, and to hide pride from man. Some understand it to be, that God withdraws man from evil deeds, and from the pride which he secretly cherishes. The first explanation is to be preferred.

xxxiii. 22. "The destroyers" are literally "those who cause death," whence some critics have thought "angels of death" are intended. There is no objection to this if diseases and calamities, as messengers of death, are understood.

xxxiii. 23. Many explanations of this verse have been suggested. Elihu clearly refers to some person, or circumstance, on account of which the man whom he has described as reduced to the last extremity is restored to health and happiness. The Hebrew may be translated, "if there be for him an interceding angel, one among a thousand, to declare to the man his uprightness." The great question is, who is the interceding angel? For some of the answers to this we refer to the notes at the end of this book.

cation; confess the fault of sin, the iniquity, the dishonesty of it, "I have perverted that which was right;" the folly of sin, So foolish have I been and ignorant, for "it profiteth me not;" and, therefore, what have I to do any more with it? And is there not good reason why we should make such a penitent confession as this? for, 1st. God expects it; "He looks upon men" when they have sinned, to see what they will do next, whether they will go on in it, or whether they will bethink themselves and return. He hearkens and hears whether any say, What have I done? Jer. viii. 6. He looks upon sinners with an eye of compassion, desiring to hear this from them, for he has no pleasure in their ruin. He looks upon them, and as soon as he perceives these workings of repentance in them he encourageth them, and is ready to accept them, Ps. xxxii. 4, 5, as the father went forth to meet the returning prodigal. 2nd. It will turn to our unspeakable advantage. The promise is general; if any humble themselves thus, whoever they are, First. They shall not come into condemnation, but be saved from the wrath to come. "He shall deliver his soul from going into the pit," the pit of hell; iniquity shall not be his ruin. Secondly. They shall be happy in everlasting life and joy. "His life shall see the light;" that is, all good, in the vision and fruition of God. To obtain this bliss, "if the prophet had bid us do some great thing, would we not have done it? how much more when he only saith unto us, Wash and be clean?" confess and be pardoned, repent and be saved.

29 Lo, all these things
Worketh God oftentimes with man,
30 To bring back his soul from the pit,
To be enlightened with the light of the living
31 Mark well, O Job, hearken unto me:
Hold thy peace, and I will speak.
32 If thou hast any thing to say, answer me:
Speak, for I desire to justify thee
33 If not, hearken unto me:
Hold thy peace, and I shall teach thee wisdom.

We have here the conclusion of this first part of Elihu's discourse, in which, First. He briefly sums up what he had said, shewing that God's great and gracious design, in all the dispensations of his providence towards the children of men, is to save them from being for ever miserable, and bring them to be for ever happy; ver. 29, 30, all these things God is working with the children of men; dealing with them by conscience, by providences, by ministers, by mercies, by afflictions; makes them sick and makes them well again. All these are his operations; he hath set the one over against the other, Eccl. vii. 14; but his hand is in all: it is he that performeth all things for us. All providences are to be looked upon as God's workings with man, his strivings with him. He useth variety of methods to do men good; if one affliction do not do the work, he will try another; if neither do, he will try a mercy; will send a messenger to interpret both. He works such things as these oftentimes, twice, thrice; so it is in the original, referring to ver. 14, "He speaketh once, yea, twice;" if that prevail not, he worketh twice, yea, thrice; changes his method, "we have piped, we have mourned," returns again to the same method, repeats the same applications. And why doth he take all this pains with man? It is "to bring back his soul from the pit," ver. 30. If God did not take more care of us than we do of ourselves, we were miserable; we would destroy ourselves, but he would have us saved, and deviseth means by his grace to undo that by which we were undoing ourselves. The former method, by dream and vision, was to keep back the soul from the pit, ver. 18, that is, to prevent sin, that we might not fall into it. This, by sickness and the word, is to bring back the soul, to recover those that have fallen into sin, that they may not lie still and perish in it. And all that by repentance are brought back from the pit, it is that they may "be enlightened with the light of the living," that they may have present comfort and everlasting happiness. Whom God saves from sin and hell, which are darkness, he will bring to heaven, the inheritance of the saints in light; and this he aims at, this he drives at, in all his institutions, and all his dispensations. "Lord, what is man, that thou shouldest thus visit him!" This should engage us to comply with God's designs, to work with him for our own good, and not to counterwork him. And this will render those that perish for ever inexcusable, that so much was done to save them, and they would not be healed.

Secondly. He bespeaks Job's acceptance of what he had offered, and begs of him to mark it well, ver. 31. What is intended for our good challengeth our regard. And if Job will observe what is said, 1. He is welcome to make what objections he can against it; ver. 32, "If thou hast any thing to say" for thyself, in thine own vindication, "answer me;" though I am fresh, and thou art spent, I will not run thee down with words. "Speak, for I desire to justify thee," and am not as thy other friends, that desired to condemn thee. Elihu contends for truth, not, as they did, for victory. Note, Those we reprove, we should desire to justify, and be glad to see them clear themselves from the imputations they lie under, and therefore give them all possible advantage and encouragement to do it. 2. If he has nothing to say against what is said, Elihu lets him know that he has something more to say, which he desires him patiently to attend to; ver. 33, "Hold thy peace, and I will teach thee wisdom." Those that would both shew wisdom and learn wisdom must hearken and keep silence; be swift to hear and slow to speak. Job was wise and good; but those that are so may yet be wiser and better, and must therefore set themselves to improve by the means of wisdom and grace.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Elihu, it is likely, paused a while, to see if Job had anything to say against his discourse in the foregoing chapter: but he sitting silent, and it is likely intimating his desire that he would go on, he here proceeds; and, I. He bespeaks not only the audience, but the assistance of the company, ver. 2—4. II. He chargeth Job with some more indecent expressions, that had dropped from him, ver. 5—9. III. He undertakes to convince him that he had spoken amiss, by shewing very fully, 1. God's incontestable justice, ver. 10—12, 17, 19, 23. 2. His sovereign dominion, ver. 13—15. 3. His almighty power, ver. 20—24. 4. His omniscience, ver. 21, 22, 25. 5. His severity against sinners, ver. 26—28. 6. His overruling providence, ver. 29, 30. IV. He teacheth him what he should say, ver. 31, 32; and then, lastly, he leaves the matter to Job's own conscience, and concludes with a sharp reproof of him for his peevishness and discontent, ver. 33—37. And all this Job not only bore patiently, but took kindly, because he saw Elihu meant well: and whereas his other friends had accused him of that from which his own conscience acquitted him, Elihu charged him with that only for which, it is probable, his own heart, now upon the reflection, began to smite him.

FURTHERMORE Elihu answered and said,
2 Hear my words, O ye wise men;
And give ear unto me, ye that have knowledge.
3 For the ear trieth words,
As the mouth tasteth meat.
4 Let us choose to us judgment:
Let us know among ourselves what is good.
5 For Job hath said, I am righteous:
And God hath taken away my judgment.
6 Should I lie against my right?
My wound is incurable without transgression
7 What man is like Job,
Who drinketh up scorning like water?
8 Which goeth in company with the workers of iniquity,
And walketh with wicked men.
9 For he hath said, It profiteth a man nothing
That he should delight himself with God.

Here, First. Elihu humbly addresseth himself to the auditors, and endeavours, like an orator, to gain their good will and their favourable attention. 1. He calls them wise men, and men that had knowledge, ver. 2. It is comfortable dealing with such as understand sense. I speak as to wise men who can judge what I say, 1 Cor. x. 15. Elihu differed in opinion from them, and yet he calls them wise and knowing men. Peevish disputants think all fools that are not of their mind; but it is justice we owe to those who are wise, to acknowledge it, though our sentiments do not agree with theirs. 2. He appeals to their judgment, and therefore submits to their trial, ver. 3. The ear of the judicious tries words, whether what is said be true or false, right or wrong; and he that speaks must stand the test of the intelligent. As we must prove all things we hear, so we must be willing what we speak should be proved. 3. He takes them in partners with him in the examination and discussion of this matter, ver. 4. He doth not pretend to be sole dictator, nor undertake to say what is just and good, and what is not; but he is willing to join with them in searching it out, and desires a consultation. Let us agree to lay aside all animosities and feuds, all prejudices and affectation of contradiction, and all stiffness in adhering to the opinion we have once espoused, and let us choose to ourselves judgment; let us fix right principles on which to proceed, and then take right methods for finding out truth; and let us know among ourselves, by comparing notes and communicating our reasons, what is good and what is otherwise. Note, We are then likely to discern what is right, when we agree to assist one another in searching it out.

Secondly. He warmly accuseth Job for some passionate words which he had spoken, that reflected on the Divine government, appealing to the house, whether he ought not to be called to the bar, and checked for them.

1. He recites the words which Job had spoken, as near as he can remember. 1st. He had insisted upon his own innocency; "Job hath said, I am righteous," ver. 5; and when urged to confess his guilt, has stiffly maintained his plea of not guilty. "Should I lie against my right?" ver. 6. Job had spoken to this purpose, ch. xxvii. 6, "My righteousness I hold fast." 2nd. He had charged God with injustice in his dealings with him, that he had wronged him in afflicting him, and had not righted him: "God has taken away my judgment;" so Job had said, ch xxvii. 2. 3rd. He had despaired of relief, and concluded that God could not or would not help him; "My wound is incurable," and likely to be mortal, and yet "without transgression; not for any injustice in my hand," ch. xvi. 16, 17. 4th. He had in effect said, that there is nothing to be got in the service of God, and that no man will be the better at last for his religion; ver. 9, "He hath said" that which gives occasion to suspect that he thinks, "it profiteth a man nothing that he shall delight himself with God." It is granted that there is a present pleasure in religion; for what is it but to delight ourselves with God? in communion with him, in concurrence with him, in walking with him as Enoch did? This is a true notion of religion, and speaks its ways to be pleasantness. And yet the advantage of it is denied, as if it were vain to serve God, Mal. iii. 14. This Elihu gathers as Job's opinion, by an innuendo from what he said, ch. ix. 22, "He destroys the perfect and the wicked," which has a truth in it, for all things come alike to all; but it was ill expressed, and gave too much occasion for this imputation, and therefore Job sat down silent under it, and attempted not his own vindication; whence Mr. Caryl well observes, that good men sometimes speak worse than they mean. And that a good man will rather bear more blame than he deserves than stand to excuse himself when he hath deserved any blame.

2. He chargeth Job very high upon it. In general, "what man is like Job?" ver. 7. Did you ever know such a man as Job, or ever hear a man talk at such an extravagant rate? He represents him, 1st. As sitting in the seat of the scorntful. He "drinketh up scorning like water;" that is, he takes a great deal of liberty to reproach both God and his friends, takes a pleasure in it, and is very liberal in his reflections. Or, he is very greedy in receiving and hearkening to the scorns and contempts which others cast upon their brethren; is well pleased with them, and cries them up. Or, as some explain it, by these foolish expressions of his he makes himself the object of scorn, lays himself very open to reproach, and gives occasion to others to laugh at him; while his religion suffers by it, and the reputation of that is wounded through his side. We have need to pray that God will never leave us to ourselves, to say or do any thing which may make us a reproach to the foolish, Ps. xxxix. 8. 2nd. As walking in the course of the ungodly, and standing in the way of sinners. He "goes in company with the workers of iniquity," ver. 8; not that in his conversation he did associate with them, but in his opinion he did favour and countenance them, and strengthen their hands. If (as it follows, ver. 9, for the proof of this) "it profits a man nothing to delight himself in God," why should he not lay the reins in the neck of his lusts, and herd himself with the workers of iniquity? He that saith, he hath cleansed his hands in vain, doth not only offend against the generation of God's children, Ps. lxxiii. 13, 14, but gratifies his enemies, and saith as they say.

10 Therefore hearken unto me, ye men of understanding:
Far be it from God, that he should do wickedness;
And from the Almighty, that he should commit iniquity.

xxxiii. 24. For "ransom," in the text, our translators have put "atonement" in the margin, the Hebrew word being the one commonly so rendered in the Pentateuch. It has been very much disputed whether there is any reference here, by anticipation, to the atonement of Christ. Albert Barnes says, "The general truth that God was merciful, and that the repentance of the sick man would be followed by a release from suffering, was all that can reasonably be supposed to have been understood at that period of the world."

xxxiii. 27. "He"—that is, God—"looketh upon men," &c.: although very much debated, the authorised version is not to be wholly rejected. The words, "He looketh upon men," are by some applied to the person who was sick but is recovered. Thus: "He looks round upon men, and says, I had sinned and perverted right, but am not requited as I deserve." Others, "now sings he joyfully among men," &c.; "he shall sit among men," &c.; "he shall fully consider or pronounce right to men," &c. If the Hebrew points

11 For the work of a man shall he render unto him,
And cause every man to find according to his ways.
12 Yea, surely God will not do wickedly,
Neither will the Almighty pervert judgment.
13 Who hath given him a charge over the earth?
Or who hath disposed the whole world?
14 If he set his heart upon man,
If he gather unto himself his spirit and his breath;
15 All flesh shall perish together,
And man shall turn again unto dust.

The scope of Elihu's discourse is to reconcile Job to his afflictions, and to pacify his spirit under them. In order to this he had shewed, in the foregoing chapter, that God meant him no hurt in afflicting him, but intended it for his spiritual benefit. In this chapter he shews that he did him no wrong in afflicting him, nor punished him more than he deserved. If the former could not prevail to satisfy him, yet this ought to silence him. In these verses he directs his discourse to all the company; "Hearken to me ye men of understanding," ver. 10, and shew yourselves to be intelligent by assenting to this which I say. And this is that which he saith, that the righteous God never did, nor ever will, do any wrong to any of his creatures; but his ways are equal, ours are unequal. The truth here maintained is the justice and equity of all God's proceedings. Now observe in these verses,

First. How plainly this truth is laid down, both negatively and positively. 1. He doth wrong to none. God cannot do wickedness, nor the Almighty commit iniquity, ver. 10. It is inconsistent with the perfection of his nature, and so it is also with the purity of his will; ver. 12, "God will not do wickedly, neither will the Almighty pervert judgment." He neither can nor will do an ill thing, nor deal hardly with any man. He will never inflict the evil of punishment but where he finds the evil of sin, nor in any undue proportion; for that would be to commit iniquity, and do wickedly. If appeals be made to him, or he be to give a definitive sentence, he will have an eye to the merits of the cause, and not respect the person; for that were to pervert judgment. He will never either do any man wrong or deny any man right; but "the heavens will shortly declare his righteousness." Because he is God, and therefore is infinitely perfect and holy, he can neither do ill himself nor countenance it in others, no more than he can either die, or lie, or deny himself. Though he be almighty, yet he never useth his power, as mighty men often do, for the support of injustice. He is Shaddai, God all-sufficient, and therefore he cannot be tempted with evil, Jas. i. 13, to do an unrighteous thing. 2. He ministers justice to all; ver. 11, "The work of a man shall he render unto him." Good works shall be rewarded, and evil works either punished or satisfied for; so that, sooner or later, in this world or in that to come, he "will cause every man to find according to his ways." This is the standing rule of distributive justice, to give to every man according to his work, "Say to the righteous it shall be well with them; woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with him." If services persevered in now go unrewarded, and sins persisted in now go unpunished, yet there is a day coming when God will fully render to every man according to his works, with interest for the delay.

Secondly. How warmly it is asserted. 1. With an assurance of the truth of it; "yea, surely," ver. 12. It is a truth which none can deny, or call in question; it is what we may take for granted, and are all agreed in, that "God will not do wickedly." 2. With an abhorrence of the very thought of the contrary; ver. 10, "Far be it from God that he should do wickedness," and from us that we should imagine such a thing, that we should entertain the least suspicion of it, or say any thing that looks like charging him with it.

Thirdly. How evidently it is proved, by two arguments:

1. His independent, absolute sovereignty and dominion; ver. 13, "Who hath given him a charge over the earth," and deputed him to manage the affairs of men upon the earth? Or, who but he hath disposed the whole world of mankind? He hath the sole administration of the kingdoms of men, and has it of himself, nor is he intrusted with it by or for any other. 1st. It is certain the government is his, and he doth according to his will in all the hosts both of heaven and earth; and therefore he is not to be charged with injustice; for, "shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Gen. xviii. 25. How shall God either rule or judge the world, if there be or could be any unrighteousness with him? Rom. iii. 5, 6. He that is entitled to such an unlimited power must certainly have in himself an unspotted purity. This is also a good reason why we should acquiesce in all God's dealings with us. Shall not he that disposeth of the whole world dispose of us and our concerns? 2nd. It is as certain that he doth not derive his power from any, nor is it a dispensation that is committed to him, but his power is original and, like his being, of himself; and therefore if he were not perfectly just all the world and the affairs of it would soon be in the utmost confusion. The highest powers on earth have a God above them to whom they are accountable, because it is not far from them to do iniquity. But, therefore, God has none above him, because it is not possible he should do any thing (such is the perfection of his nature) that should need to be controlled. And if he be an absolute Sovereign, we are bound to submit to him; for there is no higher power to which we may appeal, so that the virtue is a necessity.

2. His irresistible power, ver. 14. "If he set his heart upon man," to contend with him, much more if, as some read it, he set his heart against man to ruin him, if he should deal with man either by summa potestas,—'mere sovereignty,' or by summum jus,—'strict justice,' there were no standing before him; man's spirit and breath would soon be gone, and all flesh would perish together, ver. 15. Many men's honesty is owing purely to their impotency; they do not do wrong, because they cannot support it when it is done, or it is not in their power to do it. But God is able to crush any man, easily and suddenly, and yet doth not by arbitrary power crush any man; which, therefore, must be attributed to the infinite perfection of his nature, and that is immutable. See here, 1st. What God can do with us; he can soon bring us to dust. There needs not any positive act of his omnipotence to do it; if he do but withdraw that concurrence of his providence by which we live, if he gather unto himself that spirit and breath which was from his hand at first, and is still in his hand, we expire immediately, like an animal in an air pump when the air is exhausted. 2nd. What he may do with us without doing us any wrong. He may recall the being he gave, of which we are but tenants at will, and which also we have forfeited; and therefore as long as that is continued, of his mere favour, we have no reason to cry out of wrong, whatever other comforts are removed.

16 If now thou hast understanding, hear this:
Hearken to the voice of my words.
17 Shall even he that hateth right govern?
And wilt thou condemn him that is most just?
18 Is it fit to say to a king, Thou art wicked?
And to princes, Ye are ungodly? [princes,
19 How much less to him that accepteth not the persons of Nor regardeth the rich more than the poor?
For they all are the work of his hands.
20 In a moment shall they die, [away:
And the people shall be troubled at midnight, and pass
And the mighty shall be taken away without hand.
21 For his eyes are upon the ways of man,
And he seeth all his goings.
22 There is no darkness, nor shadow of death,
Where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves.
23 For he will not lay upon man more than right;
That he should enter into judgment with God.
24 He shall break in pieces mighty men without number,
And set others in their stead.
25 Therefore he knoweth their works, [destroyed.
And he overturneth them in the night, so that they are 26 He striketh them as wicked men
In the open sight of others;
27 Because they turned back from him,
And would not consider any of his ways:
28 So that they cause the cry of the poor to come unto him,
And he heareth the cry of the afflicted.
29 When he giveth quietness, who then can make trouble?
And when he hideth his face, who then can behold him?
Whether it be done against a nation, or against a man 30 That the hypocrite reign not, [only:
Lest the people be ensnared.

Elihu here applies himself more directly to Job. He had spoken to the rest, ver. 10, as men of understanding. Now, speaking to Job, he puts an if upon his understanding: "If thou hast understanding, hear this," and observe it, ver. 16.

First. Hear this, that God is not to be quarrelled with for any thing that he doth. It is daring presumption to arraign and condemn God's proceedings, as Job had done by his discontents. It was, 1. As absurd as it would be to advance one to power that is a professed enemy to justice; "Shall even he that hateth right govern?" ver. 17. The righteous Lord so loveth righteousness, that, in comparison with him, even Job himself, though a perfect and upright man, might be said to hate right, and shall he govern? Shall he pretend to direct God, or correct what he doth? Shall such unrighteous creatures as we are give law to the righteous God? Or, must he take his measures from us? When we consider the corruption of our nature, and the contrariety there is in us to the eternal rule of equity, we cannot but see it an impudent, impious thing for us to prescribe to God. 2. It was as absurd as it would be to call a most righteous, innocent person to the bar, and to give judgment against him, though it appeared never so plain upon the trial that he was most just. Wilt thou condemn him that is righteous in all his ways, and cannot but be so? 3. It is more absurd and unbecoming than it would be to say to a sovereign prince, "Thou art wicked;" and to judges upon the bench, "Ye are ungodly," ver. 18. This would be looked upon as an insufferable affront to majesty, and to magistracy. No king, no prince, would bear it. In favour of government we presume it is a right sentence that is past, unless the contrary be very evident; but whatever we think, it is not fit to tell a king to his face that he is wicked: Nathan reproved David by a parable. Or, whatever a high priest or a prophet might do, it is not for an ordinary subject to make so bold with the powers that are. How absurd is it then to say so to God! To impute iniquity to him who, having no respect of persons, is in no temptation to do an unjust thing; ver. 19, "He regardeth not the rich more than the poor," and therefore it is fit he should rule, and it is not fit we should find fault with him. Note, Rich and poor stand upon the same level before God. A great man shall fare never the better, nor find any favour, for his wealth and greatness; nor shall a poor man fare ever the worse for his poverty, nor an honest cause be starved. Job, now he was poor, should have as much favour with God, and be as much regarded by him as when he was rich; for they all are the work of his hands. Their persons are so; the poor are made by the same hand, and of the same mould with the rich. Their conditions are so; the poor were made poor by the Divine providence, as well as the rich made rich; and therefore the poor shall fare never the worse for that which is their lot, not their fault.

Secondly. Hear this, That God is to be acknowledged and submitted to in all that he doth. Divers considerations Elihu here suggests to Job, to beget in him great and high thoughts of God, and so to persuade him to knock under, and proceed no farther in his quarrel with him.

1. God is almighty, and able to deal with the strongest of men, when he enters into judgment with them, ver. 20; even the people, the body of a nation, though never so numerous, shall be troubled, unhinged, and put into disorder, when God pleaseth. Even the mighty man, the prince, though never so honourable, never so formidable among men, yet, if God speak the word, shall be taken away, out of his throne, nay, out of the land of the living; they shall die, they shall pass away. What cannot he do that has all the powers of death at his command? Observe the suddenness of this destruction: "In a moment shall they die." It is not a work of time with God to bring down his proud enemies, but when he pleaseth it is soon done. Nor is he bound to give them warning, no, not an hour's warning: "This night thy soul shall be required." Observe the season of it; they shall be troubled at midnight, when they are secure and are to be followed, we must translate the first verb either "he will look" or "he will sing." We prefer the former, and render the whole, "He will look upon men, and will say, I sinned and perverted uprightness, and it was not requited unto me."

xxxiii. 28. In accordance with the translation just given, the text of this verse reads, "He redeemed my soul from going down into the pit, and my life shall see light."

xxxiv. 10. The translation of this verse may be much shortened: "Therefore hear me, men of understanding: far be wickedness from God, and evil from the Almighty."

xxxiv. 14. The sense is, "If he set his heart upon himself, and took back to himself his spirit and his breath." That is, "If God only considered His own claims, and took again the spirit and breath which He had given," all men would perish, and return to dust.

xxxiv. 17. Translate, "Shall even the hater of judgment govern, and wilt thou condemn the Just and Mighty One?"

careless, and unable to help themselves, as the Egyptians when their firstborn were slain. And this is the immediate work of God, they are taken away without hand, insensibly, by secret judgments. God can himself humble the greatest tyrant, without the assistance or agency of any man. Whatever hand he sometimes useth in the accomplishing of his purposes, he needs none, but can do it without hand. Nor is it one single mighty man only that he can thus overpower, but even hosts of them; ver. 24, "He shall break in pieces mighty men without number;" for no combined power can stand it out against Omnipotence. Yet when God destroys tyranny, he doth not design anarchy; if those are brought down that ruled ill, it doth not therefore follow that people must have no rulers; for when he breaks mighty men, yet he sets others in their stead, that will rule better; or, if they do not, he overturns them also in the night, or in a night, so that they are destroyed, ver. 25; witness Belshazzar. Or, if he designs them space to repent, he doth not presently destroy them, but "he strikes them as wicked men," ver. 26; some humbling, mortifying judgments are brought upon them. These wicked rulers are stricken as other wicked men; as surely, as sorely stricken in their bodies, estates, or families, and this for warning to their neighbours. The stroke is given in terrorem,—as an alarm to others, and therefore is given "in the open sight of others," that they also may see and fear, and tremble before the justice of God. If kings stand not before him, how shall we stand?

2. God is omniscient, and can discover that which is most secret. As the strongest cannot oppose his arm, so the most subtle cannot escape his eye; and therefore if some are punished either more or less than we think they should be, instead of quarrelling with God, it becomes us to ascribe it to some secret cause known to God only. For, 1st. Every thing is open before him, ver. 22. "His eyes are upon the ways of man." Not only they are within reach of his eye, so that he can see them, but his eye is upon them, so that he actually observes and inspects them. He sees us all, and sees all our goings; go whither we will, we are under his eye; all our actions, good and evil, are regarded and recorded, and reserved to be brought into judgment when the books shall be opened. 2nd. Nothing is or can be concealed from him; ver. 22. "There is no darkness nor shadow of death," so close, so thick, so solitary, so remote from light or sight, as that in it the workers of iniquity may hide themselves from the discovering eye and avenging hand of the righteous God. Observe here, First. The workers of iniquity would hide themselves, if they could, from the eye of the world for shame, (and that perhaps they may do,) and from the eye of God for fear, as Adam among the trees of the garden. The day is coming when mighty men, and chief captains, will call to the rocks and mountains to hide them. Secondly. They would gladly be hid even by the shadow of death, be hid in the grave, and lie for ever there, rather than appear before the judgment-seat of Christ. Thirdly. It is in vain to think of flying from God's justice, or absconding when his wrath is in pursuit of us. The workers of iniquity may find ways and means to hide themselves from men, but not from God. "He knows their works," ver. 25, both what they do, and what they design.

3. God is righteous, and in all his proceedings goes according to the rules of equity. Even then when he is overturning mighty men, and breaking them in pieces, yet "he will not lay upon man more than right," ver. 23. As he will not punish the innocent, so he will not exact of those that are guilty more than their iniquities deserve; and of the proportion between the sin and the punishment Infinite Wisdom shall be the judge. He will not give any man cause to complain that he deals hardly with him, nor shall any man enter into judgment with God, or bring an action against him. If he do, God will be justified when he speaks, and clear when he judgeth. Therefore Job was very much to be blamed for his complaints of God, and is here well advised to let fall his action, for he would certainly be cast, or nonsuited. 'It is not for man ever to purpose to enter into judgment with the Omnipotent;' so some read the whole verse. Job had often wished to plead his cause before God. To what purpose? saith Elihu; the judgment already given concerning thee will certainly be affirmed; no errors can be found in it, nor any exceptions taken to it, but after all it must rest as it is. All is well that God doth, and will be found so.

To prove that God when he destroys the mighty men, and strikes them as wicked men, yet doth not lay upon them more than right, he shews what their wickedness was, ver. 27, 28; and let any compare that with their punishment, and then judge whether they did not deserve it. In short, these unjust judges whom God will justly judge, neither feared God, nor regarded man, Lu. xviii. 2. 1st. They were rebels to God. They turned back from him, cast off the fear of him, and abandoned the very thoughts of him; for they would not consider any of his ways, took no heed either to his precepts or to his providences, but lived without God in the world. This is at the bottom of all the wickedness of the wicked, they turn back from God; and it is because they do not consider,—not because they cannot, but they will not. From inconsideration comes impiety, and from thence all immorality. 2nd. They were tyrants to all mankind, ver. 28. They will not call upon God for themselves; but they "cause the cry of the poor to come to him," and that cry is against them. They are injurious and oppressive to the poor, wrong them, crush them, impoverish them yet more, and add affliction to the afflicted, who cry unto God, make their complaint to him, and he hears them, and pleads their cause. Their case is bad that have the prayers and tears of the poor against them, for the cry of the oppressed will sooner or later draw down vengeance on the heads of the oppressors, and no one can say that this is more than right, Ex. xxii. 23.

4. God hath an uncontrollable dominion in all the affairs of the children of men, and so guides and governs whatever concerns both communities and particular persons, that, as what he designs cannot be defeated, so what he doth cannot be changed, ver. 29. Observe, 1st. The frowns of all the world cannot trouble those whom God quiets with his smiles. "When he giveth quietness, who then can make trouble?" Which is a challenge to all the powers of hell and earth to disquiet those to whom God speaks peace, and for whom he creates it. If God give outward peace to a nation, he can secure what he gives, and disable the enemies of it to give it any disturbance. If God give inward peace to a man only, that quietness and everlasting assurance which is the effect of righteousness, neither the accusations of Satan nor the afflictions of this present time, no, nor the arrests of death itself, can give trouble. What can make them uneasy whose souls dwell at ease in God? see Phil. iv. 7. 2nd. The smiles of all the world cannot quiet those whom God troubles with his frowns. For if he in displeasure hide his face, and withhold the comfort of his favour, who then can behold him! that is, who can behold a displeased God so as to bear up under his wrath, or turn it away? Who can make him shew his face when he resolves to hide it, or see through the clouds and darkness which are round about him? Or, who can behold a disquieted sinner so as to give him effectual relief? Who can stand a friend to him to whom God is an enemy? None can relieve the distresses of the outward condition without God. "If the Lord do not help thee, whence shall I?" 2 Kin. vi. 27. Nor can any relieve the distresses of the mind against God and his terrors. If he impress the sense of his wrath upon a guilty conscience, all the comforts the creature can administer are ineffectual; "as vinegar upon nitre, so are songs to a heavy heart." The irresistibleness of God's operations must be acknowledged in his dealings both with communities and with particular persons. What he doth cannot be controlled, whether it be done against a nation in its public capacity, or against a man only in his private affairs. The same Providence that governs mighty kingdoms, presides in the concerns of the meanest individual; and neither the strength of a whole nation can resist his power, nor the smallness of a single person evade his cognizance; but what he doth shall be done effectually and victoriously.

5. God is wise, and careful of the public welfare, and therefore provides "that the hypocrite reign not, lest the people be ensnared," ver. 30. See here, 1st. The pride of hypocrites. They aim to reign; the praise of men and power in the world is their reward; it is what they aim at. 2nd. The policy of tyrants. When they aim to set up themselves, they sometimes make use of religion as a cloak and cover for their ambition, and by their hypocrisy come to reign. 3rd. The danger the people are in when hypocrites reign. They are likely to be ensnared in sin or trouble, or both. Power in the hands of dissemblers is often destructive to the rights and liberties of a people, which they are more easily wheedled out of than forced out of. And a great deal of mischief has been done likewise to the power of godliness under the pretence of a form of godliness. 4th. The care which Divine providence takes of the people to prevent this danger, that the hypocrite reign not; either that he do not reign at all or that he do not reign long. If God has mercy in store for a people, he will either prevent the rise or hasten the ruin of hypocritical rulers.

31 Surely it is meet to be said unto God,
I have borne chastisement, I will not offend any more:
32 That which I see not teach thou me:
If I have done iniquity, I will do no more.
33 Should it be according to thy mind? he will recompense [it,
Whether thou refuse, or whether thou choose; and not I.
Therefore speak what thou knowest.
34 Let men of understanding tell me,
And let a wise man hearken unto me
35 Job hath spoken without knowledge,
And his words were without wisdom.
36 My desire is that Job may be tried unto the end
Because of his answers for wicked men
37 For he addeth rebellion unto his sin,
He clappeth his hands among us,
And multiplieth his words against God.

In these verses,

First. Elihu instructs Job what he should say under his affliction, ver. 31, 32. Having reproved him for his peevish passionate words, here he puts better words into his mouth. When we reprove for what is amiss, we must direct to what is good. Those are reproofs of instruction, Pr. vi. 23. He doth not impose it upon Job to use these words, but recommends it to him, as that which was meet to be said. And in general he would have him repent of his ill carriage and indecent expressions under his affliction. Job's other friends would have had him own himself an ill man, and by overdoing they undid. Elihu will oblige him only to own that he had in the management of this controversy spoken unadvisedly with his lips. Let us remember this in giving reproofs, and not make the matter worse than it is; for the stretching of the crime may defeat the prosecution. Elihu drives the right nail, and speeds accordingly. He directs Job,

1. To humble himself before God for his sins, and to accept the punishment of them. "I have borne chastisement." What I suffer comes justly upon me, and therefore I will bear it, and not only justify God in it, but acknowledge his goodness. Many are chastised that do not bear chastisement, do not bear it well, and so in effect do not bear it at all. Penitents, if sincere, will take all well that God doth, and will bear chastisement as a medicinal operation intended for good.

2. To pray to God to discover his sins to him; ver. 32, "That which I see not teach thou me." Lord, upon the review, I find much amiss in me, and much done amiss by me, but I have reason to fear there is much more that I am not aware of; greater abominations which through ignorance, mistake, and partiality to myself, I do not yet see. Lord, give me to see it, awaken my conscience to do its office faithfully. A good man is willing to know the worst by himself, and particularly under affliction, desires to be told wherefore God contends with him, and what God designs in correcting him.

3. To promise reformation; ver. 31, "I will not offend any more;" and, ver. 32, "If I have done iniquity," (or seeing I have,) "I will do no more;" whatever thou shalt discover to me to have been amiss, by thy grace I will amend it for the future. This implies a confession that we have offended, true remorse and godly sorrow for the offence, and an humble compliance with God's design in afflicting us, which is to part between us and our sins. The penitent here completes his repentance; for it is not enough to be sorry for our sins, but we must go and sin no more, and, as here, bind ourselves with the bond of a fixed resolution never more to return to folly. This is meet to be said in a stedfast purpose, and meet to be said to God in a solemn promise and vow.

Secondly. He reasons with him concerning his discontent and uneasiness under his affliction, ver. 33. We are ready to think every thing that concerns us should be just as we would have it; but Elihu here shews, 1. That it is absurd and unreasonable to expect it; "Should it be according to thy mind?" No, what reason for that? Elihu here speaks with a great deference to the Divine will and wisdom, and a satisfaction therein: It is highly fit every thing should be according to God's mind; and with a just disdain of the pretensions of those that are proud, and would be their own carvers, "Should it be according to thy mind?" Must we always have the good we have a mind to enjoy? We should then wrongfully encroach upon others, and foolishly ensnare ourselves. Must we never be afflicted, because we have no mind to it? Is it fit that sinners should feel no smart, that scholars should be under no discipline? or, if we must be afflicted, is it fit we should choose what rod we will be beaten with? No, it is fit every thing should be according to God's mind, and not ours, for he is the Creator, and we are creatures; he is infinitely wise and knowing, we are foolish and short-sighted; he is in one mind, we are in many. 2. That it is vain, and to no purpose to expect it. "He will recompense it, whether thou refuse, or whether thou choose." God will take his own way, fulfil his own counsel, and recompense according to the sentence of his own xxxiv. 23. This verse may mean that God will not over-burden man, or require of him more than he can bear. Rodwell renders it, "For El need not long observe man, that He should come into judgment with him," but he admits the other explanation into the margin. Umbreit, Rosenmüller, and others generally accord with Rodwell's version, and under all the circumstances we prefer its main idea, which is that God needs not long to observe a man, or consider his conduct, to find reasons for bringing him into judgment with Himself.

xxxiv. 26. Besides our version, there are others more or less different in meaning. Fürst renders the first clause, "In the place of evil-doers He chastises them;" Delitzsch, "He smiteth them after the manner of evil-doers;" Rodwell, "Because they are wicked, He claps his hands at them." We may render the verse, "Because they are wicked, He chastises them in the place where men see," that is, openly and publicly.

xxxiv. 33. Another disputed rendering. The sense appears to be, justice, whether thou art pleased or displeased, he will neither ask thy leave nor ask thy advice, but what he pleaseth that he will do; it is therefore thy wisdom to be easy, and make a virtue of necessity. Make the best of that which is, because it is out of thy power to make it otherwise. If thou pretend to choose and refuse, that is, to prescribe to God, and except against what he doth, so will not I,—I will acquiesce in all he doth; and, therefore, speak what thou knowest, say what thou wilt do, whether thou wilt oppose or submit. The matter lies plain before thee; be at a point; thou art in God's hand, not in mine.

Thirdly. He appeals to all intelligent, indifferent persons whether there was not a great deal of sin and folly in that which Job said. 1. He would have the matter thoroughly examined and brought to an issue; ver. 36, "My desire is that Job may be tried unto the end." If any will undertake to justify what he has said, let them do it; if not, let us all agree to bear our testimony against it. Many understand it of his trial by afflictions; Let his troubles be continued till he be thoroughly humbled, and his proud spirit brought down, till he be made to see his error, and to retract what he hath so presumptuously said against God and his providence. Let the trial be continued till the end be obtained. 2. He appeals both to God and man, and desires the judgment of both upon it. 1st. Some read verse 36 as an appeal to God: 'O my Father, let Job be tried.' So the margin of our Bibles, for the same word signifies 'my desire' and 'my father;' and some suppose, he lifted up his eyes when he said this, meaning, 'O Father which art in heaven, let Job be tried till he be subdued.' When we are praying for the benefit of afflictions either to ourselves or others, we must eye God as a father, because they are fatherly corrections and a part of our filial education, Heb. xii. 7. 2nd. He appeals to the bystanders; ver. 34, "Let men of understanding tell me," whether they can put any more favourable construction upon Job's words than I have put, and whether he has not spoken very ill, and ought not to cry peccavi. In what Job had said, he thought it appeared, First. That he did not rightly understand himself, but had talked foolishly, ver. 35. He cannot say that Job is without knowledge and wisdom, but in this matter he "hath spoken without knowledge," and whatever his heart is, his words were without prudence. What he said to his wife may be retorted upon himself, (he speaks as one of the foolish men speak, and for the same reason,) Shall we not receive evil as well as good at God's hand? ch. ii. 10. Sometimes we need and deserve those reproofs ourselves which we have given to others. Those that reproach God's wisdom really reproach their own. Secondly. That he had not a due regard to God, but had talked wickedly. If what he has said be tried to the end, that is, if one would put it to the utmost stretch, and make the worst of it, it would be found, 1*st.* That he had taken part with God's enemies. His answers were for wicked men, that is, what he had said tended to strengthen the hands and harden the hearts of wicked people in their wickedness, in having carried the matter of their prosperity much farther than he needed. Let wicked men, like Baal, plead for themselves if they will; but far be it from us that we should answer for them, or say any thing in favour of them. 2*nd.* That he had insulted God's friends, and lectored over them. "He clappeth his hands among us," and, if he be not thoroughly tried and humbled, will grow yet more insolent and imperious, as if he had gotten the day, and silenced us all. To speak ill is bad enough, but to clap our hands and triumph in it when we have done, as if error and passion had won the victory, is much worse. 3*rd.* That he spoke against God himself, and by standing to what he had said, "added rebellion to his sin." To speak though but one word against God, by whom we speak and for whom we ought to speak, is a great sin; what is it then to multiply words against him, as if we would out-talk him? what is it to repeat them instead of unsaying them? Those that have sinned, and when they are called to repent, thus go on frowardly, add rebellion to their sin, and make it exceeding sinful; errare possum, hæreticus esse nolo,—'I may fall into error, but I will not plunge into heresy.'

CHAPTER XXXV.

Job being still silent, Elihu follows his blow, and here, a third time, undertakes to shew him that he had spoken amiss, and ought to recant. Three ill sayings he here chargeth him with, and returns answer to them distinctly: I. He had represented religion as an indifferent, unprofitable thing, which God enjoins for his own sake, not for ours, the contrary to which Elihu makes out, ver. 1—8. II. He had complained of God as deaf to the cries of the oppressed, against which imputation Elihu here justifies God, ver. 9—13. III. He had despaired of the return of God's favour to him, because it was so long defe..d: but Elihu shews him the true cause of the delay, ver. 14—16.

ELIHU spake moreover, and said,
2 Thinkest thou this to be right, that thou saidst,
My righteousness is more than God's?
3 For thou saidst, What advantage will it be unto thee?
And, What profit shall I have, if I be cleansed from my [sin?
4 I will answer thee,
And thy companions with thee
5 Look unto the heavens, and see;
And behold the clouds which are higher than thou.
6 If thou sinnest, what doest thou against him?
Or if thy transgressions be multiplied, what doest thou unto him?
7 If thou be righteous, what givest thou him?
Or what receiveth he of thine hand?
8 Thy wickedness may hurt a man as thou art;
And thy righteousness may profit the son of man.

We have here,

First. The bad words which Elihu chargeth upon Job, ver. 2, 3. To evince the badness of them he appeals to himself and his own sober thoughts in the reflection; "Thinkest thou this to be right?" This intimates, 1. Elihu's confidence that the reproof he now gave was just, for he could refer the judgment of it even to Job himself. They that have truth and equity on their side sooner or later will have every man's conscience on their side. 2. His good opinion of Job, that he thought better than he spoke, and that, though he had spoken amiss, yet when he perceived his mistake, he would not stand to it. What we have said in our haste that was not right, it becomes us to own that our second thoughts convince us it was wrong. Two things Elihu here reproves Job for:

1st. For justifying himself more than God, which was the thing that first provoked him, ch. xxxii. 2. Thou hast in effect said, "My righteousness is more than God's," that is, I have done more for God than ever he did for me; so that when the accounts are balanced he will be brought in debtor to me. As if Job thought his services had been paid less than they deserved, and his sins punished more than they deserved, which is a most unjust and wicked thought for any man to harbour, and especially to utter. When Job insisted so much upon his own integrity, and the severity of God's dealings with him, he did in effect say, "My righteousness is more than God's;" whereas, though we be never so good, and our afflictions never so great, we are chargeable with unrighteousness, and God is not.

2nd. For disowning the benefits and advantages of religion, because he suffers these things. "What profit shall I have, if I be cleansed from my sin?" ver. 3. This is gathered from ch. ix. 30, 31, "Though I make my hands never so clean," what the nearer am I? "Thou shalt plunge me in the ditch;" and ch. x. 15, "If I be wicked, woe to me;" but if I be righteous, it is all one. The psalmist, when he compared his own afflictions with the prosperity of the wicked, was tempted to say, "Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain," Ps. lxxiii. 13; and, if Job said so, he did in effect say, "My righteousness is more than God's," ver. 2; for if he got nothing by his religion, God was more beholden to him than he was to God; but, though there might be some colour for it, yet it was not fair to charge these words upon Job when he himself had made them the wicked words of prospering sinners; ch. xxi. 15, "What profit shall we have if we pray to him?" and had immediately disclaimed them, ver. 16, "The counsel of the wicked is far from me." It is not a fair way of disputing to charge men with those consequences of their opinions which they expressly renounce.

Secondly. The good answer which Elihu gives to this; ver. 4, "I will" undertake to "answer thee, and thy companions with thee;" that is, all those that approve thy sayings, and are ready to justify thee in them, and all others that say as thou sayest; I have that to offer which will silence them all. To do this he has recourse to his old maxim; ch. xxxiii. 12, "That God is greater than man." That is a truth which, if duly improved, will serve many good purposes; and this particularly, to prove that God is debtor to no man. The greatest of men may be a debtor to the meanest, but such is the infinite disproportion between God and man, that the great God cannot possibly receive any benefit by man; and therefore cannot be supposed to lie under any obligation to man, for, if he be obliged by his purpose and promise, it is only to himself. That is a challenge which no man can take up; Rom. xi. 35, "Who hath first given to God," let him prove it, "and it shall be recompensed to him again." Why should we demand it as a just debt to gain by our religion, as Job seemed to do, when the God we serve doth not gain by it?

1. Elihu needs not prove that God is above man. It is agreed by all, but he endeavours to affect Job and us with it by an ocular demonstration of the height of the heavens and the clouds, ver. 5. They are far above us, and God is far above them, how much then is he set out of the reach either of our sins or of our services! "Look unto the heavens, and behold the clouds." God made man 'to look upwards,'—cœlumque tueri jussit. Idolaters looked up to heaven, and worshipped the hosts of heaven, the sun, moon, and stars; but we must look up to heaven, and worship the Lord of those hosts. They are higher than we, but God is infinitely above them. His glory is above the heavens, Ps. viii. 1; and the knowledge of him higher than heaven, ch. xi. 8.

2. But from thence he infers that God is not affected, either one way or other, by any thing that we do.

1st. He owns that men may be bettered or damaged by what we do; ver. 8, "Thy wickedness" perhaps "may hurt a man as thou art," may occasion him trouble in his outward concerns; a wicked man may wound, or rob, or slander his neighbour, or may draw him into sin, and so prejudice his soul. Thy righteousness, thy justice, thy charity, thy wisdom, thy piety, may perhaps profit the son of man; our goodness extends to the saints that are in the earth, Ps. xvi. 3. To men like ourselves we are in a capacity either of doing injury, or of shewing kindness; and in both these the sovereign Lord and Judge of all will interest himself, will reward those that do good, and punish those that do hurt to their fellow-creatures and fellow-subjects. But,

2nd. He utterly denies that God can really be either prejudiced or advantaged by what any, even the greatest of all the men of the East, do or can do.

First. The sins of the worst sinners are no damage to him; ver. 6, "If thou sinnest;" wilfully, and of malice prepense, and designedly against him, with a high hand; nay, "if thy transgressions be multiplied," and the acts of sin be never so often repeated, yet "what dost thou against him?" This is a challenge to the carnal mind, and defies the most daring sinner to do his worst. It speaks much of the greatness and glory of God, that it is not in the power of his worst enemies to do him any real prejudice. Sin is said to be against God, because so the sinner intends it, and so he takes it, and it is an injury to his honour, yet it cannot do any thing against him. The malice of sinners is impotent malice; it cannot destroy his being or perfections, cannot dethrone him from his power and dominion, cannot diminish his wealth and possessions, cannot disturb his peace and repose, cannot defeat his counsels and designs, nor can it derogate from his essential glory. Job therefore did ill to say, "What profit is it that I am cleansed from my sin?" God was no gainer by his reformation, and then who should gain if he himself did not?

Secondly. The services of the best saints are no profit to him; ver. 7, "If thou be righteous, what givest thou him?" He needs not our service; or, if he did want to have the work done, he has better hands than ours at command. Our religion brings no accession at all to his felicity. He is so far from being beholden to us, that we are beholden to him for making us righteous and accepting our righteousness; and therefore, we can demand nothing from him, nor have any reason to complain if we have not what we expect, but be thankful that we have better than we deserve.

9 By reason of the multitude of oppressions they make the oppressed to cry:
They cry out by reason of the arm of the mighty 10 But none saith, Where is God my maker,
Who giveth songs in the night;
11 Who teacheth us more than the beasts of the earth,
And maketh us wiser than the fowls of heaven?
12 There they cry, but none giveth answer,
Because of the pride of evil men.
13 Surely God will not hear vanity,
Neither will the Almighty regard it.

Elihu here returns answer to another word that Job had said, which he

"Is it at thy will that He shall recompense it, 'when thou refusest and when thou choosest, and not when I choose or refuse?' Speak that which thou knowest." Does God consult you when He is to judge? Does He say to you, "It shall be when you choose or refuse, and not when I choose or refuse?" If such is your opinion, declare it. Among many explanations, we prefer this.

xxxiv. 36. For "my desire," the margin reads, "My father, let Job be tried." The true rendering is, "Oh, that Job may be tried."

xxxiv. 37. "He claps his hands at us" is probably the true meaning, or "he despises us."

xxxv. 3. The Hebrew is, "For thou saidst, What shall it profit thee? What shall I be benefited more than by my sin?" The rendering in the margin is clearly preferable.

xxxv. 8. The Hebrew is, "Thy wickedness is against a man as thou art, and thy righteousness is for a son of man." The English version develops the complete idea.

thought reflected much upon the justice and goodness of God, and therefore ought not to pass without a remark. Observe,

First. What it was that Job complained of. It was this; that God did not regard the cries of the oppressed against their oppressors; ver. 9, "By reason of the multitude of oppressions," the many hardships which proud tyrants put upon poor people, and the barbarous usage they give them, they make the oppressed to cry, but to no purpose, God doth not appear to right them. "They cry out," they cry on still "by reason of the arm of the mighty," which lies heavy upon them. This seems to refer to those words of Job, ch. xxiv. 12, "Men groan from out of the city, and the soul of the wounded crieth out" against the oppressors, "yet God layeth not folly to them," doth not reckon with them for it. This is a thing that Job knows not what to make of, nor how to reconcile to the justice of God and his government.

Is there a righteous God, and can it be,
He should so slowly hear, so slowly see?

Secondly. How Elihu solves the difficulty. If the cries of the oppressed be not heard, the fault is not in God; he is ready to hear and help them, but the fault is in themselves. "They ask and have not," but it is "because they ask amiss," Jas. iv. 3. "They cry out by reason of the arm of the mighty;" but it is a complaining cry, a wailing cry, not a penitent praying cry; the cry of nature and passion, not of grace: see Hos. vii. 14, "They have not cried unto me with their heart when they howled upon their beds;" and how can we expect then that they should be answered and relieved?

1. They do not inquire after God, nor seek to acquaint themselves with him under their affliction; ver. 10, "But none saith, Where is God my maker?" Afflictions are sent to direct and quicken us to inquire early after God, Ps. lxxviii. 34. But many that groan under great oppressions never mind God, nor take notice of his hand in their troubles; if they did, they would bear their troubles more patiently, and be more bettered by them. Of the many that are afflicted and oppressed few get the good they might get by their affliction. It should drive them to God, but how seldom doth it so. It is a piteous thing to see so little religion among the poor and miserable part of mankind. Every one complains of his troubles; "but none saith, Where is God my Maker?" that is, none repent of their sins, none return to him that smiteth them, none seek the face and favour of God, and that comfort in him which would balance their outward afflictions. They are wholly taken up with the calamitousness of their condition, as if that would excuse them in living without God in the world which should engage them to cleave the more closely to him. Observe, 1st. God is our Maker, the Author of our being, and under that notion it concerns us to regard and remember him, Eccl. xii. 1. 'God my Makers,' in the plural number; which some think is, if not an indication, yet an intimation of the trinity of persons in the unity of the Godhead. "Let us make man." 2nd. It is our duty, therefore, to inquire after him. Where is he, that we may pay our homage to him, may own our dependence upon him, and obligations to him? Where is he, that we may apply ourselves to him for maintenance and protection, may receive law from him, and may seek our happiness in his favour, from whose power we received our being? 3rd. It is to be lamented that he is so little inquired after by the children of men. All are asking where is mirth, and where is wealth, and where is a good bargain, but none ask, "Where is God my maker?"

2. They do not take notice of the mercies they enjoy in and under their afflictions, nor are thankful for them, and therefore cannot expect that God should deliver them out of their afflictions. 1st. He provides for our inward comfort and joy under our outward troubles; and we ought to make use of that, and wait his time for the removal of our troubles. He "giveth songs in the night;" that is, when our condition is never so dark, and sad, and melancholy, there is that in God, in his providence and promise, which is sufficient not only to support us, but to fill us with joy and consolation, and enable us in every thing to give thanks, and even to rejoice in tribulation. When we only pore upon the afflictions we are under, and neglect the consolations of God which are treasured up for us, it is just with God to reject our prayers. 2nd. He preserves to us the use of our reason and understanding; ver. 11, "Who teacheth us more than the beasts of the earth," that is, who has endued us with more noble powers and faculties than they are endued with, and hath made us capable of more excellent enjoyments and employments, here and for ever. Now this comes in here, First. As that which furnisheth us with matter for thanksgiving, even under the heaviest burthen of affliction. Whatever we are deprived of, we have our immortal souls, those jewels, more worth than all the world, continued to us, and even those that kill the body cannot hurt them. And if our affliction prevail not to disturb the exercise of their faculties, but we enjoy the use of our reason and the peace of our consciences, we have a great deal of reason to be thankful, how pressing soever our calamities otherwise are. Secondly. As a reason why we should under our afflictions inquire after God our Maker, and seek unto him. This is the greatest excellency of reason, that it makes us capable of religion; and it is in that especially that we are taught more than the beasts and the fowls. They have wonderful instincts and sagacities in seeking out their food, their physic, their shelter; but none of them are capable of inquiring, "Where is God my maker?" Something like logic, and philosophy, and politics, have been observed among the brute creatures, but never any thing of divinity or religion. These are peculiar to man. If therefore "the oppressed" only "cry by reason of the arm of the mighty," and do not look up to God, they do no more than the brutes, who complain when they are hurt, and forget that instruction and wisdom by which they are advanced so far above them. God relieves the brute creatures because they cry to him according to the best of their capacity, Ps. civ. 21; ch. xxxviii. 41. But what reason have men to expect relief, who are capable of inquiring after God as their Maker, and yet cry to him no otherwise than as brutes do?

3. They are proud and unhumbled under their afflictions, which were sent to mortify them, and to hide pride from them; ver. 12, "There they cry," there they lie exclaiming against their oppressors, and filling the ears of all about them with their complaints, not sparing to reflect upon God himself and his providence; "but none giveth answer." God doth not work deliverance for them, and perhaps men do not much regard them, and why so? It is "because of the pride of evil men." They are evil men; they regard iniquity in their hearts, and therefore God will not hear their prayers, Ps. lxvi. 18; Isa. i. 11. God heareth not such sinners. They have, it may be, brought themselves into trouble by their own wickedness; they are the devil's poor, and then who can pity them? Yet this is not all, they are proud still; therefore they do not seek unto God, Ps. x. 4. Or, if they do cry unto him, therefore he doth not give answer, for he hears only the desire of the humble, Ps. x. 17; and delivers those by his providence whom he hath first by his grace prepared and made fit for deliverance, and that we are not, if under humbling afflictions our hearts remain unhumbled, and pride unmortified. The case is plain then, if we cry to God for the removal of the oppression and affliction we are under, and it is not removed, the reason is, not because the Lord's hand is shortened, or his ear heavy, but because the affliction has not done its work; we are not sufficiently humbled, and therefore must thank ourselves that it is continued.

4. They are not sincere and upright and inward with God in their supplications to him, and therefore he doth not hear and answer them: ver. 13. "God will not hear vanity," that is, the hypocritical prayer, which is a vain prayer coming out of feigned lips. It is a vanity to think that God should hear it, who searcheth the heart, and requires truth in the inward part.

14 Although thou sayest thou shalt not see him,
Yet judgment is before him;
Therefore trust thou in him.
15 But now, because it is not so, he hath visited in his anger;
Yet he knoweth it not in great extremity:
16 Therefore doth Job open his mouth in vain;
He multiplieth words without knowledge.

Here is, First. Another ill word for which Elihu reproves Job; ver. 14, "Thou sayest thou shalt not see him," that is, 1. Thou complainest that thou dost not understand the meaning of his severe dealings with thee, nor discern the drift and design of them, ch. xxiii. 8, 9. And, 2. Thou despairest of seeing his gracious returns to thee, of seeing better days again, and art ready to give up all for gone, as Hezekiah, Isa. xxxviii. 11, "I shall not see the Lord." As when we are in prosperity we are ready to think our mountain shall never be brought low, so when we are in adversity we are ready to think our valley will never be filled; but in both to conclude, that to-morrow must be as this day, which is as absurd as to think that the weather, when it is either fair or foul, will be always so, that the flowing tide will always flow, or the ebbing tide will always ebb.

Secondly. The answer which Elihu gives to this despairing word that Job had said, which is this:

1. That when he looked up to God he had no just reason to speak thus despairingly: for "judgment is before him," that is, he knows what he has to do, and will do all in infinite wisdom and justice. He has the entire plan and model of providence before him, and knows what he will do, which we do not, and therefore understand not what he doth. There is a day of judgment before him, when all the seeming disorders of providence will be set to rights, and the dark chapters of it will be expounded. Then thou shalt see the full meaning of these dark events, and the final period of these dismal events; then thou shalt see his face with joy; "therefore trust in him," depend upon him, wait for him, and believe that the issue will be good at last. When we consider that God is infinitely wise, and righteous, and faithful, and that he is a God of judgment, Isa. xxx. 18, we shall see no reason to despair of relief from him, but all the reason in the world to hope in him, that it will come in due time, in the best time.

2. That if he had not yet seen an end of his troubles, the reason was because he did not thus trust in God, and wait for him; ver. 15, "Because it is not so," because thou dost not thus trust in him, therefore the affliction which came at first from love has now displeasure mixed with it. Now God hath visited thee in his anger, taking it very ill that thou canst not find in thy heart to trust him, but harbourest such hard misgiving thoughts of him. If there be any mixtures of Divine wrath in our afflictions, we may thank ourselves, it is because we do not carry ourselves aright under them; we quarrel with God, are fretful and impatient, and distrustful of the Divine providence. This was Job's case: "The foolishness of man perverts his way, and then his heart frets against the Lord," Pr. xix. 3; yet Elihu thinks that Job, being in great extremity, did not know and consider that as he should, that it is his own fault that he is not yet delivered.

He concludes therefore that "Job opens his mouth in vain," ver. 16; namely in complaining of his grievances, and crying for redress, or in justifying himself, and clearing up his own innocency. It is all in vain, because he doth not trust in God, and wait for him, and had not a due regard to him in his afflictions. He had said a great deal, had multiplied words, but all without knowledge; all to no purpose, because he did not encourage himself in God, and humble himself before him. It is in vain for us either to appeal to God or to acquit ourselves, if we do not study to answer the end for which affliction is sent; and in vain to pray for relief, if we do not trust in God, for let not that man that distrusts God think that he shall receive any thing from him, Jas. i. 7. Or this may refer to all that Job had said. Having shewed the absurdity of some passages in his discourse, he concludes there were many other passages that were in like manner the fruits of his ignorance and mistake. He did not, as his other friends, condemn him for a hypocrite, but chargeth him only with Moses' sin, speaking unadvisedly with his lips, when his spirit was provoked. And when at any time we do so—and who is there that offends not in word?—it is a mercy to be told of it, and we must take it patiently and kindly, as Job did, not repeating but recanting what we have said amiss.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Elihu having largely reproved Job for some of his unadvised speeches, which Job had nothing to say in the vindication of, here comes more generally to set him to rights, in his notions of God's dealings with him. His other friends had stood to it that because he was a wicked man therefore his afflictions were so great and so long; Elihu saith, No, the affliction was sent for his trial, and therefore it was lengthened out because Job was not as yet thoroughly humbled under it, nor had duly accommodated himself to it; and many reasons he urgeth, taken from the wisdom and righteousness of God, his care of his people, and especially his greatness and almighty power, with which, in this and the following chapter, he persuades him to submit to the hand of God. Here we have, I. His preface, ver. 2—4. II. The account he gives of the methods of God's providence towards the children of men, according as they carry themselves, ver. 5—15. III. The fair warning and good counsel he gives to Job thereupon, ver. 16—21. IV. His demonstration of God's sovereignty and omnipotence, which he gives instance of in the operations of common providence, and which is a reason why we should all submit to him, in his dealings with us, ver. 22—33; this he prosecutes, and enlarges upon in the following chapter.

ELIHU also proceeded, and said,
2 Suffer me a little, and I will shew thee
That I have yet to speak on God's behalf
3 I will fetch my knowledge from afar,
And will ascribe righteousness to my Maker.
4 For truly my words shall not be false:
He that is perfect in knowledge is with thee.

Once more Elihu begs the patience of the auditory, and Job's particularly, for he has not said all he has to say, but will have done presently. 'Stand xxxv. 15. This verse is difficult, but our translators have given an unintelligible version. Other translations are: "But now, because His anger has visited thee lightly, and He ignores thy many faults." "Now, then, if His wrath hath not yet punished, should He not be well acquainted with sullenness?" "And if there were nothing now, yet His anger would visit, although He should not severely chastise for the transgression." "But now, that with which His anger hath visited thee is as nothing; yea, He hath not regarded the great multitude of thy sins." "But now the visitations of His anger are almost as nothing, and He hath not taken cognisance, with strictness, of transgression." "But now there is nothing which His anger chastiseth, He noticeth not the evil." This last is the most literal.

xxxvi. 2. "Suffer me:" that is, "bear with me;" but the Hebrew rather means, "wait a little for me." Elihu appeals to Job's patience. The rest of the verse is more literally completed by the words in the margin, "and I will show thee that there are yet about me a little;' so some read it, ver. 2. Let me have your attendance, your attention, a while longer, and I will speak but this once, as plainly and as much to the purpose as I can. To gain this he pleads,

First. That he had a good cause, a noble subject, and a very fruitful one. "I have yet to speak on God's behalf." He spoke as an advocate for God, and therefore might justly expect the ear of the court. Some indeed pretend to speak on God's behalf that really speak for themselves; but those who sincerely appear in the cause of God, and speak in behalf of his honour, his truths, his ways, his people, they shall be sure neither to want instructions,—it shall be given them in that same hour what they shall speak,—nor to lose their cause, nor to lose their fee. Nor need they fear the exhausting of their subject. They that have spoken never so much, may yet find more to be spoken on God's behalf.

Secondly. That he had something to offer that was uncommon, and out of the road of vulgar observation. "I will fetch my knowledge from afar," ver. 3; that is, we will have recourse to our first principles, and the highest notions we can make use of to serve any purpose. It is worth while to go far for this knowledge of God, to dig for it, to travel for it; it will recompense our pains, and though far-fetched is not dear-bought.

Thirdly. That his design was undeniably honest; for all he aimed at was to ascribe righteousness to his Maker; to maintain and clear this truth, that God is righteous in all his ways. In speaking of God, and speaking for him, it is good to remember that he is our Maker, to call him so, and therefore to be ready to do him, and the interests of his kingdom, the best service we can. If he be our Maker, we have our all from him, must use our all for him, and be very jealous for his honour.

Fourthly. That his management should be very just and fair; ver. 4, "My words shall not be false," neither disagreeable to the thing itself, nor to my own thoughts and apprehensions. It is truth I am contending for, and that for truth's sake, with all possible sincerity and plainness. He will make use of plain and solid arguments, and not the subtleties and niceties of the schools. He that is perfect or upright in knowledge is now reasoning with thee, and therefore let him not only have a fair hearing, but let what he saith be taken in good part as meant well. The perfection of our knowledge in this world is to be honest and sincere in searching out truth, in applying it to ourselves, and in making use of what we know for the good of others.

5 Behold, God is mighty, and despiseth not any.
He is mighty in strength and wisdom
6 He preserveth not the life of the wicked:
But giveth right to the poor.
7 He withdraweth not his eyes from the righteous:
But with kings are they on the throne; [exalted.
Yea, he doth establish them for ever, and they are 8 And if they be bound in fetters,
And be holden in cords of affliction;
9 Then he sheweth them their work,
And their transgressions that they have exceeded
10 He openeth also their ear to discipline,
And commandeth that they return from iniquity.
11 If they obey and serve him,
They shall spend their days in prosperity,
And their years in pleasures.
12 But if they obey not, they shall perish by the sword,
And they shall die without knowledge.
13 But the hypocrites in heart heap up wrath:
They cry not when he bindeth them.
14 They die in youth,
And their life is among the unclean.

Elihu being to speak on God's behalf, and particularly to ascribe righteousness to his Maker, here shews that the disposals of Divine providence are all of them not only according to the eternal counsels of his will, but according to the eternal rules of equity. God acts as a righteous governor, for,

First. He doth not think it below him to take notice of the meanest of his subjects, nor doth poverty or obscurity set any at a distance from his favour. If men are mighty, they are apt to look with a haughty disdain upon those that are not of distinction, and make no figure; but "God is mighty," infinitely so, and yet he "despiseth not any," ver. 5. He humbleth himself to take cognizance of the affairs of the meanest, to do them justice, and to shew them kindness. Job thought himself and his cause slighted, because God did not presently appear for him. No, saith Elihu, "God despiseth not any;" which is a good reason why we should honour all men. "He is mighty in strength and wisdom," and yet doth not look with contempt upon those that have but a little strength and wisdom, if they but mean honestly. Nay, therefore he despiseth not any, because his wisdom and strength are incontestably infinite, and therefore the condescensions of his grace can be no diminution to him. They that are wise and good will not look upon any with scorn and disdain.

Secondly. He gives no countenance to the greatest, if they be bad; ver. 6, "He preserveth not the life of the wicked." Though their life may be prolonged, yet not under any special care of the Divine providence, but only the common protection of it. Job had said that "the wicked live, become old, and are mighty in power," ch. xxi. 7. No, saith Elihu, he seldom suffers wicked men to become old. He preserveth not their life so long as they expected, nor with that comfort and satisfaction which is indeed our life; and their preservation is but a reservation for the day of wrath, Rom. ii. 5.

Thirdly. He is always ready to right those that are any way injured, and to plead their causes; ver. 6, he "giveth right to the poor," avengeth their quarrel upon their persecutors, and forceth them to make restitution of what they have robbed them of. If men will not right the injured poor, God will.

Fourthly. He takes a particular care for the protection of his good subjects, ver. 7. He not only looks on them, but he never looks off them; "He withdraws not his eyes from the righteous." Though they may seem sometimes neglected and forgotten, and that befalls them which looks like an oversight of Providence, yet the tender, careful eye of their heavenly Father never withdraws from them. If our eye be ever towards God in duty, his eye will be ever upon us in mercy, and when we are at the lowest will not overlook us.

1. Sometimes he prefers good people to places of trust and honour; ver. 7, "With kings are they on the throne," and every sheaf is made to bow to theirs. When righteous persons are advanced to places of honour and power, it is in mercy to them, for God's grace in them will both arm them against the temptations that attend preferment, and enable them to improve the opportunity it gives them of doing good. It is also in mercy to those over whom they are set; "When the righteous bear rule, the city rejoiceth." If the righteous be advanced, they are established. They that in honour keep a good conscience stand upon sure ground, and high places are not such slippery ground to them as they are to others. But, because it is not often that we see good men made great men in this world, this may be supposed to refer to the honour to which the righteous shall rise when their Redeemer shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; for then only they shall be exalted for ever and established for ever, then shall they all shine forth as the sun, and be made kings and priests to our God.

2. If at any time he bring them into affliction, it is for the good of their souls, ver. 8—10. Some good people are preferred to honour and power; but others are in trouble. Now observe, 1st. The distress supposed; ver. 8, "If they be bound in fetters," laid in prison as Joseph was, "or holden in the cords of" any other "affliction," suppose them confined by pain and sickness, hampered by poverty, bound in their counsels, and notwithstanding all their struggles held long in this distress. This was Job's case; he was caught and kept fast in the cords of anguish, as some read it. But observe, 2nd. The design God has in bringing his people into such distresses as these. It is for the benefit of their souls, the consideration of which should reconcile us to affliction, and make us think well of it. Three things God intends when he afflicts us: First. To discover past sins to us, and to bring them to our remembrance, ver. 9. Then he shews them that amiss in them which before they did not see. He discovers to them the fact of sin, "he shews them their work;" sin is our own work. If there be any good in us it is God's work; and we are concerned to see what work we have made by sin. He discovers the fault of sin, shews them their transgressions of the law of God, and withal, the sinfulness of sin; that they have exceeded, and have been beyond measure sinful. True penitents lay load upon themselves, do not extenuate, but aggravate their sins, and own that they have exceeded in them. Affliction sometimes answers the sin; however, it awakens the conscience, and puts men upon considering. Secondly. To dispose our hearts to receive present instructions. Then he opens their ear to discipline, ver. 10. Whom God chastens he teaches, Ps. xciv. 12; and the affliction makes people willing to learn, softens the wax, that it may receive the impression of the seal; yet it doth not do it of itself, but the grace of God working with and by it. It is he that opens the ear, that opens the heart, who has the key of David. Thirdly. To deter and draw us off from iniquity for the future. This is the errand on which the affliction is sent; it is a command to return from iniquity, to have no more to do with sin, turn from it with an aversion to it, and a resolution never to return to it any more, Hos. xiv. 8.

3. If the affliction do its work, and accomplish that for which it is sent, he will comfort them again according to the time that he has afflicted them; ver. 11, "If they obey and serve him," if they comply with his design, and serve his purpose in these dispensations; if, when the affliction is removed, they continue in the same good mind that they were in when they were under the smart of it, and perform the vows they made then; if they live in obedience to God's commands, particularly those which relate to his service and worship, and in all instances make conscience of their duty to him, then they shall spend their days in prosperity again, and their years in true pleasures. Religion and piety is the only sure way to prosperity and pleasure. This is a certain truth, and yet few will believe it. If we faithfully serve God, 1st. We have the promise of outward prosperity, "the promise of the life that now is," and the comforts of it as far as is for God's glory and our good; and who would desire them any farther? 2nd. We have the possession of inward pleasures, the comfort of communion with God, and a good conscience, and that great peace which they have that love God's law. If we rejoice not in the Lord always, and in hope of eternal life, it is our own fault. And what better pleasures can we spend our years in?

4. If the affliction do not do its work, let them expect the furnace to be heated seven times hotter until they are consumed; ver. 12, "If they obey not," if they are not bettered by their afflictions, are not reclaimed and reformed, "they shall perish by the sword" of God's wrath. Those whom his rod is not the cure of, his sword will be the death of; and the consuming fire will prevail if the refining fire do not; for "when God judgeth he will overcome." If Ahaz in his distress trespass yet more against the Lord, this is that king Ahaz that is marked for ruin, 2 Chr. xxviii. 22; Jer. vi. 29, 30. God would have instructed them by their afflictions; but they received not instruction, would not take the hints that were given them, and therefore "they shall die without knowledge," ere they are aware, without any farther previous notices given them; or they shall die because they were without knowledge, notwithstanding the means of knowledge which they were blessed with. They that die without knowledge die without grace, and are undone for ever.

Lastly. He brings ruin upon hypocrites, the secret enemies of his kingdom, such as he described ver. 12; who, though they were numbered among the righteous whom he had spoken of before, yet did not obey him; but being children of disobedience and darkness, become children of wrath and perdition, these are the hypocrites in heart who heap up wrath, ver. 13. See the nature of hypocrisy; it lies in the heart, that is for the world and the flesh, when the outside seems to be for God and religion. Many that are saints in show, and saints in word, are hypocrites in heart. That spring is corrupt, and there is an evil treasure there. See the mischievousness of it; hypocrites heap up wrath. They are doing that every day which is provoking to God, and will be reckoned with for it altogether in the great day; "They treasure up wrath against the day of wrath," Rom. ii. 5; their sins are "laid up in store with God among his treasures," Deu. xxxii. 34; compare Jas. v. 3. As what goes up a vapour comes down a shower, so what goes up sin, if not repented of, will come down wrath. They think they are heaping up wealth, heaping up merits; but when the treasures are opened, it will prove they were heaping up wrath.

Observe, 1, What they do to heap up wrath. What is it that is so provoking? It is this, "They cry not when he binds them;" that is, when they are in affliction, bound with the cords of trouble, their hearts are hardened, they are stubborn and unhumbled, and will not cry to God, nor make their application to him. They are stupid and senseless, as stocks and stones, despising the chastening of the Lord. 2. What are the effects of that wrath? ver. 14, "They die in youth, and their life is among the unclean." This is the portion of hypocrites, whom Christ denounced many woes against. If they continue impenitent, 1st. They shall die a sudden death; die in youth, when death is most a surprise, and so death (that is, the consequences of it) always is to hypocrites. As they that die in youth die when they hoped to live, so hypocrites at death go to hell when they hoped to go to heaven. "When a wicked man dies, his expectation shall perish." 2nd. They shall die the second death. "Their life," after death, (for so it comes in here,) "is among the unclean;"

words for God;" but better still, "and I will show thee, for there are yet words for God."

xxxvi. 7. Otherwise, "He will not withdraw His eyes from the just, and with kings on a throne He will set them for ever, and they are exalted."

xxxvi. 9. Render the last clause, "and their offences, that they have been very great."

xxxvi. 12. For "they shall die without knowledge," translate, "they shall expire because without knowledge." Rodwell translates, "and, ere they are aware, expire."

xxxvi. 14. Some think that by "the unclean" the priests and devotees of Ashtoreth and other abominable idols are meant. The enormous licentiousness associated with many ancient forms of idolatry is proved by overwhelming evidence.

xxxvi. 15. The word "afflicted," put here in the margin, is, as in many other cases, far better than the term "poor" in the text.

among the fornicators, so some; among the worst and vilest of sinners, notwithstanding their specious and plausible profession. It is 'among the Sodomites,' so the margin; those filthy wretches, who, "going after strange flesh, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire," Jude 7. The souls of the wicked live after death; but they live among the unclean, the unclean spirits, the devil and his angels, for ever separated from the New Jerusalem, into which no unclean thing shall enter.

15 He delivereth the poor in his affliction,
And openeth their ears in oppression.
16 Even so would he have removed thee out of the strait
Into a broad place, where there is no straitness;
And that which should be set on thy table should be full of fatness.
17 But thou hast fulfilled the judgment of the wicked:
Judgment and justice take hold on thee.
18 Because there is wrath, beware lest he take thee away with his stroke:
Then a great ransom cannot deliver thee.
19 Will he esteem thy riches?
No, not gold, nor all the forces of strength
20 Desire not the night,
When people are cut off in their place.
21 Take heed, regard not iniquity:
For this hast thou chosen rather than affliction.
22 Behold, God exalteth by his power:
Who teacheth like him?
23 Who hath enjoined him his way?
Or who can say, Thou hast wrought iniquity?

Elihu here comes more closely to Job; and,

First. He tells him what God would have done for him ere this, if he had been duly humbled under his affliction. We all know how ready God is to deliver "the poor in his affliction," ver. 15. He always was so; the poor in spirit, those that are of a broken and contrite heart, he looks upon with tenderness, and when they are in affliction is ready to help them. He opens their ears, and makes them to hear joy and gladness, even in their oppressions; while he doth not yet deliver them he speaks to them good words and comfortable words, for the encouragement of their faith and patience, the silencing of their fears, and the balancing of their griefs. And even so (ver. 16) would he have done to thee; if thou hadst submitted to his providence, and carried thyself well, he would have delivered and comforted thee, and we should have had none of these complaints. If thou hadst accommodated thyself to the will of God, thy liberty and plenty would have been restored to thee with advantage. 1. Thou hadst been enlarged, and not confined thus by thy sickness and disgrace; "He would have removed thee into a broad place, where is no straitness," and thou shouldest no longer have been cramped thus, and have had all thy measures broken. 2. Thou hadst been enriched, and not in this poor condition; thou shouldest have had thy table richly spread, not only with food convenient, but with the finest of the wheat (see Deu. xxxii. 14) and the fattest of the flesh. Note, It ought to silence us under our afflictions to consider that if we were better it would be every way better with us. If we had answered the ends of an affliction, the affliction would be removed; and deliverance would come if we were ready for it. God would have done well for us if we had carried ourselves well, Ps. lxxxi. 13, 14; Isa. xlviii. 18.

Secondly. He chargeth him with standing in his own light, and makes him the cause of the continuance of his own trouble: ver. 17, "But thou hast fulfilled the judgment of the wicked;" that is, whatever thou art really, in this thing thou hast carried thyself like a wicked man, hast spoken and done like them; thou hast gratified them and served their cause; and therefore "judgment and justice take hold on thee" as a wicked man, because thou goest in company with them, actest as if thou wert in their interest, aiding and abetting. Thou hast maintained the cause of the wicked, and such as a man's cause is such will the judgment of God be upon him. So Bishop Patrick. It is dangerous being on the wrong side. Accessaries to treason will be dealt with as principals.

Thirdly. He cautions him not to persist in his frowardness. Several good cautions he gives him to this purpose:

1. Let him not make light of Divine vengeance, nor be secure, as if he were in no danger of it; ver. 18, "Because there is wrath;" that is, because God is a righteous governor, who resents all the affronts given to his government; because he has revealed his wrath from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, and because thou hast reason to fear that thou art under God's displeasure, therefore "beware lest he take thee away" suddenly "with his stroke," and be so wise as to make thy peace with him quickly, and get his anger turned away from thee. A warning to this purpose Job had given his friends, ch. xix. 29, "Be ye afraid of the sword, for wrath brings the punishment of the sword." Thus contenders are apt, with too much boldness, to bind one another over to the judgment of God, and threaten one another with his wrath. But he that keeps a good conscience needs not fear the impotent menaces of proud men. But this was a friendly caution to Job, and necessary. Even good men have need to be kept to their duty by the fear of God's wrath. Thou art a wise and good man; but beware lest he take thee away, for the wisest and best have enough in them to deserve his stroke.

2. Let him not promise himself that if God's wrath should kindle against him he could find out ways to escape the strokes of it. 1st. There is no escaping by money; no purchasing a pardon with silver or gold, and such corruptible things. Even a great ransom cannot deliver thee when God enters into judgment with thee. His justice cannot be bribed, nor any of the ministers of his justice. "Will he esteem thy riches," and take from them a commutation of the punishment? "No, not gold," ver. 19. If thou hadst as much wealth as ever thou hadst, that would not ease thee, would not secure thee from the strokes of God's wrath in the day of revelation in which riches profit not, Pr. xi. 4; see Ps. xlix. 7, 8. 2nd. No escaping by rescue. If "all the forces of strength" were at thy command, if thou couldst muster never so many servants and vassals to appear for thee, to force thee out of the hands of Divine vengeance, it were all in vain, God would not regard it; there is "none that can deliver out of his hand." 3rd. No escaping by absconding; ver. 20, "Desire not the night," which often favours the retreat of a conquered army, and covers it. Think not that thou canst so escape the righteous judgment of God, for the darkness hideth not from him, Ps. cxxxix. 11, 12; see ch. xxxiv. 22. Think not that because in the night people retire to their place, go up to their beds, and so it is easy then to escape their discovery, that God also ascends to his place, and cannot see thee. No, he neither slumbers nor sleeps; his eyes are open upon the children of men, not only in all places, but at all times; no rocks nor mountains can shelter us from his eye. Some understand it of the night of death. That is the night by which men are cut off from their place, and Job had earnestly breathed for that night, as the hireling desires the evening, ch. vii. 2. But do not do so, saith Elihu, for thou knowest not what the night of death is. Those that passionately wish for death, in hopes to make that their shelter from God's wrath, may perhaps be mistaken. There are those whom wrath pursues into that night.

3. Let him not continue his unjust quarrel with God and his providence, which hitherto he had persisted in, when he should have submitted to the affliction: ver. 21, "Take heed," look well to thine own spirit, and "regard not iniquity," 'return not' to it; so some; for it is at thy peril if thou do. Let us never dare to think a favourable thought of sin, never indulge it, nor allow ourselves in it. Elihu thinks Job had need of this caution, he having chosen iniquity rather than affliction; that is, having chosen rather to gratify his own pride and humour in contending with God, than to mortify it, by a submission to him, and accepting the punishment. We may take it more generally, and observe, that they who choose iniquity rather than affliction make a very foolish choice; that ease their cares by sinful pleasures, increase their wealth by sinful pursuits, escape their troubles by sinful projects, and evade sufferings for righteousness' sake by sinful compliances against their consciences, these make a choice they will repent of; for there is more evil in the least sin than in the greatest affliction. It is an evil, an only evil.

4. Let him not dare to prescribe to God, nor give him his measures; ver. 22, 23, "Behold, God exalteth by his power;" that is, he doth, may, and can set up and pull down whom he pleaseth, and therefore it is not for thee and me to contend with him. The more we magnify God the more do we humble and abase ourselves. Now consider,

1st. That God is an absolute sovereign. He exalteth himself by his own power, and not by strength derived from any other. He exalteth whom he pleases, exalts those that are afflicted and cast down by the strength and power which he gives his people; and therefore, "who has enjoined him his way?" who presides above him in his way? is there any superior from whom he has his commission, and to whom he is accountable? No, he himself is supreme and independent. Who puts him in mind of his way? so some. Doth the Eternal Mind need a remembrancer? No, his own way, as well as ours, is ever before him. He has not received orders or instructions from any, Isa. xl. 13, 14; nor is he accountable to any. He enjoins to all the creatures their way; let not us then enjoin him his, but leave it to him to govern the world who is fit to do it.

2nd. That he is an incomparable teacher. "Who teacheth like him?" It is absurd for us to teach him who is himself the fountain of light, truth, knowledge, and instruction. "He that teacheth man knowledge," and so as no one else can, "shall not he know?" Ps. xciv. 9, 10. Shall we light a candle to the sun? Observe, when Elihu would give glory to God as a ruler, he praiseth him as a teacher, for rulers must teach. God doth so. He binds with the cords of a man. In this, as in other things, he is a nonsuch. None so fit to direct his own actions as he himself is. He knows what he has to do, and how to do it for the best, and needs no information or advice. Solomon himself had a privy council to advise him, but the King of kings has none. Nor is any so fit to direct our actions as he is. None teacheth with such authority and convincing evidence, with such condescension and compassion, nor with such power and efficacy as God doth. He teacheth by the Bible, and that is the best book; teacheth by his Son, and he is the best master.

3rd. That he is unexceptionably just in all his proceedings. "Who can say, Thou hast wrought iniquity?" Not, who dares say it,—many do iniquity, but if any tell them of it, it is at their peril,—but who can say it, who had any cause to say it? who can say it and prove it? It is a maxim undoubtedly true, without limitation, that 'the King of kings can do no wrong.'

24 Remember that thou magnify his work,
Which men behold.
25 Every man may see it;
Man may behold it afar off.
26 Behold, God is great, and we know him not,
Neither can the number of his years be searched out.
27 For he maketh small the drops of water:
They pour down rain according to the vapour thereof:
28 Which the clouds do drop
And distil upon man abundantly.
29 Also can any understand the spreadings of the clouds,
Or the noise of his tabernacle?
30 Behold, he spreadeth his light upon it,
And covereth the bottom of the sea.
31 For by them judgeth he the people;
He giveth meat in abundance.
32 With clouds he covereth the light;
And commandeth it not to shine by the cloud that cometh betwixt.
33 The noise thereof sheweth concerning it,
The cattle also concerning the vapour.

Elihu is here endeavouring to possess Job with great and high thoughts of God, and so to persuade him into a cheerful submission to his providence.

First. He represents the work of God in general as illustrious and conspicuous, ver. 24. His whole work is so. God doeth nothing mean. This is a good reason why we should acquiesce in all the operations of his providence concerning us xxxvi. 16. For "that which should be set on thy table" the Hebrew is, "the setting on of thy table;" that is, "what should be set upon thy table."

xxxvi. 17. An obscure verse, which may be rendered, "But thou hast fulfilled the judgment of the wicked; judgment and justice are connected." The whole verse may mean, "Thou art full of the idea that one who is wicked has pronounced sentence on you; but be that as it may, the sentence is in accordance with the verdict."

xxxvi. 20. This verse has been very differently rendered, and there is obscurity on the face of it. Benisch suggests, "Pant not for the night, to rouse peoples from their place;" Delitzsch, "Sing not for the night to come, which shall remove people from their place;" Barnes, "Sing not for the night to go to the people beneath them;" Rodwell, "Pant not for the night wherein peoples are cut off on the spot." Fürst understands "the night" to be that of death, and he renders the rest of the verse "to drive away peoples immediately."

in particular. His visible works, those of nature, and which concern the world in general, are such as we admire and commend, and observe the Creator's wisdom, power, and goodness; shall we then find fault with his dispensations concerning us, and the counsels of his will concerning our affairs? We are here called to consider the work of God, Eccl. vii. 13. 1. It is plain before our eyes; nothing more obvious. It is what men behold; every man that has but half an eye may see it, may behold it afar off. Look which way we will, we see the products of God's wisdom and power; we see that done, and that in the doing, concerning which we cannot but say, This is the work of God, the finger of God; it is the Lord's doing. Every man may see afar off the heaven and all its lights, the earth and all its fruits, to be the work of Omnipotence; and much more when we behold them nigh at hand. Look at the minutest works of nature through a microscope, do they appear curious? The eternal power and godhead of the Creator is clearly seen and understood by the things that are made, Rom. i. 20. Every man, even those that have not the benefit of Divine revelation, may see this, for there is no speech or language where the voice of these natural constant preachers is not heard, Ps. xix. 3. 2. It ought to be marvellous in our eyes. The beauty and excellency of the work of God, and the agreement of all the parts of it, are what we must remember to magnify and highly to extol. Not only justify it as right and good, and what cannot be blamed, but magnify it as wise and glorious, and such as no creature could contrive or produce. Man may see his works, and is capable of discerning his hand in them, which the beasts are not; and therefore ought to praise them, and give him the glory of them.

Secondly. He represents God, the author of them, as infinite and unsearchable, ver. 26. The streams of being, power, and perfection, should lead us to the fountain. God is great, infinitely so; great in power, for he is omnipotent and independent; great in wealth, for he is self-sufficient and all-sufficient; great in himself, great in all his works; great, and therefore greatly to be praised. Great, and therefore we know him not; we know that he is, but not what he is. We know what he is not, but not what he is. We know in part, but not in perfection. This comes in here as a reason why we must not arraign his proceedings, nor find fault with what he doth, because it is speaking evil of the things that we understand not; and answering a matter before we hear it. We know not the duration of his existence, for it is infinite. The number of his years cannot possibly be searched out, for he is eternal; there is no number of them. He is a being without beginning, succession, or period, that ever was, and ever will be, and ever the same, the great I AM. This is a good reason why we should not prescribe to him or quarrel with him, because as he is, such are his operations, quite out of our reach.

Thirdly. He gives some instances of God's wisdom, and power, and sovereign dominion in the works of nature, and the dispensations of common providence; and begins in this chapter with the clouds and the rain that descends from them. We need not be critical in examining either the phrase or the philosophy of this noble discourse. The general scope of it is to shew, 1. That God is infinitely great, and the Lord of all; the first cause and supreme director of all the creatures, and has all power in heaven and earth; and whom therefore we ought with all humility and reverence to adore, to speak well of, and to give honour to. 2. That it is presumption for us to prescribe to him the rules and methods of his special providence towards the children of men, or to expect from him an account of them, when the operations even of common providences about the meteors are so various, and so mysterious and unaccountable. Elihu, to affect Job with God's sublimity and sovereignty, had directed him, ch. xxxv. 5, to look unto the clouds; now, in these verses, he shews us what we may observe in the clouds, we see what will lead us to consider the glorious perfections of their Creator. Consider the clouds,

1. As springs to this lower world; the source and treasure of its moisture, and the great bank through which it circulates, and that is as necessary, and the stagnating of it would be as hurtful to this lower world, as of the blood to the body of man. It is worth while to observe in this common occurrence, 1st. That the clouds above distil upon the earth below. If the heavens become brass, the earth becomes iron; therefore, thus the promise of plenty runs, "I will hear the heavens, and they shall hear the earth." This intimates to us that every good gift is from above, from Him who is both father of lights, and father of the rain, and instructs us to direct our prayers to him, and to look up. 2nd. That they are here said to distil upon man, ver. 28; for though indeed he "causes it to rain in the wilderness where no man is," ch. xxxviii. 26, Ps. civ. 11, yet special respect is had to man herein, to whom the inferior creatures are all made serviceable, and from whom the actual return of the tributes of praise is required; and, among men he "causeth his rain to fall upon the just and upon the unjust," Mat. v. 45. 3rd. They are said to distil the water in small drops, not in spouts, as when the windows of heaven were opened, Gen. vii. 11. God waters the earth with that with which he once drowned it, only dispensed in another manner, to let us know how much we lie at his mercy, and how kind he is in giving rain by drops, that the benefit of it may be the farther and the more equally diffused, as by an artificial waterpot. 4th. Though sometimes the rain comes in very small drops, yet at other times it pours down in great rain, and this difference between one shower and another must be resolved into Divine providence, which orders it so. 5th. Though it comes down in drops, yet it distils upon man abundantly, ver. 28; and therefore, is called the river of God which is full of water, Ps. lxv. 9. 6th. The clouds pour down according to the vapour that they draw up, ver. 27. Thus just the heavens are to the earth, but the earth is not so in the returns it makes. 7th. The produce of the clouds is sometimes a great terror, and at other times a great favour to the earth, ver. 13. When he pleaseth he doth by them judge the people he is angry with. Storms, and tempests, and excessive rains destroying the fruits of the earth, and causing inundations, come from the clouds; but, on the other hand, ordinarily from them he giveth meat in abundance, they drop fatness upon the pastures that are clothed with flocks, and the vallies that are covered with corn, Ps. lxv. 11—13. Lastly, Notice is sometimes given of the approach of rain, ver. 39, "the noise thereof," among other things, "sheweth concerning it." Hence we read, 1 Kin. xviii. 41, of the sound of abundance of rain," or as it is in the margin, 'a sound of a noise of rain,' before it came, and a welcome harbinger it was then; and, as the noise, so the face, of the sky sheweth concerning it, Lu. xii. 56. The cattle also, by a strange instinct, are apprehensive of a change in the weather nigh at hand, and seek for shelter; shaming man, who will not foresee the evil and hide himself.

2. As shadows to the upper world; ver. 24, "Can any understand the spreadings of the clouds?" They are spread over the earth as a curtain or canopy; how they come to be so, how stretched out, and how poised as they are, we cannot understand, though we daily see they are so. Shall we then pretend to understand the reasons and methods of God's judicial proceedings with the children of men, whose characters and cases are so various, when we cannot account for the spreadings of the clouds which cover the light? ver. 32. It is a cloud coming betwixt, ch. xxvi. 9; and this we are sensible of, that by the interposition of the clouds between us and the sun we are, 1st. Sometimes favoured; for they serve as an umbrella to shelter us from the violent heat of the sun, which otherwise would beat upon us. A cloud of dew in the heat of harvest is spoken of as a very great refreshment, Isa. xviii. 4. 2nd. Sometimes we are by them frowned upon, for they darken the earth at noonday, and eclipse the light of the sun. Sin is compared to a cloud, Ps. xliv. 22, because it comes between us and the light of God's countenance, and obstructs the shining of it; but though the cloud darken the sun for a time, and pour down rain, yet, post nubila Phœbus,—'the sun shines forth after the rain;' after he has wearied the cloud "he spreads his light upon it," ver. 30. There is a clear shining after rain, 2 Sam. xxiii. 4; the sunbeams are darted forth, and reach to cover even the bottom of the sea, thence to exhale a fresh supply of vapours, and so raise recruits for the clouds. In all this we must remember to magnify the work of God.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Elihu here goes on to extol the wonderful power of God, in the meteors, and all the changes of the weather. If in those changes we submit to the will of God, take the weather as it is, and make the best of it, why should not we do so in other changes of our condition? Here he observes the hand of God, I. In the thunder and lightning, ver. 1—5. II. In the frost and snow, the rains and winds, ver. 6—13. III. He applies it to Job, and challengeth him to solve the phenomena of these works of nature, that confessing his ignorance of them, he might own himself an incompetent judge in the proceedings of Divine providence, ver. 14—22. And then, V. Concludes with his principle which he undertook to make out, That God is great, and greatly to be feared, ver. 23, 24.

1 AT this also my heart trembleth,
And is moved out of his place
2 Hear attentively the noise of his voice,
And the sound that goeth out of his mouth.
3 He directeth it under the whole heaven,
And his lightning unto the ends of the earth.
4 After it a voice roareth:
He thundereth with the voice of his excellency;
And he will not stay them when his voice is heard.
5 God thundereth marvellously with his voice;
Great things doeth he, which we cannot comprehend

Thunder and lightning, which usually go together, are sensible indications of the glory and majesty, the power and terror, of Almighty God, one to the ear and the other to the eye. In these God leaves not himself without witness of his greatness, as in the rain from heaven and fruitful seasons he leaves not himself without witness of his goodness, (Acts xiv. 17,) even to the most stupid and unthinking. Though there be natural causes and useful effects of them, which the philosophers undertake to account for, yet they seem chiefly designed by the Creator to startle and awaken the slumbering dozing world of mankind to the consideration of a God above them. The eye and the ear are the two learning senses; and, therefore, though it is possible it might have been, yet they say it was never known in fact that any one was born both blind and deaf. By the word of God Divine instructions are conveyed to the mind through the ear, by his works through the eye; but because those ordinary sights and sounds do not duly affect men, God is pleased sometimes to astonish men by the eye with his lightnings, and by the ear with his thunder. It is very probable that at this time, when Elihu was speaking, it thundered and lightened, for he speaks of it as present; and, God being about to speak, ch. xxxviii. 1, these were, as afterwards on mount Sinai, the proper prefaces to command attention and awe. Observe here,

First. How Elihu was himself affected, and desired to affect Job, with the appearance of God's glory in the thunder and lightning, ver. 1, 2. For my part, saith Elihu, my heart trembleth at it; though I have often heard it, often seen it, yet it is still terrible to me, and makes every joint of me tremble, and my heart beat so as if it would move out of its place. Thunder and lightning have been dreadful to the wicked; the emperor Caligula would run into a corner, or under a bed, for fear of them. Those who are very much astonished, we say are thunderstruck, and even good people think them very awful; and that which makes them the more terrible is the hurt often done by lightning. Many have been killed by it; Sodom and Gomorrah were laid in ruins by it. It is a sensible indication what God could do to this sinful world, and what he will do at last by the fire to which it is reserved. Our hearts, like Elihu's, should tremble at it for fear of God's judgments, Ps. cxix. 120. He also calls upon Job to attend to it; ver. 2, "Hear attentively the noise of his voice." Perhaps as yet it thundered at a distance, and could not be heard without listening. Or rather, though the thunder itself will be heard, and whatever we are doing we cannot help attending to it, yet, to apprehend and understand the instructions God thereby gives us, we have need to hear with a great attention and application of mind. Thunder is called the voice of the Lord, Ps. xxix. 3, &c., because by it God speaks to the children of men to fear before him; and it should put us in mind of that mighty word by which the world was at first made, which is called thunder; Ps. civ. 7, "At the voice of thy thunder they hasted away," namely, the waters, when God said, "Let them be gathered in one place." They that are themselves affected with God's greatness should labour to affect others.

Secondly. How he describes them. 1. Their original, not their second causes, but the first. God directs the thunder, and the lightning is his, ver. 3. Their production and motion is not from chance, but from the counsel of God, and under the direction and dominion of his providence, though to us they seem accidental and ungovernable. 2. Their extent. The claps of thunder roll under the whole heaven, and are heard far and near, so are the lightnings darted to the ends of the earth; they come out of the one part under heaven, and shine to the other, Lu. xvii. 24. Though the same lightning and thunder do not reach to all places, yet they reach to very distant places in a moment; and there is no place but some time or other has these alarms from heaven. 3. Their order. The lightning is first directed, and after it a voice roars, ver. 4. The flash of fire, and the noise it makes in a watery cloud, are really at the same time; but, because the motion of light is much quicker than that of sounds, we see the lightning some time before we hear the thunder, as we see the firing of a great gun at a distance before we hear the report of it. The thunder is here called the voice of God's excellency, because by it he proclaims his transcendent power and greatness. "He sends forth his voice, and that a mighty voice," Ps. lxviii. 33. 4. Their violence. "He will not stay them," that is, he doth not need to check them, or hold them back, lest they should grow unruly, and out of his power to restrain them, but lets them take their course; saith to them, "Go, and they go, come and they come, do this and they do it." He will not stay the rains and showers that usually follow upon the thunder, which he had spoken of, ch. xxxvi. 27, 29, so some; but will pour them out upon the earth, when his voice is heard. Thunder showers are or "on the spot." The simplest version would perhaps be, "Pant not for the night, to remove peoples from their place," or "for the removal of people from their place."

xxxvi. 22. The phrase, "Who teacheth like Him?" has been questioned, but is fairly open to no objection.

xxxvi. 24. For the words, "which men behold," some render "which men sing of," and the Hebrew form is capable of both translations. The next verse favours our version.

xxxvi. 27. It is the opinion of good critics that for "He maketh small the drops of water," we should substitute "He draws up the drops of water;" and that the allusion is to the evaporation by which clouds are formed. Some still adhere to our old version.

xxxvi. 30. Rodwell's translation is, "Lo, He spreads out His light around him, but covers the bottom of the sea with darkness." The darkness of the ocean deeps may be meant, but is not explicitly named in the Hebrew text.

sweeping rains, and for them he makes the lightnings, Ps. xxxv. 7. 5. The inference he draws from all this, ver. 5. Doth God thunder thus marvellously with his voice? We must then conclude that his other works are great, and such as we cannot comprehend. From this one instance we may argue to all, that in the dispensations of his providence there is that which is too great, too strong for us to oppose or strive against, and too high, too deep for us to arraign or quarrel with.

6 For he saith to the snow, Be thou on the earth;
Likewise to the small rain, and to the great rain of his strength.
7 He sealeth up the hand of every man;
That all men may know his work.
8 Then the beasts go into dens,
And remain in their places.
9 Out of the south cometh the whirlwind:
And cold out of the north.
10 By the breath of God frost is given:
And the breadth of the waters is straitened.
11 Also by watering he wearieth the thick cloud:
He scattereth his bright cloud:
12 And it is turned round about by his counsels:
That they may do whatsoever he commandeth them
Upon the face of the world in the earth.
13 He causeth it to come, whether for correction,
Or for his land, or for mercy.

The changes and extremities of the weather, wet or dry, hot or cold, is the subject of a great deal of our common talk and observation. But how seldom do we think and speak of these things, as Elihu doth here, with an awful regard to God the director of them, who shews his power and serves the purposes of his providence by them! We must take notice of the glory of God, not only in the thunder and lightning, but in the more common revolutions of the weather, which are not so terrible, and which make less noise. As,

First. In the snow and rain, ver. 6. Thunder and lightning happen usually in the summer, but here he takes notice of the winter weather. Then "he saith to the snow, Be thou on the earth." He commissions it, he commands it, he appoints it where it shall light, and how long it shall lie. He speaks, and it is done; as in the creation of the world, "Let there be light," so in the works of common providence, Snow, "be thou on the earth." Saying and doing are not two things with God, though they are with us. When he speaks the word, the small rain distils, and the great rain pours down as he pleaseth. 'The winter rain,' so the Seventy; for in these countries, when the winter was past, the rain was over and gone, Cant. ii. 11. The distinction in the Hebrew between the small rain and the great rain is this, that the former is called a shower of rain, the latter of rains, many showers in one. But all are the showers of his strength. The power of God is to be observed as much in the small rain that soaks into the earth, as in the great rain that batters on the housetop, and washeth away all before it. Note, The providence of God is to be acknowledged both by husbandmen in the fields, and travellers upon the road, in every shower of rain, whether it doth them a kindness or an unkindness. It is sin and folly to contend with God's providence in the weather. If he send the snow or rain, can we hinder them? or shall we be angry at them? It is as absurd to quarrel with any other disposal of Providence concerning ourselves or ours.

The effect of the extremity of the winter weather is, that it obligeth both men and beasts to retire, making it uncomfortable and unsafe for them to go abroad. 1. Men retire to their houses from their labours in the field, and keep within doors; ver. 7, "He seals up the hand of every man." In frost and snow husbandmen cannot follow their business, nor some tradesmen, nor travellers, when the weather is extreme. The plough is laid by, the shipping laid up, nothing to be done, nothing to be got, that men, being taken off from their own work, may know his work, and contemplate that, and give him the glory of that; and, by the consideration of that work of his in the weather which seals up their hands, be led to celebrate his other great and marvellous works. Note, When we are upon any account disabled to follow our worldly business, and taken off from it, we should spend our time rather in the exercises of piety and devotion, in acquainting ourselves with the works of God, and praising him in them, than in foolish idle sports and recreations. When our hands are sealed up, our hearts should thus be opened; and the less we have at any time to do in the world, the more we should do for God and our souls. When we are confined to our houses, we should thereby be driven to our Bibles and our knees. 2. The beasts also retire to their dens, and remain in their close places, ver. 8. It is meant of the wild beasts, which being wild must seek a shelter for themselves, to which by instinct they are directed, while the tame beasts, that are serviceable to man, are housed and protected by his care, as Ex. ix. 20. The ass has no den but his master's crib, and thither he goes, not only to be safe and warm, but to be fed. Nature directs all creatures to shelter themselves from a storm, and shall man only be unprovided of an ark?

Secondly. In the winds, which blow from different quarters, and produce different effects, ver. 9, 'Out of the hidden place' (so it may be read) 'comes the whirlwind,' it turns round, and so it is hard to say from which point it comes, but it comes from the secret chamber, as the word signifies, which I am not so willing to understand of the south, because he saith here, ver. 17, that the wind out of the south is so far from being a whirlwind, that it is a warming quieting wind. But at this time perhaps Elihu saw a whirlwind cloud coming out of the south, and making towards them, out of which the Lord spoke soon after, ch. xxxviii. 1. Or, if turbulent winds, which bring showers, come out of the south, cold and drying blasts come out of the north to scatter the vapours, and clear the air of them.

Thirdly. In the frost, ver. 10. See the cause of it; it is given by the breath of God; that is, by the word of his power, and command of his will; or, as some understand it, by the wind, which is the breath of God, as the thunder is his voice; it is caused by the cold freezing wind out of the north. See the effect of it; "The breadth of the waters is straitened;" that is, the waters that had spread themselves, and flowed with a great deal of liberty, are congealed, benumbed, arrested, bound up in crystal fetters. This is such an instance of the power of God, as, if it were not common, would be next to a miracle.

Fourthly. In the clouds, the womb where all these watery meteors are conceived, of which he had spoken, ch. xxxvi. 28. Three sorts of clouds he here speaks of.

1. Close black thick clouds, pregnant with showers, and these with watering he wearies, ver. 11; that is, they spend themselves, and are exhausted by the rain into which they melt and are dissolved, pouring out water till they are weary and can pour out no more. See what pains, as I may say, the creatures, even those above us, take to serve man. The clouds water the earth till they are weary; they spend and are spent for our benefit; which shames and condemns us for the little good we do in our places, though it would be to our own advantage; for he that watereth shall be watered also himself.

2. Bright thin clouds, clouds without water, these he scattereth; they are dispersed of themselves and not dissolved into rain, but what goes with them we know not. The bright cloud in the evening when the sky is red is scattered, and proves an earnest of a fair day, Mat. xvi. 2.

3. Flying clouds, which do not dissolve as the thick cloud into a close rain, but are carried upon the wings of the wind from place to place, dropping showers as they go; and these are said to be "turned round about by his counsels," ver. 12. The common people say, the rain goes by planets, which is as bad divinity as it is philosophy; for it is guided and governed by the counsel of God, which extends itself even to those things that seem most casual and minute, "that they may do whatsoever he commandeth them," for the stormy winds and the clouds that are driven by them fulfil his word. And by this means he "causeth it to rain upon one city, and not upon another," Am. iv. 7, 8. Thus his will is done "upon the face of the world in the earth;" that is, among the children of men, to whom God has an eye in all these things, of whom it is said that he "made them to dwell on the face of all the earth," Acts xvii. 26. The inferior creatures, being not capable of doing moral actions, are not capable of receiving rewards or punishments. But among the children of men God causeth the rain to come either for the correction of his land or for mercy to it, ver. 13. 1st. Rain sometimes turns into a judgment; it is a scourge to a sinful land. As once it was for the destruction of the whole world, so it is now often for the correction or discipline of some parts of it, by hindering seedness and harvest, raising the waters, and damaging the fruits. Some have said that our nation has received much more prejudice by the excess of rain than by the want of it. 2nd. At other times it is a blessing. It is for the land that that may be made fruitful: and besides that which is just necessary, he gives for mercy to fatten it and make it more fruitful. See what a necessary dependence we have upon God, when the very same thing, according to the proportion in which it is given, may be either a great mercy or a great judgment; and, without God, we cannot have either a shower or a fair gleam.

14 Hearken unto this, O Job:
Stand still, and consider the wondrous works of God.
15 Dost thou know when God disposed them,
And caused the light of his cloud to shine?
16 Dost thou know the balancings of the clouds,
The wondrous works of him which is perfect in knowledge?
17 How thy garments are warm,
When he quieteth the earth by the south wind?
18 Hast thou with him spread out the sky,
Which is strong, and as a molten looking glass?
19 Teach us what we shall say unto him;
For we cannot order our speech by reason of darkness.
20 Shall it be told him that I speak?
If a man speak, surely he shall be swallowed up.

Elihu here applies himself closely to Job, desiring him to apply what he has hitherto said to himself. He begs he would hearken to this discourse, ver. 14, that he would pause awhile; "Stand still, and consider the wondrous works of God." What we hear is not likely to profit us unless we consider it; and we are not likely to consider things fully unless we stand still, and compose ourselves to the consideration of them. The works of God being wondrous, both deserve and need our consideration; and the due consideration of them will help to reconcile us to all his providences. Elihu, for the humbling of Job, shews him,

First. That he had no insight at all into natural causes; could neither see the springs of them, nor foresee the effects of them, ver. 15—17. Dost thou know this, and know that, which are the wondrous works of him which is perfect in knowledge? We are here taught, 1. The perfection of God's knowledge. It is one of the most glorious perfections of God, that he is perfect in knowledge. It is omniscience. His knowledge is intuitive, he sees, and doth not know by report; it is intimate and entire. He knows things truly, and not by their colours; thoroughly, and not by piecemeal. To his knowledge there is nothing distant, but all near; nothing future, but all present; nothing hid, but all open. And we ought to acknowledge this in all his wondrous works, and it is sufficient to satisfy us in those wondrous works which we know not the meaning of, that they are the works of one that knows what he doth. 2. The imperfection of our knowledge. The greatest philosophers are much in the dark concerning the powers and works of nature. We are a paradox to ourselves, and every thing about us is a mystery. The gravitation of bodies, and the cohesion of the parts of matter, are most certain, and yet unaccountable. It is good for us to be made sensible of our own ignorance. Some have confessed it, and those that would not have betrayed it. But we must all infer from it what incompetent judges we are of the Divine politics, who understand so little even of the Divine mechanics. 1st. We know not what orders God has given concerning the clouds, nor what orders he will give, ver. 15. That all is done by determination and with design we are sure; but what is determined, and what designed, and when the plan was laid, we know not. God often causeth the light of his cloud to shine; in the rainbow, so some; in the lightning, so others; but did we foresee, or could we foretell when he would do it? If we foresee the change of weather a few hours before, when second causes have begun to work, by the weather-glass, or vulgar observation, yet how little doth that shew us of the purposes of God by these changes! 2nd. We know not how the clouds are poised in the air, the balancing of them, which is one of the wondrous works of God. They are so balanced, so spread, as that they never rob us of the benefit of the sun, even the cloudy day is day; so balanced as that they do not fall at once, or burst into cataracts or waterspouts. The rainbow is an intimation of God's favour in balancing the clouds so as to keep them from drowning the world. Nay, so are they balanced as that they impartially distribute their showers on the earth, so that one time or other every place has its share. 3rd. We know not how the comfortable change comes when the winter is past, ver. 17. First. How the weather becomes warm after it has been cold. We know how our garment came to be warm upon us; that is, how we came to be warm in our clothes, by reason of the warmth of the air we xxxvi. 32. Our translators understood this to mean that God concealed the sun with clouds coming between it and the earth. Very many other explanations have been given of the Hebrew, which may be thus closely rendered: "He covereth his hands with light, and He commandeth it against an enemy." The original is capable of other versions, every one of which may be defended by plausible reasons. Certainty in such a case is impossible, but the authorised version is as poor as it well could be.

xxxvi. 33. Doubtful in the previous verse, our translators have in this quite failed. The "light" of verse 32 is most likely the flash of lightning, with which God is figured as furnishing or filling His hands, and which He directs against the opposer. The "sound" or "noise" here will then be the thunder, and the first clause offers no difficulty: "His sound declareth concerning Him." The words which follow can only mean that "the cattle show concerning the vapour," which is really unintelligible, and we must make a better version.

breathe in. Without God's blessing we should clothe us and not be warm, Hag i. 6; but, when he so orders it, the clothes are warm upon us which in the extremity of cold weather would not serve to keep us warm. Secondly. How it becomes calm after it has been stormy. "He quieteth the earth with the south wind," when spring comes. As he has a blustering, freezing north wind, so he has a thawing, composing south wind. The Spirit is compared to both, because he both convinceth and comforteth, Cant. iv. 16.

Secondly. That he had no share at all in the first making of the world; ver. 18, "Hast thou with him spread out the sky?" Thou canst not pretend to have stretched it out without him, no, nor to have stretched it out in conjunction with him, for he was far from needing any help, either in contriving or working. The creation of the vast expanse of the visible heavens, (Gen. i. 6—8,) which we see in being to this day, is a glorious instance of the Divine power, considering, 1. That, though it is fluid, yet it is firm. "It is strong," and has its name from its stability. It still is what it was, and suffers no decay, nor shall the ordinances of heaven be altered till the lease expires with time. 2. That, though it is large, it is bright, and most curiously fine. It is "a molten looking-glass," smooth and polished, and without the least flaw or crack; and in which, as in a looking-glass, we may behold the glory of God, and the wisdom of his handywork, Ps. xix. 1. When we look up to heaven above we should remember it is a mirror, or looking-glass, not to shew us our own faces, but to be a faint representation of the purity, dignity, and brightness of the upper world, and its glorious inhabitants.

Thirdly. That neither he nor they were able to speak of God in any proportion to the merit of the subject, ver. 19, 20. 1. He challengeth Job to be their director, if he durst undertake it. He speaks it ironically: "Teach us," if thou canst, "what we shall say unto him." Thou hast a mind to reason with God, and wouldst have us to contend with him on thy behalf, teach us then what we shall say. Canst thou see farther into this abyss than we can? If thou canst, favour us with the discoveries, furnish us with instructions. 2. He owns his own insufficiency both in speaking to God and in speaking of him; "We cannot order our speech by reason of darkness." Note, The best of men are much in the dark concerning the glorious perfections of the Divine nature, and the administrations of the Divine government. They that through grace know much of God, yet it is little, it is nothing, in comparison with what is to be known, and what will be known, when that which is perfect is come, and the veil shall be rent. When we would speak of God, we speak confusedly, and with great uncertainty, and are presently at a loss, and run aground, not for want of matter, but for want of words. And as we must always begin with fear and trembling, lest we speak amiss, (De Deo etiam vera dicere periculosum est,—'Even while affirming what is true concerning God we incur risk,') so we must conclude with shame and blushing, that we have spoken no better. Elihu himself had for his part spoken very well on God's behalf, and yet is so far from expecting a fee, or thinking God was beholden to him for it, or that he was fit to be standing counsel for him, that, 1st. He is even ashamed of what he has said; not of the cause, but of his own management of it; "Shall it be told him that I speak?" Shall it be reported to him as a meritorious piece of service worthy his notice? By no means; let it never be spoken of: for he fears the subject has suffered by his undertaking it, as a fine face is wronged by an ill painter; and his performance is so far from meriting thanks, that it needs pardon. When we have done all we can for God, we must acknowledge that we are unprofitable servants, and have nothing at all to boast of. 2nd. He is afraid of saying any more. "If a man speak," if he undertake to plead for God, much more if he offers to plead against him, "surely he shall be swallowed up." If he speak presumptuously, God's wrath shall soon consume him; but if never so well, he will soon lose himself in the mystery, and be overpowered by the Divine lustre. Astonishment will strike him blind and dumb.

21 And now men see not the bright light which is in the clouds:
But the wind passeth, and cleanseth them
22 Fair weather cometh out of the north:
With God is terrible majesty.
23 Touching the Almighty, we cannot find him out:
He is excellent in power, and in judgment,
And in plenty of justice: he will not afflict.
24 Men do therefore fear him:
He respecteth not any that are wise of heart.

Elihu here concludes his discourse with some short but great sayings concerning the glory of God, as that which he was himself possessed, and desired to possess others with a holy awe of. He speaks concisely and in haste, because it should seem he perceived that God was about to take the work into his own hands.

First. He observes that God, who hath said he will dwell in the thick darkness, and make that his pavilion, (2 Chr. vi. 1; Ps. xviii. 11,) is in that awful chariot advancing towards them, as if he were preparing his throne for judgment, surrounded with clouds and darkness, Ps. xcvii. 2. He saw the cloud with a whirlwind in the bosom of it, coming out of the south, ver. 9; but now it hung so thick, so black over their heads, that they could none of them see the bright light which just before was in the clouds. The light of the sun was now eclipsed; this minded him of the darkness by reason of which he could not speak, ver. 19, and made him afraid to go on, ver. 20. Thus the disciples feared when they entered into a cloud, Lu. ix. 34. Yet he looks to the north, and sees it clear that way, which gives him hopes that the clouds are not gathering for a deluge; they are covered, but not surrounded with them, and he expects that the wind will pass (so it may be read) and cleanse them,—such a wind as passed over the earth to clear it from the waters of Noah's flood, (Gen. viii. 1,) in token of the return of God's favour; and then fair weather will come out of the north, ver. 22, and all will be well. God will not always frown, nor contend for ever.

Secondly. He hastens to conclude, now God is about to speak; and therefore delivers much in a few words, as the sum of all that he had been discoursing of, which, if duly considered, would not only clench the nail he had been driving, but make way for what God would say. 1. That "with God is terrible majesty." He is a God of glory, and such transcendent perfection as cannot but strike an awe upon all his attendants, and a terror upon all his adversaries. 'With God is terrible praise,' so some; for he is "fearful in praises," Ex. xv. 11. 2. That when we speak "touching the Almighty," we must own that "we cannot find him out." Our finite understandings cannot comprehend his infinite perfections. Can we put the sea into an egg-shell? We cannot trace the steps he takes in his providence. "His way is in the sea." 3. That "he is excellent in power." It is the excellency of his power that he can do whatever he pleaseth in heaven and earth. The universal extent and irresistible force of his power are the excellency of it; no creature has an arm like him, so long, so strong. 4. That he is no less excellent in wisdom and righteousness, "in judgment and plenty of justice;" else there would be little excellency in his power. He that can do every thing we may be sure will do every thing for the best, for he is infinitely wise; and will not in any thing do wrong, for he is infinitely just. When he executes judgments upon sinners, yet there is plenty of justice in it, and he inflicts not more than they deserve. 5. That "he will not afflict," that is, he will not afflict willingly. It is no pleasure to him to grieve the children of men, much less his own children. He never afflicts but when there is cause, and when there is need; and he doth not overburthen us with affliction, but considers our frame. Some read it thus: 'The Almighty whom we cannot find out is great in power, but he will not afflict in judgment, and plenty of justice,' nor is extreme to mark what we do amiss. 6. He values not the censures of those that are wise in their own conceit. He respecteth them not, ver. 24. He will not alter his counsels to oblige them, nor can those that prescribe to him prevail with him to do as they would have him do. He regards the prayer of the humble, but not the policies of the crafty. No, the foolishness of God is wiser than men, 1 Cor. i. 25.

Lastly. From all this it is easy to infer that, since God is great, he is greatly to be feared; nay, because he is gracious and will not afflict, "men do therefore fear him," for there is forgiveness with him that he may be feared, Ps. cxxx. 4. It is the duty and interest of all men to fear God: 'men shall fear him,' so some. Sooner or later they shall fear him. They that will not fear the Lord and his goodness shall for ever tremble under the pourings out of the vials of his wrath.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

In most disputes the strife is, who shall have the last word; Job's friends had in this controversy tamely yielded it to Job, and then he to Elihu. But after all the wranglings of the council at bar the judge upon the bench must have the last word, so God had here, and so he will have in every controversy; for every man's judgment proceedeth from him, and by his definitive sentence every man must stand or fall, and every cause be won or lost. Job had often appealed to God, and had talked boldly how he would order his cause before him, and as a prince he would go near unto him; but when God took the throne Job had nothing to say in his own defence, but was silent before him. It is not so easy a matter as some think it to contest with the Almighty. Job's friends had sometimes appealed to God too; O that God would speak! ch. xi. 5. And now, at length, God doth speak, when Job by Elihu's clear and closing arguings was mollified a little and mortified, and so prepared to hear what God had to say. It is the office of ministers to prepare the way of the Lord. That which the great God designs in this discourse is to humble Job, and bring him to repent of and to recant his passionate, indecent expressions concerning God's providential dealings with him: and this he doth by calling upon Job to compare God's eternity with his own time; God's omniscience with his own ignorance, and God's omnipotence with his own impotency. I. He begins with an awakening challenge and demand in general, ver. 2, 3. II. He proceeds in divers particular instances and proofs of Job's utter inability to contend with God, because of his ignorance and weakness; for, 1. He knew nothing of the founding of the earth, ver. 4—7; 2. Nothing of the limiting of the sea, ver. 8—11; 3. Nothing of the morning light, ver. 12—15; 4. Nothing of the dark recesses of the sea and earth, ver. 16—21; 5. Nothing of the springs in the clouds, ver. 22—27, nor the secret counsel by which they are directed; 6. He could do nothing towards the production of the rain, or frost, or lightning, ver. 28—30, 34, 35, 37, 38; nothing towards the directing of the stars and their influences, ver. 31, 33; nothing towards the making of his own soul, ver. 36; and lastly, He could not provide for the lions and ravens, ver. 39—41 If in these ordinary works of nature Job was puzzled, how durst he pretend to dive into the counsels of God's government, and to judge of them? In this, as Bishop Patrick observes, God takes up the argument begun by Elihu, (who came nearest to the truth,) and prosecutes it in inimitable words, excelling his, and all other men's, in the loftiness of the style, as much as thunder doth a whisper.

THEN the LORD answered Job out of the whirlwind and said,
2 Who is this that darkeneth counsel
By words without knowledge?
3 Gird up now thy loins like a man;
For I will demand of thee, and answer thou me.

Let us observe here,

First. Who speaks: "The Lord," Jehovah, not a created angel, but the eternal Word himself, the second person in the blessed Trinity; for it is he by whom the worlds were made, and that was no other but the Son of God. The same speaks here that afterwards spoke from mount Sinai. Here he begins with the creation of the world, there with the redemption of Israel out of Egypt, and from both is inferred the necessity of our subjection to him. Elihu had said that God speaks to men and they do not perceive it, ch. xxxiii. 14. But this they could not but perceive, and yet "we have a more sure word of prophecy," 2 Pet. i. 19.

Secondly. When he spoke: "Then;" when they had all had their saying, and yet had not gained their point, then it was time for God to interpose, whose judgment is according to truth. When we know not who is in the right, and perhaps are doubtful whether we ourselves are, this may satisfy us, that God will determine shortly in the valley of decision, Joel iii. 14. Job had silenced his three friends, and yet could not convince them of his integrity in the main; Elihu had silenced Job, and yet could not bring him to acknowledge his mismanagement of this dispute, but now God comes and doth both; convinceth Job first of his unadvised speaking, and makes him cry peccavi, and, having humbled him, puts honour upon him, by convincing his three friends that they had done him wrong. These two things God will sooner or later do for his people, he will shew them their faults, that they may be themselves ashamed of them, and he will shew others their righteousness, and bring it forth as the light, that they may be ashamed of their unjust censures of them.

Thirdly. How he spoke: "Out of the whirlwind," the rolling and involving cloud, which Elihu took notice of ch. xxxvii. 1, 2, 9. A whirlwind prefaced Ezekiel's vision, Eze. i. 4; and Elijah's, 1 Kin. xix. 11. God is said to have his way in the whirlwind, Nah. i. 3; and, to shew that even the stormy wind fulfils his word, here it was made the vehicle of it. This shews what a mighty voice God's is, that it was not lost, but perfectly audible, even in the noise of a whirlwind. Thus God designed to startle Job, and to command his attention. Sometimes God answers his own people in terrible corrections, as out of the whirlwind, but always in righteousness.

Fourthly. To whom he spoke: He answered Job, directed his speech to him, to convince him of what was amiss, before he cleared him from the unjust aspersions cast upon him. It is God only that can effectually convince of sin, and those shall so be humbled whom he designs to exalt. Those that desire to hear from God, as Job did, shall certainly hear from him at length.

Fifthly. What he said: We may conjecture that Elihu, or some other of the auditory, wrote down verbatim what was delivered out of the whirlwind; for we find, Rev. x. 4, that when the thunders uttered their voices John was prepared to write; or, if it were not written then, yet, the penman of the book

The ordinary sense of the words would be, "cattle also at ascending," which again is unintelligible. We must reject the vowel points, and then we may render the clause "jealousy also against an evil man." The whole verse will then denote that the sound of the thunder is a declaration concerning God, and a token of His anger against the sinner. Much more might be said if space allowed.

xxxvii. 1—5. These verses appear to stand in intimate connection with the preceding.

xxxvii. 10. "The breath of God" is a figurative expression for the cold wind.

xxxvii. 11. This also is an obscure verse. Benisch translates it, "Even when He charges the thick cloud with moisture, His light scattereth the cloud." With verbal differences, several other translators express a closely similar meaning.

xxxvii. 18. "A molten mirror" is better, because mirrors were made of cast metal, polished, and not of glass.

being inspired by the Holy Ghost, we are sure that we have here a very true and exact report of what was said. The Spirit, saith Christ, shall bring to your remembrance, as he did here, what I have said to you. The preface is very searching.

1. God charges him with ignorance and presumption in what he had said; ver. 2, "Who is this" that talks at this rate? Is it Job? What! a man? that weak, foolish, despicable creature, shall he pretend to prescribe to me what I must do, or to quarrel with me for what I have done? Is it Job? What, my servant Job? a perfect and an upright man? Can he so far forget himself, and act unlike himself? Who, where is he, "that darkens counsel thus by words without knowledge?" Let him shew his face if he dare, and stand to what he hath said. Note, Darkening the counsels of God's wisdom with our folly is a great affront and provocation to God. Concerning God's counsels we must own that we are without knowledge. They are a deep which we cannot fathom; we are quite out of our element, out of our aim, when we pretend to account for them; and we are too apt to talk of them as if we understood them, with a great deal of niceness and boldness. But, alas, we do but darken them instead of explaining them. We confound and perplex ourselves and one another, when we dispute of the order of God's decrees, and the designs, and reasons, and methods of his operations of providence and grace. An humble faith and sincere obedience shall see farther and better into the secret of the Lord than all the philosophy of their schools, and the searches of science so called. This first word which God spoke is the most observable, because Job in his repentance fastens upon it as that which did his business, and humbled him, ch. xlii. 3. This he repeated and echoed to, as the arrow that stuck fast in him: I am the fool that have darkened counsel. There was some colour to have turned it upon Elihu, as if God meant him, for he spoke last, and was speaking when the whirlwind began; but Job applied it to himself, as becomes us to do when faithful reproofs are given, and not, as most do, to billet them upon other people.

2. He challenges him to give such proofs of his knowledge as would serve to justify his inquiries into the Divine counsels; ver. 3, "Gird up now thy loins like a stout man;" prepare thyself for the encounter; "I will demand of thee," will put some questions to thee, and answer me if thou canst, before I answer thine. Those that go about to call God to an account must expect to be catechised and called to an account themselves, that they may be made sensible of their ignorance and arrogance. God here puts Job in mind of what he had said, ch. xiii. 22, "Call thou, and I will answer." Now make thy words good.

4 Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the Declare, if thou hast understanding. [earth?
5 Who hath laid the measures thereof, if thou knowest?
Or who hath stretched the line upon it?
6 Whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened?
Or who laid the corner stone thereof:
7 When the morning stars sang together,
And all the sons of God shouted for joy?
8 Or who shut up the sea with doors, [womb?
When it brake forth, as if it had issued out of the 9 When I made the cloud the garment thereof,
And thick darkness a swaddlingband for it,
10 And brake up for it my decreed place,
And set bars and doors,
11 And said, Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further:
And here shall thy proud waves be stayed?

For the humbling of Job, God here shews him his ignorance, even concerning the earth and the sea. Though so near, though so bulky, yet he could give no account of their origination, much less of heaven above, or hell beneath, which are at such a distance, or of the several parts of matter which are so minute; and then, least of all, of the Divine counsels.

First. Concerning the founding of the earth. If he have such a mighty insight as he pretends to have into the counsels of God, let him give some account of the earth he goes upon, which is given to the children of men.

1. Let him tell where he was when this lower world was made, and whether he were advising or assisting in that wonderful work; ver. 4, "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth?" Thy pretensions are high, canst thou pretend to this? Wast thou present when the world was made? See here, 1st. The greatness and glory of God; "I laid the foundations of the earth." This proves him to be the only living and true God, and a God of power, Isa. xl. 21; Jer. x. 11, 12; and encourageth us to trust in him at all times, Isa. li. 13, 16. 2nd. The meanness and contemptibleness of man; "Where wast thou then?" Thou that hast made such a figure among the children of the east, and settest up for an oracle, and a judge of the Divine counsels, where wast thou when the foundations of the earth were laid? So far were we from having any hand in the creation of the world, which might entitle us to a dominion in it, or so much as being witnesses of it, by which we might have gained an insight into it, that we were not then in being. The first man was not, much less were we. It is the honour of Christ that he was present when this was done, Pr. viii. 22, &c.; Jno. i. 1, 2; but we are of yesterday, and know nothing. Let us not, therefore, find fault with the works of God, nor prescribe to him. He did not consult us in making the world, and yet it is well made. Why should we expect then that he should take his measures from us in governing it?

2. Let him describe how this world was made, and give a particular account of the manner and method in which this strong and stately edifice was formed and erected. Declare, if thou hast so much understanding as thou fanciest thyself to have, what were the advances of that work. Those that pretend to have understanding above others ought to give proof of it. Shew me thy faith by thy works, thy knowledge by thy words. Let Job declare if he can,

1st. How the world came to be so finely framed, with so much exactness, and such an admirable symmetry and proportion of all the parts of it, ver. 5. Stand forth and tell who laid the measures thereof, and stretched out the line upon it. Wast thou the architect that formed the model, and then drew the dimensions by rule according to it? The vast bulk of the earth is moulded as regularly as if it had been done by line and measure. But who can describe how it was cast into this figure? who determine its circumference and diameter, and all the lines that are drawn on the terrestrial globe? It is to this day a dispute whether the earth stands still or turns round; how then can we determine by what measures it was first formed?

2nd. How it came to be so firmly fixed. Though it is hung upon nothing, yet it is established that it cannot be moved; but who can tell upon what the foundations of it are fastened, that it may not sink with its own weight; or who laid the corner stone thereof, that the parts of it may not fall asunder, ver. 6. "What God doth it shall be for ever," Eccl. iii. 14; and therefore, as we cannot find fault with God's work, so we need not be in fear concerning it. It will last and answer the end, the works of his providence, as well as the work of creation,—the measures of neither can ever be broken; and the work of redemption is no less firm, of which Christ himself is both the foundation and the corner stone. The church stands as fast as the earth.

3rd. Let him repeat if he can the songs of praise which were sung at that solemnity; ver. 7, "When the morning stars sang together," the blessed angels, (the firstborn of the Father of light,) who in the morning of time shone so bright, as the morning stars, going immediately before the light which, God commanded to shine out of darkness upon the seeds of this lower world, the earth, which was without form and void. They were the sons of God, which shouted for joy when they saw the foundations of the earth laid; because, though it was not made for them, but for the children of men, and though it would increase their work and service, yet they knew the Eternal Wisdom and Word, whom they were to worship, (Heb. i. 6,) would rejoice in the habitable parts of the earth, and much of his delight would be in the sons of men, Pr. viii. 31. The angels are called the sons of God, because they bear much of his image, are with him in his house above, and serve him as a son doth his father. Now observe here, First. The glory of God as the Creator of the world is to be celebrated with joy and triumph by all his reasonable creatures; for they are qualified and appointed to be the collectors of his praises, from the inferior creatures, who can only praise him objectively. Secondly. The work of angels is to praise God; and the more we abound in holy, humble, thankful, joyful praise, the more we do the will of God as they do it; and when we are so barren and defective in praising God, it is a comfort to think that they are doing it in a better manner. Thirdly. They were unanimous in singing God's praises. They sung together with one accord, and there was no jar in their harmony. The sweetest concerts are in praising God. Fourthly. They all did it, even those that afterwards fell, and left their first estate. Even those who have praised God may, by the deceitful power of sin, be brought to blaspheme him, and yet God will be eternally praised.

Secondly. Concerning the limiting of the sea to the place appointed for it, ver. 8, &c. This refers to the third day's work, when God said, Gen. i. 9, "Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and it was so."

1. Out of the great deep, or chaos, in which earth and water were intermixed, in obedience to the Divine command, the waters brake forth like a child out of the teeming womb, ver. 8. Then the waters that had covered the deep, and stood above the mountains, retired with precipitation; at God's rebuke they fled, Ps. civ. 6, 7.

2. This new-born babe is clothed and swaddled, ver. 9. The cloud is made the garment thereof, with which it is covered, and thick darkness; that is, shores vastly remote and distant from one another, and quite in the dark one to another, are a swaddling band for it. See with what ease the great God manageth the raging sea; notwithstanding the violence of its tides, and strength of its billows, he manageth it as the nurse doth the child in swaddling clothes. It is not said he made rocks and mountains its swaddling bands, but clouds and darkness; something that we are not aware of, and would think least likely for such a purpose.

3. There is a cradle too provided for this babe; "I brake up for it my decreed place," ver. 10. Valleys were sunk for it in the earth, capacious enough to receive it, and there it is laid to sleep; and if it be sometimes tossed with winds, that, as Bishop Patrick observes, is but the rocking of a cradle, which makes it sleep the faster. As for the sea, so for every one of us, there is a decreed place; for he that determined the times before appointed determined also the bounds of our habitation.

4. This babe being made unruly and dangerous by the sin of man, which was the original of all unquietness and danger in this lower world, there is also a prison provided for it; bars and doors are set, ver. 10. And it is said to it, by way of check to its insolence, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no farther." The sea is God's, for he made it, he restrains it; he saith to it, "Here shall thy proud waves be stayed," ver. 11. This may be considered as an act of God's power over the sea. Though so vast a body, and its motion sometimes extremely violent, yet God has it under check; its waves rise no higher, its tides roll no farther, than God permits, and it is mentioned as a reason why we should stand in awe of God, Jer. v. 22, and yet why we should encourage ourselves in him; for he that stops the noise of the sea, even the noise of her waves, can when he pleaseth still the tumult of the people, Ps. lxv. 7. It is also to be looked upon as an act of God's mercy to the world of mankind, and an instance of his patience towards that provoking race. Though he could easily cover the earth again with the waters of the sea, (and methinks every flowing tide twice a day threatens us, and shews what the sea could do, and would do, if God would give it leave,) yet he restrains them, being not willing that any should perish, and having reserved the world that now is unto fire, 2 Pet. iii. 7.

12 Hast thou commanded the morning since thy days;
And caused the dayspring to know his place;
13 That it might take hold of the ends of the earth,
That the wicked might be shaken out of it?
14 It is turned as clay to the seal;
And they stand as a garment.
15 And from the wicked their light is withholden,
And the high arm shall be broken.
16 Hast thou entered into the springs of the sea?
Or hast thou walked in the search of the depth?
17 Have the gates of death been opened unto thee?
Or hast thou seen the doors of the shadow of death?
18 Hast thou perceived the breadth of the earth?
Declare if thou knowest it all.
19 Where is the way where light dwelleth?
And as for darkness, where is the place thereof, 20 That thou shouldest take it to the bound thereof, xxxvii. 22. For "fair weather" the Hebrew is "gold," whence some have thought gold really meant; but it is more probable that golden-tinted skies are signified. Possibly the reference is to the Aurora Borealis. Rodwell translates, "When after the north wind he comes forth in golden brightness," but this is somewhat fanciful.

xxxviii. 6. For "foundations" in the text our translators have put "sockets" in the margin, but as the word really means a basis or pedestal, "foundations" may remain in the text.

xxxviii. 7. In this verse "morning stars" and "sons of God" are usually understood to mean personal angels. It is, however, possible that the harmony of the universe, "the music of the spheres," may be intended. Some think the two ideas are expressed, and we regard it as probable.

xxxviii. 14. An obscure verse. The first clause refers plainly to the mode of making impressions upon clay by means of revolving seals. The other clause is literally enough rendered "they stand

And that thou shouldest know the paths to the house
21 Knowest thou it, because thou wast then born? [thereof?
Or because the number of thy days is great?
22 Hast thou entered into the treasures of the snow?
Or hast thou seen the treasures of the hail,
23 Which I have reserved against the time of trouble,
Against the day of battle and war?
24 By what way is the light parted,
Which scattereth the east wind upon the earth?

The Lord proceeds here to ask Job a great many very puzzling questions, to convince him of his ignorance, and so to shame him for his folly, in prescribing to God. If we will but pose ourselves with such interrogatories as these, we shall soon be brought to own that what we know is nothing in comparison with that which we know not. Job is here challenged to give an account of six things:

First. Of the springs of the morning, the dayspring from on high, ver. 12—15. As there is no visible being of which we may be more firmly assured that it is so, there is none which we are more puzzled in describing, nor more doubtful in determining what it is, than the light. We welcome the morning, and are glad of the dayspring; but, 1. It is not commanded since our days, but what it is it was long before we were born, so that it was neither made by us, nor designed primarily for us; but we take it as we find it, and as the many generations had it that went before us. The dayspring knew its place before we knew ours, for we are but of yesterday. 2. It was not we, it was not any man, that commanded the morning light at first, nor appointed the place of its springing up, and shining forth, nor the time of it. The constant and regular succession of day and night was no contrivance of ours; it is the glory of God that it shews, and his handywork, not ours, Ps. xix. 1, 2. 3. It is quite out of our power to alter this course; "Hast thou commanded the morning since thy days?" hast thou at any time raised the morning light sooner than its appointed time, to serve thy purpose, when thou hast waited for the morning? or ordered the dayspring for thy convenience to any other place but its own? No, never; why then wilt thou pretend to direct the Divine counsels, or expect to have the methods of Providence altered in favour of thee? We may as soon break the covenant of the day and of the night, as any part of God's covenant with his people, and particularly that, "I will chasten them with the rod of men." 4. It is God that has appointed the dayspring to visit the earth, and diffuseth the morning light through the air, which receives it as readily as the clay doth the seal, ver. 14, immediately admitting the impressions of it, so as of a sudden to be all over enlightened by it, as the seal stamps its image on the wax; and they stand as a garment, or as if they were clothed with a garment. The earth puts on a new face every morning, and dresseth itself as we do; puts on light as a garment, and is then to be seen. 5. This is made a terror to evil-doers. Nothing more comfortable to mankind than the light of the morning; it is pleasant to the eyes, it is serviceable to life and the business of it, and the favour of it is universally extended, for it "takes hold of the ends of the earth;" and how welcome it is to the earth is what we should dwell upon in our hymns to the light. But God here observes how unwelcome it is to those that do evil, and therefore hate the light. God makes the light a minister of his justice as well as of his mercy; it is designed to shake the wicked out of the earth, and for that purpose it takes hold of the ends of it, as we take hold of the ends of a garment to shake the dust and moths out of it. Job had observed what a terror the morning light is to criminals, because it discovers them, ch. xxiv. 13, &c.; and God here seconds the observation, and asks him whether the world was indebted to him for that kindness? No; the great Judge of the world sends forth the beams of the morning light as his messengers to detect criminals, that they may not only be defeated in their purposes, and put to shame, but that they may be brought to condign punishment, ver. 15; that their light may be withholden from them; that is, that they may lose their comfort, their confidence, their liberties, their lives, and that their high arm, which they have lifted up against God and man, may be broken, and they deprived of their power to do mischief. Whether what is here said of the morning light was designed to represent, as in a figure, the light of the Gospel of Christ, and to give a type of it, I will not say; but I am sure it may serve to put us in mind of the encomiums given to the Gospel, just at the rising of its morning star, by Zecharias in his Benedictus, Lu. i. 78: By "the tender mercy of our God the Dayspring from on high hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness," whose hearts are turned to it as clay to the seal, 2 Cor. iv. 6. And by the Virgin Mary in her Magnificat, Lu. i. 51; shewing that God in his Gospel hath shewed strength with his arm, scattered the proud, and put down the mighty; by that light he designed to shake the wicked, to shake wickedness itself out of the earth, and break its high arm.

Secondly. Of the springs of the sea; ver. 16, "Hast thou entered into them, or hast thou walked in the search of the depth?" knowest thou what lies in the bottom of the sea, the treasures there hid in the sands? or canst thou give an account of the rise and original of the waters of the sea? Vapours are continually exhaled out of the sea; dost thou know how the recruits are raised by which it is continually supplied? Rivers are constantly poured into the sea; dost thou know how they are continually discharged, so as not to overflow the earth? Art thou acquainted with the secret subterraneous passages by which the waters circulate? God's way in the government of the world is said to be in the sea, and in the great waters, Ps. lxxvii. 19; intimating that it is hid from us, and not to be pried into by us.

Thirdly. Of the gates of death; Have those been opened to thee? ver. 17. Death is a grand secret. 1. We know not beforehand when and how and by what means we or others shall be brought to death; by what road we must go the way whence we shall not return; what disease, or what disaster, will be the door to let us into "the house appointed for all living;" "man knows not his time." 2. We cannot describe what death is, how the knot is untied between body and soul, nor how "the spirit of a man goes upward," Eccl. iii. 21, to 'be we know not what, and live we know not how,' as Mr. Norris expresseth it: 'With what dreadful curiosity,' saith he, 'doth the soul launch out into the vast ocean of eternity, and resign to an untried abyss!' Let us make it sure that the gates of heaven shall be opened to us on the other side death, and then we need not fear the opening of the gates of death, though it is a way we are to go but once. 3. We have no correspondence at all with separate souls, nor any acquaintance with their state. It is an unknown, undiscovered region to which they are removed; we can neither hear from them nor send to them. While we are here in a world of sense, we speak of the world of spirits as blind men do of colours, and when we remove thither shall be amazed to find how much we were mistaken.

Fourthly. Of the breadth of the earth; ver. 18, Hast thou perceived that? The knowledge of this might seem most level to him, and within his reach; yet he is challenged to declare this if he can. We have our residence on the earth, God has given it to the children of men; but whoever surveyed it, or could give an account of the number of its acres? It is but a point to the universe; yet, as small as it is, we cannot be exact in declaring the dimensions of it. Job had never sailed round the world, nor any before him; so little did men know the breadth of the earth, that it was but a few ages ago that the vast continent of America was discovered, which had time out of mind lain hid. The Divine perfection is "longer than the earth, and broader than the sea;" it is, therefore, presumption for us, who perceive not the breadth of the earth, to dive into the depth of God's counsels.

Fifthly. Of the place and way of light and darkness. Of the dayspring he had spoken before, ver. 12; and he returns to speak of it again, ver. 19, "Where is the way where light dwells?" and again, ver. 24, "By what way is the light parted?" He challengeth him to describe,

1. How the light and darkness were at first made. When God in the beginning first spread "darkness upon the face of the deep," and afterwards "commanded the light to shine out of darkness," by that mighty word, "Let there be light," was Job a witness to the order, to the operation? Can he tell where the fountains of light and darkness are, and where those mighty princes keep their courts distinct, while in one world they rule alternately? Though we long never so much either for the shining forth of the morning or the shadows of the evening, we know not whither to send or go to fetch them, nor can tell "the paths to the house thereof," ver. 20. We were not then born, nor is the number of our days so great that we can describe the birth of that firstborn of the visible creation, ver. 21. Shall we then undertake to discourse of God's counsels, which were from eternity, or to find out the paths to the house thereof, to solicit for the alteration of them? God glories in it that he forms the light, and creates the darkness; and if we must take those as we find them, take those as they come, and quarrel with neither, but make the best of both, then we must, in like manner, accommodate ourselves to the peace and the evil which God likewise created, Isa. xlv. 7.

2. How they still keep their turns interchangeably. It is God that "makes the outgoings of the morning and of the evening to rejoice," Ps. lxv. 8; for it is his order, and no order of ours, that is executed by the outgoings of the morning light, and the darkness of the night. We cannot so much as tell from whence they come, or whither they go; ver. 24, "By what way is the light parted" in the morning, when in an instant it shoots itself into all the parts of the air, above the horizon, as if the morning light flew upon the wings of an east wind, so swiftly, so strongly is it carried, scattering the darkness of the night as the east wind doth the clouds. Hence we read of the wings of the morning, Ps. cxxxix. 9; on which the light is conveyed to the uttermost parts of the sea, and scattered like an east wind upon the earth. It is a mighty change that passeth over us every morning by the return of the light, and every evening by the return of the darkness; but we expect them, and so they are no surprise or uneasiness to us. If we would in like manner count upon changes in our outward condition, we should neither in the brightest noon count upon perpetual day nor in the darkest midnight despair of the return of the morning. "God hath set the one over against the other," like the day and night, and so must we, Eccl. vii. 14.

Sixthly. Of the treasures of the snow and hail; ver. 22, 23, Hast thou entered into those, and taken a view of them? In the clouds the snow and hail are generated, and thence they come in such abundance, that one would think there were treasures of them laid up in store there, whereas indeed they are produced, ex tempore,—'suddenly,' as I may say, and pro re nata,—'for the occasion.' And sometimes they come so opportunely to serve the purposes of providence in God's fighting for his people, and against his and their enemies, that one would think they were laid up as magazines, or stores of arms, ammunition, and provisions, against "the time of trouble, the day of battle and war;" when God will either contend with the world in general, as in the deluge, when the windows of heaven were opened, and the waters fetched out of these treasures to drown a wicked world that waged war with heaven, or with some particular person, or parties, as when God out of these treasures fetched great hailstones wherewith to fight against the Canaanites, Jos. x. 11. See what folly it is to strive against God who is thus prepared for battle and war, and how much it is our interest to make our peace with him, and to keep ourselves in his love. God can fight as effectually with snow and hail, if he pleases, as with thunder and lightning, or the sword of an angel.

25 Who hath divided a watercourse for the overflowing of
Or a way for the lightning of thunder; [waters, 26 To cause it to rain on the earth, where no man is;
On the wilderness, wherein there is no man;
27 To satisfy the desolate and waste ground;
And to cause the bud of the tender herb to spring forth?
28 Hath the rain a father?
Or who hath begotten the drops of dew?
29 Out of whose womb came the ice?
And the hoary frost of heaven, who hath gendered it?
30 The waters are hid as with a stone,
And the face of the deep is frozen.
31 Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades,
Or loose the bands of Orion?
32 Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his season?
Or canst thou guide Arcturus with his sons?
33 Knowest thou the ordinances of heaven?
Canst thou set the dominion thereof in the earth?
34 Canst thou lift up thy voice to the clouds,
That abundance of waters may cover thee?
35 Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go,
And say unto thee, Here we are?
36 Who hath put wisdom in the inward parts?
Or who hath given understanding to the heart?

like a garment," but the allusion is uncertain, though probably it is to the beautiful array in which all things appear. The field of Nature is not only covered with wonderful forms, but clothed in various hues, constituting a scene of life and beauty.

xxxviii. 21. This may be either a question or it may be spoken ironically. According to the former mode of rendering it, it is the same as asking Job whether he had lived long enough to understand where the abode of light was, or whether he had an existence when it was created, and knew where its home was appointed. According to the latter mode, it is keen sarcasm. A good many expositors follow this latter course, and the arrangement and form of the sentence favour their opinion, although our version may be reasonably justified.

xxxviii. 22, 23. The word for "treasures," like our word "store," denotes both the place where things are deposited and the things themselves. Here the snow and hail are set forth, like other natural

Or who can stay the bottles of heaven,
38 When the dust groweth into hardness,
And the clods cleave fast together?
39 Wilt thou hunt the prey for the lion?
Or fill the appetite of the young lions,
40 When they couch in their dens,
And abide in the covert to lie in wait?
41 Who provideth for the raven his food?
When his young ones cry unto God,
They wander for lack of meat.

ANCIENT ZODIACS.

Hitherto God had put such questions to Job as were proper to convince him of his ignorance and shortsightedness. Now he comes in the same manner to shew his impotency and weakness. As it is but little that he knows, and therefore he ought not to arraign the Divine counsels, so it is but little he can do, and therefore he ought not to oppose the proceedings of Providence. Let him consider what great things God doth, and try whether he can do the like, or whether he thinks himself an equal match for him.

First. God has thunder, and lightning, and rain, and frost at command; but Job has not, and therefore let him not dare to compare with God, or to contest with him. Nothing is more uncertain than what weather it shall be, nor more out of our reach to appoint, but it shall be what weather pleaseth God, not what pleaseth us; unless, as becomes us, whatever pleaseth God pleaseth us. Concerning this, observe here,

1. How great God is, 1st. He has a sovereign dominion over the waters, has appointed them their course, even then when they seem to overflow, and to be from under his check; ver. 25, he has divided a watercourse; directs the rain where to fall, even when the shower is most violent, with as much certainty as if it were conveyed by canals or conduit-pipes. Thus the hearts of kings are said to be in God's hand; and, as the rains, those rivers of God, he turneth them whithersoever he will. Every drop goes as it is directed. God has "sworn that the waters of Noah shall no more return to cover the earth;" and we see he is able to make good what he has promised, for he has the rain in a watercourse. 2nd. He hath dominion over the lightning and the thunder, which go not at random, but in the way that he directs them; and they are mentioned here, because he "prepares the lightnings for the rain," Ps. cxxxv. 7. Let not those that fear God be afraid of the lightning or the thunder; for they are not blind bullets, but go the way that God himself directs them, who means no hurt to them. 3rd. In directing the course of the rain, he doth not neglect the wilderness nor the desert land; ver. 26, 27, "where no man is." First. No man to be employed in taking care of the products. God's providence reaches farther than man's industry. If he had not more kindness for many of the inferior creatures than man has it would go ill with them. God can make the earth fruitful without any art or pains of ours, as, Gen. ii. 5, 6, when "there was not a man to till the ground, yet there went up a mist, and watered it;" but we cannot make it fruitful without God, it is he that gives the increase. Secondly. Where there is no man to be provided for, or to take the benefit of the fruits that are produced. Though God doth with a very peculiar favour visit and regard man, yet he doth not overlook the inferior creatures, but causeth "the bud of the tender herb to spring forth for food for all flesh, as well as for the service of man." Even the wild asses shall have their thirst quenched, Ps. civ. 11. God has enough for all, and wonderfully provides even for those creatures that man neither hath service from nor makes provision for. 4th. He is in a sense the father of the rain, ver. 28. It has no other father. He produceth it by his power, he governs and directs it, and makes what use he pleaseth of it. Even the small drops of the dew he distils upon the earth as the God of nature, and as the God of grace rains righteousness upon us; and is himself as the dew unto Israel: see Hos. xiv. 5, 6; Mic. v. 7. 5th. The ice and the frost, by which the waters are congealed and the earth incrustated, are produced by his providence, ver. 29, 30. These are very common things, which lessens the strangeness of them; but considering what a mighty change is made by them in a very little time,—how the waters are hid as with a stone, as with a gravestone laid upon them, so thick, so strong, is the ice that covers them, and the face even of the deep is sometimes frozen, we may well ask, "Out of whose womb came the ice?" What created power could produce such a wonderful work? No power but that of the Creator himself. Frost and snow come from him, and therefore should lead our thoughts and meditations to him, who doth such great things past finding out; and we shall the easier bear the inconveniences of winter weather if we learn to make this good use of it.

2. Observe, how weak man is. Can he do such things as these? Could Job? No; ver. 35, 36. 1st. He cannot command one shower of rain for the relief of himself or his friends. "Canst thou lift up thy voice to the clouds," those bottles of heaven, "that abundance of waters may cover thee," to water thy fields when they are dry and parched? If we lift up our voice to God to pray for rain, we may have it, Zec. x. 1; but, if we lift up our voice to the clouds to demand it, they will soon tell us they are not at our beck, and we shall go without it, Jer. xiv. 22. The heavens will not hear the earth unless God hear them, Hos. ii. 21. See what poor, indigent, depending creatures we are; we cannot do without rain, nor can we have it when we will. 2nd. He cannot commission one flash of lightning, if he had a mind to make use of it for the terror of his enemies; ver. 35, "Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go" on thine errand, and do the execution thou wishest for? will they come at thy call, "and say unto thee, Here we are?" No, the ministers of God's wrath will not be ministers of ours. Why should they, since "the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God?" see Ja. ix. 55.

Secondly. God has the stars of heaven under his command and cognizance, and that we have not. Our meditations are now to rise higher, far above the clouds, to the glorious lights above. He instanceth not in the planets, which move in lower orbs, but in the fixed stars which are much higher. It is supposed that they have an influence upon this earth, notwithstanding their vast distance, not upon the minds of men, or the events of providence,—men's fate is not determined by their stars,—but upon the ordinary course of nature: they are set for signs and seasons, for days and years, Gen. i. 14; and if the stars have such a dominion over this earth, as it is called here, ver. 33, though they have their place in the heavens, and are but mere matter, much more has He who is their Maker and ours, and who is an eternal mind. Now see how weak we are

1. We cannot alter the influences of the stars, ver. 31, not theirs that are instrumental to produce the pleasures of the spring; "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades?" the seven stars, that constellation which lies in so small a compass, (none in less,) and yet sheds very benign influences upon the earth. Nor can we alter theirs that introduce the rigour of the winter. "Canst thou loose the bands of Orion?" that magnificent constellation, that makes so great a figure, (none greater,) dispenseth rough and unpleasing influences which we cannot control or repel. Both summer and winter will have their course; God can change them when he pleaseth, can make the summer cold, and so "bind the sweet influences of Pleiades," and the winter warm, and so "loose the bands of Orion," but we cannot.

2. It is not in our power to order the motions of the stars, nor are we intrusted with the conduct of them. God, who calleth the stars by their names, Ps. cxlvii. 4, calls them forth in their respective seasons, appoints them the time of their rising and setting; but this is none of our province, we cannot bring forth Mazzaroth, the stars in the southern signs, nor guide Arcturus, those in the northern, ver. 32. God can bring forth the stars to battle as he did when in their courses they fought against Sisera, and guide them in the attacks they are ordered to make; but man cannot do so.

3. We are not only unconcerned in the government of the stars, the government they are under, and the government they are intrusted with, (for they both rule and are ruled,) but utterly unacquainted with it; we know not the ordinances of heaven, ver. 33. So far are we from being able to change them, that we can give no account of them; they are a secret to us. Shall we then pretend to know God's counsels, and the reasons of them? If it were left to us to "set the dominion of the stars upon the earth," we should soon be at a loss. Shall we then teach God how to govern the world?

Thirdly. God is the author and giver, the father and fountain, of all wisdom and understanding, ver. 36. The souls of men are nobler and more excellent beings than the stars of heaven themselves, and shine brighter. The powers and faculties of reason with which man is endued, and the wonderful performances of thought, bring him into some alliance to the blessed angels; and whence comes this light but from the Father of lights? Who, but he, hath put wisdom into the inward parts of man, and given understanding to the heart? 1. The rational soul itself, and its capacities, come from him as the God of nature; for he "formeth the spirit of man within him." We did not make our own souls, nor can we describe how they act, or how they are united to our bodies. He only that made them knows them, and knows how to manage them; "he fashioneth men's hearts alike" in some things, and yet unlike in others. 2. True wisdom, its furniture and improvement, come from him as the God of grace, and the founder of every good and perfect gift. Shall we pretend to be wiser than God, who have all our wisdom from him? Nay, shall we pretend to be wise above our sphere, and beyond the limits which he that gave us our understanding sets to it? He designed we should with it serve God and do our duty; but never intended we should with it set up for directors of the stars or the lightning.

Fourthly. God has the clouds under his cognizance and government; but so have not we, ver. 37. Can any man, with all his wisdom, undertake to number the clouds? Or, as it may be read, to declare and describe the nature of them? Though they are near us, in our own atmosphere, yet we know little more of them than of the stars which are at so great a distance And when the clouds have poured down rain in abundance, so that the dust grows into solid mire, and the clods cleave fast together, ver. 38, "Who can stay the bottles of heaven?" Who can stop them, that it may not always rain? The power and goodness of God is herein to be acknowledged that he gives the earth rain enough, but doth not surfeit it; softens it, but doth not drown it; makes it fit for the plough, but not unfit for the seed. As we cannot command a shower of rain, so we cannot command a fair day without God; so necessary, so constant, is our dependence on him.

Fifthly. God provides food for the inferior creatures; and it is by his providence, not by any care or pains of ours, that they are fed. The following chapter is wholly taken up with the instances of God's power and goodness about animals; and therefore some transfer the three last verses of this chapter to it, which speak of the provision made,

1. For the lions, ver. 39, 40. Thou dost not pretend that the clouds and stars have any dependence upon thee, for they are above thee, but on the earth thou thinkest thyself paramount; let us try that then. "Wilt thou hunt the prey for the lion?" Thou valuest thyself upon thy possessions of cattle which thou wast once owner of, the oxen, and asses, and camels, that were fed at thy crib; but wilt thou undertake the maintenance of the lions, and the young lions, when they couch in their dens, waiting for a prey? No, thou needest not do it, they can shift for themselves without thee. Thou canst not do it, for thou hast not wherewithal to satisfy them. Thou darest not do it,—shouldest thou come to feed them, they would seize upon thee; but I do it. See the all-sufficiency of the Divine providence, it has wherewithal to "satisfy the desire of every living thing," even the most ravenous. See the bounty of the Divine providence, that wherever it has given life will give livelihood, even to those creatures that are not only not serviceable but dangerous to man. And see its sovereignty, that it suffers some creatures to be killed for the support of other creatures; the harmless sheep are torn to pieces to fill the appetite of the young lions, who yet sometimes are made to lack and suffer hunger, to punish them for their cruelty, while those that fear God want no good thing.

2. For the young ravens, ver. 41. As ravenous beasts, so ravenous birds, are fed by the Divine providence. "Who" but God "provides for the raven his food?" Man doth not; he takes care only of these creatures that are or may be useful to him; but God has a regard to all the works of his hands, even the meanest and least valuable. The ravens, young ones, are in a special manner necessitous, and God supplies them, Ps. cxlvii. 9. God's feeding the fowls, especially these fowls, Mat. vi. 26, is an encouragement to us to trust him for our daily bread. See here, 1. What distress the young ravens are often in; "they wander for lack of meat." The old ones, they say, neglect them, and do not provide for them as other birds do for their young; and, indeed, those that are ravenous to others are commonly barbarous to their own, and unnatural. 2. What they are supposed to do in that distress. They cry, for they are noisy, clamorous creatures, and this is interpreted "crying to God." It being the phenomena, as ministers of God's will, and illustrative of His wisdom, power, and authority. Man has no influence in regard to them.

xxxviii. 24. Our version of this text must be doubted It seems to make the appearance of light the cause of the east wind. The idea is that the courses of the light and of the east wind are alike beyond human comprehension. The question is a double one: By what means is the light distributed? and by what means does the east wind break out upon earth?

xxxviii. 30. For "the waters are hid as a stone," we must translate "are congealed like stone."

xxxviii. 31, 32. Some of these astronomical terms occur in chap. ix. 9. The word Mazzaroth is usually understood of the signs of the Zodiac. The "sons" of Arcturus are the stars which accompany that constellation, or the three stars in the tail of the Great Bear.

xxxviii. 33. "The ordinances of heaven" are the regulations or laws by which celestial bodies are governed.

cry of nature, it is looked upon as directed to the God of nature. The putting of so favourable a construction as this upon the cries of the young ravens may encourage us in our prayers, though we can but cry, Abba, Father. 3. What God doth for them. Some way or other he provides for them, so that they grow up and come to maturity. And he that takes this care of the young ravens certainly will not be wanting to his people or theirs. This, being but one instance of many of the Divine compassion, may give us occasion to think how much good our God doth every day beyond what we are aware of.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

God proceeds here to shew Job what little reason he had to charge him with unkindness, who was so compassionate to the inferior creatures, and took such a tender care of them; or to boast of himself and his own good deeds before God, which were nothing to the Divine mercies. He shews him also what great reason he had to be humble, who knew so little of the nature of the creatures about him, and had so little influence upon them, and to submit to that God on whom they all depend. He discourseth particularly, I. Concerning the wild goats and the hinds, ver. 1—4. II. Concerning the wild ass, ver. 5—8. III. Concerning the unicorn, ver. 9—12. IV. Concerning the peacock, ver. 12. V. Concerning the ostrich, ver. 13—18. VI. Concerning the horse, ver. 19—25. VII. Concerning the hawk and the eagle, ver. 26—30.

1 KNOWEST thou the time when the wild goats of the rock bring forth?
Or canst thou mark when the hinds do calve?
2 Canst thou number the months that they fulfil?
Or knowest thou the time when they bring forth?
3 They bow themselves, they bring forth their young ones,
They cast out their sorrows. [corn;
4 Their young ones are in good liking, they grow up with
They go forth, and return not unto them.
5 Who hath sent out the wild ass free?
Or who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass?

SYRIAN ASS.

6 Whose house I have made the wilderness,
And the barren land his dwellings.
7 He scorneth the multitude of the city,
Neither regardeth he the crying of the driver.
8 The range of the mountains is his pasture,
And he searcheth after every green thing.
9 Will the unicorn be willing to serve thee,
Or abide by thy crib?
10 Canst thou bind the unicorn with his band in the furrow?
Or will he harrow the vallies after thee?
11 Wilt thou trust him, because his strength is great?
Or wilt thou leave thy labour to him?
12 Wilt thou believe him, that he will bring home thy seed,
And gather it into thy barn?

God here shews Job what a little acquaintance he had with the untamed creatures that run wild in the deserts, and lived at large, but were the care of the Divine providence; as,

First. The wild goats and the hinds. That which is taken notice of concerning them is the bringing forth and bringing up of their young ones. For, as every individual is fed, so every species of animals is preserved, by the care of the Divine providence, and, for aught we know, none extinct to this day. Observe here,

1. Concerning the production of their young. 1st. Man is wholly ignorant of the time when they bring forth, ver. 1, 2. Shall we pretend to tell what is in the womb of Providence, or what a day will bring forth, who know not the time of the pregnancy of a hind, or a wild goat? 2nd. Though they bring forth their young with a great deal of difficulty and sorrow, and have no assistance from man, yet, by the good providence of God they get through it; their young ones are safely produced, and their sorrows cast out and forgotten, ver. 3. Some think it is intimated, Ps. xxix. 9, that God by thunder helps the hinds in calving. Let it be observed, for the comfort of women in labour, that God helps even the hinds to bring forth their young; and shall he not much more succour them, and save them in child-bearing, who are his children in covenant with him?

2. Concerning the growth of their young; ver. 4, "they are in good liking," though they are brought forth in sorrow. After their dams have suckled them a while, they shift for themselves in the corn-fields, and are no more burthensome to them, which is an example to children, when they are grown up, not to be always hanging upon their parents, and craving from them, but to put forth themselves to get their own livelihood, and to requite their parents.

Secondly. The wild ass. A creature we frequently read of in Scripture; some say untameable. Man is said to be born as the wild ass's colt, so hard to be governed. Three things Providence has allotted to the wild ass: 1. An unbounded liberty; ver. 5, "Who" but God "hath sent out the wild ass free?" He hath given a disposition to it, and therefore a dispensation for it. The tame ass is bound to labour, the wild ass has no bonds on him. Note, Freedom from service, and liberty to range at pleasure, is but the privilege of a wild ass. It is pity any of the children of men should covet it, or value themselves by it. It is better labour and be good for something, than ramble and be good for nothing. But if among men Providence sets some at liberty, and suffers them to live at ease while others are doomed to servitude, we must not marvel at the matter, it is so among the brute creatures. 2. An unenclosed lodging; ver. 6, "Whose house I have made the wilderness," where he has room enough to traverse his ways, and snuff up the wind at his pleasure, as the wild ass is said to do, Jer. ii. 24, as if he were to live upon air, for it is the barren land that is his dwelling. Observe, The tame ass that labours, and is serviceable to man, has his master's crib to go to both for shelter and food, and lives in a fruitful land; but the wild ass that will have his liberty must have it in a barren land. He that will not labour let him not eat. He that will, shall eat the labour of his hands, and have also to give to him that needeth. Jacob the shepherd has good red pottage to spare, when Esau a sportsman was ready to perish for hunger. A farther description of the liberty and livelihood of the wild ass we have, ver. 7, 8. First. He has no owner, nor will he be in subjection. "He scorneth the multitude of the city." If they attempt to take him, and in order to that surround him with a multitude, he will soon get clear of them, and the crying of the driver is nothing to him. He laughs at those that live in the tumult and bustle of cities, (so Bishop Patrick,) thinking himself happier in the wilderness; and opinion is the rate of things. Secondly. Having no owner, he has no feeder, nor is any provision made for him, but he must shift for himself. "The range of the mountains is his pasture," and a bare pasture it is; there he searcheth after here and there a green thing as he can find it, and pick it up; whereas the labouring asses have green things in plenty, without their searching for them. From the untameableness of this and other creatures, we may infer how unfit we are to give law to Providence, who cannot give law even to a wild ass's colt.

Thirdly. The unicorn. Rhem, a 'strong' creature; Num. xxiii. 22, a stately proud creature, Ps. xcii. 10; he is able to serve, but not willing, and God here challenges Job to force him to it. Job expected every thing should be just as he would have it. Since thou dost pretend, saith God, to bring every thing to thy bow, begin with the unicorn, and try thy skill upon him. Now thine oxen and asses are all gone, try whether he will be willing to serve thee in their stead, ver. 9, and whether he will take up with the provision thou usedst to make for them; "Will he abide by thy crib?" No. 1. Thou canst not tame him; not bind him with his band, nor set him to draw the harrow, ver. 10. There are creatures that are willing to serve man, and seem to take a pleasure in it, and to have a love for their masters; but there are such as will never be brought to it. And it is the effect of sin. Man is revolted from his subjection to his Maker, and is therefore justly punished with the revolt of the inferior creatures from their subjection to him; and yet, as an instance of God's good will to man, there are some that are still serviceable to him. Though the wild bull (which some think is meant here by the unicorn) will not serve man, nor submit to his band in the furrows, yet there are tame bullocks that will, and other animals that are not feræ naturæ,—'of a wild nature,' in whom man may have a property, for whom he provides, and to whose service he is entitled. "Lord, what is man, that thou art thus mindful of him?" 2. Thou darest not trust him. Though his strength is great, yet thou wilt not leave thy labour to him as thou dost with thine asses or oxen, whom a little child may lead or drive, leaving to them all the pains. Thou wilt never depend upon the wild bull as likely to come to thy harvest work, much less to go through it, to "bring home thy seed, and gather it into thy barn," ver. 11, 12. And, because he will not serve about the corn, he wants the many good bits which the tame ox hath, whose mouth was not to be muzzled in treading out the corn; but therefore he will not draw the plough, because He that made him never designed him for it. A disposition to labour is as much the gift of God as an ability for it. And it is a great mercy if, where God gives strength for service, he gives a heart; and it is what we should pray for, and reason ourselves into, which the brutes cannot do; for, as among beasts, so among men, those may justly be reckoned wild and abandoned to the deserts that have no mind either to take pains or to do good.

13 Gavest thou the goodly wings unto the peacocks?
Or wings and feathers unto the ostrich?

OSTRICH.

xxxviii. 37. The word translated "stay" means to hold in a sloping position, and the sense is, therefore, Who can cause the clouds to discharge their contents? Connected with the following verse, the idea is that man cannot control the rain, however it may be needed, or whenever it comes.

xxxix. 1. The wild goat of the rock is the mountain goat or ibex, which is found in the Sinaitic peninsula and the surrounding regions.

xxxix. 5—8. The wild ass is less widely disseminated than formerly. Dr. Tristram says it is "rarely now found west of the Hauran (Bashan), nor do we find it in the Sinaitic wilderness."

xxxix. 9. The word "unicorn," here and elsewhere, represents the Hebrew reem. Our translators follow the renderings of the Septuagint and of the Vulgate, which in the opinion of most modern critics are wrong. Some think the oryx, a species of antelope, is meant, but it is more generally thought that the reem was a sort of buffalo or wild ox.

14 Which leaveth her eggs in the eart ,
And warmeth them in dust,
15 And forgetteth that the foot may crush them,
Or that the wild beast may break them.
16 She is hardened against her young ones, as though they were not her's:
Her labour is in vain without fear;
17 Because God hath deprived her of wisdom,
Neither hath he imparted to her understanding.
18 What time she lifteth up herself on high,
She scorneth the horse and his rider.

The ostrich is a wonderful animal, a very large bird, but never flies. Some have called it a winged camel. God here gives an account of it, and observes,

First. Something that it has in common with the peacocks, and that is, beautiful feathers, ver. 13. 'Gavest thou proud wings unto the peacocks?' so some read it. Fine feathers make proud birds. The peacock is an emblem of pride; when he struts and shews his fine feathers, Solomon in all his glory is not arrayed like him. The ostrich too has goodly feathers, and yet a foolish bird; for wisdom doth not always go along with beauty and gaiety. Other birds do not envy the peacock or the ostrich their gaudy colours, nor complain for want of them; why then should we repine if we see others wear better clothes than we can afford to wear? God gives his gifts variously, and those gifts are not always the most valuable that make the finest show. Who would not rather have the voice of the nightingale than the tail of the peacock? the eye of the eagle, and her soaring wing, and the natural affection of the stork, than the beautiful wings and feathers of the ostrich, that can never rise above the earth, and is without natural affection?

Secondly. Something that is peculiar to itself.

1. Carelessness of her young. And it is well this is peculiar to herself, for it is a very ill character. Observe, 1st. How she exposeth her eggs. She doth not retire to some private place, and make a nest there, as the sparrows and swallows do, Ps. lxxxiv. 3, and there lay eggs and her young. Most birds, as well as other animals, are strangely guided by natural instinct in providing for the preservation of their young; but the ostrich is a monster in nature, for she drops her eggs any where upon the ground, and takes no care to hatch them. If the sand and the sun will hatch them, well and good; they may for her, for she will not warm them, ver. 14. Nay, she takes no care to preserve them; the foot of the traveller may crush them, and the wild beast break them, ver. 15. But how then are any young ones brought forth, and whence is it that the species is not perished? We must suppose either that God by a special providence with the heat of the sun and sand (so some think) hatcheth the neglected eggs of the ostrich, as he feeds the neglected young ones of the raven, or that, though the ostrich often leaves her eggs thus, yet not always. 2nd. The reason why she doth thus expose her eggs. It is, First. For want of natural affection; ver. 16, "She is hardened against her young ones." To be hardened against any is an ill thing even in a brute creature, much more in a rational creature, that boasts of humanity; especially to be hardened against young ones, that cannot help themselves, and therefore merit compassion; that give no provocation, and therefore merit no hard usage. But it is worst of all for her to be hardened against her own young ones, as though they were not hers, whereas really they are parts of herself. Her labour in laying her eggs is in vain, and all lost, because she has not that fear and tender concern for them that she should have. Those are most likely to lose their labour that are least in fear of losing it. Secondly. For want of wisdom; ver. 17, "God has deprived her of wisdom." This intimates that the art which other animals have to nourish and preserve their young is God's gift, and, where it is not, God denies it, that by the folly of the ostrich, as well as by the wisdom of the ant, we may learn to be wise; for, 1*st*. As careless as the ostrich is of her eggs, many people are of their own souls; they make no provision for them, no proper nest in which they may be safe, leave them exposed to Satan and his temptations, and it is a certain evidence that they are deprived of wisdom. 2*nd*. So careless are many parents of their children; some of their bodies, not providing for their own house, their own bowels, and therefore worse than infidels, and as bad as the ostrich; but many more are thus careless of their children's souls, take no care of their education, send them abroad into the world untaught, unarmed, forgetting what corruption there is in the world through lust, which will certainly crush them. Thus their labour in rearing them comes to be in vain; it were better for their country they had never been born. 3*rd*. So careless are too many ministers of their people, with whom they should reside; but they leave them in the earth, and forget how busy Satan is to sow tares while men sleep. They overlook those whom they should oversee, and are really hardened against them.

2. Care of herself. She leaves her eggs in danger; but, if she herself be in danger, no creature shall ply the oar better to get out of the way of it than the ostrich, ver. 18. Then she lifts up her wings on high, (the strength of which then stands her in better stead than their beauty,) and with the help of them runs so fast that a horseman on full speed cannot overtake her; "She scorneth the horse and his rider." Many times those that are least under the law of natural affection contend most for the law of self-preservation. Let not the rider be proud of the swiftness of his horse, when so sottish and lubberly an animal as the ostrich shall have the heels of him.

19 Hast thou given the horse strength?
Hast thou clothed his neck with thunder?
20 Canst thou make him afraid as a grasshopper?
The glory of his nostrils is terrible.
21 He paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength
He goeth on to meet the armed men.
22 He mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted:
Neither turneth he back from the sword
23 The quiver rattleth against him,
The glittering spear and the shield.
24 He swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage:
Neither believeth he that it is the sound of the trumpet.
25 He saith among the trumpets, Ha, na;
And he smelleth the battle afar off.
The thunder of the captains, and the shouting.

God, having displayed his own power in those creatures that are strong and despise man, here shews it in one scarce inferior to any of them in strength, and yet very tame and serviceable to man, and that is the horse; especially "the horse that is prepared against the day of battle," and is serviceable to man at a time when he has more than ordinary occasion for his service. It seems there was in Job's country a noble, generous breed of horses. Job, it is probable, kept a good stable of them, though they are not mentioned among his possessions; cattle, for use in husbandry, being there valued more than those for state and war, which alone horses were then reserved for, and they were not then put to such mean services as with us they are commonly put to. Concerning the great horse, that stately beast, it is here observed,

First. That he has a great deal of strength and spirit; ver. 19, "Hast thou given the horse strength?" He uses his strength for man, but has it not from him; God gave it him, who is the fountain of all the powers of nature, and yet he himself "delighteth not in the strength of the horse," Ps. cxlviii. 10; but has told us that "a horse is a vain thing for safety," Ps. xxxiii. 17. For running, drawing, and carrying, no creature that is ordinarily in the service of man hath so much strength as the horse hath, nor is of so stout and bold a spirit, not to be "made afraid as a grasshopper," but daring and forward to face danger. It is a mercy to man to have such a servant, which, though very strong, submits to the management of a child, and rebels not against his owner. But let not the strength of a horse be trusted to, Hos. xiv. 3; Ps. xx. 7; Isa. xxxi. 1, 3.

Secondly. That his neck and nostrils look great. His neck is clothed with a great thundering mane, which makes him formidable, and is an ornament to him. The glory of his nostrils when he snorts, flings up his head, and throws foam about, is terrible. Perhaps there might be at that time and in that country a more stately breed of horses than any we have now.

Thirdly. That he is very fierce and furious in battle, and chargeth with an undaunted courage, though he pusheth on in imminent danger of his life. 1. See how frolicsome he is, ver. 21. He paweth in the valley, scarce knowing what ground he stands upon. He is proud of his strength, and much more reason to be so that useth his strength in the service of man, and under his direction, than the wild ass, that useth it in contempt of man, and in a revolt from him, ver. 8. 2. See how forward he is to engage; "he goes on to meet the armed men," animated not by the goodness of the cause, or the prospect of honour, but only by "the sound of the trumpet, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting" of the soldiers, which are as bellows to the fire of his innate courage, and make him spring forwards with the utmost eagerness, as if he cried, "Ha, ha," ver. 25. How wonderfully are the brute creatures fitted for, and inclined to, the services for which they were designed. 3. See how fearless he is, how he despiseth death, and the most threatening dangers; ver. 22, "he mocks at fear," and makes a jest of it; slash at him with a sword, rattle the quiver, brandish the spear to drive him back, he will not retreat, but press forward, and even inspires courage into his rider. 4. See how furious he is. He curvets, and pranceth, and runs on with so much violence and heat against the enemy, that one would think he even swallowed the ground with fierceness and rage, ver. 24. High mettle is the praise of a horse rather than of a man, whom fierceness and rage ill become. This description of the war horse will help to explain that character which is given of presumptuous sinners, Jer. viii. 6, "Every one turneth to his course, as the horse rusheth into the battle." When a man's heart is fully set in him to do evil, and he is carried on in a wicked way by the violence of inordinate appetites and passions, there is no making him afraid of the wrath of God, and the fatal consequences of sin. Let his own conscience set before him the curse of the law, the death that is the wages of sin, and all the terrors of the Almighty in battle array, and he mocks at this fear, and is not affrighted, neither turneth he back from the flaming sword of the cherubim. Let ministers lift up their voice like a trumpet, to proclaim the wrath of God against him, he believeth not that it is the sound of the trumpet, nor that God and his heralds are in earnest with him; but what will be in the end hereof it is easy to foresee.

26 Doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom,
And stretch her wings toward the south?
27 Doth the eagle mount up at thy command,
And make her nest on high?
28 She dwelleth and abideth on the rock,
Upon the crag of the rock, and the strong place.
29 From thence she seeketh the prey,
And her eyes behold afar off.
30 Her young ones also suck up blood:
And where the slain are, there is she.

The birds of the air are proofs of the wonderful power and providence of God, as well as the beasts of the earth. God here instanceth in two stately ones.

First. The hawk, a noble bird, of great strength and sagacity, and yet a bird of prey, ver. 26. This bird is here taken notice of for her flight, which is swift and strong, and especially for the course she steers towards the south, whither she follows the sun in winter, out of the colder countries in the north, especially when she is to cast her plumes and renew them. This is her wisdom, and it was God that gave her this wisdom, not man. Perhaps the extraordinary wisdom of the hawk's flight after her prey was not used then for men's diversion and recreation, as it has been since. It is pity the reclaimed hawk, that is taught to fly at man's command, and to make him sport, should at any time be abused to the dishonour of God, since it is from God that she receives that wisdom which makes her flight entertaining and serviceable.

Secondly. The eagle, a royal bird, and yet a bird of prey too; the permission of which, nay, the giving of power to which, may help to reconcile us to the prosperity of oppressors among men. The eagle is here taken notice of 1. For the height of her flight. No bird soars so high, has so strong a wing, nor can so well bear the light of the sun. Now, doth she mount at thy command? ver. 27. Is it by any strength she has from thee, or dost thou direct her flight? No, it is by the natural power and instinct God has given her; she will soar out of thy sight, much more out of thy call. 2. For the strength of her nest. Her house is her castle and stronghold: she makes it on high and on the rock, the crag of the rock, ver. 28, which sets her and her young out of the xxxix. 13. There is every reason to think that the ostrich, and not the peacock, is intended in the first clause of this verse. Rosenmuller's version of the whole verse is, "The wing of the ostrich exults: truly its wing and plumage resembles that of the stork." What follows, to verse 18, clearly describes the habits of the ostrich.

xxxix. 19—25. This highly-figurative passage has been often compared with poetical descriptions of the war-horse in other books. The word rendered "thunder," in verse 19, rather means the flowing or waving mane of the horse. In verse 20, for "grasshopper," understand "locust," and translate the second clause, "the snorting of his nostrils is a terror." In verse 24 the war-horse is represented as devouring the ground in his fury, and not standing still when the trumpet sounds. The second clause of this verse must therefore be translated in accordance: "and he will not stand still when the sound of the trumpet" is heard.

reach of danger. Secure sinners think themselves as safe in their sins as the eagle in her nest on high, in the clefts of the rock; Jer. xliv. 16, "But I will bring thee down from thence," saith the Lord. The higher ill men sit above the resentments of the earth, the nearer they ought to think themselves to the vengeance of Heaven. 3. For her quicksightedness; ver. 29, "her eyes behold afar off," not upwards, but downwards, in quest of her prey. In this she is an emblem of a hypocrite, who, while in the profession of religion he seems to rise towards heaven, at the same time his eye and heart are upon the prey on earth, some temporal advantage, some widow's house or other that he hopes to devour under pretence of devotion. 4. For the way she has of maintaining herself and her young. She preys upon living animals, which she seizeth and tears to pieces, and then carries to her young ones, who are taught to suck up blood. They do it by instinct, and know no better; but for men, that have reason and conscience, to thirst after blood, is what could scarce be believed, if there had not been in every age wretched instances of it. She also preys upon the dead bodies of men; "where the slain are, there is she." These birds of prey (in another sense than the horse, ver. 25,) smell the battle afar off; therefore when a great slaughter is to be made among the enemies of the church, the fowls are invited to "the supper of the great God, to eat the flesh of kings and captains," Rev. xix. 17, 19. Our Saviour refers to this instinct of the eagle, Mat. xxiv. 28, "Wheresoever the carcase is, there will the eagles be gathered together." Every creature will make towards that which is its proper food; for He that provides them their food has implanted in them that inclination. These and many such instances of natural power and sagacity in the inferior creatures, which we cannot account for, oblige us to confess our own weakness and ignorance, and to give glory to God as the fountain of all being, power, wisdom, and perfection.

CHAPTER XL.

Many humbling puzzling questions God had put to Job in the foregoing chapter; now in this chapter, I. He demands an answer to them, ver. 1, 2. II. Job submits in an humble silence, ver. 3—5. III. God proceeds to reason with him, for his conviction, of the infinite distance and disproportion between him and God, and that he was by no means an equal match for him. He challengeth him, (ver. 6, 7,) to vie with him, if he durst, for justice, ver. 8; power, ver. 9; majesty, ver. 10; and dominion over the proud, ver. 11—14; and gives an instance of his power in one particular animal, here called Behemoth, ver. 15—24.

MOREOVER the LORD answered Job, and said,
2 Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty instruct him?
He that reproveth God, let him answer it.
3 Then Job answered the LORD, and said,
4 Behold, I am vile; what shall I answer thee?
I will lay mine hand upon my mouth.
5 Once have I spoken; but I will not answer:
Yea, twice; but I will proceed no further.

Here is, First. An humbling challenge which God gave to Job. After he had heaped up many hard questions upon him, by his manifest ignorance in the works of nature to shew him what an incompetent judge he was of the methods and designs of Providence, he clenches the nail with one demand more, which stands by itself here as the application of the whole. It should seem God paused awhile, as Elihu had done, to give Job time to say what he had to say, or to think of what God had said; but Job was in such confusion, that he remained silent, and therefore God here put him upon replying, ver. 1, 2. This is not said to be spoken out of the whirlwind, as before, and therefore some think God said it in a still small voice, which wrought more upon Job than the whirlwind did, as upon Elijah, 1 Kin. xix. 12, 13; "My doctrine shall drop as the rain," and then it doth wonders. Though Job had not spoken any thing, yet God is said to answer him; for he knows men's thoughts, and can return a suitable answer to their silence. Here,

1. God puts a convincing question to him: "Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty instruct him?" Shall he pretend to dictate to God's wisdom, or prescribe to his will? Shall God receive instruction from every peevish complainer, and change the measures he has taken to please him? It is a question with disdain: "Shall any teach God knowledge?" ch. xxi. 22. It is intimated that those who quarrel with God do in effect go about to teach him how to mend his work. For if we contend with men like ourselves, as not having done well, we ought to instruct them how to do better; but is it a thing to be suffered that any man should teach his Maker? He that contends with God is justly looked upon as his enemy, and shall he pretend so far to have prevailed in the contest, as to prescribe to him? We are ignorant and short-sighted, but before him all things are naked and open. We are foolish, but his wisdom is infinite; we are depending creatures, but he is the sovereign Creator, and shall we pretend to instruct him? Some read it, 'Is it any wisdom to contend with the Almighty?' The answer is easy, No, it is the greatest folly in the world. Is it wisdom to contend with him whom it will certainly be our ruin to oppose, and unspeakably our interest to submit to?

2. He demands a speedy reply to it: "He that reproacheth God, let him answer" this question to his own conscience, and answer it thus, "Far be it from me to contend with the Almighty," or to instruct him. Let him answer all those questions which I have put if he can. Let him answer for his presumption and insolence, answer it at God's bar to his confusion. Those have high thoughts of themselves, and mean thoughts of God, who reprove any thing he saith or doth.

Secondly. Job's humble submission thereupon. Now Job came to himself, and began to melt into godly sorrow. When his friends reasoned with him, he did not yield, but the voice of the Lord is powerful. When the Spirit of truth is come he shall convince. They had condemned him for a wicked man; Elihu himself had been very sharp upon him, ch. xxxiv. 7, 8, 37; but God had not given him such hard words. We may sometimes have reason to expect better treatment from God, and a more candid construction of what we do, than we meet with from our friends. And this the good man is here overcome by, and yields himself a conquered captive to the grace of God.

1. He owns himself an offender, and has nothing to say in his own justification; ver. 4, "Behold, I am vile;" not only mean and contemptible, but vile and abominable in my own eyes. He is now sensible that he hath sinned, and therefore calls himself vile. Sin debaseth us, and penitents abase themselves, reproach themselves, are ashamed, yea, even confounded. I have acted undutifully to my father, ungratefully to my benefactor, unwisely for myself, and therefore I am vile. Job now vilifies himself as much as ever he had justified and magnified himself. Repentance changes men's opinion of themselves. Job had been too bold in demanding a conference with God, and thought he could make his part good with him; but now he is convinced of his error, and owns himself utterly unable to stand before God, or to produce any thing worth his notice; the veriest dunghill worm that ever crawled upon God's ground. While his friends talked with him he answered them, for he thought himself as good as they; but when God talked with him, he had nothing to say: for in comparison with him he sees himself nothing, less than nothing, worse than nothing, vanity and vileness itself, and therefore, "What shall I answer thee?" God demanded an answer, ver. 2. Here he gives the reason of his silence. It was not because he was sullen, but because he was convinced he had been in the wrong. Those that are truly sensible of their own sinfulness and vileness dare not justify themselves before God, but are ashamed that ever they entertained such a thought, and in token of that shame lay their hand upon their mouth.

2. He promiseth not to offend any more as he had done; for Elihu had told him this was meet to be said unto God. When we have spoken amiss, we must repent it, and not repeat it, nor stand to it. He enjoins himself silence; ver. 4, "I will lay my hand upon my mouth," will keep that as with a bridle, to suppress all passionate thoughts which may arise in my mind, and keep them from breaking out in intemperate speeches. It is bad to think amiss, but it is much worse to speak amiss, for that is an allowance of the evil thought, and gives it an imprimatur,—'a sanction;' it is publishing the seditious libel; and therefore "If thou hast thought evil, lay thy hand upon thy mouth," and let it go no farther. Pr. xxx. 32; and that will be an evidence for thee, that that which thou thoughtest thou allowest not. Job had suffered his evil thoughts to vent themselves; "Once have I spoken" amiss, "yea, twice;" that is, divers times, in one discourse and in another; but I have done, I will not answer, I will not stand to what I have said, nor say it again, "I will proceed no farther." Observe here what true repentance is. 1st. It is to rectify our errors, and the false principles we went upon in doing as we did. What we have long, and often, and vigorously maintained once, yea, twice, as soon as we are convinced that it is a mistake, we must retract it, not adhere to it any longer, but take shame to ourselves for holding it so long. 2nd. It is to return from every by-path, and to proceed not one step farther in it. 'I will not add,' so the word is. I will never indulge my passion so much again, nor give myself such a liberty of speech; will never say as I have said, nor do as I have done. Until it come to this, we come short of repentance. Farther observe, that those who dispute with God, will be silenced at last. Job had been very bold and forward in demanding a conference with God, and talked very big, how plain he would make his case, and how sure he was that he "should be justified, as a prince he would go near unto him," ch. xxxi. 37; he would come even to his seat, ch. xxiii. 3; but he has soon enough of it, he lets fall his plea, and will not answer. Lord, the wisdom and right is all on thy side, and I have done foolishly and wickedly in questioning it.

6 Then answered the LORD unto Job out of the whirlwind,
7 Gird up thy loins now like a man: [and said,
I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me.
8 Wilt thou also disannul my judgment?
Wilt thou condemn me, that thou mayest be righteous?
9 Hast thou an arm like God?
Or canst thou thunder with a voice like him?
10 Deck thyself now with majesty and excellency;
And array thyself with glory and beauty.
11 Cast abroad the rage of thy wrath:
And behold every one that is proud, and abase him.
12 Look on every one that is proud, and bring him low;
And tread down the wicked in their place.
13 Hide them in the dust together;
And bind their faces in secret.
14 Then will I also confess unto thee
That thine own right hand can save thee.

Job was greatly humbled for what God had already said, but not sufficiently; brought low, but not low enough; and therefore God here proceeds to reason with him in the same manner, and to the same purpose, as before, ver. 6. Observe, 1. Those who duly receive what they have heard from God, and profit by it, shall hear more from him. 2. Those that are truly convinced of sin, and penitent for it, yet have need to be more thoroughly convinced, and to be made more deeply penitent. Those that are under convictions, that have their sins set in order before their eyes, and their hearts broken for them, must learn from this instance not to catch at comfort too soon; it will be everlasting when it comes, and therefore it is necessary we be prepared for it by deep humiliation, that the wound be searched to the bottom, and not skinned over, and that we do not make more haste out of our convictions than good speed. When our hearts begin to melt and relent within us, let those considerations be dwelt upon and pursued which will help to make a thorough effectual thaw of it. God begins with a challenge, ver. 7, as before, ch. xxxviii. 3, "Gird up thy loins now like a man." If thou hast the courage and confidence thou hast pretended to, shew it now; but thou wilt soon be made to see and own thyself no match for me. This is that which every proud heart must be brought to at last, either by its repentance or by its ruin; and thus low must every mountain and hill be sooner or later brought. We must acknowledge,

First. That we cannot vie with God for justice. That the Lord is righteous and holy in his dealings with us, but we are unrighteous and unholy in our carriage towards him. We have a great deal to blame ourselves for, but nothing to blame him for; ver. 8, "Wilt thou disannul my judgment?" Wilt thou take exceptions to what I say and do, and bring a writ of error to reverse the judgment I have given, as erroneous and unjust? Many of Job's complaints had too much of a tendency this way; "I cry out of wrong," saith he, "but I am not heard;" but such language as this is by no means to be suffered. God's judgment cannot, must not, be disannulled, for we are sure it is according to truth, and therefore it is a great piece of impudence and iniquity in us to call it in question. What! saith God, "wilt thou condemn me, that thou mayest be righteous?" Must my honour suffer for the support of thy reputation? Must I be charged as dealing unjustly with thee, because thou canst not otherwise clear thyself from the censures thou liest under? Our duty is to condemn ourselves that God may be righteous; David is therefore ready xxxix. 26—30. We may suppose that the hawk alluded to is not of one kind only. The point of the reference is in the fact that "the hawk is a bird of passage; God has endowed it with instinct to migrate to the south as the winter season is approaching." These details indicate the accurate acquaintance which the writer possessed with the habits of the animals he mentioned. What he says of the eagle family is singularly accurate: they fly higher than all other birds, they build in the inaccessible rocks which they love to haunt, their power of seeing is greater than that of any other creatures, they convey living animals to their nests for their young, and they devour the corpses of the battle-field.

xl. 1, 2. Having concluded the long array of appeals to what God's works teach of Him and suggest in regard to man, the Lord asks whether, after this, the disputatious has anything to say: will the litigant who contended with the Almighty contend any longer? let the reprover of God answer.

to own the evil he has done in God's sight, that God may be justified when he speaks, and clear when he judgeth, Ps. li. 4; see Neh. ix. 33; Dan. ix. 7. But those are very proud, and very ignorant both of God and themselves, who to clear themselves will condemn God; and the day is coming when, if the mistake be not rectified in time by repentance, the eternal judgment will be both the confutation of the plea and the confusion of the prisoner, for the heavens shall declare God's righteousness, and all the world shall become guilty before him.

Secondly. That we cannot vie with God for power; and therefore, as it is great impiety, so it is great imprudence to contest with him, and we go as much against our interest as we do against reason and right; ver. 9, "Hast thou an arm like God?" equal to his in length and strength; or, "Canst thou thunder with a voice like him," as he did, ch. xxxvii. 1, 2, or doth now out of the whirlwind? To convince Job that he was not so able as he thought himself to contest with God, he shews him, 1. That he could never fight it out with him, nor carry his cause by force of arms. Sometimes among men controversies have been decided by battle, and the victorious champion is adjudged to have the right on his side; but, if it be put upon that issue between God and man, man would certainly go by the worse, for all the force he could raise against the Almighty would be but like briars and thorns before a consuming fire, Isa. xxvii. 4. Hast thou, a poor, weak worm of the earth, an arm comparable to His who upholdeth all things? The power of creatures, even of angels themselves, is derived from God, limited by him, and dependent on him; but the power of God is original, independent, and unlimited. He can do every thing without us; we can do nothing without him; and, therefore, we have not an arm like God. 2. That he could never talk it out with him, nor carry his cause by noise and big words, which sometimes, among men, go a great way towards the gaining of a point; "Canst thou thunder with a voice like him?" No; his voice will soon drown thine, and one of his thunders will overpower and overrule thy whispers. Man cannot speak so convincingly, so powerfully, nor with such a commanding, conquering force as God can, who speaks and it is done. His creating voice is called his thunder, Ps. civ. 7; so is that voice of his with which he terrifies and discomfits his enemies, 1 Sam. ii. 10, "Out of heaven shall he thunder upon them." The wrath of a king may sometimes be like the roaring of a lion, but can never pretend to imitate God's thunder.

Thirdly. That we cannot vie with God for beauty and majesty; ver. 10, If thou wilt enter into a comparison with him, and appear more amiable, put on thy best clothes, "deck thyself now with majesty and excellency." Appear in all the martial pomp, in all the royal pomp thou hast, make thy best of every thing that will set thee off, "array thyself with glory and beauty," such as may awe thy enemies and charm thy friends. But what is it all to the Divine majesty and beauty? No more than the light of a glowworm to that of the sun when he goes forth in his strength. God decks himself with such majesty and glory as is the terror of devils and all the powers of darkness, and makes them tremble; he arrays himself with such glory and beauty as is the wonder of angels and all the saints in light, and makes them rejoice. David could dwell all his days in God's house to behold the beauty of the Lord. But in comparison with this, what is all that majesty and excellency with which princes think to make themselves feared, and all that glory and beauty with which lovers think to make themselves beloved? If Job think in contending with God to carry the day by looking great and making a figure, he is quite mistaken. "The sun shall be ashamed and the moon confounded when God shines forth."

Fourthly. That we cannot vie with God for dominion over the proud, ver. 11—14. Here the cause is put upon this short issue: if Job can humble and abase proud tyrants and oppressors as easily and effectually as God can, it shall be acknowledged that he has some colour to compare with God. Observe here,

1. The justice Job is here challenged to do; and that is to bring the proud low, with a look. If Job will pretend to be a rival with God, especially if he pretend to be a judge of his actions, he must be able to do this.

1st. It is here supposed that God can do it, and will do it himself, else he would not have put it thus upon Job. By this God proves himself to be God, that he resisted the proud, sat Judge upon them, and is able to bring them to ruin. Observe here, First. That proud people are wicked people, and pride is at the bottom of a great deal of the wickedness that is in this world, both towards God and man. Secondly. Proud people will certainly be abased and brought low, for pride goes before destruction. If they bend not, they will break; if they humble not themselves by true repentance, God will humble them to their everlasting confusion. The wicked will be trodden down in their place; that is, wherever they are found. Though they pretend to have a place of their own, and to have taken root in it, yet there they shall be trodden down, and all the wealth and power and interest which their place entitles them to, will not be their security. Thirdly. The wrath of God scattered among the proud will humble them and break them, and bring them down. If he casts abroad the rage of his wrath, as he will do at the great day, and sometimes doth in this life, the stoutest heart cannot hold out against him. Who knows the power of his anger? Fourthly. God can and doth easily abase proud tyrants. He can look upon them, and bring them low, can put them to shame and fear and utter ruin with one angry look, as he can with a gracious look revive the hearts of the contrite ones. Fifthly. He can and will at last do it effectually, ver. 13; not only bring them to the dust, from which they might hope to arise, but hide them in the dust, like the proud Egyptian whom Moses slew and hid in the sand, Ex. ii. 12; that is, they shall not only be brought to death, but brought to the grave, that pit out of which there is no return. They were proud of the figure they made, but they shall be buried in oblivion, and be no more remembered than those that are hid in the dust—out of sight and out of mind. They were linked in leagues and confederacies to do mischief, and are now bound in bundles, they are hid together; not their rest, but their shame together is in the dust, ch. xvii. 16. Nay, they are treated as malefactors, who, when condemned, had their faces covered as Haman's was; he binds their faces in secret, or as dead men. Lazarus, in the grave, had his face bound about. So complete will the victory be that God will gain at last over proud sinners that set themselves in opposition to him. Now by this he proves himself to be God. Doth he thus hate proud men? then he is holy. Will he thus punish them? then he is the just Judge of the world. Can he thus humble them? then he is the Lord Almighty. When he had abased proud Pharaoh, and hid him in the sand of the Red sea, Jethro from thence inferred that doubtless the Lord is greater than all gods, for wherein the proud enemies of his Israel dealt proudly he was above them, he was too hard for them, Ex. xviii. 11: see Rev. xix. 1, 2.

2nd. It is here proposed to Job to do it. He had been passionately quarrelling with God and his providence, casting abroad the rage of his wrath towards heaven; as if he thought thereby to bring God himself to his mind. Come, saith God, try thy hand first upon proud men, and thou wilt soon see how little they value the rage of thy wrath; and shall I then regard it or be moved by it? Job had complained of the prosperity and power of tyrants and oppressors, and was ready to charge God with maladministration for suffering it: but he ought not to find fault except he could mend. If God, and he only, has power enough to humble and bring down proud men, no doubt he has wisdom enough to know when and how to do it, and it is not for us to prescribe to him, or to teach him how to govern the world. Unless we had an arm like God, we must not think to take his work out of his hands.

2. The justice which is here promised shall be done him, if he can perform such mighty works as these; ver. 14, "Then will I also confess unto thee that thy right hand" is sufficient to "save thee," though, after all, it would be too weak to contend with me. It is the innate pride and ambition of man that he would be his own saviour, would have his own hands sufficient for him, and be independent; but it is presumption to pretend to it; our own hands cannot save us by recommending us to God's grace, much less by rescuing us from his justice. Unless we could by our own power humble our enemies, we cannot pretend by our own power to save ourselves; but if we could, God himself would confess it. He never did, nor ever will, defraud any man of his just praise, nor deny him the honour he has merited. But, since we cannot do this, we must confess unto him that our own hands cannot save us, and therefore into his hand we must commit ourselves.

15 Behold now behemoth, which I made with thee;
He eateth grass as an ox.

HIPPOPOTAMUS.

16 Lo now, his strength is in his loins,
And his force is in the navel of his belly.
17 He moveth his tail like a cedar.
The sinews of his stones are wrapped together
18 His bones are as strong pieces of brass;
His bones are like bars of iron.
19 He is the chief of the ways of God: [unto him.
He that made him can make his sword to approach
20 Surely the mountains bring him forth food,
Where all the beasts of the field play
21 He lieth under the shady trees,
In the covert of the reed, and fens.
22 The shady trees cover him with their shadow;
The willows of the brook compass him about.
23 Behold, he drinketh up a river, and hasteth not:
He trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth.
24 He taketh it with his eyes:
His nose pierceth through snares.

God, for the farther proving of his own power, and disproving of Job's pretensions, concludes his discourse with the description of two huge, vast, mighty animals, far exceeding man in bulk and strength; one he calls Behemoth, the other Leviathan. In these verses we have the former described. "Behold now behemoth," and consider whether thou art able to contend with him who made that beast and gave him all that power that he hath, and whether it is not thy wisdom rather to submit to him, and make thy peace with him. Behemoth signifies beasts in general, but must here be meant of some one particular species. Some understand it of the bull; others of an amphibious animal, well known, they say, in Egypt, called the river horse, hippopotamus, living among the fish in the river Nilus, but coming out to feed upon the earth. But I confess I see no reason to depart from the ancient and most generally received opinion, that it is the elephant that is here described, which is a very strong, stately creature, of a very large stature above any other, and of wonderful sagacity, and of so great a reputation in the animal kingdom, that among so many fourfooted beasts as we have had the natural history of, ch. xxxviii. and xxxix., we can scarce suppose this should be omitted. Observe,

First. The description here given of the behemoth.

1. His body is very strong and well built. "His strength is in his loins," ver. 16. His bones, compared with those of other creatures, are like bars of iron, ver. 18. His backbone so strong, that, though his tail be not large, yet he moves it like a cedar, with a commanding force, ver. 17. Some understand it of the trunk of the elephant, for the word signifies any extreme part, and is xl. 7—14. A general call to Job to exercise Divine prerogatives if he can. The words "bind their faces in secret," in verse 13, refer to the imprisoning of persons in obscure dungeons. The final judgment of the wicked is in the hands of the Most High.

xl. 15—24. On the word "behemoth," in verse 15, we read in the margin, "or the elephant, as some think," but it is now generally believed that the hippopotamus is meant. The account of the animal is very figurative and highly coloured, but the leading features can easily be recognised. In verse 16, the second clause should rather be rendered "his force is in the sinews (or muscles) of his belly," where "belly" may mean the body generally, as distinguished from the limbs. Verse 17 properly means, "He waves his tail like a cedar, the sinews of his thighs are matted together." Other explanations of the second clause have been proposed, but the sense now given is the one most acquiesced in by good critics. The words "he is the chief of the ways of God," in verse 19, signify that the behemoth is that there is indeed a wonderful strength. So strong is the elephant in his back and loins, and the sinews of his thighs, that he will carry a large wooden tower, and a great number of fighting men in it. No animal whatsoever comes near the elephant for strength of body, which is the main thing insisted on in this description.

2. He feeds on the products of the earth, and doth not prey upon other animals; he "eateth grass as an ox," ver. 15; "the mountains bring him forth food," ver. 20; and the beasts of the field do not tremble before him, nor flee from him, as from a lion; but they play about him, knowing they are in no danger from him. This may give us occasion, 1st. To acknowledge the goodness of God in ordering it so that a creature of such bulk, that required so much food, should not feed upon flesh, for then multitudes must die to keep him alive, but should be content with the grass of the field, to prevent such destruction of lives as otherwise must have been made. 2nd. To commend living upon herbs and fruits without flesh, according to the original appointment of man's food, Gen. i. 29. Even the strength of an elephant, as of a horse and an ox, may be supported without flesh, and why not those of a man? Though, therefore, we use the liberty God has allowed us, yet, be not among riotous eaters of flesh, Pr. xxiii. 20. To commend a quiet and peaceable life. Who would not rather, like the elephant, have his neighbours easy and pleasant about him, than, like the lion, have them all afraid of him?

3. He lodgeth "under the shady trees," ver. 21, which "cover him with their shadow," ver. 22, where he has a free and open air to breathe in; while the lions, that live by prey, when they would repose themselves, are obliged to retire into a close and dark den, to live therein, and to abide in the covert of that, ch. xxxviii. 40. They that are a terror to others cannot but be sometimes a terror to themselves too; but they will be easy that will let others be easy about them; and the reed and fens, and the willows of the brook, though a very weak and slender fortification, yet are sufficient for the defence and security of those who therefore dread no harm, because they design none.

4. That he is a very great and greedy drinker; not of wine and strong drink,—to be greedy of that is peculiar to man, who, by his drunkenness, makes a beast of himself,—but of fair water. 1st. His belly is big, and must be filled, and therefore he must have supply accordingly, ver. 23. He drinks so much that one would think he could drink up a river, if you would give him time and not hasten him. Or, when he drinks, he hasteth not, as those do that drink in fear; he is confident of his own strength and safety, and therefore makes no haste when he drinks, no more haste than good speed. 2nd. His eye is bigger than his belly; for when he is very thirsty, having been long kept without water, he "trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth," and even "takes it with his eyes," ver. 24. As a covetous man causeth his eyes to fly upon the wealth of this world, which he is greedy of, so this great beast is said to snatch, or draw up, even a river, with his eyes. 3rd. His nose has in it strength enough for both; for when he goes greedily to drink with it he pierceth through snares, or nets, which perhaps are laid in the water to catch fish. He makes nothing of the difficulties that lie in his way, so great is his strength, and so eager his appetite.

Secondly. The use that is to be made of this description. We have taken a view of this mountain of a beast, this overgrown animal, which is here set before us, not merely as a show, as sometimes it is in our country, to satisfy our curiosity, and to amuse us, but as an argument with us to humble ourselves before the great God; for,

1. He made this vast animal, which is so fearfully and wonderfully made; it is the work of his hands, the contrivance of his wisdom, the product of his power; it is "behemoth which I made," ver. 15. Whatever strength this or any other creature hath, it is derived from God, who therefore must be acknowledged to have all power originally and infinitely in himself, and such an arm as it is not for us to contest with. This beast is here called the chief in its kind of the ways of God, ver. 19; an eminent instance of the Creator's power and wisdom. They that will peruse the accounts given by historians of the elephant will find that his capacities approach nearer to those of reason than the capacities of any other brute creature whatsoever; and therefore he is fitly called "the chief of the ways of God," in the inferior part of the creation, no creature below man being preferable to him.

2. He made him with man, as he made other four-footed beasts, on the same day with man, Gen. i. 25, 26, whereas the fish and fowl were made the day before, and to live and move on the same earth, in the same element; and therefore man and beast are said to be jointly preserved by the Divine providence, as fellow commoners, Ps. xxxvi. 6. It is "behemoth which I made with thee;" I made that beast as well as thee, and he doth not quarrel with me; why then dost thou? Why shouldst thou demand peculiar favours because I made thee, ch. x. 9, when I made the behemoth likewise with thee? I made thee as well as that beast, and therefore can as easily manage thee at pleasure as that beast; and will do it, whether thou refuse, or whether thou choose. I made him with thee that thou mayest look upon him and receive instruction. We need not go far for proofs and instances of God's almighty power and sovereign dominion; they are with us, they are near us, they are under our eye wherever we are.

3. "He that made him can make his sword to approach to him," ver. 19; that is, the same hand that made him, notwithstanding his great bulk and strength, can unmake him again at pleasure, and kill an elephant as easily as a worm or a fly, without any difficulty, and without impeachment either of waste or wrong. God that gave to all the creatures their being, may take away the being he gave; for may he not do what he will with his own? And he can do it; he that has power to create with a word, no doubt has power to destroy with a word, and can as easily speak the creature into nothing as at first he spoke it out of nothing. The behemoth perhaps is here intended (as well as the leviathan afterwards) to represent those proud tyrants and oppressors, whom God had just now challenged Job to abase and bring down. They think themselves as well fortified against the judgments of God as the elephant with his bones of brass and iron; but he that made the soul of man knows all the avenues to it, and can make the sword of justice—his wrath—to approach to it, and touch it in the most tender and sensible part. He that framed the engine, and put the parts of it together, knows how to take it in pieces. Woe to him, therefore, that strives with his Maker; for he that made has therefore power to make him miserable, and will not make him happy unless he will be ruled by him.

CHAPTER XLI.

The description here given of the leviathan, a very large, strong, formidable fish, or water animal, is designed yet farther to convince Job of his own impotency, and of God's omnipotence, that he might be humbled for his folly in making so bold with him as he had done. I. To convince Job of his own weakness, he is here challenged to subdue and tame this leviathan if he could, and make himself master of him, ver. 1—9; which because he cannot do, he must own himself utterly unable to stand before the great God, ver. 10. II. To convince Job of God's power and terrible majesty, divers particular instances are here given of the strength and terror of the leviathan, which is no more than what God has given him, nor more than he has under his check, ver. 11, 12. The face of the leviathan is here described to be terrible, ver. 13, 14; his scales close, ver. 15—17; his breath and neesings sparkling, ver. 18—21; his flesh firm, ver. 22—24; his strength and spirit when he is attacked insuperable, ver. 25—30; his motions turbulent and disturbing to the waters, ver. 31, 32. So that upon the whole matter he is a very terrible creature, and man is no match for him, ver. 33, 34.

CANST thou draw out leviathan with an hook?
Or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down?
2 Canst thou put an hook into his nose?
Or bore his jaw through with a thorn?
3 Will he make many supplications unto thee?
Will he speak soft words unto thee?
4 Will he make a covenant with thee?
Wilt thou take him for a servant for ever?
5 Wilt thou play with him as with a bird?
Or wilt thou bind him for thy maidens?
6 Shall the companions make a banquet of him?
Shall they part him among the merchants?
7 Canst thou fill his skin with barbed irons?
Or his head with fish spears?
8 Lay thine hand upon him,
Remember the battle, do no more.
9 Behold, the hope of him is in vain:
Shall not one be cast down even at the sight of him?
10 None is so fierce that dare stir him up:
Who then is able to stand before me?

Whether this leviathan be a whale or crocodile is a great dispute among the learned, which I will not undertake to determine; some of the particulars agree more easily to the one, others to the other; both are very strong and fierce, and the power of the Creator appears in them. The ingenious Sir Richard Blackmore, though he admits the more received opinion concerning the behemoth, that that must be meant of the elephant, yet agrees with the learned Bochart's notion of the leviathan, that it is the crocodile, which was so well known in the river of Egypt. I confess that which inclines me rather to understand it of the whale, is not only because it is much larger, and a nobler animal, but because in the history of the creation there is such an express notice taken of it as is not of any other species of animals whatsoever, Gen. i. 21, "God created great whales;" by which it appears not only that whales were well known in those parts in Moses' time, who lived a little after Job; but that the creation of whales was generally looked upon as a most illustrious proof of the eternal power and godhead of the Creator; and we may conjecture that this was the reason (for otherwise it seems unaccountable) why Moses there so particularly mentions the creation of the whales, because God has so lately, in this discourse with Job, more largely insisted upon the bulk and strength of that creature than of any other, as the proof his power; and the leviathan is here spoken of as an inhabitant of the sea, ver. 31, which the crocodile is not; and Ps. civ. 25, 26, "there," in "the great and wide sea is that leviathan." Here in these verses,

First. He shews how unable Job was to master the leviathan. 1. That he could not catch him as a little fish with angling, ver. 1, 2. He had no bait wherewith to deceive him, no hook wherewith to catch him, no fish-line wherewith to draw him out of the water, nor a thorn to run through his gills on which to carry him home. 2. That he could not make him his prisoner, nor force him to cry quarter, or surrender himself at discretion, ver. 3, 4. He knows his own strength too well to make many supplications to thee, and to make a covenant with thee to be thy servant, on condition thou wilt save his life. 3. That he could not entice him into a cage, and keep him there, as a bird for the children to play with, ver. 5. There are creatures so little, so weak, as to be easily restrained thus, and triumphed over; but the leviathan is none of those; he is made to be the terror, not the sport and diversion, of mankind. 4. That he could not have him served up to his table as a fish dinner; he and his companions could not make a banquet of him; his flesh is too strong to be fit for food; nor, if he were good fish, is he so easily catched. 5. That they could not enrich themselves with the spoil of him. "Shall they part him among the merchants," the bones to one, the oil to another? so they will do if they can catch him: but it is probable the art of fishing for whales was not brought to perfection then as it has been since. 6. That they could not be the death of him; could not "fill his head with fish-spears," ver. 7. He kept out of the reach of their instruments of slaughter; or, if they touched him, they could not touch him to the quick. 7. That it was to no purpose to attempt it; the hope of taking him is in vain, ver. 9. If men go about to seize him, so formidable is he that the very sight of him will give them enough, and make a stout man ready to faint away; "Shall not one be cast down even at the sight of him?" and will not that deter the pursuers from their attempt? Job is bid, at his peril, to lay his hand upon him; ver. 8, Touch him if thou dare; remember the battle, how unable thou art to encounter such a force, and what is therefore likely to be the issue of the battle, and do no more, but desist from the attempt. It is good to remember the battle before we engage in a war, and put off the harness in time, if we foresee it will be to no purpose to gird it on. Job is hereby admonished not to proceed in his controversy with God, but to make his peace with him, remembering what the battle will certainly end in if we come to an engagement: see Isa. xxvii. 4, 5.

Secondly. From thence he infers how unable he was to contend with the Almighty. "None is so fierce," none so fool-hardy, that dare stir up the leviathan, ver. 10, as knowing he will certainly be too hard for them; and "who then is able to stand before God," either to impeach and arraign his proceedings, or to outface the power of his wrath? If the inferior creatures that are put under the feet of man, and over whom he has dominion, keep us in awe thus, how terrible must the majesty of our great Lord be, who has a sovereign dominion over us, and against whom man has been so long in rebellion? "Who can stand before him when once he is angry?"

11 Who hath prevented me, that I should repay him?
Whatsoever is under the whole heaven is mine.
12 I will not conceal his parts, nor his power,
Nor his comely proportion.

"pre-eminent among the works of God." What follows is translated by Rodwell, "His Creator has furnished him with tusks like a sword," wherein he is preceded by several other authorities. The Hebrew word rendered "shady trees," in verses 21 and 22, is said to mean the rhamnus lotus, or lotus tree of Linnæus, also called the dum or dhom by the Arabs; it is a very thorny tree, and bears an edible fruit like a small gooseberry. The translation of verses 23 and 24 cannot stand, and it is now generally admitted that the sense adopted by Barnes is more nearly correct: "Lo, should a river rush upon him he is not alarmed; he is unmoved should the Jordan rush upon his mouth. Who can take him when he is on his guard? or when taken in snares, who can pierce his nose?" The amphibious habits of the animal are alluded to in verse 23, but the mention of the Jordan does not imply that the hippopotamus ever frequented it. It has been thought that "Jordan" stands for any large river, but on insufficient grounds. In reference to the last verse, it is only needful 13 Who can discover the face of his garment?

Or who can come to him with his double bridle?
14 Who can open the doors of his face?
His teeth are terrible round about.
15 His scales are his pride,
Shut up together as with a close seal.
16 One is so near to another,
That no air can come between them
17 They are joined one to another,
They stick together, that they cannot be sundered.
18 By his neesings a light doth shine,
And his eyes are like the eyelids of the morning

CROCODILE.

19 Out of his mouth go burning lamps,
And sparks of fire leap out
20 Out of his nostrils goeth smoke,
As out of a seething pot or caldron.
21 His breath kindleth coals,
And a flame goeth out of his mouth.
22 In his neck remaineth strength,
And sorrow is turned into joy before him.
23 The flakes of his flesh are joined together:
They are firm in themselves; they cannot be moved.
24 His heart is as firm as a stone;
Yea, as hard as a piece of the nether millstone.
25 When he raiseth up himself, the mighty are afraid:
By reason of breakings they purify themselves.
26 The sword of him that layeth at him cannot hold:
The spear, the dart, nor the habergeon.
27 He esteemeth iron as straw,
And brass as rotten wood.
28 The arrow cannot make him flee:
Sling stones are turned with him into stubble
29 Darts are counted as stubble:
He laugheth at the shaking of a spear
30 Sharp stones are under him:
He spreadeth sharp pointed things upon the mire.
31 He maketh the deep to boil like a pot:
He maketh the sea like a pot of ointment.
32 He maketh a path to shine after him;
One would think the deep to be hoary.
33 Upon earth there is not his like,
Who is made without fear
34 He beholdeth all high things:
He is a king over all the children of pride.

God having in the foregoing verses showed Job how unable he was to deal with the leviathan, here sets forth his own power in that massy mighty creature. Here is,

First. God's sovereign dominion and independency laid down, ver. 11. 1. That he is indebted to none of his creatures. If any pretend he is indebted to them, let them make their demand and prove their debt, and they shall receive it in full, and not by composition. "Who has prevented me?" that is, who has laid any obligations upon me by any service they have done me? Who can pretend to be beforehand with me? If any were, I would not long be behindhand with them; I would soon repay them. The apostle quotes this for the silencing of all flesh in God's presence, Rom. xi. 35, "who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed to him again?" As God doth not inflict upon us the evils we have deserved, so he doth bestow upon us the favours we have not deserved. 2. That he is the rightful Lord and owner of all the creatures. "Whatsoever is under the whole heavens," animate or inanimate, "is mine," (and particularly this leviathan,) at my command and dispose, what I have an incontestable property in, and dominion over. All is his; we are his, all we have and do, and therefore we cannot make God our debtor; but of thine own, Lord, have we given thee. All is his; and therefore if he were indebted to any, he has wherewithal to repay them; the debt is in good hands. All is his; and therefore he needs not our services, nor can he be benefited by them. "If I were hungry, I would not tell thee: for the world is mine, and the fulness thereof," Ps. l. 12.

Secondly. The proof and illustration of it from the wonderful structure of the leviathan, ver. 12. The parts of his body, the power he exerts, especially when he is set upon, and the comely proportion of the whole of him, is what God will not conceal, and therefore what we must observe and acknowledge the power of God in. Though he be a creature of monstrous bulk, yet there is in him a comely proportion. In our eye, beauty lies in little, (inest sua gratia parvis,—'little things have a gracefulness all their own,') because we ourselves are little; but in God's eye even the leviathan is comely; and if he pronounce even the whale, even the crocodile so, it is not for us to say of any of the works of his hands they are ugly or ill-favoured, it is enough to say so, as we have cause, of our own works. God here goes about to give us an anatomy, as it were, of the leviathan, for his works appear most beautiful and excellent, and his wisdom and power appear most in them when they are taken in pieces and viewed in their several parts and proportions.

1. The leviathan, even prima facie,—'at first sight,' appears formidable and inaccessible, ver. 13, 14. Who dares come so near him while he is alive as to discover or take a distinct view of the face of his garment, the skin with which he is clothed as with a garment? so near him as to bridle him like a horse, and so lead him away? so near him as to be within reach of his jaws, which are like a double bridle? Who will venture to look into his mouth, as we do into a horse's mouth? He that opens the doors of his face will see his teeth terrible round about, strong and sharp, and fitted to devour; it would make a man tremble to think of having a leg or an arm between them

2. His scales are his beauty and strength, and therefore his pride, ver. 15—17. The crocodile is indeed remarkable for his scales; if we understand it of the whale, we must understand by these, 'shields,' (for so the word is,) the several coats of his skin; or there might be whales in that country with scales. That which is remarkable concerning the scales is, that they stick so close together, by which he is not only kept warm,—for no air can pierce him,—but kept safe; for no sword can pierce him through those scales. Fishes that live in the water are fortified accordingly by the wisdom of Providence, which gives clothes as it gives cold.

3. He scatters terror with his very breath and looks. If he sneeze, or spout up water, it is like a light shining, either with the froth, or the light of the sun shining through it, ver. 18. The eyes of the whale are reported in the night time to shine like a flame, or, as here, "like the eyelids of the morning;" the same they say of the crocodile. The breath of this creature is so hot and fiery, from the great natural heat within, that burning lamps and sparks of fire, smoke, and a flame, are said to go out of his mouth, even such as one would think sufficient to set coals on fire, ver. 19—21. Probably these hyperbolical expressions are used concerning the leviathan, to intimate the power and terror of the wrath of God, for that is it which all this is designed to convince us of. "Fire out of his mouth devours," Ps. xviii. 7, 8; "the breath of the Almighty, like a stream of brimstone, kindles Tophet," and will for ever keep it burning, Isa. xxx. 33. The wicked one shall be consumed with the breath of his mouth, 2 Thes. ii. 8.

4. He is of invincible strength, and most terrible fierceness, so that he frightens all that come in his way, but is not himself frightened by any. Take a view of his neck, and there remains strength, ver. 22. His head and his body are well set together. Sorrow rejoiceth, or rides in triumph before him; for he makes terrible work wherever he comes. Or those storms which are the sorrow of others are his joy; what is tossing to others is dancing to him. His flesh is well knit, ver. 23. The flakes of it are joined so close together, and are so firm, that it is hard to pierce it; he is as if he were all bone; his flesh is of brass, which Job had complained his was not, ch. vi. 12. His heart is as firm as a stone, ver. 24. He has spirit equal to his bodily strength; and though he is bulky, he is sprightly and not unwieldy. As his flesh and skin cannot be pierced, so his courage cannot be daunted; but, on the contrary, he daunts all he meets, and puts them into a consternation; ver. 25, "When he raiseth up himself," like a moving mountain in the great waters, even "the mighty are afraid," lest he overturn their ships, or do them some other mischief. "By reason of the breakings" he makes in the water, which threaten death, "they purify themselves," confess their sins, betake themselves to their prayers, and get ready for death. We read, ch. iii. 8, of those who, when they raise up a leviathan, are in such a fright that they curse the day. It was a fear which it seems used to drive some to their curses, and others to their prayers; for as now, so then, there were seafaring men of different characters, and on whom the terrors of the sea have contrary effects; but all agree there is a great fright among them when the leviathan raiseth up himself.

5. All the instruments of slaughter that are used against him do him no hurt, and therefore are no terror to him, ver. 26—29. The sword and the spear, which wound nigh at hand, are nothing to him; the darts, arrows, and sling-stones, which wound at a distance, do him no damage; nature has so well armed him, cap-a-pie,—'at all points,' against them all. The defensive weapons which men use when they engage leviathan, as the habergeon, or breastplate, often stead men no more than their offensive weapons; iron and brass are to him as straw and rotten wood, and he laughs at them. It is the picture of a hard-hearted sinner, that despiseth the terrors of the Almighty, and laughs at all the threatenings of his word. The leviathan so little dreads the weapons that are used against him, that, to shew how hardy he is, he chooseth to lie on the sharp stones, the sharp pointed things, ver. 30, and lies as easy there as if he lay on the soft mire. Those that would endure hardness must inure themselves to it.

6. His very motion in the water troubles it, and puts it into a ferment, ver. 31, 32. When he rolls and tosseth, and makes a bustle in the water, or is in pursuit of his prey, "he makes the deep to boil like a pot;" he raiseth to say that the capture of the hippopotamus is still one of the most difficult and perilous enterprises of the hunter.

xli. 1—10. That the leviathan is the crocodile is now commonly admitted, though our translators seem to have had no such idea, because they put in the margin, "i.e., a whale, or a whirlpool." The description, as in the case of the behemoth, is highly coloured. It has been observed on verse 2, that Nile fishermen sometimes put a ring into the jaws of a large fish, and having attached a cord to the ring, throw the fish back into the water, detained a prisoner by the cord, of which the other end is fastened to the shore. The word rendered "companions," in verse 6, may mean partners or associates, but it may refer simply to a company assembled for a feast. The word translated "merchants" is literally "Canaanites," but our version may stand, because Canaanite sometimes means a merchant. The reason is, the Canaanites or Phœnicians were the chief trading people of the old world. A similar use of the term appears else-a great froth and foam upon the water, such as is upon a boiling pot, especially a pot of boiling ointment. And he makes a path to shine after him, which even a ship, in the midst of the sea doth not, Pr. xxx. 19. One may trace the leviathan under water by the bubbles on the surface, and yet who can take that advantage against him in pursuing him? Men track hares in the snow, and kill them, but he that tracks the leviathan dares not come near him.

Lastly, Having given this particular account of "his parts, and his power, and his comely proportion," he concludes with four things in general, concerning this animal, ver. 33, 34:—1. That he is a nonsuch among the inferior creatures; "upon earth there is not his like." No creature in this world is comparable to him for strength and terror. Or the earth is here distinguished from the sea: 'his dominion is not upon the earth,' so some, but in the waters. None of all the savage creatures upon earth come near him for bulk and strength; and it is well for man that he is confined to the waters, and there has a watch set upon him (ch. vii. 12) by the Divine providence; for if such a terrible creature were allowed to roam and ravage upon this earth, it would be an unsafe and uncomfortable habitation for the children of men, for whom it is intended. 2. That he is more bold and daring than any other creature whatsoever. "He is made without fear." The creatures are as they are made; the leviathan has courage in his constitution, nothing can frighten him; other creatures, quite contrary, seem as much designed for flying as this for fighting; among men some in their natural temper are bold, others are timorous. 3. That he is himself very proud; though lodged in the deep, yet "he beholdeth all high things." The rolling waves, the impending rocks, the hovering clouds, and the ships under sail with top and top-gallant, this mighty animal beholds with contempt, for he doth not think they either lessen him or threaten him. Those that are great are apt to be scornful. 4. That "he is a king over all the children of pride," that is, he is the proudest of all proud ones. He has more to be proud of (so Mr. Caryl expounds it) than the proudest people in the world have; and so it is a mortification to the haughtiness and lofty looks of men. Whatever bodily accomplishments men are proud of and puffed up with, the leviathan excels them, and is a king over them. Some read it as to understand it of God: 'He that beholdeth all high things, even he is King over all the children of pride.' He can tame the behemoth, ch. xl. 19, and so he can the leviathan, as big as they are, and as stout-hearted as they are. This discourse concerning those two animals was brought in to prove that it is God who can "look upon proud men and abase them, bring them low, and tread them down, and hide them in the dust," ch. xl. 11—13; and so it concludes with a quod erat demonstrandum,—'that which was to be demonstrated.' There is one that "beholds all high things," and wherein men deal proudly, is above them; "he is king over all the children of pride," whether brutal or rational, and can make them all either bend or break before him: Isa. ii. 11, "The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down, and thus the Lord alone shall be exalted."

CHAPTER XLII.

Solomon saith, "Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof," Eccl. vii. 8; it was so here in the story of Job: at evening time it was light. Three things we have met with in this book that, I confess, have troubled me very much; but we find all the three grievances redressed, thoroughly redressed, in this chapter, every thing set to rights and well again: I. It has been a great trouble to us to see such a holy man as Job was so fretful and peevish and uneasy to himself, and especially to hear him quarrel with God, and speak indecently to him: but, though he thus fell, he is not utterly cast down, for here he recovers his temper, comes to himself and to his right mind again by repentance, is sorry for what he hath said amiss, unsaith it, and humbles himself before God, ver. 1—6. II. It has been likewise a great trouble to us to see Job and his friends so much at variance, not only differing in their opinions, but giving one another a great many hard words, and passing severe censures upon one another, though they were all very wise and good men; but here we have this grievance redressed likewise, the differences between them happily adjusted, the quarrel taken up, all the peevish reflections they had cast upon one another forgiven and forgotten, and all joining in sacrifices and prayers, mutually accepted of God, ver. 7—9. III. It has troubled us to see a man of such eminent piety and usefulness as Job was so grievously afflicted, so pained, so sick, so poor, so reproached, so slighted, and made the very centre of all the calamities of human life; but here we have this grievance redressed too: Job healed of all his ailments, more honoured and beloved than ever, enriched with an estate double to what he had before, surrounded with all the comforts of life, and as great an instance of prosperity as ever he had been of affliction and patience, ver. 10—17. And all this is written for our learning, that we, under these and the like discouragements that we meet with, through patience and comfort of this scripture may have hope.

THEN Job answered the LORD, and said,
2 I know that thou canst do every thing,
And that no thought can be withholden from thee.
3 Who is he that hideth counsel without knowledge?
Therefore have I uttered that I understood not;
Things too wonderful for me, which I knew not.
4 Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak:
I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me.
5 I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear:
But now mine eye seeth thee.
6 Wherefore I abhor myself,
And repent in dust and ashes.

The words of Job, justifying himself, were ended ch. xxxi. 40; after that he said no more to that purpose. The words of Job, judging and condemning himself, began ch. xl. 4, 5; here he goes on with words to the same purpose. Though his patience had not its perfect work, his repentance for his impatience had. He is here thoroughly humbled for his folly and unadvised speaking, and it was forgiven him. Good men will see and own their faults at last, though it may be some difficulty to bring them to it. "Then" when God had said all that to him concerning his own greatness and power appearing in the creatures, "then Job answered the Lord," ver. 1, not by way of contradiction,—he had promised not so to answer again, ch. xl. 5,—but by way of submission; and thus we must all answer the calls of God.

First. He subscribes to the truth of God's unlimited power, knowledge, and dominion, to prove which was the scope of God's discourses out of the whirlwind, ver. 2. Corrupt passions and practices arise either from some corrupt principles, or from the inconsideration and disbelief of the principles of truth, and therefore true repentance begins in "the acknowledgment of the truth," 2 Tim. ii. 25. Job here owns his judgment convinced of the greatness, and glory, and perfection of God, from which would follow the conviction of his conscience concerning his own folly in speaking irreverently to him. 1. He owns that God can do every thing. He that made behemoth and leviathan, and manages both as he pleases, what can be too hard for him to do? He knew this before, and had himself discoursed very well upon the subject, but now he knew it with application; God had spoken it once, and then he heard it twice, that power belongs to God, and therefore it is the greatest madness and presumption imaginable to contend with him. "Thou canst do every thing," and therefore canst raise me out of this low condition, which I have so often foolishly despaired of as impossible; I now believe thou art able to do this. 2. That no thought can be withholden from him; that is, 1st. There is no thought of ours that he can be hindered from the knowledge of. Not a fretful, discontented, unbelieving thought is in our minds at any time but God is a witness to it. It is in vain to contest with him, for we cannot hide our counsels and projects from him; and if he discover them he can defeat them. 2nd. There is no thought of his that he can be hindered from the execution of; whatever the Lord pleased that did he. Job had said this passionately, complaining of it, ch. xxiii. 13, "What his soul desireth, even that he doth." Now he saith it with pleasure and satisfaction, that God's counsels shall stand. If God's thoughts concerning us be thoughts of good, to give us an expected end, he cannot be withheld from accomplishing his gracious purposes, whatever difficulties may seem to lie in the way.

Secondly. He owns himself to be guilty of that which God had charged him with in the beginning of his discourse, ver. 3. Lord, the very first word thou saidst was, "Who is this that darkens counsel by words without knowledge?" and there needed no more; that word convinced me. I own I am the man that has been so foolish. That word reached my conscience, and set my sin in order before me; it is too plain to be denied, too bad to be excused; 'I have hid counsel without knowledge.' I have ignorantly overlooked the counsels and designs of God in afflicting me, and therefore have quarrelled with God, and insisted too much upon my own justification: "Therefore I uttered that I understood not;" that is, I have passed a judgment upon the dispensations of Providence, though I was utterly a stranger to the reasons of them. Here, 1. He owns himself ignorant of the Divine counsels; and so we are all. God's judgments are a great deep, which we cannot fathom, much less find out the springs of. We see what God doth, but we neither know why he doth it, what he is driving at, nor what he will bring it to; these are things too wonderful for us, out of our sight to discover, out of our reach to alter, and out of our jurisdiction to judge of. They are things which we know not; it is quite above our capacity to pass a verdict upon them; the reason why we quarrel with Providence is because we do not understand it. And we must be content to be in the dark about it, till the mystery of God shall be finished. 2. He owns himself imprudent and presumptuous in undertaking to discourse of that which he did not understand, and to arraign that which he could not judge of. "He that answereth a matter before he heareth it, it is folly and shame to him." We wrong ourselves, as well as the cause which we undertake to determine, while we are no competent judges of it.

Thirdly. He will not answer, but he will make supplication to his Judge, as he had said ch. ix. 15, "Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak," ver. 4; not speak either as plantiff or defendant, (ch. xiii. 22,) but as an humble petitioner; not as one that will undertake to teach and prescribe, but as one that desires to learn, and is willing to be prescribed to. Lord, put no more puzzling questions to me, for I am not able to answer thee one of a thousand of those which thou hast put; but give me leave to ask instruction from thee, and do not deny it me, do not upbraid me with my folly and self-sufficiency, Jas. i. 5. Now he is brought to the prayer Elihu taught him, "That which I see not teach thou me."

Fourthly. He puts himself into the posture of a penitent, and therein goes upon a right principle. In true repentance there must be not only conviction of sin, but contrition, and godly sorrow for it, sorrow according to God, 2 Cor. vii. 9. Such was Job's sorrow for his sins.

1. Job had an eye to God in his repentance, thought highly of him; and went upon that as the principle of it; ver. 5, "I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear" many a time, from my teachers, when I was young; from my friends now of late. I have known something of thy greatness, and power, and sovereign dominion, and yet was not brought by what I heard to submit myself to thee as I ought. The notions I had of these things served me only to talk of, and had not a due influence upon my mind; "but" now thou hast by immediate revelation discovered thyself to me in thy glorious majesty, "now mine eye sees thee," now I feel the power of those truths which before I had only the notion of, and therefore now I repent, and unsay what I have foolishly said. Note, 1st. It is a great mercy to have a good education, and to know the things of God by the instructions of his word and ministers. Faith comes by hearing, and then it is most likely to come when we hear attentively, and with the hearing of the ear. 2nd. When the understanding is enlightened by the Spirit of grace, our knowledge of Divine things as far exceeds what we had before as that by ocular demonstration exceeds that by report and common fame. By the teachings of men God reveals his Son to us, but by the teachings of his Spirit he reveals his Son in us, Gal. i. 16, and so changes us into the same image, 2 Cor. iii. 18. 3rd. God is pleased sometimes to manifest himself most fully to his people by the rebukes of his word and providence. Now I have been afflicted; now I have been told of my faults; "now mine eye sees thee;" "the rod and reproof give wisdom; blessed is the man whom thou chastenest and teachest."

2. Job had an eye to himself in his repentance, thought hardly of himself, and thereby expressed his sorrow for his sins; ver. 6, "Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." Observe, 1st. It concerns us to be deeply humbled for the sins we are convinced of, and not to rest in a sight, superficial displeasure against ourselves for them. Even good people, that have no gross enormities to repent of, yet must be greatly afflicted in soul for the workings and breaking out of pride, passion, peevishness and discontent, and all their hasty unadvised speeches; for these we must be pricked to the heart, and be in bitterness. Till the enemy be effectually humbled, the peace will be insecure. 2nd. Outward expressions of godly sorrow well become penitents; Job repented in dust and ashes. These, without an inward change, do but mock God; but where they come from sincere contrition of soul, the sinner by them gives glory to God, takes shame to himself, and may be instrumental to bring others to repentance. Job's afflictions had brought him to the ashes, ch. ii. 8; he sat down among the ashes; but now his sins brought him thither. True penitents mourn for their sins as heartily as ever they did for any outward afflictions; and are in bitterness, as for an only son, or a firstborn, for they are brought to see more evil in their sins than in their troubles. 3rd. Self-loathing is evermore the companion of true repentance; Eze. vi. 9, "They shall loathe themselves for the evils which they have committed." We must not only be angry at ourselves for the wrong and damage we have by sin done to our own souls, but must abhor ourselves, as having by sin made ourselves odious to the pure and holy God, who cannot endure to look upon iniquity. If sin be truly an abomination to us, sin in ourselves will especially be so: the nearer where, as in Prov. xxxi. 24, Isa. xxiii. 8, Hos. xii. 7, Zeph. i. 11. The celebrity of the Canaanites as merchants must have been much older than this book.

xli. 11. This verse is obscure in our translation. In the preceding verse the speaker has in effect said, If such be the terror and power of a mere creature, what must be the might of the Creator? He now adds a somewhat related thought: "Who hath laid me under obligation by any gift? All that is is mine." A very literal version is difficult, owing to the extreme brevity of the original. Compare 1 Cor. iv. 7.

xli. 13—17. These verses relate to the formidable armour and teeth of the crocodile. "The face of his garment" is the surface of his coat of mail. The next words rather mean, "Who can enter his double row of teeth?" "The doors of his face" are his ponderous jaws. The closely-compacted scales of his shield are his glory, and his defence against attack.

it is to us, the more loathsome it will be. 4th. The more we see of the glory and majesty of God, the more we see of the vileness and odiousness of sin, and of ourselves because of sin, and the more we shall abase and abhor ourselves for it. Now mine eye sees what a God he is whom I have offended, the brightness of that majesty that by wilful sin I have spit in the face of, the tenderness of that mercy which I have spurned at the bowels of; now I see what a just and holy God he is whose wrath I have incurred, "wherefore I abhor myself;" "Woe is me, for I am undone," Isa. vi. 5. God had challenged Job to look upon proud men and abase them. Not I, saith Job, I will never pretend to it; I have enough to do to get my own proud heart humbled, to abase that, and bring that low. Let us leave it to God to govern the world, and make it our care, in the strength of his grace, to govern ourselves and our own hearts well.

7 And it was so, that after the LORD had spoken these words unto Job, the LORD said to Eliphaz the Temanite, My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends: for ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath. 8 Therefore take unto you now seven bullocks and seven rams, and go to my servant Job, and offer up for yourselves a burnt offering; and my servant Job shall pray for you: for him will I accept: lest I deal with you after your folly, in that ye have not spoken of me the thing which is right, like my servant Job. 9 So Eliphaz the Temanite and Bildad the Shuhite and Zophar the Naamathite went, and did according as the LORD commanded them: the LORD also accepted Job.

Job in his discourses had complained very much of the censures of his friends, and their hard usage of him, and had appealed to God as judge between him and them, and thought it long that judgment was not given upon the appeal. While God was catechising Job out of the whirlwind, one would have thought that he only was in the wrong, and the cause would certainly go against him; but here, to our great surprise, we find it quite otherwise, and the definitive sentence given in Job's favour: wherefore judge nothing before the time. Those who are truly righteous before God may have their righteousness clouded and eclipsed by great and uncommon afflictions, by the severe censures of men, by their own frailties and foolish passions, by the sharp reproofs of the Word and conscience, and the deep humiliation of their own spirits, under the sense of God's terrors; and yet in due time these clouds shall all blow over, and God will "bring forth their righteousness as the light, and their judgment as the noonday," Ps. xxxvii. 6. So he cleared Job's righteousness here, because he, like an honest man, held it fast, and would not let it go. We have here,

First. Judgment given against Job's three friends upon the controversy between them and Job. Elihu is not censured here, for he distinguished himself from the rest in the management of the dispute, and acted not as a party, but as a moderator; and moderation will have its praise with God, whether it have with men or no. In the judgment here given, Job is magnified, and his three friends mortified. While we were examining the discourses on both sides we could not discern, and therefore durst not determine, who was in the right; something of truth we thought they both had on their side, but could not cleave the hair between them, nor would we, for all the world, have been to give the decisive sentence upon the case, lest we should have determined wrong; but it is well the judgment is the Lord's, and we are sure that his judgment is according to truth, to it we will refer ourselves, and by it we will abide. Now in the judgment here given,

1. Job is greatly magnified, and comes off with honour. He was but one against three, a beggar now against three princes, and yet, having God on his side, he needed not fear coming off well, though thousands set themselves against him. Observe here,

1st. When God appeared for him: "After the Lord had spoken these words unto Job," ver. 7; after he had convinced and humbled him, and brought him to repentance for what he had said amiss, then he owned him in what he had said well, comforted him, and put honour upon him. Not till then,—for we are not ready for God's approbation till we judge and condemn ourselves,—but then he thus pleaded his cause, for he that has torn will heal us, he that has smitten will bind us up: the Comforter shall convince, Jno. xvi. 8. See in what method we are to expect Divine acceptance, we must first be humbled under Divine rebukes. After God, by speaking these words, had caused grief, he returned and had compassion, according to the multitude of his mercies, for he will not contend for ever, but will debate in measure, and stay his rough wind in the day of his east wind. Now Job had humbled himself, God exalted him. True penitents shall find favour with God, and what they have said and done amiss shall no more be mentioned against them. Then God is well pleased with us when we are brought to abhor ourselves.

2nd. How he appeared for him. It is taken for granted that all his offences are forgiven, for, if he be dignified, as we find he is here, no doubt he is justified. Job had sometimes spoken with great assurance that God would clear him at last, and he was not made ashamed of the hope.

First. God calls him again and again his servant Job; four times in two verses, and he seems to take a pleasure in calling him so, as before his troubles, ch. i. 8, "Hast thou considered my servant Job?" Though he be poor and despised he is my servant for all that, and as dear to me as when he was in his prosperity. Though he has his faults, and has appeared to be a man subject to like passions as others, though he has contended with me, has gone about to disannul my judgment, and has darkened counsel by words without knowledge, yet he sees his error, and retracts it, and therefore he is my servant Job still. If we still hold fast the integrity and fidelity of servants to God as Job did, though we may for a time be deprived of the credit and comfort of the relation, we shall be restored to it at last, as he was. The devil had undertaken to prove Job a hypocrite, his three friends had condemned him as a wicked man, but God will contess those whom he accepts, and will not suffer them to be run down by the malice of hell or earth. If God saith, Well done, good and faithful servant, the matter is not great who saith otherwise.

Secondly. He owns that he had spoken of him the thing that was right beyond what his antagonists had done; he had given a much better account of the Divine providence, and nearer to truth, than they had done. They had wronged God by making prosperity a mark of the true church, and affliction a certain indication of God's wrath. But Job had done him right, by maintaining that God's love and hatred is to be judged of by what is in men, not by what is before them. Eccl. ix. 1. Observe, 1st. Those do the most justice to God and his providence who have an eye to the rewards and punishments of another world more than to those of this, and with the prospect of those solve the difficulties of the present administration. Job had referred things to the future judgment and the future state more than his friends had done, and therefore he spoke of God that which was right better than his friends had done. 2nd. Though Job had spoken some things amiss, even concerning God, whom he made too bold with, yet he is commended for what he spoke that was right. We must not only not reject that which is true and good, but must not deny it its true praise, though there appear in it a mixture of human frailty and infirmity. 3rd. Job was in the right, and his friends in the wrong, and yet he was in pain, and they at ease, which is a plain evidence that we cannot judge of men and their sentiments by looking in their faces or purses; He only can do it infallibly who sees men's hearts.

Thirdly. He will pass his word for Job, that, notwithstanding all the wrong his friends had done him, he is so good a man, and of such an humble, tender, forgiving spirit, that he will very readily pray for them, and use his interest in Heaven on their behalf. "My servant Job will pray for you," I know he will; I have pardoned him, and he has the comfort of it, and therefore he will pardon you.

Fourthly. He appoints him to be the priest of this congregation, and promiseth to accept him, and his mediation for his friends. Take your sacrifices to my servant Job, "for him will I accept." Those whom God washes from their sins, he makes to himself kings and priests. True penitents shall not only find favour as petitioners for themselves, but be accepted as intercessors for others also. It was a great honour God hereby put upon Job, in appointing him to offer sacrifice for his friends, as formerly he used to do for his own children, ch. i. 5; and a happy presage it was of his restoration to his prosperity again, and indeed a good step towards it, that he was thus restored to the priesthood. Thus he became a type of Christ, through whom alone we and our spiritual sacrifices are acceptable to God, see 1 Pet. ii. 5. "Go to my servant Job," to my servant Jesus, (from whom for a time he hid his face,) put your services into his hand, make use of him as your advocate, "for him will I accept;" but out of him you must expect to be dealt with according to your folly. And as Job prayed and offered sacrifice for those that had grieved and wounded his spirit, so Christ prayed and died for his persecutors, and ever lives making intercession for the transgressors.

2. Job's friends are greatly mortified, and came off with a slur. They were good men, and did belong to God, and therefore he would not let them lie still in their mistake no more than Job; but, having humbled him by a discourse out of the whirlwind, takes another course to humble them. Job, who was dearest to him, was first chidden, but the rest in their turn. When they heard Job talked to it is probable they flattered themselves with a conceit that they were in the right, and Job in all the fault; but God soon took them to task, and made them know the contrary. In most disputes and controversies there is something amiss on both sides, either in the merits of the cause or in the management, or both, and it is fit both sides should be told of it, and made to see their errors. God addresseth this to Eliphaz, not only as the senior, but as the ringleader in the attack made upon Job. Now,

1. God tells them plainly they had "not spoken of him the thing that was right, like Job;" that is, they had censured and condemned Job upon a false hypothesis, had represented God fighting against Job as an enemy, when really he was only trying him as a friend; and this was not right. Those do not say well of God who represent his fatherly chastisements of his own children as judicial punishments, and who cut them off from his favour upon the account of them. Note, It is a dangerous thing to judge uncharitably of the spiritual and eternal state of others, for in so doing we may perhaps condemn those whom God has accepted, which is a great provocation to him; it is offending his little ones, and he takes himself to be wronged in all the wrongs that are done to them.

2. He assures them he was angry with them: "My wrath is kindled against thee, and thy two friends." God is very angry with those who despise and reproach their brethren, who insult over them, and judge hardly of them, either for their calamities or for their infirmities. Though they were wise and good men, yet when they spoke amiss God was angry with them, and let them know it.

3. He requires from them a sacrifice to make atonement for what they had said amiss. They must bring each of them seven bullocks, and each of them seven rams, to be offered up to God for a burnt offering; for it should seem that, before the law of Moses, all sacrifices, even those of atonement, were wholly burnt, and therefore were so called. They thought they had spoken wonderful well, and that God was beholden to them for pleading his cause, and owed them a good fee for it, but they are told that, quite contrary, he is displeased with them, requires from them a sacrifice, and threatens that otherwise he will deal with them after their folly. Many times God is angry at that in us which we are ourselves proud of, and sees much amiss in that which we think was well done.

4. He orders them to go to Job, and beg of him to offer their sacrifices and pray for them, or otherwise they should not be accepted. By this God designed, 1st. To humble them, and lay them low. They thought that they only were the favourites of Heaven, and that Job had no interest there, but God gives them to understand, that he had a better interest there than they had, and stood fairer for God's acceptance than they did. The day may come when those who despise and censure God's people will court their favour, and be made to know that God has loved them, Rev. iii. 9. The foolish virgins will beg oil of the wise. 2nd. To oblige them to make their peace with Job, as the condition of their making their peace with God. "If thy brother has aught against thee," (as Job had a great deal against them,) "first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." Satisfaction must first be made for wrong done, according as the nature of the thing requires, before we can hope to obtain from God the forgiveness of sin. See how thoroughly God espoused the cause of his servant Job, and engaged in it; God will not be reconciled to those that have offended Job till they have first begged his pardon, and he is reconciled to them. Job and his friends had differed in their opinion about many things, and been too keen in their reflections one upon another, but now they were to be made friends, and in order to that they are not to argue the matter over again, and try to give it a new turn, that might be done endlessly; but they must agree in a sacrifice and a prayer, and that must reconcile them. In affection and devotion they must unite, when they could not concur in the same sentiments. Those who differ in judgment about lesser things yet are one in Christ the great sacrifice, and meet at the same throne of grace, and therefore ought to love and bear with one another. Once more, observe, that when God was angry with Job's friends he did himself put them in a way to make their peace

xli. 18—21. There is a basis of truth in this very hyperbolical language. Barnes says verse 18 refers to "the strong effort of the animal to recover breath when he rises to the surface, and when in the effort the eyes seem to scintillate, or emit light." Figurative allusions to fire and smoke from the eyes, nostrils, and mouths of wild beasts occur in all poetry. The smoke-like vapour from the nostrils of an enraged alligator is asserted to be a fact.

xli. 31, 32. The common translation here is feebly expressed, and indeed it is not easy to display the full force of the original to an ordinary English reader. The idea is that in rushing through the deep waters the crocodile causes them to seethe like a boiling cauldron, and the animal is said to emit a musk-like odour; his track is like a shining path, which looks like a stream of hoary hair. The use of the term "sea" in reference to the Nile is only what is common to this day. The Syriac omits verses 30—32.

xlii. 5. It is not to be supposed that Job saw God actually, but that with him. Our quarrels with God always begin on our part, but the reconciliation begins on his.

Secondly. The acquiescence of Job's friends in this judgment given, ver. 9. They were good men, and as soon as they understood what the mind of the Lord was they did as he commanded them, and that speedily, and without gainsaying, though it was against the grain to flesh and blood to court him thus whom they had condemned. Note, Those who would be reconciled to God must carefully use the prescribed means and methods of reconciliation. Peace with God is to be had only in his own way, and upon his own terms; and they will never seem hard to those who know how to value the privilege, but they will be glad of it upon any terms, though never so humbling. Job's friends had all joined in accusing Job, and now they join in begging his pardon. Those that have sinned together should repent together. They that appeal to God, as both Job and his friends had often done, must resolve to stand by his award, whether pleasing or unpleasing to their own mind. And they that conscientiously observe God's commands need not doubt but to gain his favour; "the Lord also accepted Job," and his friends, in answer to his prayer. It is not said he accepted them, though that is implied, but he accepted Job for them; so he has made us accepted in the Beloved, Eph. i. 6; Mat. iii. 17. Job did not insult over his friends upon the testimony God had given concerning him, and the submission they were obliged to make to him, but God being graciously reconciled to him, he was easily reconciled to them, and then God accepted him. This is that we should aim at in all our prayers and services, to be accepted of the Lord; this must be the top of our ambition, not to have praise of men, but to please God.

10 And the LORD turned the captivity of Job, when he prayed for his friends; also the LORD gave Job twice as much as he had before. 11 Then came there unto him all his brethren, and all his sisters, and all they that had been of his acquaintance before, and did eat bread with him in his house: and they bemoaned him, and comforted him over all the evil that the LORD had brought upon him: every man also gave him a piece of money, and every one an earring of gold. 12 So the LORD blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning: for he had fourteen thousand sheep, and six thousand camels, and a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she asses. 13 He had also seven sons and three daughters. 14 And he called the name of the first, Jemima; and the name of the second, Kezia; and the name of the third, Keren-happuch. 15 And in all the land were no women found so fair as the daughters of Job: and their father gave them inheritance among their brethren. 16 After this lived Job an hundred and forty years, and saw his sons, and his sons' sons, even four generations. 17 So Job died, being old and full of days.

JOB'S WEALTH.

"Ye have heard of the patience of Job," saith the apostle, Jas. v. 11, "and have seen the end of the Lord," that is, what end the Lord at length put to his troubles. In the beginning of this book we had Job's patience under his troubles, for an example; here, in the close, for our encouragement to follow that example, we have the happy issue of his troubles, and the prosperous condition to which he was restored after them, which confirms us in counting them happy which endure. And the extraordinary prosperity which Job was crowned with after his afflictions perhaps was intended to be to us Christians a type and figure of the glory and happiness of heaven, which the afflictions of this present time are working for us; and in which they will issue at last, and which will be more than double to all the delights and satisfactions we now enjoy, as Job's after prosperity was to his former, though then he was the greatest of all the men of the East. He that rightly endureth temptation when he is tried shall receive a crown of life, Jas. i. 12; as Job, when he was tried, received all the wealth, and honour, and comfort, which here we have an account of.

First. God returned in ways of mercy to him; and his thoughts concerning him were "thoughts of good and not of evil, to give the expected" (nay, the unexpected) "end," Jer. xxix. 11. His troubles began in Satan's malice, which God restrained; his restoration began in God's mercy, which Satan could not oppose. Job's sorest complaint, and indeed the sorrowful accent of all his complaints, on which he laid the greatest emphasis, was that God appeared against him. But now God plainly appeared for him, and "watched over him to build and to plant, like as he had" (at least, in his apprehension,) "watched over him to pluck up and to throw down," Jer. xxxi. 28. This put a new face upon his affairs immediately, and every thing now looked as pleasing and promising as before it had looked gloomy and frightful.

1. God turned his captivity, that is, he redressed his grievances, and took away all the causes of his complaints. He loosed him from the bond with which Satan had now for a great while bound him, and delivered him out of those cruel hands into which he had delivered him. We may suppose that presently all his bodily pains and distempers were healed, so suddenly and so thoroughly, that the cure was next to miraculous; "His flesh became fresher than a child's, and he returned to the days of his youth;" and that (which was more) he sensibly felt a very great alteration in his mind; it was calm and easy, and the toss was all over, his disquieting thoughts were all vanished, his fears silenced, and the consolations of God were now as much the delight of his soul as his terrors had been its burthen. The tide thus turned, and his troubles began to ebb as fast as they had flowed; just then when he was praying for his friends, praying over his sacrifice which he offered for them. Mercy did not return when he was disputing with his friends, no, not though he had right on his side, but when he was praying for them; for God is better served and pleased with our warm devotions than with our warm disputations. When Job completed his repentance by this instance of his forgiving men their trespasses, then God completed his remission by turning his captivity. Note, We are really doing our business when we are praying for our friends, if we pray in a right manner; for in those prayers there is not only faith, but love. Christ has taught us to pray with and for others, in teaching us to say, "Our Father;" and in seeking mercy for others, we may find mercy ourselves. Our Lord Jesus has his exaltation and dominion there where he ever lives making intercession. Some by the turning of Job's captivity understand the restitution which the Sabeans and Chaldeans made of the cattle which they had taken from him, God wonderfully inclining them to do it; and with these he began the world again. Probably it was so; those spoilers had swallowed down his riches, but they were forced to vomit them up again, ch. xx. 15. But I rather understand this more generally of the turn now given.

2. God doubled his possessions; "also the Lord gave Job twice as much as he had before." It is likely he did at first, by some way or other, intimate to him that it was his gracious purpose, by degrees, in due time to bring him to such a height of prosperity, that he should have twice as much as ever he had, for the encouraging of his hope, and the quickening of his industry, and that it might appear that this wonderful increase was a special token of God's favour. And it may be considered as intended, 1st. To balance his losses. He suffered for the glory of God, and therefore God made it up to him with advantage, and allowed him more than interest upon interest; God will take care that none shall lose by him. 2nd. To recompense his patience and his confidence in God, which (notwithstanding the workings of corruption) he did not cast away, but still held fast; and that is it which has a great recompence of reward, Heb. x. 35. Job's friends had often put their severe censure of Job upon this issue, "If thou wert pure and upright, surely now he would awake for thee," ch. viii. 6; but he doth not awake for thee, therefore thou art not upright. Well, saith God, though your argument be not conclusive, I will even by that demonstrate the integrity of my servant Job; his latter end shall greatly increase, and by that it shall appear, since you will have it so, that it was not for any injustice in his hands that he suffered the loss of all things. Now it appeared Job had reason to bless God for taking away, (as he did ch. i. 21,) since it made so good a return.

Secondly, His old acquaintance, neighbours, and relations, were very kind to him, ver. 11. They had been estranged from him, and it was not the least of the grievances of his afflicted state; he bitterly complained of their unkindness, ch. xix. 13, &c.; but now they visited him with all possible expressions of affection and respect. 1. They put an honour upon him, in coming to dine with him, as formerly; but, we may suppose, privately bringing their entertainment along with them, so that he had the reputation of feasting them without the expense. 2. They sympathized with him, and shewed a tender concern for him, such as becomes brethren. They bemoaned him, when they talked over all the calamities of his afflicted state, and comforted him, when they took notice of God's gracious returns to him. They wept for his griefs, and rejoiced in his joys; and proved not such miserable comforters as his three friends, that at first were so forward and officious to attend him. These were not such great men, nor such learned and eloquent men as those, but they proved much more skilful and kind in comforting Job. God sometimes chooseth the foolish and weak things of the world, as for conviction, so for comfort. 3. They made a collection among them for the repair of his losses, and the setting of him up again; they did not think it enough to say, "Be warmed, be filled," but gave him such things as would be of use to him, Jas. ii. 16. "Every one gave him a piece of money," some more, it is likely, and some less, according to their ability, "and every one an earring of gold," (an ornament much used by the children of the East,) which would be as good as money to him. This was a superfluity which they could well spare, and the rule is, that our abundance must be a supply to our brethren's necessity.

he now had such a view of Him and His excellence as he never had before.

xlii. 7. Job had confessed and repented, but he was less in error than the three who had undertaken to convict him of sin.

xlii. 8. The sacrifices were ordered after a purely patriarchal manner, and without any allusion to an official priesthood.

xlii. 11. "A piece of money" is a very improbable version, if coined money is intended. The Hebrew word is kesitah ("a lamb"), and probably denoted a certain weight of silver, which some think was worth four shekels—nearly 9s. It is an old opinion that such pieces of silver were marked with the figure of a lamb; but it may have been the equivalent of a lamb in value. We know nothing certainly upon the subject. The word "earring" represents a Hebrew term for a ring as an ornament, whether worn in the ear or in the nose.

xlii. 14. Keren-happuch signifies a "horn of paint," such as Oriental women use for blackening their eyelids.

But why did Job's relations now at length shew this kindness to him? 1st. God put it in their hearts to do so; and every creature is that to us that he makes it to be. Job had acknowledged God in their estrangement from him, for which he now rewarded him, in turning them to him again. 2nd. Perhaps some of them withdrew from him because they thought him a hypocrite, but now his integrity was made manifest, they returned to him and to communion with him again. When God was friends with him, they were all willing to be friends with him, Ps. cxix. 74, 79; others of them, it may be, withdrew because he was poor, and sore, and a rueful spectacle, but now he began to get up his back again, they were willing to renew their acquaintance with him. Swallow-friends, that are gone in winter, will return in the spring, though their friendship is of little value. 3rd. Perhaps the rebuke which God had given to Eliphaz, and the other two, for their unkindness to Job, awakened the rest of his friends to return to their duty. Reproofs to others we should thus take as admonitions and instructions to us. 4th. "Job prayed for his friends," and then they flocked about him, overcome by his kindness, and every one desiring an interest in his prayers. The more we pray for our friends and relations, the more comfort we may expect in them.

Thirdly. His estate strangely increased, by the blessing of God upon the little that his friends gave him. He thankfully received their courtesy, and did not think it below him to have his estate repaired by contributions; he did not, on the one hand, urge his friends to raise money for him, he acquits himself from that ch. vi. 22, "Did I say, Bring unto me, or give me a reward of your substance?" and yet what they brought he thankfully accepted, and did not upbraid them with their former unkindnesses, nor ask them why they did not do this sooner. He was neither so covetous and grasping as to ask their charity, nor so proud and ill-natured as to refuse it when they offered it; and he being in so good a temper, God gave him that which was far better than their money and earrings, and that was his blessing, ver. 12. The Lord comforted him now according to the days wherein he had afflicted him, and "blessed his latter end more than his beginning." Observe, 1. "The blessing of the Lord makes rich." It is he that gives us power to get wealth, and gives success in honest endeavours. Those, therefore, that would thrive must have an eye to God's blessing; and never go out of it, no, not into the warm sun; and those that have thriven must not sacrifice to their own net, but own their obligations to God for his blessing. 2. That blessing can make very rich, and sometimes makes good people so. Those that are become rich by getting think they can easily make themselves very rich by saving; but, as those that have little must depend upon God to make it much, so those that have much must depend upon God to make it more, and to double it; else ye have sown much, and bring in little, Hag. i. 6. 3. The last days of a good man sometimes prove his best days, his last works his best works, his last comforts his best comforts; for his path, like that of the morning light, shines more and more to the perfect day. Of a wicked man it is said, his last state is worse than his first, Lu. xi. 26; but of the upright man, that his end is peace, and sometimes the nearer it is the clearer are the views of it. In respect of outward prosperity, God is pleased sometimes to make the latter end of a good man's life more comfortable than the former part of it has been, and strangely to outdo the expectations of his afflicted people, who thought they should never have lived to see better days, that we may not despair even in the depths of adversity; we know not what good times we may yet be reserved for in our latter end. Non si male, nunc et olim, sic erit,—'it may be well, though now it is ill.' Job in his affliction had wished to be as in months past, as rich as he had been before, and quite despaired of that; but God is often better to us than our own fears, nay, than our own wishes, for Job's possessions were doubled to him. The number of his cattle, his sheep and camels, his oxen and she-asses, is just double here to what it was ch. i. 3. This is a remarkable instance of the extent of the Divine providence to things that seem minute, as this of the exact number of a man's cattle; as also of the harmony of providence, and the reference of one event to another: for "known unto God are all his works, from the beginning to the end." Job's other possessions, no doubt, were increased in proportion to his cattle, his lands, money, servants, &c. So that if before he was the greatest of all the men of the East, what was he now?

Fourthly. His family was built up again, and he had great comfort in his children, ver. 13—15. The last of his afflictions that are recorded, ch. i., and the most grievous, was the death of all his children at once. His friends upbraided him with it, ch. viii. 4. But God repaired even that breach, in process of time, either by the same wife, or, she being dead, by another. 1. The number of his children was the same as before, "seven sons, and three daughters." Some give this reason why they were not doubled as his cattle were, because his children that were dead were not lost, but gone before, to a better world; and, therefore, if he have but the same number of them, they may be reckoned doubled, for he hath two fleeces of children, as I may say, Mahanaim,—'two hosts,' one in heaven, the other on earth, and in both he is rich. 2. The names of his daughters are here registered, ver. 14; because in the significations of them they seemed designed to perpetuate the remembrance of God's great goodness to him in the surprising change of his condition. He called the first Jemima, 'the day,' (whence perhaps Diana had her name,) because of the shining forth of his prosperity after a dark night of affliction. The next, Kezia, a spice of a very fragrant smell, because, saith Bishop Patrick, God had healed his stinking ulcers. The third, Keren-happuch, that is, 'plenty restored,' or 'a horn of paint;' because, saith he, God had wiped away the tears which fouled his face, ch. xvi. 16. Concerning these daughters we are here told, ver. 15, 1st. That God made them great beauties, "no women so fair as the daughters of Job." In the Old Testament we often find women praised for their beauty, as Sarah, Rebecca, and many others, but we never find any women in the New Testament whose beauty is in the least taken notice of, no, not the virgin Mary herself, because the beauty of holiness is that which is brought to a much clearer light by the Gospel. 2nd. That their father (God enabling him to do it) made them great fortunes; pardon the vulgar expression. He "gave them inheritance among their brethren," and did not turn them off with small portions, as most did. It is probable they had some extraordinary personal merit, which Job had an eye to in this extraordinary favour he shewed them. Perhaps they excelled their brethren in wisdom and piety; and therefore, that they might continue in his family, to be a stay and blessing to it, he made them coheirs with their brethren.

Fifthly. His life was long. What age he was of when his troubles came, we are nowhere told, but here we are told that he lived one hundred and forty years; whence some conjecture that he was seventy when he was in his troubles, and so his age was doubled, as his other possessions. 1. He lived to have much of the comfort of this, for he saw his posterity to the fourth generation, ver. 16; though his children were not doubled to him, yet in his children's children, (and those are the crown of old men,) they were more than doubled. As God appointed to Adam another seed, instead of that which was slain, Gen. iv. 15, so he did to Job with advantage. God has ways to repair the losses and balance the griefs of those who are written childless, as Job was when he had buried all his children. 2. He lived until he had enough of it; for he died "full of days," satisfied with living in this world, and willing to leave it; not peevishly so, as in the days of his affliction, but piously so, and thus, as Eliphaz had encouraged him to hope, he "came to his grave like a shock of corn in his season."

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF JOB.

CHAP. I.—1. There was a man. This has all the appearance of being a true history. Many have regarded the whole book as a fiction, and have supposed that no such person as Job ever lived. But the book opens with the appearance of reality; and the express declaration that there was such a man, the mention of his name, and of the place where he lived, shew that the writer meant to affirm that there was in fact such a man. The monuments and memorials of Job still preserved or referred to in the East may be adduced as some slight evidence of the fact that such a man as Job lived, and as an indication of the region in which he resided, which appears to have been not in Idumæa, but in some part of Arabia Deserta, lying between Palestine and the Euphrates. 6. Now there was a day. This is evidently designed to introduce the subsequent events relating to Job. It is language taken from the proceedings of a monarch who had sent forth messengers or ambassadors on important errands through the different provinces of his empire, who now returned to give an account of what they had observed, and of the general state of the kingdom. Such a return would, of course, be made on a fixed day, when, in the language of the law, their report would be 'returnable,' and when they would be required to give in an account of the state of the kingdom. If it be said that it is inconsistent with the supposition that this book was inspired, to suppose such a poetic fiction, it is replied, 1. That it is no more so than the parables of the Saviour, who often supposes cases, and states them as real occurrences, in order to illustrate some important truth. Yet no one was ever led into error by this. 2. It is in accordance with the language in the Scripture everywhere to describe God as a monarch seated on his throne, surrounded by his ministers, and sending them forth to accomplish important purposes in different parts of his vast empire. It is not absolutely necessary, therefore, to regard this as designed to represent an actual occurrence. It is one of the admissible ornaments of poetry,—as admissible as any other poetic ornament. To represent God as a king is not improper; and if so, it is not improper to represent him with the usual accompaniments of royalty,—surrounded by ministers, and employing angels and messengers for important purposes in his kingdom. This supposition being admitted, all that follows is merely in keeping, and is designed to preserve the verisimilitude of the conception. This idea, however, by no means militates against the supposition that angels are in fact really employed by God in important purposes in the government of his kingdom, nor that Satan has a real existence, and is permitted by God to employ an important agency in the accomplishment of his purposes towards his people.

CHAP. II.—11. Eliphaz the Temanite. The Temanites were celebrated for wisdom. "Is wisdom no more in Teman?" Jer. xlix. 7. The country was distinguished also for producing men of strength: "and thy mighty men, O Teman, shall be dismayed," Obad. 9. That this country was a part of Idumæa is apparent, not only from the fact that Teman was a descendant of Esau, who settled there, but from several places in the Scriptures: thus Eze. xxv. 13; Amos i. 12. Bildad the Shuhite. It would seem that Bildad did not reside very far from Eliphaz, for they made an agreement to go and visit Job. And Zophar the Naamathite. An inhabitant of Naamah, whose situation is unknown. Naamah was probably in or near the Ghor or valley which extends from the Dead sea to the gulf of Akaba. 13. And none spake a word unto him. That is, on the subject of his grief. They came to condole with him, but they had now nothing to say. They saw that his affliction was much greater than they had anticipated. For they saw that his grief was very great. This is given as a reason why they were silent. But how this produced silence, or why his great grief was a cause of their silence, is not intimated. Perhaps one or all of the following considerations may have led to it. 1. They were amazed at the extent of his sufferings. 2. The effect of great calamity is often to prevent utterance. 3. They might not have known what to say. 4. They seem to have been very early thrown into doubt in regard to the real character of Job. 5. In this state of things to administer rebuke would seem to be cruel. To be silent at such times is all that can be done; or to commend the sufferer in humble prayer to God, an expedient which seems not to have been resorted to either by Job or his friends. It is remarkable that Job is not represented as calling upon God for support, and it is as remarkable that his friends during these seven days of silent grief did not commend the case of their much afflicted friend to the Father of mercies. Had Job prayed, he might have been kept from much of the improper feeling to which he gave vent in the following chapter; had they prayed, they might have obtained much more just views of the government of God than they had hitherto possessed.

CHAP. III.—14. Which built desolate places for themselves. Kings constructed for their own burial-places magnificent tombs or mausoleums, which xlii. 17. The following is the celebrated addition to Job, as found in the Greek of the Septuagint:—"And it is written that he will rise again with those whom the Lord will raise up. This is translated out of a Syrian book. He dwelt indeed in the land of Ausitis, on the confines of Idumæa and Arabia. His first name was Jobab; and, having married an Arabian woman, he had by her a son, whose name was Ennon. He was himself a son of Zare, one of the sons of Esau; and his mother's name was Bosorra, so that he was the fifth in descent from Abraham. And these were the kings who reigned in Edom, over which country he also bare rule. The first was Balak, the son of Beor, and the name of his city was Dannaba. And after Balak Jobab, who is called Job; and after him Asom, who was governor from the region of Thaimanitis; and after him, Adad son of Barad, who smote Midian in the plain of Moab, and the name of his city was Getham. And the friends who came to him were Eliphaz, of the sons of Esau, the king of the Thaimanites; Bildad, the sovereign of the were lonely and desolate places, where they might lie in still and solemn grandeur. With such persons, lying in their places of lonely grandeur, Job felt it would be an honour to be associated. Compared with his present condition, it was one of dignity; and he earnestly wished that it might have been his lot thus early to have been consigned to the fellowship of the dead. It may be some confirmation of this view to remark, that the land of Edom, near which Job is supposed to have lived, contains at this day some of the most wonderful sepulchral monuments of the world. The engraving, (see also heading to Isaiah,) taken from Laborde, will give an illustration of those tombs. It is true that those sepulchres are of a much later date than the time of Job, nor could the art of sculpture in his time have been such as these specimens exhibit; but it is interesting to find such illustrations of the general idea in the very region where Job lived.

CHAP. IV.—8. Even as I have seen. It is true that wicked men are thus cut off and perish; but it is not true that all the wicked are thus punished in this life, nor that any of the righteous are not visited with similar calamities. His reasoning was of a kind that is common in the world—that of drawing universal conclusions from premises that are too narrow to sustain them, or from too few carefully observed facts. 20. Without any regarding it. O how painfully soon to human pride will our names be forgotten! The circle of friends will cease to weep, and then cease to remember us. The last memorial that we lived will be gone. The house that we built, the bed on which we slept, the counting-room that we occupied, the monuments that we raised, the books that we made, the stone that we directed to be placed over our graves, will all be gone; and the last memento that we ever lived, will have faded away! How vain is man! How vain is pride! How foolish is ambition! How important the announcement that there is another world, where we may live on for ever!

CHAP. V.—9. Without number. Marg. 'Till there be no number.' The sense is, that it is impossible to estimate the number of those things in the universe over which he presides which are adapted to excite admiration. If the view of the universe entertained in the time of Eliphaz was fitted to overwhelm the mind by its vastness, and by the number of the objects which were created, this astonishment is much greater now that the telescope has disclosed the wonders of the heavens above to man, and the microscope the not less amazing wonders of the world beneath him.

CHAP. VI.—4. For the arrows of the Almighty are within me. That is, it is not a light affliction that I endure. I am wounded in a manner which could not be caused by man; called to endure a severity of suffering which shews that it proceeds from the Almighty. The figure is not uncommon in the poetry of the East and of the ancients. Far more beautiful, however, than the expressions of any of the ancient classics,—more tender, more delicate, more full of pathos,—is the description which the Christian poet Cowper gives of the arrow that pierces the side of the sinner. It is the account of his own conversion:—

> 'I was a stricken deer, that left the herd
> Long since. With many an arrow deep infix'd
> My panting side was charged, when I withdrew,
> To seek a tranquil death in distant shades.
> There I was found by one, who had himself
> Been hurt by the archers. In his side he bore,
> And in his hands and feet, the cruel scars.'—Task, b. iii.

Of such wounding he did not complain. The arrow was extracted by the tender hand of him who alone had power to do it. Had Job known of him: had he been fully acquainted with the plan of mercy through him, and the comfort which a wounded sinner may find there, we should not have heard the bitter complaints which he uttered in his trials. Let us not judge him with the severity which we may use of one who is afflicted and complains under the full light of the Gospel.

CHAP. VII.—16. I would not live alway. As Job used this expression, there was doubtless somewhat of impatience and of an improper spirit. Still it contains a very important sentiment, and one that may be expressed in the highest state of just religious feeling. A man who is prepared for heaven should not, and will not, desire to live here always. It is better to depart and to be with Christ, better to leave a world of imperfection and sin, and to go to a world of purity and love. The sentiments suggested by this verse have been beautifully versified in a hymn by Muhlenberg:—

> 'I would not live alway; I ask not to stay
> Where storm after storm rises dark o'er the way;
> The few fleeting mornings that dawn on us here
> Are enough for life's sorrows—enough for its cheer.
>
> I would not live alway; no, welcome the tomb;
> Since Jesus hath lain there, I dread not its gloom;
> There sweet be my rest, till he bid me arise,
> To hail him in triumph descending the skies.
>
> Who, who would live alway, away from his God,
> Away from yon heaven, that blissful abode,
> Where rivers of pleasure flow o'er the bright plains,
> And the noontide of glory eternally reigns?
>
> Where the saints of all ages in harmony meet,
> Their Saviour and brethren transported to greet;
> While anthems of rapture unceasingly roll,
> And the smile of the Lord is the feast of the soul.

21. And why dost thou not pardon my transgression? Perhaps the following may be some of the reasons why Job had not the evidence of forgiveness which he now desired, and why the convicted sinner has not. The main reason is, that they are not in a state of mind to make it proper to forgive them. 1. There is a feeling that they have a claim on God for pardon, or that it would be wrong for God not to pardon them. 2. There is no proper submission to God, to his views, his terms, his plan. 3. There is a murmuring spirit, and that is a reason why the sinner is not forgiven. That was manifestly the case with Job; and when that exists how can God forgive? God often suffers the awakened sinner, therefore, to remain under conviction for sin, until he is willing to acquiesce in all his claims, and to submit without a murmur; and then, and not till then, he extends forgiveness to the guilty and troubled spirit.

CHAP. VIII.—17. His roots are wrapped about the heap. The reference is to the fact that a tree or plant which springs up on a rock, or in the midst of rocks, will send its roots afar for nutriment, or will wrap them around the projecting points of rocks in order to obtain support. What more beautiful illustration of a hypocrite can there be? His roots do not strike into the earth. His piety is not planted in a rich soil. It is on the hard rock of the unconverted human heart. Yet it sends out its roots afar; seems to flourish for a time; draws nutriment from remote objects; clings to a crag or a projecting rock, or to anything for support, until a tempest sweeps it down to rise no more! No doubt the idea of Bildad was, that Job was just such a man. Seeth the place of stones. Sept., 'and lives in the midst of flints,' not an unapt rendering, and a very striking description of a hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.—9. Which maketh Arcturus. This constellation is so conspicuous, that it has been an object of interest in all ages, and has been one of the groups of stars most attentively observed by navigators, as a guide in sailing. The reason was, probably, that as it constantly revolved around the North Pole, it could always be seen in clear weather, and thus the direction in which they were sailing could always be told. It has had a great variety of names. The name Ursa Major, or the Great Bear, is that which is commonly given to it. Orion. The situation of Orion is on the equator, midway between the poles of the heavens. It comes to the meridian about the 23rd of January. If, then, Job, with his limited views of astronomy, saw in this constellation an impressive proof of the greatness of the Almighty, how much more sublime should be our views of God! We see this constellation, not merely as a beautiful object in the sky—a collection of bright and beautiful gems—but we see it as so vast as to surpass our comprehension, and behold in it a single nebula, or speck—not quite visible to the naked eye—that mocks all our powers of conception! It may be added, that by the aid of a telescope about two thousand stars have been seen in this constellation. And Pleiades. The seven stars. The name is given to the cluster of stars in the neck of the constellation Taurus, of which seven are the principal. Six or seven may be usually seen if the eye is directed towards it; but if the eye be turned carelessly aside while the attention is fixed on the group, many more may be seen. For, 'it is a very remarkable fact, says Sir John Herschell, 'that the centre of the visual organ is by far less sensible to feeble impressions of light than the exterior portion of the retina.' 25. Now my days are swifter than a post. Than a courier, runner, or racer. It is applied to the mounted couriers of the Persians who carried the royal edicts to the distant provinces, Est. iii. 13, 15; xviii. 14; and to the body-guard and royal messengers of Saul and of David, 1 Sam. xxii. 17; 2 Kin. x. 25. The common rate of travelling in the East is exceedingly slow. The caravans move little more than two miles an hour. Couriers are, however, employed, who go either on dromedaries, or horses, or on foot, and who travel with great rapidity. Lady Montague says, that 'after the defeat at Peterwaradin, they [the couriers on dromedaries] far outran the fleetest horses, and brought the first news of the battle at Belgrade.'

CHAP. XI.—16. And remember it as waters that pass away. When we look back upon our sorrows, it is like thinking of the stream that was so much swollen, and was so impetuous. Its waters rolled on, and they come not back again; and there is a kind of pleasure in thinking of that time of danger, of that flood that was then so fearful, and that has now swept on to come back no more. So there is a kind of peaceful joy in thinking of the days of sorrow that are now fled for ever; in the assurance that those sad times will never, never recur again.

CHAP. XIII.—15. Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him. The sentiment here expressed is one of the noblest that could fall from the lips of man. It indicates unwavering confidence in God, even in death. It is the determination of a mind to adhere to him, though he should strip away comfort after comfort, and though there should be no respite to his sorrows until he should sink down in death. This is the highest expression of piety, and this it is the privilege of the friends of God to experience. Reader, can you in sincerity lift the eye toward God, and say to him, 'Though thou dost slay me, though comfort after comfort is taken away, though the waves of trouble roll over me, and though I go down into the valley of the shadow of death, yet I will trust in thee; thine I will be even then, and when all is dark I will believe that God is right, and just, and true, and good, and will never doubt that he is worthy of my eternal affection and praise?' Such is religion. Where else is it found but in the views of God and of his government which the Bible reveals? The infidel may have apathy in his sufferings, the blasphemer may be stupid, the moralist or the formalist may be unconcerned; but that is not to have confidence in God—that results from religion alone.

CHAP. XV.—26. Upon the thick bosses. The word boss with us means a knob, a protuberant ornament of silver, brass, or ivory, on a harness or a bridle; then a protuberant part, a prominence, or a round or swelling body of any kind. The idea here is not that which our translation would seem to convey. It is not that he rushes upon or against the hard and thick shield of the Almighty, and that, therefore, he must meet resistance and be overcome; it is that he rushes upon God with his own shield. He puts himself in the attitude of a warrior. He turns the boss of his own shield against God, and becomes his antagonist. He is his enemy. The omission of the word with in the passage, or the preposition, which is in the Hebrew, has led to this erroneous translation. The passage is often quoted in a popular manner to denote that the sinner rushes upon God, and must meet resistance from his shield, or be overcome. It should be quoted only to denote that the sinner places himself in an attitude of opposition to God, and is his enemy.

CHAP. XVI.—15. And defiled my horn in the dust. The word horn is used in the Scriptures to denote strength and power. The figure is taken from horned animals, whose strength resides in their horns; and hence, as the horn is the means of defence, the word comes to denote that on which one relies; his strength, honour, dignity. A horn made of silver was also worn as an ornament, or as an emblem, on the forehead of females or warriors. It was probably used at first by warriors as a symbol of power, authority, or strength; and the idea was undoubtedly derived from the fact that the strength of animals was seen to lie in the horn. Then it came to be a mere ornament, and as such is used still in the vicinity of mount Lebanon. Oriental customs do not undergo those changes which are so common in the Western world, and it is possible that this custom prevailed in the time of Job. The idea here is, that whatever once constituted the reliance or the glory of Job, was now completely prostrate. It was as if it were buried in the earth.

CHAP. XVIII.—And his candle. Marg., 'lamp.' The reference is to a lamp that was suspended from the ceiling. 'The houses of Egypt, in modern times, are never without lights; they burn lamps all the night long, and in every occupied apartment. So requisite to the comfort of a family is this custom reckoned, and so imperious is the power which it exercises, that the poorest people would rather retrench part of their food than neglect it.'—Paxton. It is not improbable that this custom prevailed in former times in Arabia, as it does now in Egypt; and this consideration will give increased beauty and force to this passage.

CHAP. XIX.—23. Oh that they were printed. It is clear that this expression may convey wholly an erroneous idea. The art of printing was then unknown; and the passage has no allusion to that art. The original word means, properly, to cut in, to hew; then to cut,—for example, a sepulchre in a rock, Isa. xxii. 16; then to cut, or engrave letters on a tablet of lead or stone, Isa. xxx. 8; Eze. iv. 1, and generally it implies the notion of engraving, or inscribing on a plate with an engraving tool. Anciently books were made of materials which allowed of this mode of making a record. Stone would probably be the first material; and then Saucheans; and Sopher, the king of the Minaians." Although we give this passage in full, we have no reason to regard it as authentic. It may embody some old traditions, and is so far curious, but it is a note, and no part of the book of Job. The custom of prefacing or of supplementing ancient texts by brief memoranda is well known to have been common.

Additional Note on chap. xxxiii. 23, 24.—The ancient versions of this passage are almost wholly unsatisfactory, and the ordinary reader would be little helped by them. The opinions which have been advocated respecting the "messenger" or "interpreter," referred to in verse 23, have been divided into three classes:—1. The opinions of those who regard the personage in question as a man. 2. The opinions of those who believe an angel is meant. 3. The opinions of those who suppose the allusion is to the Messiah. Under each of these heads there are many shades or varieties of sentiment. Only in one fundamental conception do nearly all expositors agree; plates of metal, leaves, bark, skins, &c. The notion of engraving, however, is the proper idea here. In a book. As books in the form in which they are now were then unknown; as there is no evidence that at that time anything like volumes or rolls were possessed; as the records were probably preserved on tablets of stone or lead; and as the entire description here pertains to something that was engraved: and as this sense is conveyed by the Arabic verb from which the word book is derived, the word tablet, or some kindred word, will better express the sense of the original than book. 24. Pen—graven—in the rock. It was common, at an early period, to make inscriptions on the smooth surface of a rock. Perhaps the first that were made were on stones, which were placed as waymarks, or monuments over the dead, as we now make such inscriptions on gravestones. Then it became common to record any memorable transaction, as a battle, on stones or rocks; and perhaps, also, sententious and apophthegmatical remarks were recorded in this manner, to admonish travellers, or to transmit them to posterity. Numerous inscriptions of this kind are found by travellers in the East, on tombs, and on rocks in the desert. 25. For I know—that is, 'I am fully persuaded'—that my redeemer liveth. Wemyss considers that Job only meant, 'I know that my avenger liveth,' &c., and that he predicted the appearance of God as his avenger, as related in ch. xxxviii., &c. A host of distinguished critics support this opinion, and so does Barnes, in his recent translation of Job. Wemyss, among other reasons for so rendering it, says, 'the Septuagint (or Greek translation) gives no countenance to our translation: it commences the passage thus:—

"For I know that he is eternal Who is about to deliver me on earth," &c.

He also says, 'There is no other passage in the whole book of Job importing that he knew anything of the Messiah, or believed in a resurrection.' He adds, 'It is a good and safe rule to apply no Old Testament passage to Jesus Christ that is not so applied to him in the New.' He considers ch. xvi. 19, as expressing the same meaning as this text. He says, 'Had Job possessed a hope in the resurrection from the dead, and in a Saviour to come, he would never have cursed the day of his birth.' 'Such an avowal of faith as is supposed would have included his name in Heb. xi.' And finally, 'Job would then have had a place among the prophets.' Now the word rendered, by the advocates of these opinions, 'avenger,' signifies also 'redeemer;' and the interpretation of the passage may be, 'he shall stand up as the great and impartial Judge, to award to all according to their deeds; to vindicate the character of the just, and to punish the wicked.' With regard to the rendering of the Septuagint, it certainly signifies that a 'deliverer' shall come, and that that deliverer is 'eternal,' a grand characteristic of the Redeemer. In opposition to Wemyss, it may be observed, that there is, at least, another passage from which it may be inferred that Job did believe in a resurrection: see ch. xiv. 12. The expression "till the heavens be no more," may imply, as Davidson remarks, 'that then shall man rise again from death,' which Scripture calls a sleep, 1 Thes. iv. 13; and with regard to a Redeemer and Saviour, the knowledge of God which Job possessed must have been derived from the same source whence is derived the promise, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." The rule is conceded, that passages in the Old Testament should not be applied to Christ without the sanction of the New; nevertheless the doctrine contained in this verse, rendered as by our translators, is a New Testament doctrine, and the editor of these pages thinks there may be a strongly-implied allusion to Job's faith in the declaration of our Lord at Bethany, "I am the resurrection and the life," &c. Some think the spirit of the passage may be found in 2 Tim. i. 12. As to Job cursing the day of his birth, the hasty expression of a vexed, tried, and tempted man is not to be viewed as his creed; he might express his angry feelings against this life, without shutting out hope from the next. That Job was not inserted in the catalogue in Heb. xi., is not to be taken as an argument, since that inserted the name of some persons only of distinguished faith; nor, finally, was it likely that Job should, for such a glance at future deliverance, be reckoned as a prophet, any more than Jacob, when he bowed his dying head, and said, "I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord." As there is among modern critics an effort to alter this text, the editor has here given a far longer note than usual, to dispute the point, which he ventures to do with great deference. He has on his side Poole, Henry, Bishop Hall, Bishop Sherlock, Dr. Gill, Scott the translator, Bishop Pearson, Hales, Ostervald, Goode, Clarke, Dr. Boothroyd, Dr. Pye Smith, Scott the commentator, and T. Williams; and even Dr. Priestley says, 'Christians in general, from the earliest times, maintain that Job [in this passage] declares his faith in a happy resurrection at the last day; and this, I have no doubt, is the right construction. . . . . His wishing so often for death, as the end of all his troubles, shows that he had no expectation of any temporal deliverance.' Old prejudices should certainly yield to the discoveries of clearer light and knowledge; but arguments should be stronger than those at present advanced, to induce us to relinquish the construction of a passage which has comforted many a believer in trouble, and lighted up his countenance with the beams of immortality, when the spirit was about to depart to its eternal abode. Barnes considers that the common rendering is inconsistent with the whole scope and connexion of the book, which is 'a great inquiry about the doctrines of Divine providence, and the Divine dealings with men;' but it is not a singular thing to find pious men and eminent prophets suddenly, as if by momentary inspiration, darting out of, and soaring far above, the subject on which they are treating, to take a glimpse of the Messiah, or the blessings connected with him. Barnes considers that our rendering is inconsistent with numerous passages in which Job expresses a contrary belief; or at least that, had he believed in the resurrection, he would frequently have adverted to it. This objection has been noticed, and is easily answered, as Job, in the gloominess of his spirit, noticed only the destination of the mortal body, worn out with disease and grief; but it might as fairly be inferred from this, that he had no belief in the existence of his soul. No doubt, as Barnes observes, the clear doctrine of the resurrection of the dead was reserved for the Christian dispensation, as were many other great truths: but they were all seen as by momentary glimpses, of which there seem to be sufficient evidences. Abel, before the days of Job, had by faith offered up a more acceptable sacrifice than Cain: the one acknowledged the Creator, but the other doubtless looked to the Redeemer. Job, too, offered up his sacrifices, not merely as acknowledgments for favours received, but for the removal of guilt; and as there never was but one way in which guilt could be removed, Job's sacrifices could only have been offered by faith in that way. Hence he must have had some view of a Redeemer, or his sacrifices, on the score of attaining pardon and acceptance, would have been in vain. It may, therefore, be inferred that our Redeemer was the Redeemer to whose glorious deliverance Job cast the momentary glance of faith, which must have been as the drop of cordial to cheer his drooping spirit.—Domestic Bible, by the Rev. Ingram Cobbin, A.M.

CHAP. XXI.—Wherefore do the wicked live? This question is one of great importance at all times, and one which it is natural to ask, but which it is not even yet always easy to answer. Some points are clear, and may be easily suggested. They are such as these: They live, 1. To shew the forbearance and long-suffering of God. 2. To furnish a full illustration of the character of the human heart. 3. To afford them ample space for repentance, so that there shall not be the semblance of a ground of complaint when they are called before God, and are condemned. 4. Because God intends to make some of them the monuments of his mercy, and more fully to display the riches of his grace in their conversion, as he did in the case of Paul, Augustine, John Bunyan, and John Newton. 5. They may be preserved to be the instruments of his executing some important purpose by them, as was the case with Pharaoh, Sennacherib, and Nebuchadnezzar. Or, 6. He keeps them, that the great interests of society may be carried on; that the affairs of the commercial and the political world may be forwarded by their skill and talent. For some, or all of these purposes, it may be, the wicked are kept in the land of the living, and are favoured with great external prosperity, while many a Christian is oppressed, afflicted, and crushed to the dust. Of the fact there can be no doubt; of the reasons for the fact, there will be a fuller development in the future world than there can be now. 11. And their children dance. They frolick or play. There is no evidence here that Job meant to say that they taught their children to dance; that they caused them to be trained in anything that now corresponds to dancing schools; and that he meant to say that such a training was improper, and tended to exclude God from the heart. Of the impropriety of so training children there ought to be but one opinion among the friends of religion; but there is no evidence that Job referred to any such training here, and this passage should not be adduced to prove that dancing is wrong. It refers to the playfulness and the cheerful sports of children, and God has made them so that they will find pleasure in such sports, and so that they are benefited by them. There is not a more lovely picture of happiness and of the benevolence of God anywhere on earth than in such groups of children, and in their sportiveness and playfulness there is no more that is wrong than there is the gambols of the lambs of the flock. 14. Therefore. In the Hebrew it is simply, And they say. The word 'therefore' should not have been inserted. Job is not affirming that their mode of life is a reason why they reject the claims of God, but that it is a simple fact that they do live, even in this prosperity, in the neglect of God. This is the gist of what he is saying, that being thus wicked they were in fact prospered, and not punished as his friends had maintained. 33. And every man shall draw after him. This appears to be the idea here, that the man who should thus die would draw great numbers to the place where he was buried, and that before him, or in his presence, there was an innumerable multitude, so greatly would he be honoured. What multitudes would go to look on the grave of Alexander the Great! How many have gone to look on the place where Cæsar fell! How many have gone, and will go, to look on the place where Napoleon is buried!

CHAP. XXIII.—8. I go forward. The terms here used refer to the points of the compass, and should have been so rendered. The Oriental geographers considered themselves as facing the east, instead of the north, as we do. Of course the west was behind them, the south on the right hand, and on the left the north. The phrase, therefore, "Behold, I go forward," means, "I go to the east. I look toward the rising of the sun." And backward. To the west—for this was behind the individual when he stood looking to the east. 9. On the left hand. That is, in the north—at the left hand when the face was turned to the east. On the right hand. On the south.

CHAP. XXIV.—16. In the dark they dig through houses. In Bengal, says Mr. Ward, it is common for thieves to dig through the walls of houses made of mud, or under the house floors, which are made merely of earth, and enter thus into the dwellings while the inmates are asleep.

CHAP. XXVI.—13. Crooked serpent. The practice of forming pictures of the heavens, with a somewhat fanciful resemblance to animals, was one of the most early devices of astronomy, and was evidently known in the time of Job. The figure of the serpent, or "the dragon," is still one of the constellations of the heavens, and there can be little doubt that it is the same that is referred to in this ancient book. On the celestial globes it is drawn between Ursa Major and Cepheus.

CHAP. XXVII.—10. Will he always call upon God? That is, he will not always call upon God. This is literally true. The hypocrite prays, 1. When he makes a profession of religion. 2. On some extraordinary occasion—as when a friend is sick, or when he feels that he himself is about to die; but he does not always maintain habits of prayer. He suffers his business to break in upon his times for prayer: neglects secret devotion on the slightest pretence, and soon abandons it altogether. One of the best tests of character is the feeling with which we pray, and the habit which we have of calling on God. The man who loves secret prayer has one of the most certain evidences that he is a pious man.

CHAP. XXVIII.—1. A vein for silver, and a place for gold where they fine it 'When we had satisfied ourselves with the view of the inscriptions on the rocks in the valley of Mukatted, Mr. Smith, Dhanjibbai, and I proceeded to take a peep through our telescopes at the high range of red granite mountains, lying to the east. We were so much struck by their absolutely naked flanks, and with what appeared to be numerous dark metallic veins, or basaltic dykes, running up to their summits, like a series of bars or ribs, that we resolved to visit them. On a hill in front of them, which we had to surmount before we could get to their base, we were surprised to see immense quantities of debris and slag, with fragments of stone, mortar, and furnaces, which we doubted not had been used in the remotest antiquity, for the founding and smelting of ore. When we actually reached the mountains, we found that they had been peeled and excavated to a great extent where the veins and dykes had occurred. Numerous grooves and channels seemed to be cut in the extraction of the ore from the very top to the bottom of the mountains, even where they were most perpendicular, and the mountains are completely spoiled and stripped of their treasures. How they were wrought, whether by the aid of scaffolding reaching from the bottom, or by supports let down from above by ropes or chains, it is impossible to say. They formed to us a most striking and valuable illustration of the ancient processes of mining, and the enterprise in which they originated, as referred to in that sublime and interesting chapter of Job—the twenty-eighth.'—Dr. Wilson's Lands of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 187, 188.

CHAP. XXIX.—19. My root was spread out by the waters. The meaning is that it was spread abroad, or extended far, so that the moisture of the earth had free access to it; or it was like a tree planted near a stream, whose root ran down to the water. This is an image designed to denote great prosperity. In the East such an image would be more striking than with us. Here, green, large, and beautiful trees are so common as to excite little or no attention. In such a country as Arabia, however, where general desolation exists, such a tree would be a most beautiful object, and a most striking image of prosperity. And the dew lay all night upon my branch. In the absence of rain, which seldom falls in deserts, the scanty vegetation is dependent on the dews that fall at night. Those dews are often very abundant.

CHAP. XXXI.—12. For it is a fire that consumeth to destruction. It is like a consuming fire, which sweeps away every thing before it. It is destructive to the body, the morals, the soul. Accordingly, it may be remarked that there is and it is in this, that the words point to such a Divine interposition on behalf of a man that he is pardoned and restored. This idea is illustrated by this very book. In the depth of Job's affliction, aggravated by his so-called comforters, Elihu interposes, and becomes the instrument of preparing Job to attend to God's counsels, and so to receive the Divine grace and favour, and to return to health, prosperity, and a right mind. That Elihu alludes to himself has been maintained by men like Gusset, Umbreit, and Barnes. A much more popular view is certainly that which regards the language as an allusion to the Messiah and his work. Only a very small number of modern critics think an angel is intended, and we cannot approve of that notion. Amid so much uncertainty, we can but endorse as judicious the following from the writer last named: "The general truth that God was merciful, and that the repentance of the sick man would be followed by a release from suffering, was all that can reasonably be supposed to have been understood at that period of no one vice which pours such desolation through the soul as licentiousness: see Rush on the Diseases of the Mind, and Paley's Moral Philosophy. It corrupts and taints all the fountains of morals, and utterly annihilates all purity of the heart. And would root out all mine increase. By its desolating effects on my heart and life. The meaning is that it would utterly ruin him: compare Luke xv. 13, 30. How many a wretched sensualist can bear testimony to the truth of this statement! How many a young man has been wholly ruined in reference to his worldly interests, as well as in reference to his soul, by this vice! compare Pr. vii. No young man could do a better service to himself than to commit the whole of that chapter to memory, and so engrave it on his soul that it never could be forgotten.

CHAP. XXXII.—19. Like new bottles. The reference of Elihu is undoubtedly to skins that were used as bottles; and new skins are here mentioned as ready to burst, not because they were more likely to burst than old ones, for that was y no means the case, but because new and unfermented wine would naturally be placed in them, thus endangering them. Bottles in the East, it is well known, are usually made of the skins of goats: see Supplementary Notes on Mat. ix. 17.

CHAP. XXXIII.—17. That he may withdraw man from his purpose. Marg., work. The sense is plain. God designs to warn him of the consequences of executing a plan of iniquity. The case of Colonel Gardiner cannot be forgotten, though in that instance it was rather "a vision of the night" than a dream. He was meditating an act of wickedness, and was alone in his room awaiting the appointed hour. In the silence of the night, and in the solitude of his room, he seemed to see the Saviour on the cross. This view, however it may be accounted for, restrained him from the contemplated act of wickedness, and he became an eminently pious man: see Doddridge's Life of Colonel Gardiner. The mind, with all its faculties, is under the control of God, and no one can demonstrate that he does not make its actings, even in the wanderings of a dream, the designed means of checking the sinner, and of saving the soul.

CHAP. XXXV.—12. Because of the pride of evil men. That is, of their own pride. The pride of men so rebellious, and so disposed to complain of God, is the reason why they do not appeal to him to sustain them and give them relief. This is still as true as it was in the time of Elihu. However inapplicable, therefore, this solution of the difficulty may have been to the case of Job, it is not inapplicable to the case of multitudes of sufferers. Many of the afflicted have no peace or consolation in their trials, no "songs in the night," because they are too proud to pray!

CHAP. XXXVI.—6. But giveth right to the poor. Marg., or afflicted. The Hebrew word often refers to the afflicted, to the humble, or the lowly; and the reference here is to the lower classes of society. The idea is that God deals justly with them, and does not overlook them because they are so poor and feeble that they cannot contribute any thing to him. In this sentiment Elihu was undoubtedly right, though, like the three friends of Job, he seems to have adopted the principle that the dealings of God here are according to the characters of men. He had some views in advance of theirs. He saw that affliction is designed for discipline, ch. xxxiii.; that God is willing to shew mercy to the sufferer on repentance: that he is not dependent on men, and that his dealings cannot be graduated by any reference to what he would receive or suffer from men; but still he clung to the idea that the dealings of God here are a proof of the character of the afflicted. What was mysterious about it he resolves into sovereignty, and shewed that man ought to be submissive to God, and to believe that he was qualified to govern. He lacked the views which Christianity has furnished, that the inequalities that appear in the Divine dealings here, will be made clear in the retributions of another world.

CHAP. XXXVII.—16. Dost thou know the balancings of the clouds? That is, Dost thou know how the clouds are poised and suspended in the air? The difficulty to be explained was, that the clouds, so full of water, did not fall to the earth, but remained suspended in the atmosphere. They were poised and moved about by some unseen hand. Elihu asks what kept them there; what prevented their falling to the earth; what preserved the equilibrium, so that they did not all roll together? We know more of the facts and laws respecting the clouds than was understood then; but our knowledge in this, as in all other things, is fitted only to exalt our conceptions of the Deity, and to change blind wonder into intelligent adoration. 22. Fair weather. Marg., gold. It seems probable that Elihu means to say that a bright, dazzling light was seen in the northern sky, like burnished gold, which was a fit symbol of the approaching Deity. This idea is hinted at in the Septuagint, but it has not seemed to occur to expositors. The image is that of the heavens darkened with the tempest, the lightnings playing, the thunder rolling, and then the wind seeming to brush away the clouds in the north, and disclosing in the opening a bright dazzling appearance, like burnished gold, that bespoke the approach of God.

CHAP. XXXVIII.—22. Treasures of the snow—of the hail. All the facts about the formation of hail were unknown in the time of Job, and hence God appeals to them as evidence of his superior wisdom and greatness, and in proof of the duty of man to submit to him. These phenomena, which were constantly occurring, man could not explain; and how much less qualified, therefore, was he to sit in judgment on the secret counsels of the Almighty! The same observation may be made now; for, though science has done something to explain the laws by which snow and hail are formed, yet those discoveries have tended to enlarge our conceptions of the wisdom of God, and have shown us, to an extent which was not then suspected, how much is still unknown. We see a few of the laws by which God does these things, but who is prepared to explain these laws themselves, or to tell why and how the particles of vapour arrange themselves into such beautiful crystallized forms?

CHAP. XXXIX.—9. Will the unicorn be willing to serve thee? In Hebrew, rem, or reem. Of the wild buffalo of Abyssinia, Dr. Roth, who lately visited that country as the naturalist under Major Harris, says, 'The wild buffalo, bubolus pegasus, fierce, and as yet untamed, inhabits the forests and jungles of Bulgu and Mentspai, all along the river Hawash. Its chase is considered one of the most dangerous pursuits of the hunter; several human lives being frequently expended in the conquest of one beast.'—App. to Harris's Highlands of Ethiopia. Dr. Wilson adds, 'Such an animal as this seems to correspond with the reem of Job.' 18. She scorneth the horse and his rider. 'Notwithstanding the stupidity of this animal, its Creator hath amply provided for its safety by endowing it with extraordinary swiftness, and a surprising apparatus for escaping from its enemy. "They, when they raise themselves up for flight, laugh at the horse and his rider." They afford him an opportunity only of admiring at a distance the extraordinary agility, and the stateliness likewise of their motions, the richness of their plumage, and the great propriety there was in ascribing to them an expanded, quivering wing. Nothing, certainly, can be more entertaining than such a sight; the wings, by their rapid but unwearied vibrations, equally serving them for sails and for oars; while their feet, no less assisting in conveying them out of sight, are no less insensible of fatigue.'—Dr. Shaw's Travels, 8vo. vol. ii. p. 343, as quoted by Noyes.

CHAP. XL.—15. Behold now behemoth. The characteristics given agree better with the hippopotamus than with any other known animal, and at present, critics, with few exceptions, agree in the opinion that this is the animal which is referred to. The hippopotamus is found principally on the banks of the Nile, though it is found also in the other large rivers of Africa, as the Niger, and the rivers which lie between that and the Cape of Good Hope. It is not found in any of the rivers which run north into the Mediterranean except the Nile, and there only at present in that portion which traverses Upper Egypt; and it is found also in the lakes and fens of Ethiopia. The appearance of the animal, when on land, is represented as very uncouth, the body being very large, flat, and round, the head enormously large in proportion, the feet as disproportionably short, and the armament of teeth in its mouth truly formidable. The length of a male has been known to be seventeen feet, the height seven, and the circumference fifteen; the head three feet and a half, and the mouth about two feet in width. Objection is, however, made to the hippopotamus, because he keeps to the water, and never feeds on the mountains, as the creature here described (see ver. 20); and to the elephant, because his belly is not invulnerable, as this creature (see ver. 16). Hence some suppose an animal is meant now become extinct, possibly the mastodon, whose amazing structure is among the discoveries of geology.—Domestic Bible.

CHAP. XLI.—1. Leviathan. As the learned have contended about the behemoth, so also have they about leviathan. The two leading opinions respecting this creature are, 1. That it means the whale; and, 2. That it means the crocodile. Against the opinion that it means the whale it is objected, that the whale tribes do not inhabit the Mediterranean, much less the rivers which empty themselves into it, with which it is supposed Job could have been acquainted. And moreover, the animal here described differs from the whale in many particulars, the whale having neither proper snout nor nostrils, nor proper teeth. The eyes too of the whale are most disproportionately small. Neither is it fierce, or unconquerably courageous. In favour of the leviathan being the crocodile, it is remarked, 1. That this creature is a natural inhabitant of the Asiatic and African rivers; 2. that he is wild, fierce, and ungovernable—of vast extent—terrible in aspect—has a huge mouth—numerous and formidable teeth—is covered with strong scales—fierce in the eye—frightful in the mouth—astonishingly strong, and incapable of being captured in an ordinary way. The crocodile will grow to the length of thirty feet; it has thirty teeth in each jaw; its coat of mail repels a musket ball. It has power sufficient to drag a tiger into the water and drown it, when it goes to drink. The description of the fury and power of this creature needs no particular explanation in the subsequent verses. In verses 10 and 11 the argument is carried from the creature to the Creator; and ver. 12 again commences a more particular description of the animal than had been before given.—Domestic Bible.

CHAP. XLII.—16. After this lived Job an hundred and forty years. The age to which he lived is mentioned as remarkable, and was evidently somewhat extraordinary. It is not proper, therefore, to assume that this was the ordinary length of human life at that time, though it would be equally improper to suppose that there was anything like miracle in the case. The fair interpretation is that he reached the period of old age which was then deemed most honourable; that he was permitted to arrive at what was then regarded as the outer limit of human life; and if this be so, it is not difficult to determine about the time when he lived. The length of human life after the flood suffered a somewhat regular decline, until, in the time of Moses, it was fixed at about threescore years and ten, Ps. xc. 10. The following instances will shew the regularity of the decline, and enable us, with some degree of probability, to determine the period of the world in which Job lived. Noah lived 950 years; Shem, his son, 600; Arphaxad, his son, 438 years; Salah, 433 years; Eber, 464; Peleg, 239; Reu, 239; Serug, 230; Nahor, 248; Terah, 205; Abraham, 175; Isaac, 180; Jacob, 147; Joseph, 110; Moses, 120; Joshua, 110. Supposing then the age of Job to have been somewhat unusual and extraordinary, it would fall in with the period somewhere in the time between Terah and Jacob; and if so, he was probably contemporary with the most distinguished of the patriarchs.

In view of all these things, and especially of the statements in the chapter which closes the book, we may make the following remarks: 1. The upright will be ultimately honoured by God and man. 2. We should adhere to our integrity when passing through trials. 3. The expressions of Divine favour and love are not to be expected in the midst of angry controversy and heated debate. 4. From the chapter before us (xlii. 11,) we are presented with an interesting fact, such as often occurs. It is this: friends return to us, and become exceedingly kind after calamity has passed by. 5. We should overcome the unkindness of our friends by praying for them. 6. The last days of a good man are not unfrequently his best and happiest days. The early part of his life may be harassed with cares; the middle may be filled up with trials; but returning prosperity may smile upon his old age, and his sun go down without a cloud. 7. The book through whose exposition we have now passed is a most invaluable argument. The reasonings of philosophy now are no more satisfactory than were those of Eliphaz, Zophar, and Bildad; and it may be doubted whether, since this book was written, the slightest advance has been made in removing the perplexities on the subject of the Divine administration, so beautifully stated in the book of Job. 8. The reasonings in this book show the desirableness and the value of revelation. A great and good man fails. His comforts all depart. He sinks to the lowest degree of wretchedness. To explain this, and all kindred subjects, his own mind is taxed to the utmost, and four men of distinguished sagacity and extent of observation are introduced—the representatives of the wisdom of the world—to explain the fact. They adduce all that they had learned by tradition, and all that their own observation had suggested, and all the considerations which reason would suggest to them; but all in vain. They make no advances in the explanation, and the subject at the close is left as dark as when they began. Such an effect, and such a train of discussion, is admirably fitted to prepare the mind to welcome the teachings of revelation, and to be grateful for that volume of revealed truth which casts such abundant light on the questions that so perplexed these ancient sages. Lastly, the theologian should study this book as an invaluable introduction to the volume of inspired truth; the humble Christian, to obtain elevated views of God; the philosopher, to see how little the human mind can accomplish on the most important of all subjects without the aid of revelation; the child of sorrow, to learn the lessons of patient submission; the man of science, to know what was understood in the far distant periods of the past; the man of taste, as an incomparable specimen of poetic beauty and sublimity. It will teach invaluable lessons to each advancing generation; and to the end of time true piety and taste will find consolation and pleasure in the study of the book of Job.

the world. Now we know the reason, the mode, and the extent of the ransom; and taking the words in their broadest sense, we may go to all sufferers, and say that they may be redeemed from going down to the dark chambers of the eternal pit, for God has found a ransom."

Note on chap. xxxiv. 5, 6. These verses must be taken together, and the following translation of them may be suggested: "For Job said, I am righteous, and God hath removed my judgment. Shall I lie concerning my judgment? Grievous is the arrow (wound) of me (who am) without transgression." The idea is that God has not dealt justly with him, and the proof of this is that he, an innocent man, suffers the most severe agonies, which he compares to the wounds caused by a (poisoned) arrow. Elihu proceeds to show that this view is wrong.

AN

THE BOOK OF PSALMS,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We have now before us one of the choicest and most excellent parts of all the Old Testament; nay, so much is there in it of Christ and his Gospel, as well as of God and his law, that it has been called the abstract or summary of both Testaments. The history of Israel, which we were long upon, led us to camps and council-boards, and there entertained and instructed us in the knowledge of God; the book of Job brought us into the schools, and treated us with profitable disputations concerning God and his providence; but this book brings us into the sanctuary, draws us off from converse with men, with the politicians, philosophers, or disputers of this world, and directs us into communion with God, by solacing and reposing our souls in him, lifting up and letting out our hearts towards him. Thus may we be in the mount with God; and we understand not ourselves if we say not, "It is good to be here." Let us consider,

I. The title of this book. It is called, 1. The Psalms; under that title it is referred to Lu. xxiv. 44. The Hebrew calls it Tehillim, which properly signifies 'psalms of praise,' because many of them are such; but Psalms is a more general word, meaning all metrical compositions fitted to be sung, which may as well be historical, doctrinal, or supplicatory, as laudatory. Though singing be properly the voice of joy, yet the intention of songs is of a much greater latitude—to assist the memory, and both to express and to excite all the other affections as well as this of joy. The priests had a mournful muse as well as joyful ones. And the Divine institution of singing psalms is thus largely intended; for we are directed not only to praise God, but to teach and admonish ourselves and one another, in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, Col. iii. 16. 2. It is called the Book of Psalms; so it is quoted by St. Peter, Acts i. 20. It is a collection of psalms, of all the psalms that were divinely inspired; which, though composed at several times, and upon several occasions, are here put together without any reference to, or dependence upon, one another. Thus they were preserved from being scattered and lost, and laid in so much greater readiness for the service of the church. See what a good Master we serve, and what pleasantness there is in wisdom's ways, when we are not only commanded to sing at our work, and have cause enough given us to do so, but have words also put into our mouths, and songs prepared to our hands.

II. The author of this book. It is, no doubt, derived originally from the blessed Spirit. They are spiritual songs, words which the Holy Ghost teacheth. The penman of most of them was David the son of Jesse, who is therefore called the sweet Psalmist of Israel, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1. Some that have not his name in their titles, yet are expressly ascribed to him elsewhere, as the second Psalm, Acts iv. 25, and Psalms xcvi. and cv., 1 Chr. xvi. One psalm is expressly said to be the prayer of Moses, Ps. xc., and that some of the psalms were penned by Asaph is intimated 2 Chr. xxix. 30, where they are said to praise the Lord in the words of David and Asaph, who is there called a seer or prophet. Some of the psalms seem to have been penned long after, as Ps. cxxxvii., at the time of the captivity in Babylon; but for certain the far greater part of them were penned by David himself, whose genius lay towards poetry and music; and who was raised up, qualified, and spirited for the establishing of the ordinance of singing psalms in the church of God, as Moses and Aaron were in their day for the settling of the ordinances of sacrifice: theirs is superseded, but this remains, and will to the end of time, when it shall be swallowed up in the songs of eternity. Herein David was a type of Christ, who descended from him; not from Moses, because he came to take away sacrifice, (the family of Moses was soon lost and extinct,) but to establish and perpetuate joy and praise; for of the family of David, in Christ, there shall be no end.

III. The scope of it. It is manifestly intended, 1. To assist the exercises of natural religion, and to kindle in the souls of men those devout affections which we owe to God as our Creator, Owner, Ruler, and Benefactor. The book of Job helps to prove our first principles of the Divine perfections and providence; but this helps to improve them in prayers and praises, and professions of desire toward him, dependence on him, and an entire devotedness and resignation to him. Other parts of Scripture shew that God is infinitely above man, and his Sovereign Lord; but this shews us that, notwithstanding that, he may be conversed with by us sinful worms of the earth, and there are ways in which, if it be not our own faults, we may keep up communion with him in all the various conditions of human life. 2. To advance the excellences of revealed religion, and, in the most pleasing, powerful manner, to recommend it to the world. There is indeed little or nothing in all the book of Psalms of the ceremonial law; though sacrifice and offering were yet to continue many ages, yet they are here represented as things which God did not desire, Ps. xl. 6; li. 16; as things comparatively little, and which in time were to vanish away. But the word and law of God, those parts of it which are moral and of perpetual obligation, are here all along magnified and made honourable: nowhere more. And Christ, the crown and centre of revealed religion, the foundation, corner, and topstone of that blessed building, is here clearly spoken of in type and prophecy; both his sufferings and the glory that should follow, and the kingdom he should set up in the world, which God's covenant with David concerning his kingdom was to have its accomplishment in. What a high value doth this book put upon the Word of God, his statutes and judgments, his covenant, and the great and precious promises of it; and how doth it recommend them to us as our guide and stay, and our heritage for ever!

IV. The use of it. All Scripture, being given by inspiration of God, is profitable to convey Divine light into our understanding; but this book is of singular use with that to convey Divine life and power, and a holy heat, into our affections. There is no one book of Scripture that is more helpful to the devotions of the saints than this, and it has been so in all ages of the church ever since it was written, and the several parts of it delivered to the chief musician, for the service of the church. 1. It is of use to be sung. Farther than David's psalms we may go, but we need not go, for hymns and spiritual songs. What the rules of the Hebrew metre were, even the learned are not certain. But these psalms ought to be rendered according to the metre of every language, at least, so as that they may be sung for the edification of the church; and, methinks, it is a great comfort to us, when we are singing David's psalms, that we are offering the very same praises to God that were offered him in the days of David, and other the godly kings of Judah. So rich, so well made, are these Divine poems, that they can never be exhausted, can never be worn threadbare. 2. It is of use to be read and opened by the ministers of Christ, as containing great and excellent truths, and rules concerning good and evil. Our Lord Jesus expounded the psalms to his disciples, the gospel psalms, and opened their understandings (for he had the key of David) to understand them, Lu. xxiv. 44. 3. It is of use to be read and meditated upon by all good people. It is a full fountain out of which we may all be drawing water with joy. 1st. The Psalmist's experiences are of great use for our direction, caution, and encouragement; in telling us, as he often doth, what passed between God and his soul, he lets us know what we may expect from God, and what he will expect and require, and graciously accept, from us. David was a man after God's own heart, and, therefore, those who find themselves in some measure according to his heart, have reason to hope that they are renewed by the grace of God, after the image of God, and may have much comfort in the testimony of their consciences for them, that they can heartily say Amen to David's prayers and praises. 2nd. Even the Psalmist's expressions, too, are of great use; and by them the Spirit helps our praying infirmities, because we know not what to pray for as we ought. In all our approaches to God, as well as in our first returns to God, we are directed to take with us words, Hos. xiv. 2; these words, words which the Holy Ghost teacheth. If we make David's psalms familiar to us, as we ought to do, whatever errand we have at the throne of grace, by way of confession, petition, or thanksgiving, we may from thence be assisted in the delivery of it; whatever devout affection is working in us, holy desire or hope, sorrow or joy, we may there find apt words wherewith to clothe them: sound speech which cannot be condemned. It will be good to collect the most proper and lively expressions of devotion which we find here, and to methodize them, and reduce them to the several heads of prayer, that they may be the more ready to us; or we may take sometimes one choice psalm, and sometimes another, and pray it over, that is, enlarge upon each verse in our own thoughts, and offer up our meditations to God, as they arise from the expressions we find there. The learned Dr. Hammond, in his preface to his Paraphrase on the Psalms, sect. 29, saith, 'That going over a few psalms with these interpunctions of mental devotion, suggested, animated, and maintained by the native life and vigour which is in the Psalms, is much to be

The Book of Psalms.—This book is a collection of sacred odes, written by different authors at different times, but it has long been generally known as the Psalms of David, because the larger number are from his pen. Seventy-one are directly ascribed to him, but this does not decide how many he wrote, as he may not have written some of these, and may have produced some to which his name is not prefixed. The authorship of several is ascribed to Moses, Asaph, Heman, Ethan, Jeduthun, and the Korathites, or sons of Korah. It must be admitted, however, that the inscriptions are not positively original. They do not appear in all the ancient versions, and they are not uniform in the copies of those versions which contain them. But some of them may be original, and those found in the Hebrew manuscripts are certainly very ancient. There is an old division of the Psalms into five portions or books, thus:—1. i.—xli; 2. xlii.—lxxii.; 3. lxxiii—lxxxix.; 4. xc.—cvi.; 5. cvii.—cl. Each of these books ends with Amen, or Hallelujah. The Psalms are all preferred before the saying over of the whole Psalter; since nothing is more fit to be averted in religious offices than their degenerating into heartless, dispirited recitations.' If, as St. Austin adviseth, we form our spirit by the affection of the psalm, we may then be sure of acceptance with God in using the language of it. Nor is it only our devotion and the affections of our mind that the book of Psalms assists, teaching us how to offer praise so as to glorify God; but it is also a directory to the actions of our lives, and teacheth us how to order our conversation aright, so as that, in the end, we may see the salvation of God, Ps. l. 6. The psalms were thus serviceable to the Old Testament church, but to us Christians they may be of more use than they could be to them who lived before the coming of Christ; for, as Moses' sacrifices, so David's songs, are expounded and made more intelligible by the Gospel of Christ, which lets us within the veil; so that if, to David's prayers and praises, we add St. Paul's prayers in his Epistles, and the new songs in the Revelation, we shall be thoroughly furnished for this good work, for the Scripture perfected makes the man of God perfect.

As to the division of this book we need not be solicitous; there is no connexion (or very seldom) between one psalm and another, nor any reason discernible for the placing of them in the order wherein we here find them; but it seems to be ancient, for that which is now the 2nd Psalm was so in the apostles' time, Acts xiii. 33. The vulgar Latin joins the 9th and 10th together; all Popish authors quote by that; so that from thenceforward, throughout the book, their number is one short of ours: our 11th is their 10th, our 119th their 118th. But then they divide the 147th into two, and so make up the number of 150. Some have endeavoured to reduce the Psalms to proper heads, according to the matter of them; but there is many times such a variety of matter in one and the same psalm, that it cannot be done with any certainty; but the seven penitential psalms have been in a particular manner singled out by the devotions of many. They are reckoned to be the 6th, 32nd, 38th, 51st, 102nd, 130th, and 143rd. The Psalms have anciently been divided into five books, each concluding with "Amen, amen," or "Hallelujah;" the first ending with Ps. xli., the second with Ps. lxxii., the third with Ps. lxxxix., the fourth with Ps. cvi., the fifth with Ps. cl. Others divide them into three fifties, others into sixty parts, two for every day of the month,—one for the morning, the other for the evening. Let good Christians divide them for themselves, so as may best increase their acquaintance with them, that they may have them at hand upon all occasions, and may sing them in the spirit and with the understanding.

PSALM I.

This is a psalm of instruction concerning good and evil, setting before us life and death, the blessing and the curse, that we may take the right way which leads to happiness, and avoid that which will certainly end in our misery and ruin. The different character and condition of godly people and wicked people, those that serve God, and those that serve him not, is here plainly stated in a few words; so that every man, if he will be faithful to himself, may here see his own face, and then read his own doom. That division of the children of men into saints and sinners, righteous and unrighteous, the children of God, and the children of the wicked one, as it is ancient, ever since the struggle began between sin and grace, the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, so it is lasting, and will survive all other divisions and subdivisions of men into high and low, rich and poor, bond and free; for by this men's everlasting state will be determined, and the distinction will last as long as heaven and hell. This psalm shews us, I. The holiness and happiness of a godly man, ver. 1—3. II. The sinfulness and misery of a wicked man, ver. 4, 5. III. The ground and reason of both, ver. 6. Whosoever collected the psalms of David, (probably it was Ezra,) with good reason put this psalm first, as a preface to the rest, because it is absolutely necessary to the acceptance of our devotions that we be righteous before God; for it is only the prayer of the upright that is his delight, and therefore that we be right in our notions of blessedness, and in our choice of the way that leads to it. Those are not fit to put up good prayers that do not walk in good ways.

BLESSED is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, [ners,
Nor standeth in the way of sin-
Nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful. [of the LORD;
2 But his delight is in the law
And in his law doth he meditate day and night.
3 And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water,
That bringeth forth his fruit in His leaf also shall not wither; [his season;
And whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.

The psalmist begins with the character and condition of a godly man, that those may first take the comfort of that to whom it belongs. Here is,

First. A description given of the godly man's spirit and way, by which we are to try ourselves. The Lord knows them that are his by name, but we must know them by their character, for that is agreeable to a state of probation, that we may study to answer the character; which is indeed both the command of the law, that we are bound in duty to obey, and the condition of the promise, that we are bound in interest to fulfil. The character of a good man is here given by the rules he chooseth to walk by, and to take his measures from. It is of great consequence to us what we take at our setting out, and at every turn, for the guide of our conversation, whether the course of this world or the word of God. An error in the choice of our standard and leader is original and fatal, but if we be right here we are in a fair way to do well.

1. A godly man, that he may avoid the evil, utterly renounces the conduct of evil-doers, and will not be led by them; ver. 1, he "walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly," &c. This part of his character is put first, because those that will keep the commandments of their God must say to evil-doers, "Depart from us," Ps. cxix. 115. And departing from evil is that in which wisdom begins. 1st. He sees evil-doers round about him. The world is full of them, they walk on every side. They are here described by three characters,—ungodly, sinners, and scornful. See by what steps men arrive to the height of impiety; nemo repente sit turpissimus,—'none reach the height of vice at once.' They are ungodly first, casting off the fear of God, and living in the neglect of their duty to him. But they rest not there; when the services of religion are laid aside, they come to be sinners, that is, they break out into open rebellion against God, and engage in the service of sin and Satan. Omissions make way for commissions; and by these the heart is so hardened that at length they come to be scorners; they openly defy all that is sacred, scoff at religion, and make a jest of sin. Thus is the way of iniquity down-hill; the bad grow worse, sinners themselves become tempters to others, and advocates for Baal. The word which we translate ungodly, signifies such as are unsettled, aim at no certain end, and walk by no certain rule, but are at the command of every lust, and at the beck of every temptation; the word for sinners, such as are determined for the practice of sin, and set it up as their trade; and then the scornful are those that set up their mouths against the heavens. These the good man sees with a sad heart; they are a constant vexation to his righteous soul. But, 2nd. He shuns them wherever he sees them. He doth not do as they do; and that he may not he doth not converse familiarly with them. First. He doth not walk in the counsel of the ungodly. He is not present at their counsels, nor doth he advise with them; though they are never so witty, and subtle, and learned, if they are ungodly they shall not be the men of his counsel; he doth not consent to them, nor say as they say, Lu. xxiii. 51; doth not take his measures from their principles, nor act according to the advice which they use to give and take. The ungodly are forward to give their advice against religion; and it is managed so artfully, that we have reason to bless ourselves from it, and to think ourselves happy if we escape being tainted and ensnared by it. Secondly. He stands not in the way of sinners; that is, he avoids doing as they do. Their way shall not be his way; he will not come into it, much less will he continue in it, as the sinner doth, who "sets himself in a way that is not good," Ps. xxxvi. 4. He avoids, as much as may be, being where they are; that he may not imitate them he will not associate with them, nor choose them for his companions. He doth not stand in their way to be picked up by them, Pr. vii. 8, but keeps as far from them as from a place or person infected with the plague, for fear of the contagion, Pr. iv. 14, 15. He that would be kept from harm must keep out of harm's way. Thirdly. He sits not in the seat of the scornful. He doth not repose himself with those that sit down secure in their wickedness, and please themselves with the searedness of their own consciences. He doth not associate with those that sit in close cabal to find out ways and means for the support and advancement of the devil's kingdom: or that sit in open judgment magisterially to condemn the generation of the righteous. The seat of the drunkards is the seat of the scornful, Ps. lxix. 12; happy is the man that never sits in it, Hos. vii. 5.

2. A godly man, that he may do that which is good, and cleave to it, submits to the conduct of the word of God, and makes that familiar to him, ver. 2. This is that which keeps him out of the way of the ungodly, and fortifies him against their temptations, "By the words of thy lips I have kept me from the path of the destroyer," Ps. xvii. 4. We need not court the fellowship of sinners either for pleasure or improvement, while we have fellowship with the word of God, and with God himself, in and by his word; "When thou wakest, it shall talk with thee," Pr. vi. 22. We may judge of our spiritual state by this, What is the law of God to us? what account do we make of it? what place has it in us? See here, 1st. The entire affection which a good man has for the law of God. His delight is in it. He delights in it, though it be a law, a yoke, because it is the law of God, which is holy, just, and good, which he freely consents to, and so delights in it after the inner man, Rom. vii. 16, 22. All that are well pleased there is a God, cannot but be well pleased there is a Bible, a revelation of God, of his will, and of the only way to happiness in him. 2nd. The intimate acquaintance which a good man keeps up with the word of God. In that law doth he meditate day and night; and by this it appears his delight is in it; for what we love we love to think of, Ps. cxix. 97. To meditate in God's word is to discourse with ourselves concerning the great things contained in it, with a close application of mind, a fixedness of thought, till we be suitably affected with those things, and experience the savour and power of them in our hearts. This we must do day and night, that is, we must have a constant habitual regard to the word of God as the rule of our actions, and the spring of our comforts, and we must have it in our thoughts accordingly upon every occasion that occurs, whether night or day. No time amiss for the meditating on the word of God, nor any time unseasonable for those visits. We must not only set ourselves to meditate on God's word morning and evening, at the entrance of the day and the night, but these thoughts should be interwoven with the business and converse of every day, and with the repose and slumbers of every night; "When I am awake, I am still with thee."

Secondly. An assurance given of the godly man's happiness, with which we should encourage ourselves to answer the character of such.

1. In general, he is blessed, ver. 1. God blesseth him, and that blessing will make him happy. 'Blessednesses are to him,' blessings of all kinds, of the upper and nether springs, enough to make him completely happy; none of the ingredients of happiness shall be wanting to him. When he undertakes to describe a blessed man, he describes a good man; for, after all, those only are happy, truly happy, that are holy, truly holy; and we are more concerned to know the way to blessedness than to know wherein the blessedness will consist. Nay, goodness and holiness is not only the way to happiness, (Rev. xxii. 14,) but happiness itself. Supposing there were not another life after this, yet that man is a happy man that keeps in the way of his duty.

2. His blessedness is here illustrated by a similitude; ver. 3, "He shall be like a tree," fruitful and flourishing. This is the effect, 1st. Of his pious practice; he meditated in the law of God, turns that in sucum et sanguinem,—'into juice and blood,' and that makes him like a tree. The more we converse with the word of God the better furnished we are for every good word and work. Or, 2nd. Of the promised blessing. He is blessed of the Lord, and therefore "he shall be like a tree." The Divine blessing produceth real effects. It is the happiness of a godly man, First. That he is planted by the grace of God. These trees were by nature wild olives, and will continue so till they are grafted anew, and so planted by a power from above. Never any good tree grew of itself; it is poetical, and illustrate almost every variety of that form of Hebrew composition, including acrostics, of which there are several—viz., Psalms ix., x., xxv., xxxiv., xxxvii., cxi., cxii., cxix., and cxlv. Many of the Psalms are connected with historical events, which in some cases must be observed in order to a right understanding of the composition. A large number may be viewed as utterances of pious sentiment, and some as prophetic anticipations of the Messiah, His sufferings and glory. One school of interpreters regards the entire book as Messianic, and therefore as typical and prophetic throughout; but great difficulty lies in the way of the adoption of that principle. The following passages of the New Testament contain references to the Psalms:—Matt. iv. 6, 7; xiii. 35; xxi. 16, 42; xxii. 44; xxvii.; Mark xv.; Luke xx. 42; xxiii.; xxiv. 44; John xiii. 18; xix.; Acts i. 20; iv. 11, 25, 26; vii. 46; xiii. 35; Rom. iii. 12; iv. 6—8; viii. 36; x. 18; xi. 9, 10; xv. 9, 11; Eph. ii. 20; iv. 7, 8 Heb. i. 5; iii. 9, 15; iv. 7; v. 5; x. 5; 1 Pet. ii. 4, 7.

the planting of the Lord; and therefore he must in it be glorified, Isa. lxi. 3; "The trees of the Lord are full of sap." Secondly. That he is placed by the means of grace, here called the rivers of water, those rivers which make glad the city of our God, Ps. xlvi. 4; from these a good man receives supplies of strength and vigour, but in secret undiscerned ways. Thirdly. That his practices shall be fruit abounding to a good account, Phil. iv. 17. To those whom God first blessed he said, Be fruitful, Gen. i. 22, and still the comfort and honour of fruitfulness is a recompence for the labour of it. It is expected from those who enjoy the mercies of grace, that, both in the temper of their minds and in the tenor of their lives, they comply with the intentions of that grace, and then they bring forth fruit. And be it observed, to the praise of the Great Dresser of the vineyard, they bring forth their fruit (that which is required of them) in due season, when it is most beautiful and most useful; improving every opportunity of doing good, and doing it in its proper time. Fourthly. That his profession shall be preserved from blemish and decay; "his leaf also shall not wither." Those who bring forth only the leaves of profession, without any good fruit, even their leaf will wither, and they shall be as much ashamed of their profession as ever they were proud of it; but if the word of God rule in the heart, that will keep the profession green, both to our comfort and to our credit. The laurels he has won shall never wither. Fifthly. That prosperity shall attend him wherever he goes,—soul prosperity. Whatever he doth, in conformity to the law, it shall prosper and succeed to his mind, or above his hope.

In singing these verses, being duly affected with the malignant and dangerous nature of sin, the transcendent excellences of the Divine law, and the power and efficacy of God's grace, from which our fruit is found, we must teach and admonish ourselves and one another to watch against sin, and all approaches towards it,—to converse much with the word of God, and abound in the fruits of righteousness. And in praying over them we must seek to God for his grace, both to fortify us against every evil word and work, and to furnish us for every good word and work.

4 The ungodly are not so:
But are like the chaff which the wind driveth away.
5 Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment,
Nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous.
6 For the LORD knoweth the way of the righteous:
But the way of the ungodly shall perish.

Here is, First. The description of the ungodly given, ver. 4. 1. In general; they are the reverse of the righteous, both in character and condition. They "are not so." The Seventy emphatically repeat this, 'Not so the ungodly, they are not so;' they are led by the counsel of the wicked, in the way of sinners, to the seat of the scornful. They have no delight in the law of God, nor ever think of it; they bring forth no fruit, but grapes of Sodom; they cumber the ground. 2. In particular; whereas the righteous are like valuable, useful, fruitful trees, they "are like the chaff which the wind driveth away;" the very lightest of the chaff, the dust which the owner of the flour desires to have driven away, as not capable of being put to any use. Would you value them? Would you weigh them? They are like chaff, of no worth at all in God's account, how highly soever they may value themselves. Would you know the temper of their minds? They are light and vain; they have no substance in them, no solidity; they are easily driven to and fro by every wind and temptation, and have no stedfastness. Would you know their end? The wrath of God will drive them away in their wickedness, as the wind doth the chaff, which is never gathered or looked after more. The chaff may be for a while among the wheat, but He is coming whose fan is in his hand, and who will thoroughly purge his floor. They that by their own sin and folly make themselves as chaff will be found so before the whirlwind and fire of Divine wrath, (Ps. xxxv. 5,) so unable to stand before it or to escape it, Isa. xvii. 13.

Secondly. The doom of the ungodly read, ver. 5. 1. They will be cast, upon their trial, as traitors convict. They "shall not stand in the judgment," that is, they shall be found guilty, shall hang down the head with shame and confusion, and all their pleas and excuses will be overruled as frivolous. There is a judgment to come, in which every man's present character and work, though never so artfully concealed and disguised, shall be truly and perfectly discovered, and appear in its own colours; so every man's future state will be by an irreversible sentence determined for eternity. The ungodly must appear in that judgment, to receive according to the things done in the body. They may hope to come off, nay, to come off with honour, but their hope will deceive them; they "shall not stand in the judgment;" so plain will the evidence be against them, and so just and impartial will the judgment be upon it. 2. They will be for ever shut out from the society of the blessed. They shall not stand "in the congregation of the righteous," that is, in the judgment, so some, in that court wherein the saints, as assessors with Christ, shall judge the world,—those holy myriads with which he shall come to execute judgment upon all, Jude 14; 1 Cor. vi. 2. Or, in heaven there will shortly be a general assembly of the church of the firstborn, a congregation of the righteous, of all the saints, and none but saints, and saints made perfect; such a congregation of them as never was in this world, 2 Thes. ii. 1. The wicked shall not have a place in that congregation. Into the New Jerusalem none unclean, or unsanctified, shall enter; they shall see the righteous enter into the kingdom, and themselves to their everlasting vexation thrust out, Lu. xiii. 27. The wicked and profane in this world ridiculed the righteous, and their congregation despised them, and cared not for their company; justly, therefore, will they be for ever separated from them. Hypocrites in this world, under the disguise of a plausible profession, may thrust themselves into the congregation of the righteous, and remain undisturbed and undiscovered there, but Christ cannot be imposed upon, though his ministers may; the day is coming when he will separate between the sheep and the goats, the tares and the wheat: see Mat. xiii. 41, 49. That great day, so the Chaldee here calls it, will be a day of discovery, a day of distinction, and a day of final division; then you shall return and discern between the righteous and the wicked, which here it is sometimes hard to do, Mal. iii. 18.

Thirdly. The reason rendered of this different state of the godly and wicked, ver. 6. 1. God must have all the glory of the prosperity and happiness of the righteous. They are blessed because the Lord knows their way; he chose them into it, inclined them to choose it, leads and guides them in it, and orders all their steps. 2. Sinners must bear all the blame of their own destruction. Therefore the ungodly perish because the very way in which they have chosen and resolved to walk leads directly to destruction; it naturally tends towards ruin, and therefore must necessarily end in it. Or we may take it thus: "The Lord knows," that is, he approves of, and is well pleased with, "the way of the righteous," and therefore under the influence of his gracious smiles it shall prosper and end well. But he is angry at the way of the wicked; all they do is offensive to him, and therefore it shall perish, and they in it. It is certain every man's judgment proceedeth from the Lord, and it is well or ill with us, and is likely to be so to all eternity, according as we are or are not accepted of God. Let this support the drooping spirits of the righteous, that the Lord knows their way, knows their hearts, Jer. xii. 3; knows their secret devotions, Mat. vi. 6; knows their character, how much soever it is blackened and blemished by the reproaches of men; and will shortly make them and their way manifest before the world, to their immortal joy and honour. Let this cast a damp upon the security and jollity of sinners, that their way, though pleasant now, will perish at last.

In singing these verses, and praying over them, let us possess ourselves with a holy dread of the wicked man's portion, and deprecate it, with a firm and lively expectation of the judgment to come, and stir up ourselves to prepare for it; and with a holy care to approve ourselves to God in every thing, entreating his favour with our whole hearts.

PSALM II.

As the foregoing psalm was moral, and shewed us our duty, so this is evangelical, and shews us our Saviour. Under the type of David's kingdom, which was of Divine appointment, met with much opposition, but prevailed at last, the kingdom of the Messiah, the son of David, is prophesied of, which is the primary intention and scope of the psalm: and I think there is less in it of the type, and more of the antitype, than in any of the gospel psalms, for there is nothing in it but what is applicable to Christ, but some things that are not at all applicable to David; ver. 6, 7, "Thou art my Son;" ver. 8, "I will give thee the uttermost parts of the earth;" and, ver. 12, "Kiss the Son." It is interpreted of Christ, Acts iv. 25; xiii. 33; Heb. i. 5. The Holy Ghost here foretells, I. The opposition that should be given to the kingdom of the Messiah, ver. 1—3. II. The baffling and chastising of that opposition, ver. 4, 5. III. The setting up of the kingdom of Christ notwithstanding that opposition, ver. 6. IV. The confirmation and establishment of it, ver. 7. V. A promise of the enlargement and success of it, ver. 8, 9. VI. A call and exhortation to kings and princes to yield themselves the willing subjects of this kingdom, ver. 10—12. Or thus: we have here, I. Threatenings denounced against the adversaries of Christ's kingdom, ver. 1—6. II. Promises made to Christ himself, the head of this kingdom, ver. 7—9. III. Counsel given to all to espouse the interests of this kingdom, ver. 10—12. This psalm, as the former, is very fitly prefixed to this book of devotions, because, as it is necessary to our acceptance with God that we should be subject to the precepts of his law, so it is likewise that we should be subject to the grace of his Gospel, and come to him in the name of a Mediator.

WHY do the heathen rage,
And the people imagine a vain thing?
2 The kings of the earth set themselves,
And the rulers take counsel together,
Against the LORD, and against his anointed, saying,
3 Let us break their bands asunder,
And cast away their cords from us.
4 He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh:
The LORD shall have them in derision.
5 Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath
And vex them in his sore displeasure.
6 Yet have I set my king
Upon my holy hill of Zion.

We have here a very great struggle about the kingdom of Christ; hell and heaven contesting it; and the seat of the war is this earth, where Satan has long had a usurped kingdom, and exercised dominion to that degree, that he has been called the prince of the power of the very air we breathe in, and the god of the world we live in. He knows very well that as the Messiah's kingdom riseth and gets ground his falls and loseth ground; and, therefore, though it will be set up certainly, it shall not be set up tamely. Observe here,

First. The mighty opposition that would be given to the Messiah and his kingdom, to his holy religion, and all the interests of it, ver. 1—3. One would have expected that so great a blessing to this world should have been universally welcomed and embraced, and that every sheaf should immediately have bowed to that of the Messiah, and all the crowns and sceptres on earth should have been laid at his feet; but it proves quite contrary. Never were the notions of any sect of philosophers, though never so absurd, nor the powers of any prince or state though never so tyrannical, opposed with so much violence as the doctrine and government of Christ. A sign it was from heaven, for the opposition was plainly from hell originally.

1. We are here told who would appear as adversaries to Christ, and the devil's instruments in this opposition to his kingdom. Princes and people, court and country, have sometimes separate interests, but here they are united against Christ; not the mighty only, but the mob, the heathen, the people,—numbers of them, communities of them, though usually fond of liberty, yet averse to that liberty Christ came to procure and proclaim. Not the mob only, but the mighty, among whom one might have expected more sense and consideration, appear violent against Christ; though his kingdom is not of this world, nor in any danger of weakening their interests, but very likely, if they please, to strengthen them, yet the kings of the earth and rulers are up in arms presently. See the effects of the old enmity in the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman, and how general and malignant the corruption of mankind is: see how formidable the enemies of the church are; they are numerous, they are potent. The unbelieving Jews are here called heathen, so wretchedly were they degenerated from the faith and holiness of their ancestors; they stirred up the heathen, the Gentiles, to prosecute the Christians. As the Philistines and their lords, Saul and his courtiers, the disaffected party and their ringleaders, opposed David's coming to the crown, so Herod and Pilate, the Gentiles and the Jews, did their utmost against Christ, and his interest in men, Acts iv. 27.

2. Who it is that they quarrel with, and muster up all their forces against. It is "against the Lord, and against his anointed," that is, against all religion in general, and the Christian religion in particular; and it is certain, all that are enemies to Christ, whatever they pretend, are enemies to God himself; they "have hated both me and my Father," Jno. xv. 24. The Great Author of our holy religion is here called the Lord's Anointed, or Messiah, or Christ, in allusion to the anointing of David to be king. He is both authorized and qualified to be the church's head and king, is duly invested in the office, and every way fitted for it, and yet there are those that are against him; nay, therefore they are against him, because they are impatient of God's authority envious at his advancement, and have a rooted enmity to the Spirit of holiness.

i. 3. The good man who studies God's law is here compared to a tree planted by the side of a stream of water. As such a tree, especially in Eastern lands, is verdant, fruitful, and flourishing, so he who devoutly meditates the word of God will prosper in spiritual things, while those who neglect to do so will be barren and unfruitful.

i. 4. The chaff is separated from the grain by means of wind, and is rapidly carried away in drifts.

ii. 2. The word for "anointed" here is in the Hebrew text "Messiah," and in the Greek it is "Christ," all these words having the same signification.

ii. 12. There has been much controversy about the phrase rendered "kiss the Son." Of the ancient versions the Syriac agrees with ours, but the Greek, Latin, and Chaldee understand it "take hold of instruction." Modern critics who deny the prophetic reference to the Messiah propose other explanations; thus, Dr. Benisch, the

3. The opposition they give is here described. 1st. It is a most spiteful and malicious opposition. They rage and fret, gnash their teeth for vexation, at the setting up of Christ's kingdom; it creates in them the greatest uneasiness that can be, and fills them with indignation, so that they have no enjoyment of themselves: see Lu. xiii. 14; Jno. xi. 47; Acts v. 17, 33; xix. 28. Idolaters raged at the discovery of their folly, the chief priests and Pharisees at the eclipsing of their glory, and the shaking of their usurped dominion. They that did evil raged at the light. 2nd. It is a deliberate, politic opposition. They imagine, or meditate, that is, they contrive means to suppress the rising interests of Christ's kingdom, and are very confident of the success of their contrivances; they promise themselves that they shall run down religion, and carry the day. 3rd. It is a resolute, obstinate opposition. They set themselves, set their faces as a flint, and their hearts as an adamant, in defiance of reason and conscience, and all the terrors of the Lord; they are proud and daring, like the Babel-builders, and will persist in their resolution, come what will. 4th. It is a combined, confederate opposition. They "take counsel together," to assist and animate one another in this opposition; they are 'unanimous' in their resolutions, and carry them nemine contradicente, that they will push on the unholy war against the Messiah with the utmost vigour. And thereupon councils are called, cabals are formed, and all their wits are at work to find out ways and means for the preventing of the establishment of Christ's kingdom, Ps. lxxxiii. 5.

4. We are here told what it is they are exasperated at, and what they aim at in this opposition; ver. 3, "Let us break their bands asunder." They will not be under any government,—they are children of Belial, that cannot endure the yoke,—however, not under the government of the Lord and his Anointed; they will be content to entertain the notions of the kingdom of God and the Messiah, which will serve them to dispute of, and to support their own dominion with. If the Lord and his Anointed will make them rich and great in the world, they will bid them welcome; but if they will restrain their corrupt appetites and passions, regulate and reform their hearts and lives, and bring them under the government of a pure and heavenly religion, truly, then, they will not have this man to reign over them, Lu. xix. 14. Christ has bands and cords for us; they that will be saved by him must be ruled by him: but they are cords of a man, agreeable to right reason, and bands of love, conducive to our true interest. And yet against those the quarrel is. Why do men oppose religion, but because they are impatient of the restraints and obligations of it? They would break asunder the bands of conscience they are under; and the cords of God's commandments, by which they are called to tie themselves out from all sin, and to tie themselves up to all duty, they will not receive, but cast them away as far from them as they can.

5. They are here reasoned with concerning it; ver. 1, Why do they do this? 1st. They can shew no good cause for opposing so just, and holy, and gracious a government, which will not interfere with the secular powers, nor introduce any dangerous principles hurtful to kings or provinces; but, on the contrary, if universally received, would bring a heaven upon earth. 2nd. They can hope for no good success in opposing so powerful a kingdom, with which they are utterly unable to contend. It is a vain thing; when they have done their worst Christ will have a church in the world, and that church shall be glorious and triumphant. It is built upon a rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. The moon walks in brightness, though the dogs bark at it.

Secondly. The mighty conquest gained over all this threatening opposition. If heaven and earth be the combatants, it is easy to foretell which will be the conqueror. They that make this mighty struggle are the people of the earth, and the kings of the earth, who, being of the earth, are earthy; but he whom they contest with is one that sits in the heavens, ver. 4. He is in the heaven, a place of such a vast prospect that he can oversee them all, and all their projects; and such a vast power that he can overcome them all, and all their attempts. He sits there as one easy and at rest, out of the reach of all their impotent menaces and attempts. There he sits as judge in all the affairs of the children of men, perfectly secure of the full accomplishment of all his own purposes and designs, in spite of all opposition, Ps. xxix. 10. The perfect repose of the Eternal Mind may be our comfort under all the disquietments of our mind. We are tossed on earth, and in the sea, but he sits in the heavens, where he has prepared his throne for judgment. And therefore,

1. The attempts of Christ's enemies are easily ridiculed. God laughs at them for a company of fools; he hath them and all their attempts in derision, and therefore the virgin, the daughter of Zion, hath despised them, Isa. xxxvii. 22. Sinners' follies are the just sport of God's infinite wisdom and power; and those attempts of the kingdom of Satan which in our eyes are formidable in his are despicable. Sometimes God is said to awake, and arise, and stir up himself for the vanquishing of his enemies, here he is said to sit still and do it; for the utmost operations of God's omnipotence create no difficulty at all, nor the least disturbance to his eternal rest.

2. They are justly punished, ver. 5. Though God despiseth them as impotent, yet he doth not therefore wink at them, but is justly displeased with them, as impudent and impious, and will make the most daring sinners to know that he is so, and to tremble before him. 1st. Their sin is a provocation to him. He is wroth, he is sorely displeased. We cannot expect that God should be reconciled to us, or well pleased in us, but in and through the Anointed: and therefore, if we affront and reject him, we sin against the remedy, and forfeit the benefit of his interposal between us and God. 2nd. His anger will be a vexation to them. If he but speak to them in his wrath, even the breath of his mouth will be their confusion,—slaughter and consumption, Isa. x. 23; 2 Thes. ii. 8. He speaks, and it is done; he speaks in wrath, and sinners are undone. As a word made us, so a word can unmake us again; "Who knows the power of his anger?" The enemies rage, but cannot vex God. God sits still, and yet vexeth them; puts them into a consternation, so the word is, and brings them to their wit's end. His setting up this kingdom of his Son in spite of them, is the greatest vexation to them that can be. They were vexatious to Christ's good subjects; but the day is coming when vexation shall be recompensed to them.

3. They are certainly defeated, and all their counsels turned headlong; ver. 6, "Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion." David was advanced to the throne, and became master of the stronghold of Zion notwithstanding the disturbance given him by the malcontents in his kingdom, and particularly the affronts he received from the garrison of Zion, who taunted him with their blind and their lame,—their maimed soldiers, 2 Sam. v. 6. And the Lord Jesus is exalted to the right hand of the Father, has all power both in heaven and in earth, and is head over all things to the church, notwithstanding the restless endeavours of his enemies to hinder his advancement. 1st. Jesus Christ is a king, and is invested by him who is the fountain of power with the dignity and authority of a sovereign prince in the kingdom both of providence and grace. 2nd. God is pleased to call him his King, because he is appointed by him, and intrusted for him, with the sole administration of government and judgment. He is his King, for he is dear to the Father, and one in whom he is well pleased. 3rd. Christ took not this honour to himself, but was called to it; and he that called him owns him: I have set him. His commandment, his commission, he received from the Father. 4th. Being called to this honour, he was confirmed in it. High places, we say, are slippery places, but Christ being raised is fixed: I have set him, I have settled him. 5th. He is set upon Zion, the hill of God's holiness, a type of the gospel church, for on that the temple was built, for the sake of which the whole mount was called holy. Christ's throne is set up in his church, that is, in the hearts of all believers, and in the societies of them. The evangelical law of Christ is said to go forth from Zion, Isa. ii. 3; Mic. iv. 2; and therefore that is spoken of as the head-quarters of this general, the royal seat of this prince, in whom the children of men shall be joyful.

We are to sing these verses with a holy exultation, triumphing over all the enemies of Christ's kingdom, not doubting but they will all of them be quickly made his footstool, and triumphing in Jesus Christ as the great trustee of power. And we are to pray in firm belief of the assurance here given, 'Father in heaven, thy kingdom come; let thy Son's kingdom come.'

7 I will declare the decree:
The LORD hath said unto me, Thou art my Son;
This day have I begotten thee.
8 Ask of me,
And I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance
And the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.
9 Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron;
Thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel.

We have heard what the kings of the earth have to say against Christ's kingdom, and have heard it gainsaid by him that sits in heaven. Let us now hear what the Messiah himself has to say for his kingdom, to make good his claims, and it is what all the powers on earth cannot gainsay. 1. The kingdom of the Messiah is founded upon a decree, an eternal decree of God the Father. It was not a sudden resolve, it was not the trial of an experiment, but the result of the counsels of the Divine wisdom, and the determinations of the Divine will before all worlds, neither of which can be altered. The precept or statute, so some read it; the covenant or compact, so others; the federal transactions between the Father and the Son concerning man's redemption, represented by the covenant of royalty made with David, and his seed, Ps. lxxxix. 3. This our Lord Jesus often referred himself to, as that which all along in his undertaking he governed himself by. "This is the will of him that sent me," Jno. vi. 40; "This commandment have I received of my Father," Jno. x. 18; xiv. 31. 2. There is a declaration of that decree, as far as is necessary for the satisfaction of all those who are called and commanded to yield themselves subjects to this king, and to leave them inexcusable who will not have him to reign over them. The decree was secret; it was what the Father said to the Son, when he possessed him in the beginning of his way before his works of old; but it is declared by a faithful witness, who had lain in the bosom of the Father from eternity, and came into the world as the prophet of the church to declare him, Jno. i. 18. The fountain of all being is, without doubt, the fountain of all power; and it is by, from, and under him, that the Messiah claims: he has his right to rule from what Jehovah said to him, by whose word all things were made, and are governed. Christ here makes out a twofold title to his kingdom:

First. A title by inheritance; ver. 7, "Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee." This scripture the apostle quotes, Heb. i. 5, to prove not only that Christ has a more excellent name than the angels, but that he obtained it by inheritance, ver. 4. He is the Son of God, not by adoption, but his begotten Son, the only begotten of the Father, Jno. i. 14. And the Father owns him, and will have this declared to the world as the reason why he is constituted King upon the holy hill of Zion; he is therefore unquestionably entitled to, and perfectly qualified for, that great trust. He is the Son of God, and therefore of the same nature with the Father; has in him all the fulness of the Godhead, infinite wisdom, power, and holiness. The supreme government of the church is too high an honour, and too hard an undertaking, for any mere creature; none can be fit for it but he who is one with the Father, and was from eternity by him, as one brought up with him, thoroughly apprised of all his counsels, Pr. viii. 30. He is the Son of God, and therefore dear to him; his beloved Son in whom he is well pleased, and upon this account we are to receive him as a King: for, because "the Father loveth the Son, he hath given all things into his hand," Jno. iii. 35; v. 20. Being a Son, he is heir of all things; and, the Father having made the worlds by him, it is easy to infer from thence, that by him also he governs them; for he is the Eternal Wisdom, and the Eternal Word. If God hath said unto him, "Thou art my Son," it becomes each of us to say to him, Thou art my Lord, my Sovereign. Farther to satisfy us that his kingdom is well grounded upon his sonship, we are here told what his sonship is grounded on; "This day have I begotten thee," which refers both to his eternal generation itself, for it is quoted, Heb. i. 5, to prove that he is "the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person," ver. 3, and to the evidence and demonstration which was given of it by his resurrection from the dead, for to that also it is expressly applied by the apostle, Acts xiii. 33, "He hath raised up Jesus again, as it is written, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee." It was by the resurrection from the dead, that sign of the prophet Jonas, which was to be the most convincing of all, that he was "declared to be the Son of God with power," Rom. i. 4. Christ is said to be the first begotten, and firstborn from the dead, Rev. i. 5, Col. i. 18; and immediately after his resurrection it was that he entered upon the administration of his mediatorial kingdom. It was then that he said, "All power is given unto me," and to that especially he had an eye when he taught his disciples to pray, "Thy kingdom come."

Secondly. A title by agreement, ver. 8, 9. The agreement is in short this, the Son must undertake the office of an intercessor, and upon that condition he shall have the honour and power of a universal monarch: see Isa. liii. 12, "Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great, because he made intercession for the transgressors." "He shall be a priest upon his throne, and the counsel of peace shall be between them both," Zec. vi. 13.

1. The Son must ask. This supposeth his putting himself voluntarily into a state of inferiority to the Father by taking upon him the human nature; for, as God, he was equal in power and glory with the Father, and had nothing to ask. It supposeth the making of a satisfaction, in the virtue of which the intercession must be made, and the paying of a price on which this large demand was to be grounded: see Jno. xvii. 4, 5. The Son, in asking the heathen for his inheritance, aims not only at his own honour, but at their happiness in him; so that he intercedes for them, ever lives to do so, and is therefore able to save to the uttermost.

2. The Father will grant, more than to the half of the kingdom, even to the kingdom itself. It is here promised him, 1st. That his government shall be universal. He shall have the heathen for his inheritance; not the Jews only, to whose nation the church had been long confined, but the Gentiles also, those Jewish translator, suggests "kiss a pure one," and others "kiss"—i.e., do homage to—"the chosen one." Gesenius, Fürst, and even ancient Hebrew authorities, admit the sense given in our version; and it is only "from polemical motives" that it is rejected. True, the word for "son" is peculiar, only occurring here and in Prov. xxxi. 2, but it is common in Syriac and Chaldee. We cannot venture to alter the ordinary translation, especially since the context implies that "Jehovah" and "the Son" demand equal reverence.

iii. 2. The word "Selah" has greatly exercised the ingenuity of critics. It is represented in the Greek by a word denoting a division, and it is therefore ancient; but it is not known whether it was in the original copies. It is not often indicated by the Syriac and Latin versions. The introduction of the word is not governed by the grammatical structure of the places where it is found, and therefore it may be regarded as a musical direction for a pause of some kind, or for some modification of the tone.

in the uttermost parts of the earth (as this nation of ours) shall be his possession, and he shall have multitudes of willing, loyal subjects among them. Baptized Christians are the possession of the Lord Jesus, they are to him for a name and a praise; God the Father gives them to him, when by his Spirit and grace he works upon them to submit their necks to the yoke of the Lord Jesus. This is in part fulfilled; a great part of the Gentile world received the Gospel when it was first preached, and Christ's throne was set up there where Satan's seat had long been; but it is to be yet farther accomplished, when "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of the Lord and of his Christ," Rev. xi. 15; "Who shall live when God doth this?" 2nd. That it shall be victorious; "thou shalt break them." that is, those of them that oppose thy kingdom, "with a rod of iron," ver. 9. This was in part fulfilled when the nation of the Jews, Those that persisted in unbelief and enmity to Christ's Gospel, were destroyed by the Roman power, which was represented Dan. ii. 40, by feet of iron, as here by a rod of iron. It had a farther accomplishment in the destruction of the pagan powers, when the Christian religion came to be established; but it will not be completely fulfilled till all opposing rule, principality and power shall be finally put down, 1 Cor. xv. 24; see Ps. cx. 5, 6. Observe, How powerful Christ is, and how weak the enemies of his kingdom are before him; he hath a rod of iron wherewith to crush them that will not submit to his golden sceptre; they are but like a potter's vessel before him, suddenly, easily, and irreparably dashed in pieces by him; see Rev. ii. 27. Thou shalt do it, that is, thou shalt have leave to do it; nations shall be ruined, rather than the gospel church shall not be built and established: "I have loved thee, therefore will I give men for thee," Isa. xliii. 4. Thou shalt have power to do it, and none shall be able to stand before thee, and thou shalt do it effectually. They that will not bow shall break.

In singing this, and praying it over, we must give glory to Christ as the eternal Son of God, and our rightful Lord; and must take comfort from this promise, and plead it with God, that the kingdom of Christ shall be enlarged and established, and shall triumph over all opposition.

10 Be wise now therefore, O ye kings:
Be instructed, ye judges of the earth.
11 Serve the LORD with fear, and rejoice with trembling.
12 Kiss the Son, lest he be angry,
And ye perish from the way,
When his wrath is kindled but a little
Blessed are all they that put their trust in him.

We have here the practical application of this gospel doctrine concerning the kingdom of the Messiah, by way of exhortation to the kings and judges of the earth. They hear that it is in vain to oppose Christ's government; let them therefore be so wise for themselves as to submit to it. He that has power to destroy them shews that he has no pleasure in their destruction; for he puts them into a way to make themselves happy, ver. 10. Those that would be wise must be instructed; and those are truly wise that receive instruction from the Word of God. Kings and judges stand upon a level with common persons before God; and it is as necessary for them to be religious as for any others. They that give law and judgment to others must receive it from Christ, and it will be their wisdom. What is said to them is said to all, and is required of every one of us, only it is directed to kings and judges, because of the influence which their example will have upon their inferiors, and because they were men of rank and power that opposed the setting up of Christ's kingdom, ver. 2. We are exhorted,

First. To reverence God, and to stand in awe of him, ver. 11. This is the great duty of natural religion. God is great and infinitely above us, just and holy, and provoked against us, and therefore we ought to fear him and tremble before him; yet he is our Lord and Master, and we are bound to serve him; our Friend and Benefactor, and we have reason to rejoice in him. And these are very well consistent with each other, for, 1. We must serve God in all ordinances of worship, and all instances of a godly conversation, but with a holy fear, a jealousy over ourselves, and a reverence of him. Even kings themselves, whom others serve and fear, must serve and fear God; there is the same infinite distance between them and God that there is between the meanest of their subjects and him. 2. We must rejoice in God; and, in subordination to him, we may rejoice in other things, but still with a holy trembling, as those that know what a glorious and jealous God he is, whose eye is always upon us. Our salvation must be wrought out with fear and trembling, Phil. ii. 12. We ought to rejoice in the setting up of the kingdom of Christ, but rejoice with trembling; with a holy awe of him, a holy fear for ourselves lest we come short, and a tender concern for the many precious souls to whom his Gospel and kingdom are a savour of death unto death. Whatever we rejoice in in this world, it must always be with trembling, lest we grow vain in our joy, and be puffed up with the things we rejoice in; and because of the uncertainty of them, and the damp which by a thousand accidents may soon be cast upon our joy. To rejoice with trembling is to rejoice as though we rejoiced not, 1 Cor. vii. 29.

Secondly. To welcome Jesus Christ, and to submit to him, ver. 12. This is the great duty of the Christian religion; it is that which is required of all, even kings and judges, and it is our wisdom and interest to do it. Observe here,

1. The command given to this purpose; "Kiss the Son." Christ is called the Son, because so he was declared ver. 7, "Thou art my Son." He is the Son of God by eternal generation, and upon that account he is to be adored by us; he is the Son of man, that is, the Mediator, Jno. v. 27, and upon that account to be received and submitted to. He is called the Son to include both, as God is often called emphatically the Father, because he is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in him our Father; and we must have an eye to him under both considerations. Our duty to Christ is here expressed figuratively, "Kiss the Son." Not with a betraying kiss, as Judas kissed him, and as all hypocrites who pretend to honour him, but really affront him, but with a believing kiss. 1st. With a kiss of agreement and reconciliation: Kiss and be friends, as Jacob and Esau; let the quarrel between us and God be taken up, let the acts of hostility cease, and let us be at peace with God in Christ, who is our peace. 2nd. With a kiss of adoration and religious worship; they that worshipped idols kissed them, 1 Kin. xix. 18; Hos. xiii. 2. Let us study how to do honour to the Lord Jesus, and to give unto him the glory due unto his name; "He is thy Lord, and worship thou him," Ps. xlv. 11; with him that "sits on the throne, we must worship the Lamb," Rev. v. 9—13. 3rd. With a kiss of affection and sincere love; "Kiss the Son," that is, enter into a covenant of friendship with him, and let him be very dear and precious to you, love him above all, love him in sincerity, love him much, as she did to whom much was forgiven, and in token of it kissed his feet, Lu. vii. 38. 4th. With a kiss of allegiance and loyalty, as Samuel kissed Saul, 1 Sam. x. 1; Swear fealty and homage to him, submit to his government, take his yoke upon you, and give up yourselves to be governed by his laws, disposed of by his providence, and entirely devoted to his interest.

2. The reasons to enforce this command; and they are taken from our own interest, which God in his Gospel shews a concern for. Consider,

1st. The certain ruin we run upon if we refuse and reject Christ; "Kiss the Son," for it is at your peril if you do not. First. It will be a great provocation to him; Do it "lest he be angry." The Father is angry already, the Son is the Mediator that undertakes to make peace; if we slight him, the Father's wrath abides upon us, Jno. iii. 36; and not only so, but there is an addition of the Son's wrath too, to whom nothing is more displeasing than to have the offers of his grace slighted, and the designs of it frustrated. The Son can be angry, though a Lamb, he is the lion of the tribe of Judah; and the wrath of this King, this King of kings, will be as the roaring of a lion, and will drive even mighty men, and chief captains, to seek in vain for shelter in rocks and mountains, Rev. vi. 16. If the Son be angry, who shall intercede for us? There remains no more sacrifice, no other name by which we can be saved. Unbelief is a sin against the remedy. Secondly. It will be utter destruction to yourselves; "lest ye perish from the way," or 'in the way,' so some. In the way of your sins, and from the way of your vain hopes; lest your way perish, as Ps. cxvi.; lest you prove to have missed the way to happiness. Christ is the way; take heed lest ye be cut off from him as your way to God. It intimates that they were, or at least thought themselves, in the way, but by neglecting Christ they perished from it, which aggravates their ruin, that they go to hell from the way to heaven, are not far from the kingdom of God, and yet never come thither.

2nd. The happiness we are sure of if we yield ourselves to Christ. "When his wrath is kindled," though "but a little," the least spark of that fire is enough to make the proudest sinner miserable, if it fasten upon his conscience; for it will burn to the lowest hell. One would think it should therefore follow, "when his wrath is kindled," woe be to those that despise him. But the psalmist startles at the thought, blesseth himself from that dreadful doom, and blesseth those that do escape it. They that trust in him, and so kiss him, are truly happy; but they will especially appear to be so when the wrath of Christ is kindled against others. Blessed will they be in the day of wrath that by trusting in Christ have made him their refuge and patron; when the hearts of others fail them for fear, they shall lift up their heads with joy; and then those who now despise Christ and his followers will be forced to say it to their own greater confusion, Now we see that blessed are all they, and they only, that trust in him.

In singing this, and praying it over, we should have our hearts filled with a holy awe of God, but borne up with a cheerful confidence on Christ, in whose mediation we may comfort and encourage ourselves and one another: "We are the circumcision that rejoice in Christ Jesus."

PSALM III.

As the foregoing psalm, in the type of David in preferment, shewed us the royal dignity of the Redeemer, so this, by the example of David in distress, shews us the peace and holy security of the redeemed; how safe they really are, and think themselves to be, under the Divine protection. David being now driven out from his palace, from the royal city, from the holy city, by his rebellious son Absalom, I. Complains to God of his enemies, ver. 1, 2. II. Confides in God, and encourageth himself in him as his God notwithstanding, ver. 3. III. Recollects the satisfaction he had in the gracious answers God gave to his prayers, and his experience of his goodness to him, ver. 4, 5. IV. Triumphs over his fears, ver. 6; and over his enemies, whom he prays against, ver. 7. V. Gives God the glory, and takes to himself the comfort of that Divine blessing and salvation which are sure to all the people of God, ver. 8. Those speak best of the truths of God that speak experimentally; so David here speaks of the power and goodness of God, and of the safety and tranquillity of the godly.

A Psalm of David, when he fled from Absalom his son.

LORD, how are they increased that trouble me!
Many are they that rise up against me.
2 Many there be which say of my soul,
There is no help for him in God. Selah.
3 But thou, O LORD, art a shield for me;
My glory, and the lifter up of mine head.

The title of this psalm, and many others, is as a key hung ready at the door to open it, and let us into the entertainments of it. When we know upon what occasion a psalm was penned, we know the better how to expound it. This was composed, or at least the substance of it was meditated and digested in David's thoughts, and offered up to God, then when he fled from Absalom his son, who formed a conspiracy against him to take away not his crown only but his life; we have the story, 2 Sam. xv., &c. 1. David was now in great grief. When in his flight he went up the mount of Olives he wept greatly, with his head covered, and marching barefoot; yet then he composed this comfortable psalm. He wept and prayed, wept and sung, wept and believed; this was sowing in tears. "Is any afflicted? let him pray;" nay, let him sing psalms, let him sing this psalm. Is any afflicted with undutiful disobedient children? So was David, and yet that did not hinder his joy in God, nor put him out of tune for holy songs. 2. He was now in great danger. The plot against him was laid deep, and the party that sought his ruin was very formidable, and his own son at the head of them, so that his affairs seemed to be at the last extremity; yet then he kept hold of his interest in God, and improved that. Perils and frights should drive us to God, not drive us from him. 3. He had now a great deal of provocation given him by those from whom he had reason to expect better things; from his son, whom he had been indulgent of, from his subjects, whom he had been so great a blessing to, which he could not but resent, and was enough to break in upon any man's temper; and yet he was so far from any indecent expressions of passion and indignation, that he had calmness enough for those acts of devotion which require the greatest fixedness and freedom of thought. It was a sign his mind was very sedate, that the Spirit came upon him, who chooseth to move upon the still waters. Let no unkindness, no, not of a child, or a friend, ever be laid so much to heart as to disfit us for communion with God. 4. He was now suffering for his sin in the matter of Uriah; this was the evil which for that sin God threatened to raise up against him out of his own house, 2 Sam. xii. 11, which no doubt he observed, and took occasion from thence to renew his repentance for it; and yet he did not therefore cast away his confidence in the Divine power and goodness, nor despair of succour. Even our sorrow for sin must not hinder either our joy in God or our hope in God. 5. He seemed cowardly in fleeing from Absalom, and quitting his royal city, before he had had one push for it; and yet by this psalm it appears he was full of true courage arising from his faith in God. True Christian fortitude consists more in a gracious security and serenity of mind, in patient bearing, and patient waiting, than in daring enterprises with sword in hand. In these three verses he applies himself to God. Whither else should we go but to him, when

iii. 4. The holy hill—literally, "mount of holiness"—is, no doubt, Mount Zion, where the ark of the covenant, the token and pledge of the Divine presence, then was.

iii. 7. Smiting enemies on the cheek bone, and breaking the teeth of bad men, would be now accounted cruel; but we are bound, in reading such a sentence, to remember that the language is figurative, though based on the customs of less enlightened times.

iv. Title. The words, "To the chief musician on Neginoth," call for a remark. For "chief musician" various other explanations have been suggested, but that it signifies the leader of a choir is now generally admitted by the best scholars. The term "Neginoth" is a plural, and no doubt the name of musical instruments. In the singular it is Neginah, and means a stringed instrument. Occasionally the music played upon such instruments appears to be meant.

iv. 2. The term "leasing" is simply an antiquated word for "lying." It will be observed that here, as frequently elsewhere, the any thing grieves us or frightens us? David was now at a distance from his own closet, and from the courts of God's house, where he used to pray, and yet he could find a way open heavenward. Wherever we are we may have access to God, and may draw nigh to him whithersoever we are driven. David in his flight attends his God

First. With a remonstrance of his distress, ver. 1, 2. He looks round, and doth as it were take a view of his enemies' camp, or receive informations of their designs against him, which he brings to God, not to his council-board. Two things he complains of concerning his enemies:

1. That they were very many. "Lord, how are they increased!" beyond what they were at first, and beyond whatever he thought they would have been. Absalom's faction, like a snowball, strangely gathered in its motion. He speaks of it as one amazed, and well he might, that a people he had so many ways obliged should almost generally revolt from him, and rebel against him, and choose for their head such a silly, giddy, young fellow as Absalom was. How slippery and deceitful are the many! and how little fidelity and constancy is to be found among men! David had had the hearts of his subjects as much as ever any king had, and yet now of a sudden he had lost them. As people must not trust too much to princes, Ps. cxlvi. 3, so princes must not build too much upon their interest in the people. Christ, the son of David, had many enemies; when a great multitude came to seize him, when the crowd cried, Crucify him, crucify him, how were they then increased that troubled him! Even good people must not think it strange if the stream be against them, and the powers that threaten them grow more and more formidable.

2. That they were very malicious. They rose up against him, they aimed to trouble him; but that was not all, "they said of his soul, There is no help for him in God." That is, First. They put a spiteful invidious construction upon his troubles, as Job's friends did upon his, concluding that, because his servants and subjects forsook him thus, and did not help him, God had deserted him, and abandoned his cause; and he was therefore to be looked on, or rather to be looked off, as a hypocrite, and a wicked man. Secondly. They blasphemously reflected upon God as unable to relieve him; his danger is so great that God himself cannot help him. It is strange, that so great unbelief should be found in any, especially in many, in Israel, as to think any party of men too strong for Omnipotence to deal with. Thirdly. They endeavoured to shake his confidence in God, and drive him to despair of relief from him. 'They have said it to my soul,' so it may be read: compare Ps. xi. 1; xlii. 10. This grieved him worst of all, that they have so ill an opinion of him as to think it possible to take him off from that bottom. Even the temptation was a buffeting to him, a thorn in his flesh; nay, a sword in his bones. Note, A child of God startles at the very thought of despairing of help in God; you cannot vex him with any thing so much as if you offer to persuade him, "there is no help for him in God." David comes to God, and tells him what his enemies said of him, as Hezekiah spread Rabshakeh's blasphemous letter before the Lord; they say, There is no help for me in thee; but Lord, if it be so, I am undone. They say to my soul, 'There is no salvation' (for so the word is) 'for him in God;' but Lord, do thou "say unto my soul, I am thy salvation," Ps. xxxv. 3; and that shall satisfy me, and in due time silence them. To this complaint he adds "Selah," which occurs about seventy times in the book of Psalms. Some refer it to the music with which in David's time the psalms were sung; others to the sense, and that it is a note commanding a solemn pause: Selah, Mark that, or stop there, and consider a little. As here, they say, There is no help for me in God, Selah; take time for such a thought as this. "Get thee behind me, Satan; the Lord rebuke thee!" away with such a vile suggestion!

Secondly. With a profession of his dependence upon God, ver. 3. An active believer, the more he is beaten off from God, either by the rebukes of providence or the reproaches of enemies, the faster hold he will take of him, and the closer will he cleave to him; so David here, when his enemies said, "There is no help for him in God," cries out with so much the more assurance, "But thou, O Lord, art a shield for me;" let them say what they will, I am sure thou wilt never desert me, and I am resolved, I will never distrust thee. See what God is to his people, what he will be, what they have found him, what David found in him. 1. Safety: "Thou art a shield for me," a shield about me, so some, to secure me on all sides since my enemies surrounded me. Not only my shield, Gen. xv. 1, which notes an interest in the Divine protection; but a shield for me, which notes the present benefit and advantage of that protection. 2. Honour, "Thou art my glory." Those whom God owns for his are not only safe and easy, but really look great, and have true honour put upon them, far above that which the great ones of the earth are proud of. David was now in disgrace, the crown was fallen from his head; but he will not think the worse of himself, while he has God for his glory; Isa. lx. 19, "Thou art my glory," that is, thy glory I reckon mine, so some; that is it I aim at, and am ambitious of, whatever my lot is, and whatever becomes of my honour, that I may be to my God for a name and a praise. 3. Joy and deliverance; "Thou art the lifter up of my head," that is, thou wilt lift up my head out of my troubles, and restore me to my dignity again in due time; however, thou wilt lift up my head under my troubles, so that I shall not droop nor be discouraged, nor shall my spirits fail. If in the worst of times God's people can lift up their heads with joy, knowing that all shall work for good to them, they will own it is God that is the lifter up of their head, that gives them both cause to rejoice and hearts to rejoice.

In singing this, and praying it over, we should possess ourselves with an apprehension of the danger we are in from the multitude and malice of our spiritual enemies, that seek the ruin of our souls by driving us from our God; and concern ourselves in the distresses and dangers of the church of God, which is every where spoken against, every where fought against; but in reference to both we should encourage ourselves in our God, who doth own and protect, and will in due time crown, his own interest, both in the world and in the hearts of his people.

4 I cried unto the LORD with my voice,
And he heard me out of his holy hill. Selah.
5 I laid me down and slept;
I awaked; for the LORD sustained me.
6 I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people,
That have set themselves against me round about.
7 Arise, O LORD; save me, O my God:
For thou hast smitten all mine enemies upon the cheek bone;
Thou hast broken the teeth of the ungodly.
8 Salvation belongeth unto the LORD:
Thy blessing is upon thy people. Selah.

David having stirred up himself, by the irritations of his enemies, to take hold on God, as his God, and so gained comfort enough in looking upward, when if he looked round about him nothing appeared but what was discouraging, here looks back with pleasing reflections upon the benefit he had found by trusting in God, and looks forward with pleasing expectations of a very bright and happy issue which would shortly be put to the dark dispensation he was now under.

First. See with what comfort he looks back upon the communion he had had with God, and the communications of his favour to him, either in some former troubles he had been in, and through God's goodness got through, or in this hitherto. David had been in his time exercised with many difficulties, often oppressed and brought very low; but still he had found God all-sufficient. He now remembered with pleasure,

1. That his troubles had always brought him to his knees, and in all his difficulties and dangers he had been enabled to acknowledge God, and to lift up his heart to him, and his voice too; and this will be a comfortable reflection: "I cried unto God with my voice." That care and grief doth us good and no hurt, which sets us praying, and engageth us, not only to speak to God, but to cry to him as those that are in earnest; and though God understands the language of the heart, when the voice is not heard, 1 Sam. i. 13, and values not the hypocritical prayers of those who cause their voice to be heard on high, Isa. lviii. 4,—vox et preterea nihil,—'voice, and that is all,"—yet, when the earnestness of the voice comes from the fervency of the heart, notice shall be taken of it in the account, that we cried unto God with our voice.

2. That he had always found God ready to answer his prayers; Still "he heard me out of his holy hill," from heaven, the high and holy place, from the ark on mount Zion, whence he used to give answers to those that sought to him. David had ordered Zadok to carry back the ark into the city, when he was upon his flight from Absalom, 2 Sam. xv. 25; knowing that God was not tied, no, not to the ark of his presence, and that, notwithstanding the distance of place, he could by faith receive answers of peace from the holy hill. No such thing can fix a gulf between the communications of God's grace towards us and the operations of his grace in us, between his favour and our faith. The ark of the covenant was in mount Zion, and all the answers to our prayers come from the promises of that covenant. Christ was set king upon the holy hill of Zion, Ps. ii. 6; and it is through him, whom the Father hears always, that our prayers are heard.

3. That he had always been very safe and very easy under the Divine protection; ver. 5, "I laid me down and slept," composed and quiet, and awaked refreshed, "for the Lord sustained me." 1st. This is applicable to the common mercies of every night, which we ought to give thanks for alone and with our families every morning. Many have not where to lay their head, but wander in deserts, or, if they have, dare not lie down for fear of the enemy; but we have laid us down in peace. Many lay them down and cannot sleep, but are full of tossings to and fro till the dawning of the day, through pain of body, or anguish of mind, or the continual alarms of fear in the night; but we lie down and sleep in safety, though incapable of doing any thing then for our own preservation. Many lie down and sleep, and never wake again,—they sleep the sleep of death, as the firstborn of the Egyptians,—but we lie down, and sleep, and awake again to the light and comfort of another day; and whence is it, but because the Lord hath sustained us with sleep as with food? we have been safe under his protection, and easy in the arms of his good providence. 2nd. It seems here to be meant of the wonderful quietness and calmness of David's spirit in the midst of his dangers. Having by prayer committed himself and his cause to God, and being sure of his protection, his heart was fixed, and he was easy. The undutifulness of his son, the disloyalty of his subjects, the treachery of many of his friends, the hazard of his person, the fatigues of his march, and uncertainty of the event, never lost him an hour's sleep, nor gave any disturbance to his repose, for the Lord, by his grace and the consolations of his Spirit, powerfully sustained him, and made him easy. It is a great mercy, when we are in trouble, to have our minds stayed upon God, so as never either to eat or sleep with trembling and astonishment. 3rd. Some of the ancients apply it to the resurrection of Christ. In his sufferings he offered up strong cries, and was heard; and therefore, though he laid him down and slept the sleep of death, yet he awaked the third day, for the Lord sustained him that he should not see corruption.

4. That God had many a time broken the power, and restrained the malice of his enemies; had smitten them upon the cheek bone, ver. 7; had silenced them and spoiled their speaking, blemished them and put them to shame, smitten them on the cheek reproachfully; had disabled them to do the mischief they intended, for he had broken their teeth. Saul and the Philistines, that were sometimes ready to swallow him up, could not effect what they designed. The teeth that are gnashed or sharpened against God's people shall be broken; and, when at any time the power of the church's enemies seems threatening, it is good to remember how often God has broken it, and we are sure that his arm is not shortened. He can stop their mouths, and tie their hands.

Secondly. See with what confidence he looks forward upon the dangers he had yet in prospect. Having put himself under God's protection, and often found the benefit of it,

1. His fears were all stilled and silenced, ver. 6. With what a holy bravery doth he bid defiance to the impotent menaces and attempts of his enemies: "I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people, that" either in a foreign invasion or an intestine rebellion "set themselves" as it were encamped "against me round about." No man less safe; his enemies are numerous, ten thousands. They are spiteful and resolute, they have set themselves against me; nay, they have prevailed far, and seemed to have gained their point, for they are against me round about on every side, thousands against one; and yet no man more secure. I will not be afraid for all this; they cannot hurt me, and therefore they shall not frighten me; whatever prudent methods I take for my own perservation, I will not disquiet myself, distrust my God, nor doubt of a good issue at last. When David, in his flight from Absalom, bade Zadok carry back the ark, he spoke doubtfully of the issue of his present troubles, and concluded like an humble penitent, "Here I am, let him do to me what seemeth him good," 2 Sam. xv. 26; but now, like a strong believer, he speaks confidently, and has no fear concerning the event. Note, A cheerful resignation to God is the way to obtain a cheerful satisfaction and confidence in God.

2. His prayers were quickened and encouraged, ver. 7. He believed God was his Saviour, and yet prays; nay, he therefore prays: "Arise, O Lord; save me, O my God," Promises of salvation do not supersede, but engage, our petitions for it. He will for this be enquired of.

3. His faith became triumphant. He began the psalm with complaints of the strength and malice of his enemies, but concludes it with exultation in the power and grace of his God, and now sees more with him than against him, ver. 8. Two great truths he here builds his confidence upon, and fetcheth comfort from: 1st. That "salvation belongeth unto the Lord," that is, he has power to save, be the danger never so great; it is his prerogative to save, when all other helps and succours fail. It is his pleasure, it is his property, it is his promise to those that are his, whose salvation is not of themselves, but of the Lord; therefore all that have the Lord for their God, according to the tenor of the new covenant, are sure of salvation, for he that is their God

Hebrew text is very brief in expression: "Oh, ye sons of men, how long (will ye turn) my glory into shame, love vanity, seek after lying?" Some commentators understand all this as a prayer which must be applied to the Messiah, but it is exceedingly difficult to justify such an explanation, and it is a safer and simpler principle to regard it as the utterance of the writer himself, without any prophetic reference.

iv. 3. According to a various reading, this verse has been thus rendered in the first clause: "But know ye that Jehovah hath glorified his holy one." But even if the various reading were adopted in the face of very strong evidence to the contrary, there would be no good reason for the version proposed. The only alteration we would suggest would be this: "But know ye that the Lord hath distinguished his godly one," which would apply to both readings.

iv. 4. There is no doubt that the phrase or precept of St. Paul, "Be ye angry and sin not," is translated from this verse; nor is it is the God of salvation. 2nd. That his blessing is upon His people. He not only has power to save them, but he assures them of his kind and gracious intentions towards them. He has in his word pronounced a blessing upon his people, and we are bound to believe that that blessing doth accordingly rest upon them, though there be not the visible effects of it. Hence we may conclude, that God's people, though they may lie under the reproaches and censures of men, yet are surely blessed of him, who blesseth indeed, and therefore can command a blessing.

In singing this, and praying it over, we must own the satisfaction we have had in depending upon God, and committing ourselves to him; and encourage ourselves and one another to continue still hoping and quietly waiting for the salvation of the Lord.

PSALM IV.

David was a preacher, a royal preacher, as well as Solomon. Many of his psalms are doctrinal and practical as well as devotional; the greatest part of this psalm is so, in which wisdom cries to men, to the sons of men, (as Pr. viii. 4, 5,) to receive instruction. The title doth not tell us, as that of the former did, that it was penned on any particular occasion, nor are we to think that all the psalms were occasional, though some were; but that many of them were designed in general for the instruction of the people of God that attended in the courts of his house, the assisting of their devotions, and the directing of their conversations; such a one I take this psalm to be. Let us not make the prophecy of Scripture to be of more private interpretation than needs must, 2 Pet. i. 20. Here, I. David begins with a short prayer, ver. 1, and that prayer preacheth. II. He directs his speech to the children of men, and, 1. In God's name reproves them for the dishonour they do to God, and the damage they do to their own souls, ver. 2; 2. He sets before them the happiness of godly people, for their encouragement to be religious; 3. He calls upon them to consider their ways, ver. 4. III. He exhorts them to serve God and trust in him, ver. 5. IV. He gives an account of his own experiences of the grace of God working in him. 1. Enabling him to choose God's favour for his felicity, ver. 6; 2. Filling his heart with joy therein, ver. 7; 3. Quieting his spirit in the assurance of the Divine protection he was under night and day, ver. 8.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth. A Psalm of David.

HEAR me when I call, O God of my righteousness:
Thou hast enlarged me when I was in distress;
Have mercy upon me, and hear my prayer. [shame?
2 O ye sons of men, how long will ye turn my glory into How long will ye love vanity, and seek after leasing?
Selah. [for himself:
3 But know that the LORD hath set apart him that is godly
The LORD will hear when I call unto him.
4 Stand in awe, and sin not:
Commune with your own heart
Upon your bed, and be still. Selah.
5 Offer the sacrifices of righteousness,
And put your trust in the LORD.

The title of the psalm acquaints us that David, having penned it by Divine inspiration, for the use of the church, delivered it to the chief musician, or master of the song, who (according to the Divine appointment of psalmody made in his time, which he was chiefly instrumental in the establishment of) presided in that service. We have a particular account of the constitution, the modelling the several classes of singers, each with a chief, and the share each bore in the work, 1 Chr. xxv. Some "prophesied according to the order of the king," ver. 2; others "prophesied with a harp, to give thanks and to praise the Lord," ver. 3; of others it is said, "they were to lift up the horn," ver. 5; but of them all that they were "for song in the house of the Lord," ver. 6, and were "instructed in the songs of the Lord," ver. 7. To one of the chiefs was this psalm committed to be sung on Neginoth, that is, on stringed instruments, Hab. iii. 19, which were played on with the hand; with music of that kind the choristers were to sing this psalm: and it should seem that then they only sung, not the people. But the New Testament appoints all Christians to sing, Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16; from whom it is expected that they do it decently, not artfully, and therefore there is not now so much occasion for musical instruments as there was then: the melody is to be made in the heart. In these verses,

First. David addresseth himself to God, ver. 1. Whether the sons of men, to whom he is about to speak, will hear, or whether they will forbear, he hopes and prays that God will give him a gracious audience, and an answer of peace: "Hear me when I call," and accept my adorations; grant my petitions, and judge upon my appeals; "have mercy upon me, and hear me." All the notice God is pleased to take of our prayers, and all the returns he is pleased to make to them, must be ascribed not to our merit, but purely to his mercy. Hear me for thy mercy sake, is our best plea. Two things David here pleads farther: 1. Thou art the God of my righteousness; not only a righteous God thyself, but the author of my righteous dispositions, who hast by thy grace wrought that good that is in me, hast made me a righetous man; therefore hear me, and so own thine own work in me: thou art also the patron of my righteous cause, the protector of my wronged innocency, to whom I commit my way, and whom I trust to bring forth my righteousness as the light. When men condemn us unjustly this is our comfort, it is God that justifies. He is the God of a believer's righteousness. 2. "Thou hast" formerly "enlarged me when I was in distress," enlarged my heart in holy joy and comfort under my distresses, enlarged my condition by bringing me out of my distresses; therefore now, Lord, have mercy upon me, and hear me. The experience we have had of God's goodness to us in enlarging us when we have been in distress is not only a great encouragement to our faith and hope for the future, but a good plea with God in prayer: Thou hast; wilt thou not? for thou art God, and changest not; thy work is perfect.

Secondly. He addresseth himself to the children of men, for the conviction and conversion of those that are yet strangers to God, and that will not have the Messiah, the son of David, to reign over them.

1. He endeavours to convince them of the folly of their impiety; ver. 2, "O ye sons of men," (of great men, so some, men of high degree, understanding it of the partizans of Saul, or Absalom,) how long will ye oppose me and my government, and continue disaffected to it, under the influence of the false and groundless suggestions of those that wish evil to me? Or it may be taken more generally. God by the psalmist here reasons with sinners to bring them to repentance. You that go on in the neglect of God and his worship, and in contempt of the kingdom of Christ and his government, consider what you do. 1st. You debase yourselves, for you are sons of men, (the word signifies man as a noble creature;) consider the dignity of your nature, and the excellency of those powers of reason with which you are endued, and do not act thus irrationally, and untecoming yourselves. Let the sons of men consider, and shew themselves men. 2nd. You dishonour your Maker, and turn his glory into shame. They may well be taken as God's own words, charging sinners with the wrong they do him in his honour. Or, if David's words, it may be understood of God, whom he called his glory, Ps. iii. 3. Idolaters are charged with changing the glory of God into shame, Rom. i. 23. All wilful sinners do so, by disobeying the commands of his law, despising the offers of his grace, and giving that affection and service to the creature which is due to God only. Those that profane God's holy name, that ridicule his word and ordinances, and, while they profess to know him, in works deny him, do what in them lies to turn his glory into shame. 3rd. You put a cheat upon yourselves; "you love vanity, and seek after leasing," or lying, or that which is a lie. You are yourselves vain and lying, and you love to be so. Or, you set your hearts upon that which will prove at last but vanity and a lie. They that love the world, and seek the things that are beneath, love vanity, and seek lies; that please themselves with the delights of sense, and portion themselves with the wealth of this world, for these will deceive them, and so ruin them. How long will ye do this? Will you never be wise for yourselves, never consider your duty and interest? "When shall it once be?" Jer. xiii. 27. The God of heaven thinks the time long that sinners persist in dishonouring him, and in deceiving and ruining themselves.

2. He shews them the peculiar favour which God has for good people, the special protection they are under, and the singular privileges to which they are entitled, ver. 3. This comes in here, 1st. As a reason why they should not oppose or persecute him that is godly, or think to run him down. It is at their peril if they offend one of these little ones, whom God has set apart for himself, Mat. xviii. 6. God reckons that those who touch them touch the apple of his eye, and he will make their persecutors to know it sooner or later. They have an interest in heaven; God will hear them, and therefore let none dare to do them any injury, for God will hear their cry and plead their cause, Ex. xxii. 23. It is generally supposed that David speaks of his own designation to the throne; he is the godly man whom God hath set apart for that honour, and who doth not usurp it, or assume it to himself; and therefore the opposition you give to him, and to his advancement, is very criminal, for therein you fight against God, and it will be vain and ineffectual. God has in like manner set apart the Lord Jesus for himself, that merciful one; and those that attempt to hinder his advancement will certainly be baffled, for the Father heareth him always. Or, 2nd. As a reason why they should themselves be good, and walk no longer in the counsel of the ungodly; You have hitherto sought vanity, be truly religious, and you will be truly happy here and for ever. For, First. God will secure to himself his interest in you. "The Lord hath set apart him that is godly," every particular godly man, "for himself," in his eternal choice, in his effectual calling, in the special disposals of his providence and operations of his grace; they are purified unto him a peculiar people. Godly men are God's separated, sealed ones; he knows them that are his, hath set his image and superscription upon them; distinguisheth them with uncommon favours, "and they shall be mine, saith the Lord, in that day when I make up my jewels." Know this; let godly people know it, and let them never alienate themselves from him to whom they are thus appropriated; let wicked people know it, and take heed how they hurt those whom God protects. Secondly. God will secure to you an interest in himself. This David speaks with application, "The Lord will hear when I call unto him." We should think ourselves happy if we had the ear of an earthly prince; and is it not worth while upon any terms, especially such easy ones, to gain the ear of the King of kings? Let us know this, and forsake lying vanities for our own mercies.

3. He warns them against sin, and exhorts them both to frighten themselves and to reason themselves from it; ver. 4, "Stand in awe, and sin not:" ('be angry and sin not,' so the Seventy, and some think the apostle takes that exhortation from him, Eph. iv. 26;) "commune with your own hearts." Be converted; and, in order thereunto, consider and fear. Note, 1st. We must not sin, not miss our way and so miss our aim. 2nd. One good remedy against sin is to stand in awe. 'Be moved,' so some, in opposition to carelessness and carnal security; always keep up a holy reverence of the glory and majesty of God, and a holy dread of his wrath and curse, and dare not to provoke him. 3rd. One good means of preventing sin, and preserving a holy awe, is to be frequent and serious in communing with our own hearts. Talk with your hearts; you have a great deal to say to them, they may be spoken with at any time, let it not be unsaid. A thinking man is in a fair way to be a wise and a good man. "Commune with your hearts;" that is, examine them by serious self-reflection, that you may acquaint yourselves with them, and amend what is amiss in them; employ them by solemn pious meditations; let your thoughts fasten upon that which is good, and keep close to it. Consider your ways; and observe the directions here given us, in order to the doing of this work well, and to good purpose. First. Choose a solitary time: do it when you lie awake upon your beds. Before you turn you to go to sleep at night, (as some of the heathen moralists have directed,) examine your consciences what you have done that day, particularly what you have done amiss, that you may repent of it. When you awake in the night meditate upon God, and the things that belong to your peace. David did himself practise what he here counsels others to; Ps. lxiii. 6, "I remember thee on my bed." Upon a sick bed particularly we should consider our ways, and commune with our own hearts about them. Secondly. Compose yourselves into a serious frame; "be still." When you have asked conscience a question, be silent, and wait for an answer; even in unquiet times keep your spirits calm and quiet.

4. He counsels them to make conscience of their duty; ver. 5, "Offer to God the sacrifice of righteousness." We must not only cease to do evil, but learn to do well. They that were disaffected to David and his government would soon come to a better temper, and return to their allegiance, if they would but worship God aright. And those that know the concerns that lie between them and God will be glad of the Mediator the Son of David. It is required here from every one of us, 1st. That we serve him, offer sacrifices to him; your own selves first, and your best sacrifices. But they must be sacrifices of righteousness, that is, good works; all the fruits of the reigning love of God and our neighbour, and all the instances of a religious conversation, which are better than all burnt offerings and sacrifices. Let all your devotions come from an upright heart; let all your alms be sacrifices of righteousness. The sacrifices of the unrighteous God will not accept, they are an abomination, Isa. i. 11, &c. 2nd. That we confide in him. First make conscience of offering the sacrifices of righteousness, and then you are welcome to "put your trust in the Lord." Serve God without any diffidence of him, or any fear of losing by him. Honour him by trusting in him only, and not in your wealth, or in an arm of flesh; in his providence, and lean not to your own understanding; in his grace, and go not about to establish your own righteousness or sufficiency.

In singing these verses we must preach to ourselves the doctrine of the provoking nature of sin, the lying vanity of the world, and the unspeakable happiness of God's people, and press upon ourselves the duties of fearing God, at all apparent why the same rendering was not adopted here. The Syriac has, "Be ye angry and sin not: speak with your hearts, and meditate upon your couches." The translator regarded the exhortation to be still or silent as equivalent to meditate. The Vulgate and the Greek give as the sense of the last clause, "What you say in your hearts be sorry for on your beds." Probably the different explanations arose out of the various meanings of a word which might signify to reflect, either in the sense of meditating or of repenting.

iv. 5. "The sacrifices of righteousness" are righteous sacrifices; that is to say, such as it is a duty to be offered, presented in such a spirit and manner as shall secure their acceptance.

iv. 6, 7. The psalmist, in verse 6, refers to the men whose desire is after worldly gain; and in verse 7 he intimates that he has more joy than they have in their prosperity. Spiritual good is greater than material wealth, and he who has the spiritual can be happy even if he is deprived of the material. Corn and wine are mentioned as conversing with our own hearts, and offering spiritual sacrifices; and, in praying over them, beg of God grace thus to think and thus to do.

6 There be many that say, Who will shew us any good?
LORD, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us.
7 Thou hast put gladness in my heart, [increased.
More than in the time that their corn and their wine
8 I will both lay me down in peace, and sleep:
For thou, LORD, only makest me dwell in safety.

We have here,

First. The foolish wish of worldly people; "There be many that say, Who will shew us any good?" 'Who will make us to see good?' What good they meant is intimated ver. 7; it was the increase of their corn and wine. All they desired was plenty of the wealth of this world, that they might enjoy abundance of the delights of sense. Thus far they are right, that they are desirous of good, and solicitous about it; but there are these things amiss in this wish: 1. They inquire in general who will make them happy, but do not apply themselves to God, who alone can; and so expose themselves to be ill advised, and shew they would rather be beholden to any than to God; for they would willingly live without him. 2. They inquire for good that may be seen, seeming good, sensible good, and were not for the good things that were out of sight, and are the objects of faith only. The source of idolatry was a desire of gods that they might see, therefore they worshipped the sun; but as we must be taught to worship an unseen God, so to seek an unseen good, 2 Cor. iv. 18. We look with an eye of faith farther than we can see with an eye of sense. 3. They inquire for any good, not for the chief good; if it be outward good, present good, partial good, good meat, good drink, a good trade, a good estate; and what are all these worth without a good God, and a good heart? Any good will serve the turn of the most of men, but a gracious soul will not be put off so. This way, this wish, of carnal worldlings is their folly, and yet many there be that join in it; and so will their doom be; "Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things;" the penny thou didst agree for.

Secondly. The wise choice which godly people make. David and the pious few that adhered to him dissented from that wish, and joined in this prayer, "Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us." 1. He disagrees from the vote of the many; God had set him apart for himself by distinguishing favours, and therefore he sets himself apart by a distinguishing character. They are for any good, for worldly good, but so am not I; I will not say as they say. Any good will not serve my turn; the wealth of the world will never make a portion for my soul, and therefore I cannot take up with it. 3. He and his friends agree in their choice of God's favour as their felicity; that is it which in their account is better than life, and all the comforts of life.

1st. That is it which they most earnestly desire and seek after. This is the breathing of their souls, "Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us;" most are for other things, but we are for this. Good people, as they are distinguished by their practices, so they are by their prayers, not the length and language of them, but the faith and fervency of them. They whom God hath set apart have a prayer by themselves, which, though others may speak the words of, they only offer up in sincerity; and this is a prayer which they all say amen to, Lord, let us have thy favour, and let us know that we have it, and we desire no more; that is enough to make us happy. Lord, be at peace with us, accept of us, manifest thyself to us; let us be satisfied of thy lovingkindness, and we will be satisfied with it. Observe, though David speaks, ver. 7, 8, of himself only, here in the prayer he speaks for others also, "upon us," as Christ taught us to pray, "Our Father." All the saints come to the throne of grace on the same errand; and in this they are one, they all desire God's favour as their chief good. We should beg it for others, as well as for ourselves; for in God's favour there is enough for us all, and we shall have never the less for others sharing.

2nd. That is it in which above any thing they rejoice, ver. 7. Thou hast hereby many a time put gladness into my heart, not only supported and refreshed me, but filled me with joy unspeakable; and, therefore, that is it which I will still pursue, which I will seek after all the days of my life. When God puts grace in the heart, he puts gladness in the heart; nor is any joy comparable to that which gracious souls have in the communications of the Divine favour, no, not the joy of harvest, of a plentiful harvest, when the corn and wine increaseth. This is gladness in the heart, inward, solid, substantial joy. The mirth of worldly people is but a flash, a shadow; even in laughter their heart is sorrowful, Pr. xiv. 13. 'Thou hast given gladness in my heart,' so the word is. True joy is God's gift, not as the world giveth, Jno. xiv. 27. The saints have no reason to envy carnal worldlings their mirth and joy, but should pity them rather; for they may know better, and will not.

3rd. That is it which they entirely confide in, and in that confidence are always easy, ver. 8. He had laid him down and slept, Ps. iii. 5; and so he will still, "I will lay me down," having the assurance of thy favour, "in peace;" and with as much pleasure as they "whose corn and wine increaseth," and who lie down as Boaz did in his threshing-floor, at the end of the heap of corn, to sleep there, when his heart was merry, Ru. iii. 7. "For thou only makest me to dwell in safety." Though I am alone, yet I am not alone, for God is with me; though I have no guards to attend me, the Lord alone is sufficient to protect me; he can do it himself when all other defences fail. If he have the light of God's countenance, First. He can enjoy himself. His soul returns to God, and reposeth itself in him as its rest, and so he lays him down and sleeps in peace. He has what he would have, and is sure that nothing can come amiss to him. Secondly. He fears no disturbance from his enemies, sleeps quiet, and is very secure, because God himself has undertaken to keep him safe. When he comes to sleep the sleep of death, and to lie down in the grave, to make his bed in the darkness, he will then, with good old Simeon, depart in peace, Lu. ii. 29; being assured that God will receive his soul to be safe with himself, and that his body also shall be made to dwell in safety in the grave. Thirdly. He commits all his affairs to God, and contentedly leaves the issue of them with him. It is said of the husbandman that, having cast his seed into the ground, he sleeps and riseth night and day, and the seed springs and grows up he knoweth not how, Mar. iv. 26, 27. So a good man, having by faith and prayer cast his care upon God, he sleeps and resteth night and day, and is very easy, leaving it to his God to perform all things for him: welcome his holy will.

In singing these verses, and praying over them, let us, with a holy contempt of the wealth and pleasure of this world as insufficient to make us happy, earnestly seek the favour of God, and pleasingly solace ourselves in that favour, and with a holy indifferency about the issue of all our worldly concerns; let us commit ourselves and all our affairs to the conduct and custody of the Divine providence, and be satisfied that all shall be made to work for good to us, if we keep ourselves in the love of God.

PSALM V.

This psalm is a prayer, a solemn address to God, at a time when the psalmist was brought into distress by the malice of his enemies. Many such times passed over David; nay, there was scarce any time of his life to which this psalm may not be accommodated; for in this he was a type of Christ, that he was continually beset with enemies; and his powerful and prevalent appeals to God when he was so beset, pointed at Christ's dependence on his Father, and triumphs over the powers of darkness in the midst of his sufferings. In this psalm, I. David settles a correspondence between his soul and God, promising to pray, and promising himself that God would certainly hear him, ver 1—3. II. He gives to God the glory, and takes to himself the comfort of God's holiness, ver. 4—6. III. He declares his resolution to keep close to the public worship of God, ver. 7. IV. He prayed, 1. For himself, that God would guide him, ver. 8; 2. Against his enemies, that God would destroy them, ver. 9, 10; 3. For all the people of God, that God would give them joy, and keep them safe, ver. 11, 12. And this is all of great use to direct us in prayer.

To the chief Musician upon Nehiloth. A Psalm of David.

GIVE ear to my words, O LORD, consider my meditation.
2 Hearken unto the voice of my cry, my King, and my God:
For unto thee will I pray.
3 My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O LORD;
In the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up.
4 For thou art not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness:
Neither shall evil dwell with thee.
5 The foolish shall not stand in thy sight:
Thou hatest all workers of iniquity.
6 Thou shalt destroy them that speak leasing:
The LORD will abhor the bloody and deceitful man.

The title of this psalm has nothing in it peculiar, but that it is said to be upon Nehiloth, a word nowhere else used. It is conjectured (and it is but a conjecture) that it signifies wind-instruments, with which this psalm was sung, as Neginoth was supposed to signify the stringed instruments. In these verses David had an eye to God,

First. As a prayer-hearing God; and so he has always been, ever since men began to call upon the name of the Lord, and yet is still as ready to hear prayer as ever. Observe how David here styles him, "O Lord," ver. 1, 3; Jehovah, a self-existent, self-sufficient being, whom we are bound to adore; and "my King and my God," ver. 2, whom I have avouched for my God, and to whom I have sworn allegiance, and under whose protection I have put myself as my King. We believe that the God we pray to is a King and a God, King of kings, and God of gods; but that is not enough. The most commanding, encouraging principle of prayer, and the most powerful prevailing plea in prayer, is to look upon him as our King and our God, whom we lie under peculiar obligations to, and whom we have peculiar expectations from. Now observe,

1. What David here prays for, which may encourage our faith and hopes in all our addresses to God. If we pray fervently and in faith, we have reason to hope, 1st. That God will take cognizance of our case, the remonstrance we make of it, and the requests we make upon it; for so he prays here, "Give ear to my words, O Lord." Though God is in heaven, he has an ear open to his people's prayers; and it is not heavy, that he cannot hear. Men perhaps will not or cannot hear us, our enemies so haughty that they will not, our friends at such a distance that they cannot; but God, though high, though in heaven, can and will. 2nd. That he will take it into his wise and compassionate consideration, and will not slight it, or turn it off with a cursory answer; for so he prays, "Consider my meditation." David's prayers were not his words only, but his meditations. As meditation is the best preparative for prayer, so prayer is the best issue of meditation. Meditation and prayer should go together, Ps. xix. 14. And when we thus consider our prayers, then and then only we may expect that God will consider them, and take that to his heart which comes from ours. 3rd. That he will in due time return a gracious answer of peace; for so he prays ver. 2, "Hearken to the voice of my cry." His prayer was a cry, it was the voice of his cry, which notes fervency of affection, and importunity of expression; and such effectual fervent prayers of a righteous man avail much, and do wonders.

2. What David here promiseth, as the condition on his part to be performed, fulfilled and kept, that he might obtain this gracious acceptance; and this may guide and govern us in our addresses to God, that we may present them aright; for we ask and have not, if we ask amiss. Four things David here promiseth, and so must we:

1st. That he will pray, that he will make conscience of it, and make a business of it; "Unto thee will I pray." Others live without prayer, but I will pray. Kings on their own thrones (so David was) must be beggars at God's throne. Others pray to strange gods and expect relief from them; but to thee, to thee only will I pray. The assurances God has given us of his readiness to hear prayer should confirm our resolution to live and die praying.

2nd. That he will pray in the morning. His praying voice shall be heard then, and then shall his prayer be directed, that shall be the date of his letters to heaven; not that only, "morning and evening, and at noon will I pray," nay, seven times a day will I praise thee, but that certainly. Morning prayer is our duty; we are the fittest for prayer when we are in the most fresh, and lively, and composed frame, got clear of the slumbers of the night, revived by them, and not yet filled with the business of the day. We have then most need of prayer, considering the dangers and temptations of the day, to which we are exposed, and against which we are concerned, by faith and prayer, to fetch in fresh supplies of grace.

3rd. That he will have his eye single, and his heart intent in the duty; "I will direct my prayer," as a marksman directs his arrow to the white; with such a fixedness and steadiness of mind should we address ourselves to God. Or, as we direct a letter to a friend at such a place, so must we direct our prayers to God as our Father in heaven; and let us always direct them to be left with the Lord Jesus, the great Mediator, and then they will be sure not to miscarry. All our prayers must be directed to God, that is, his honour and glory must be aimed at as our highest end in all our prayers; let our first petition be, Hallowed, glorified be thy name, and then we may be sure of the same gracious answer to it that was given to Christ himself, "I have glorified it, and I will glorify it yet again."

4th. That he will patiently wait for an answer of peace. "I will look up;" will look after my prayers, and "hear what God the Lord will speak," examples of the sort of good after which some men seek, as the best they can desire.

v. The occasion on which this psalm was penned is not stated in the title, but Rosenmüller observes that the ancient Hebrew rabbis taught that David wrote it on account of Doeg and Ahithophel. This, however, is doubtful, and it has been more common to regard it as having arisen out of the sedition of Absalom. Among the various explanations of the word "Nehiloth," in the title, the one most generally acquiesced in is, that it is the name of certain wind instruments, resembling a flute or pipe.

v. 3. The ordinary translation of this verse may be accepted, though the second clause denotes rather, "I will set in order (words) before thee, and will watch (for thee)." It is far better than the Vulgate, which the Douay renders, "In the morning I will stand by thee and will see;" it is also better than the old Bible version, "In the morning will I direct me unto thee, and I will wait."

Ps. lxxxv. 8; Hab. ii. 1: that if he grant what I asked I may be thankful; if he deny, I may be patient; if he defer, I may continue to pray and wait, and may not faint. We must look up or look out, as he that has shot an arrow looks to see how near it has come to the mark. We lose much of the comfort of our prayers for want of observing the returns of them. Thus praying, thus waiting, as the lame man looked stedfastly on Peter and John, Acts iii. 4, we may expect that God will give ear to our words, and consider them, and to him we may refer ourselves, as David here; who doth not pray, Lord, do this or the other for me, but hearken to me, consider my case, and do in it as seemeth good unto thee.

Secondly. As a sin-hating God, ver. 4—6. David takes notice of this, 1. As a warning to himself, and all other praying people, to remember that, as the God with whom we have to do is gracious and merciful, so he is pure and holy. Though he is ready to hear prayer, yet if we regard iniquity in our heart he will not hear our prayers, Ps. lxvi. 18. 2. As an encouragement to his prayers against his enemies; they were wicked men, and therefore enemies to God, and such as he had no pleasure in. See here,

1st. The holiness of God's nature. When he saith, "Thou art not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness," he means, thou art a God that hatest it, as directly contrary to thine infinite purity, and rectitude, and holy will. Though the workers of iniquity prosper, let none from thence infer, that God hath pleasure in wickedness; no, not in that by which men pretend to honour him, or those do that hate their brethren and cast them out, and say, "Let the Lord be glorified." God has no pleasure in wickedness, though palliated with a cloak of religion. Let those, therefore, who delight in sin, know that God hath no delight in them; nor let any say when he is tempted, "I am tempted of God," for God is not the author of sin, neither shall evil dwell with him; that is, it shall not always be countenanced and suffered to prosper. Dr. Hammond thinks this refers to that law of Moses, which would not permit strangers that persisted in their idolatry to dwell in the land of Israel.

2nd. The justice of his government. The foolish shall not stand in his sight; that is, shall not be smiled upon by him, nor admitted to attend upon him, nor shall they be acquitted in the judgment of the great day. The workers of iniquity are very foolish: sin is folly, and sinners are the greatest fools of any others; not fools of God's making,—those are to be pitied, he hateth nothing that he has made,—but fools of their own making, and those he hates. Wicked people hate God, justly therefore are they hated of him, and it will be their endless misery and ruin; Those whom thou hatest thou shalt destroy; particularly two sorts of sinners, who are here marked for destruction. First. Those that are fools; that speak leasing, or lying, and that are deceitful. There is a particular emphasis laid on these sinners, Rev. xxi. 8, all liars; and xxii. 15, "whosoever loves and makes a lie." Nothing more contrary than this, and therefore nothing more hateful to the God of truth. Secondly Those that are cruel; Thou wilt abhor the bloody man; for inhumanity is no less contrary, no less hateful to the God of mercy, whom mercy pleaseth. Liars and murderers are in a particular manner said to resemble the devil, and to be his children; and, therefore, it may well be expected that God should abhor them. These were the characters of David's enemies, and such as these are still the enemies of Christ and his church, men perfectly lost to all virtue and honour; and the worse they are the surer we may be of their ruin in due time.

In singing these verses and praying over them, we must engage and stir up ourselves to the duty of prayer, and encourage ourselves in it, because we shall not seek the Lord in vain; and must express our detestation of sin, and our awful expectation of that day of Christ's appearing, which will be the day of the perdition of ungodly men.

7 But as for me, I will come into thy house in the multitude of thy mercy:
And in thy fear will I worship toward thy holy temple.
8 Lead me, O LORD, in thy righteousness because of mine enemies;
Make thy way straight before my face.
9 For there is no faithfulness in their mouth;
Their inward part is very wickedness;
Their throat is an open sepulchre;
They flatter with their tongue
10 Destroy thou them, O God;
Let them fall by their own counsels;
Cast them out in the multitude of their transgressions;
For they have rebelled against thee.
11 But let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice:
Let them ever shout for joy, because thou defendest them:
Let them also that love thy name be joyful in thee.
12 For thou, LORD, wilt bless the righteous;
With favour wilt thou compass him as with a shield.

In these verses David gives three characters, of himself, of his enemies and of all the people of God, and subjoins a prayer to each of them.

First. He gives an account of himself, and prays for himself, ver. 7, 8.

1. He is stedfastly resolved to keep close to God, and to his worship. Sinners go away from God, and so make themselves odious to his holiness, and obnoxious to his justice; but as for me, that shall not keep me from thee. God's holiness and justice are so far from being a terror to the upright in heart, to drive them from God, that they are rather by them invited to cleave to him. David resolves, 1st. To worship God; that is, to pay his homage to him, and give unto God the glory due unto his name. 2nd. To worship him publicly; "I will come into thy house," the courts of thy house, to worship there with other thy faithful worshippers. David was much in secret worship, prayed often alone by himself, ver. 2, 3; and yet was very constant and devout in his attendance on the sanctuary. The duties of the closet are designed to prepare us for, not excuse us from, public ordinances. 3rd. To worship him reverently, and with a due sense of the infinite distance there is between God and man; "In thy fear will I worship," with a holy awe of God upon my spirit, Heb. xii. 28. God is greatly to be feared by all his worshippers. 4th. To take his encouragement in worship from God himself only. First. From his infinite mercy. It is in the multitude of that (the inexhaustible treasures of mercy that are in God, and the innumerable proofs and instances of it which we receive from him,) that David confides, and not in any merit or righteousness of his own, in his approaches to God. The mercy of God should ever be both the foundation of our hopes and the fountain of our joy in every thing wherein we have to do with him. Secondly. From the instituted medium of worship; which was then the temple, here called the temple of his holiness, as a type of Christ, the great and only Mediator, who sanctifies the service, as the temple sanctified the gold; and to whom we must have an eye in all our devotions, as they then had to the temple.

2. He earnestly prays, that God by his grace would guide and preserve him always in the way of his duty; ver. 8, "Lead me in thy righteousness, because of mine enemies," Heb., 'Because of those which observe me,' which watch for my halting, and seek occasion against me. See here, 1st. The good use which David made of the malice of his enemies against him. The more curious they were in spying faults in him, that they might have whereof to accuse him, the more cautious he was to avoid sin, and all appearances of it, and the more solicitous to be always found in the good way of God and duty. Thus by wisdom and grace good may come out of evil. 2nd. The right course which David took for the baffling of those who sought occasion against him. He committed himself to a Divine conduct, begged of God both by his providence and by his grace to direct him in the right way, and keep him from turning aside out of it, at any time, in any instance whatsoever, that the most critical and captious of his enemies, like Daniel's, might find no occasion against him. The way of our duty is here called God's way and his righteousness, because he prescribes to us by his just and holy laws, which, if we sincerely set before us as our rule, we may in faith beg of God to direct us in all particular cases. How this prayer of David's was answered to him, see 1 Sam. xviii. 14, 15.

Secondly. He gives an account of his enemies, and prays against them, ver. 9, 10. 1. If his account of them be true, as no doubt it is, they have a very bad character; and if they had not been ill men indeed they could not have been enemies to a man after God's own heart. He had spoken, ver. 6, of God's hating the bloody and deceitful men; Now, Lord, saith he, that is the character of my enemies. They are deceitful: there is no trusting them; for "there is no faithfulness in their mouth." They thought it was no sin to tell a deliberate lie, if it might but blemish David, and make him odious; "Lord, lead me," saith he, ver. 8, for such as these are the men I have to do with, against whose slanders innocency itself is no security. Do they speak fair? Do they talk of peace and friendship? They flatter with their tongues; it is designed to cover their malice, and to gain their point the more secure. Whatever they pretend of religion or friendship, two sacred things, they are true to neither; their inward part is wickedness itself,—it is very wickedness. They are likewise bloody, for their throat is an open sepulchre; cruel as the grave, gaping to devour and to swallow up; insatiable as the grave, which never saith, "It is enough," Pr. xxx. 15, 16. This is quoted Rom. iii. 13, to shew the general corruption of mankind; for they are all naturally prone to malice, Tit. iii. 3. The grave is opened for them all, and yet they are as open graves to one another. 2. If his prayer against them be heard, as no doubt it is, they are in a bad condition. As men are and do, so they must expect to fare. He prays to God to destroy them, (according to what he had said, ver. 6, "Thou shalt destroy" men of this character, so let them fall; and sinners will soon throw themselves into ruin, if they be let alone;) to cast them out of his protection and favour, out of the heritage of the Lord, out of the land of the living. And woe to those whom God casts out. They have by their sins deserved destruction; there is enough to justify God in their utter rejection; "Cast them out in the multitude of their transgressions," by which they have filled up the measure of their iniquity, and are become ripe for ruin. Persecuting God's servants fills the measure as soon as any thing, 1 Thes. ii. 15, 16. Nay, they may be easily made to fall by their own counsels; that which they do to secure themselves and do mischief to others, by the overruling providence of God, may be made a means of their destruction, Ps. vii. 15; ix. 17. He pleads, "They have rebelled against thee." Had they been only mine enemies, I could safely have forgiven them, but they are rebels against God, his crown and dignity; they oppose his government, and will not repent to give him glory, and therefore I plainly foresee their ruin. His prayer for their destruction comes not from a spirit of revenge, but from a spirit of prophecy; by which he foretold, that all that rebel against God will certainly be destroyed by their own counsels. If "it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble" his people, as we are told it is, 2 Thes. i. 6, we pray it may be done whenever we pray, "Father, thy will be done."

Thirdly. He gives an account of the people of God, and prays for them, concluding with an assurance of their bliss, which he doubted not of his own interest in. Observe,

1. The description he gives of God's people. They are "the righteous," ver. 12: for they put their trust in God, are well assured of his power and all-sufficiency, venture their all upon his promise, and are confident of his protection in the way of their duty; and they love his name, are well-pleased with all that by which God has made himself known, and take delight in their acquaintance with him. This is true and pure religion, to live a life of complacency in God, and dependence on him.

2. His prayer for them; "Let them rejoice;" let them have cause to rejoice, and hearts to rejoice. Fill them with joy, with great joy, and unspeakable, "let them shout for joy." With constant joy, and perpetual; "let them ever shout for joy, with holy joy; and that which terminates in God, let them "be joyful in thee," in thy favour, in thy salvation, not in any creature. Let them rejoice, "because thou coverest them," or overshadowest them, dwellest among them. Perhaps it is an allusion to the pillar of cloud and fire, which was to Israel a visible token of God's special presence with them, and the special protection they were under. Let us learn of David to pray not for ourselves only, but for others; for all good people, for all that trust in God and love his name, though not in every thing of our mind, or in our interest. Let all that are entitled to God's promises have a share in our prayers. "Grace be with all that love Christ in sincerity." This is to concur with God.

3. His comfort concerning them, ver. 12. Therefore he takes them into his prayers, because they are God's peculiar people; therefore he doubts not but his prayers shall be heard, and they shall always rejoice; for, 1st. They are happy in the assurance of God's blessing; "Thou, Lord, wilt bless the righteous;" wilt command a blessing upon them. Thou hast in thy word pronounced them blessed, and therefore wilt make them truly so; 'Those whom thou blessest, they are blessed indeed.' 2nd. They are safe under the protection of thy favour; 'with that thou wilt crown him,' so some read it; it is his honour; it will be to him a diadem of beauty, and make him truly great. With that thou wilt compass him, wilt surround him on every side, as with a shield. A shield in war guards only one side, but the favour of God is to the saints a defence on every side, like the hedge about Job, round about, so that while they keep themselves under the Divine protection they are entirely safe, and ought to be entirely satisfied.

In singing these verses, and praying them over, we must by faith put ourselves under God's conduct and care, and then please ourselves with his mercy and grace, and with the prospect of God's triumphs at last over all his enemies, and his people's triumphs in him and in his salvation.

v. 5. "The foolish" are called "the malignant" in one version, and "boasters" in another, while a third calls them "the profligate." The persons meant are such as madly run on in the ways of sin.

v. 6. "Thou shalt destroy them that speak leasing:" that is, "thou wilt destroy all them that utter falsehood."

v. 7. The closing words are literally, "I will worship towards the temple of thy holiness in thy fear." Here the word "temple" must refer to the tabernacle, because the Temple proper was not yet built. It became customary for Hebrews absent from Jerusalem to prostrate themselves in the direction of that city, and such we may think was the case with David when he wrote this psalm.

v. 9, 10. These verses, as commonly read, contain an imprecation or prayer that evil may overtake the wicked. There are many other passages which belong to the same class, and they have provoked strong hostility to the claims of the authors to Divine inspiration. Many methods of removing the difficulty have been devised, and very

PSALM VI.

David was a weeping prophet as well as Jeremiah, and this psalm is one of his lamentations; either it was penned at a time, or at least calculated for a time, of great trouble, both outward and inward. Is any afflicted? is any sick? Let him sing this psalm. The method of the psalm is very observable, and what we shall often meet with. He begins with doleful complaints, but ends with joyful praises; like Hannah, who went to prayer with a sorrowful spirit, but when she had prayed went her way, and her countenance was no more sad. Three things the psalmist is here complaining of: I. Sickness of body. II. Trouble of mind, arising from the sense of sin, the meritorious cause of pain and sickness. III. The insults of his enemies upon occasion of both. Now here, 1. He pours out his complaint before God, deprecates his wrath, and begs earnestly for the return of his favour, ver. 1—7; 2. He assures himself of an answer of peace shortly, to his full satisfaction, ver. 8—10. This psalm is like the book of Job.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth upon Sheminith, A Psalm of David.

O LORD, rebuke me not in thine anger,
Neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure.
2 Have mercy upon me, O LORD; for I am weak:
O LORD, heal me; for my bones are vexed.
3 My soul is also sore vexed:
But thou, O LORD, how long?
4 Return, O LORD, deliver my soul:
Oh save me for thy mercies' sake.
5 For in death there is no remembrance of thee:
In the grave who shall give thee thanks?
6 I am weary with my groaning;
All the night make I my bed to swim;
I water my couch with my tears.

MODERN EASTERN COUCH AND BED.

7 Mine eye is consumed because of grief;
It waxeth old because of all mine enemies.

These verses speak the language of a heart truly humbled under humbling providences, of a broken and contrite spirit under great afflictions, sent on purpose to awaken conscience, and mortify corruption. Those heap up wrath who cry not when God binds them; but those are getting ready for mercy who, under God's rebukes, sow in tears, as David doth here. Let us observe here,

First. The representation he makes to God of his grievances. He pours out his complaint before him. Whither else should a child go with his complaints but to his father? 1. He complains of bodily pain and sickness; ver. 2, "My bones are vexed;" his bones and his flesh, like Job's were touched. Though David was a king, yet sick and pained; his imperial crown would not keep his head from aching. Great men are men, and subject to the common calamities of human life. Though David was a stout man, a man of war from his youth, yet that will not secure him from distempers, which will soon make even the strong men to bow themselves. Though David was a good man, yet neither will his goodness keep him in health; "Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick." Let this help to reconcile us to pain and sickness, that it has been the lot of some of the best saints, and that we are directed and encouraged by their example to shew before God our trouble in that case, who is for the body, and takes cognizance of its ailments. 2. He complains of inward trouble; "My soul is also sore vexed," and that is much more grievous than the vexation of the bones; "The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity," if that be in good plight, but if that be wounded the grievance is intolerable. David's sickness brought his sin to his remembrance, and he looked upon it as a token of God's displeasure against him; and that was the vexation of his soul that made him cry, I am weak, heal me. It is a sad thing for a man at the same time to have his bones vexed and his soul vexed too. But this has been sometimes the lot of God's own people; nay, and this completed his complicated trouble, it was continued upon him a great while, which is here intimated in that expostulation, ver. 3, "Thou, O Lord, how long?" To the living God we must at such a time apply ourselves, who is the only physician, both of body and mind, and not to the Assyrians, not to the god of Ekron.

Secondly. The impression which his troubles made upon him. They lay very heavy. He groaned till he was weary, wept till he made his bed to swim, and watered his couch, ver. 6. Wept till he had almost wept his eyes out; ver. 7, "Mine eye is consumed because of grief." David had more courage and consideration than to mourn thus for any outward affliction. But sin sat heavy upon his conscience, and he was made to possess his iniquities,—when his soul was wounded with the sense of God's wrath, and his withdrawings from him,—then he takes on thus, and mourns in secret, and even his soul refuseth to be comforted. This not only kept his eyes waking, but kept his eyes weeping. Note, 1. It has often been the lot of the best men to be men of sorrows; our Lord Jesus himself was so. Our way lies through a vale of tears, and we must accommodate ourselves to the temper of the climate. 2. It well becomes the greatest spirits to be tender, and to relent under the tokens of God's displeasure. David, that could face Goliath himself, and many another threatening enemy, with an undaunted bravery, yet melts into tears at the remembrance of sin, and under the apprehensions of Divine wrath; and it is no diminution at all to his character. 3. True penitents weep in their retirements. The Pharisees disguised their faces, that they might appear unto men to mourn, but David mourns in the night upon his bed, where he lay communing with his own heart, and no eye was a witness to his grief but His that is all eye. Peter went out, covered his face, and wept. 4. Sorrow for sin ought to be great sorrow; so David's was; he wept so bitterly, so abundantly, that he watered his couch. 5. The triumphs of wicked men in the sorrows of the saints add very much to their grief. David's eye waxed old because of his enemies, who rejoiced in his afflictions, and put ill constructions upon his tears. In this great sorrow David was a type of Christ, who often wept, and who cried out, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful;" Heb. v. 7.

Thirdly. The petitions which he offers up to God in this sorrowful and distressed state. 1. That which he dreads as the greatest evil is the anger of God. This was the wormwood and the gall in the affliction and the misery; it was the infusion of this that made it indeed a bitter cup; and therefore he prays, ver. 1, "O Lord, rebuke me not in thine anger," though I have deserved it, "neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure." He doth not pray, Lord, rebuke me not, Lord, chasten me not; for as many as God loves he rebukes and chastens, "as a father the son in whom he delighteth." He can bear the rebuke and chastening well enough if God at the same time lift up the light of his countenance upon him, and by his Spirit make him to hear the joy and gladness of his lovingkindness; the affection of his body will be tolerable, if he have but comfort in soul. No matter, though sickness make his bones ache, if God's wrath do not make his heart ache; therefore his prayer is, "Lord, rebuke me not in thy wrath;" let me not lie under the impressions of that, for that will sink me. Herein David was a type of Christ, whose sorest complaint in his sufferings was of the trouble of his soul, and of the suspension of his Father's smiles. He never so much as whispered a complaint of the rage of his enemies,—Why do they crucify me? or the unkindness of his friends,—Why do they desert me? but he cried with a loud voice, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Let us thus deprecate the wrath of God more than any outward trouble whatsoever, and always take heed of treasuring up wrath against a day of affliction. 2. That which he desires as the greatest good, and which would be to him the restoration of all good, is the favour and grace of God. He prays, 1st. That God would pity him, and look upon him with compassion. He thinks himself very miserable, and misery is the proper object of mercy; and therefore he prays, "Have mercy upon me, O Lord;" in wrath remember mercy, and deal not with me in strict justice. 2nd. That God would pardon his sins; for that is the proper act of mercy, and is often chiefly intended in that petition, Have mercy upon me. 3rd. That God would put forth his power for his relief; "Lord, heal me," ver. 2; "Save me," ver. 4; speak the word, and I shall be whole, and all will be well. 4th. That he would be at peace with him; Return, O Lord, receive me into thy favour again, and be reconciled to me. Thou hast seemed to depart from me, and neglect me; nay, to set thyself at a distance, as one angry; but now, Lord, return, and shew thyself nigh to me. 5th. That he would especially preserve the inward man, and the interests of that, whatever becomes of the body; "O Lord, deliver my soul" from sinning, from sinking, from perishing for ever. It is an unspeakable privilege that we have a God to go to in our afflictions; and it is our duty to go to him, and thus to wrestle with him, and we shall not seek in vain.

Fourthly. The pleas with which he enforceth his petitions: not to move God, he knows our cause, and the true merits of it, better than we can state it; but to move himself. 1. He pleads his own misery, and that his misery had continued long. "I am weak," I am troubled, sore troubled; O Lord, how long shall I be so? 2. He pleads God's mercy, and from thence we take some of our best encourgements in prayer. "Save me, for thy mercy's sake." 3. He pleads God's glory, ver. 5, "For in death there is no remembrance of thee." Lord, if thou deliver me and comfort me, I will not only give thee thanks for my deliverance, and stir up others to join with me in these thanksgivings, but I will spend the new life thou shalt intrust me with in thy service, to thy glory, and all the remainder of my days preserve a grateful remembrance of thy favours to me, and be quickened thereby in all instances of service to thee; but if I die I shall be cut short of that opportunity of honouring thee, and doing good to others; for "in the grave, who will give thee thanks?" Not but that separate souls live and act, and the souls of the faithful joyfully remember God, and give thanks to him; but, 1st. In the second death (which perhaps David, being now troubled in soul under the wrath of God, had some dreadful apprehensions of) there is no pleasing remembrance of God; devils and damned spirits blaspheme him, and do not praise him. Lord, let me not lie always under this wrath, for that is Sheol, it is hell itself, and lays me under an everlasting disability to praise thee. They that sincerely seek God's glory, and desire and delight to praise him, may pray in faith, Lord, send me not to that dreadful place, where there is no devout remembrance of thee, nor any thanks given to thee. 2nd. Even the death of the body puts an end to our opportunity and capacity of glorifying God in this world, and serving the interests of his kingdom among men, by opposing the powers of darkness, and bringing many on this earth to know God, and devote themselves to him. Some have maintained, that the joys of saints in heaven are more desirable, infinitely more so, than the comforts of saints on earth; yet the services of saints on earth, especially such eminent ones as David was, are more laudable, and redound more to the glory of the Divine grace, than the services of saints in heaven, who are not employed in maintaining the war against sin and Satan, nor in edifying the body of Christ. Courtiers in the royal presence are most happy, but soldiers in the field are more useful; and therefore we may with good reason pray, that if it be the will of God, and he has any farther work for us or our friends to do in this world, he will yet spare us or them to serve him. To depart and be with Christ is most happy for the saints themselves; but for them to abide in the flesh is more profitable for the church. And this David had an eye to when he pleaded this, "In the grave, who shall give thee thanks?" Ps. xxx. 9; lxxxviii. 10; cxv. 17; Isa. xxxviii. 18. And this Christ had an eye to when he said, "I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world."

We should sing these verses with a deep sense of the terrors of God's wrath, which we should therefore dread and deprecate above anything; and with thankfulness, if this be not our condition; and compassion to those who are thus afflicted. If we be thus troubled, let it comfort us, that our case is not without precedent; nor, if we humble ourselves, and pray as David did, shall it be long without redress.

naturally the first inquiries have been turned to the translations, which were executed by men of fiercer countenance than we are, and who were less familiar with the principles of linguistic science. The version we have in common use cannot be much modified. The word "destroy" is wrong, and must be substituted by "condemn," or "punish;" and, indeed, our translators seem to have felt so, for they put in the margin "make them guilty," and if they had said "pronounce them guilty" they would have been very near the truth. "Let them fall" may be translated "they shall fall," but the change is of doubtful value. The rest of the phraseology may stand, and it does appear that David prayed for the punishment of evil-doers and for the praise of them that did well. Nor was he wrong. There was no more harm in his praying God to punish his foes than there could have been in punishing them himself; and under the old dispensation this seems to have been a recognised right in rulers. Without supposing for a moment that a power to punish offences against

8 Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity;
For the LORD hath heard the voice of my weeping.
9 The LORD hath heard my supplication;
The LORD will receive my prayer.
10 Let all mine enemies be ashamed and sore vexed:
Let them return and be ashamed suddenly.

What a sudden change is here for the better! He that was groaning, and weeping, and giving up all for gone, ver. 6, 7, here looks and speaks very pleasant. Having made his requests known to God, and lodged his case with him, he is very confident the issue will be good, and his sorrow turned into joy.

First. He distinguisheth himself from the wicked and ungodly, and fortifies himself against their insults; ver. 8, "Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity." When he was in the depth of his distress, 1. He was afraid that God's wrath against him would give him his portion with the workers of iniquity; but now that cloud of melancholy was blown over, he is assured that his soul shall not be gathered with sinners, for they are not his people. He began to suspect himself to be one of them, because of the heavy pressures of God's wrath upon him; but now all his fears are silenced, he bids them depart, knowing that his lot is among the chosen. 2. The workers of iniquity had teazed him, and taunted him, and asked him, Where was his God? triumphing in his despondency and despair, but now he had wherewith to answer them that reproached him, for God was about to return in mercy to him, had now comforted his spirit, and would shortly complete his deliverance. 3. Perhaps they had tempted him to do as they did, to quit his religion, and betake himself for ease to the pleasures of sin. But now, "Depart from me;" I will never lend ear to your counsel; you would have had me to curse God and die, but I will bless him, and live. This good use we should make of God's mercies to us, we should thereby have our resolutions strengthened never to have anything more to do with sin and sinners. David was a king, and he takes this occasion to renew his purpose of using his power for the suppression of sin, and the reformation of manners, Ps. lxxv. 4; ci. 3. When God has done great things for us, that should put us upon studying what we shall do for him. Our Lord Jesus seems to borrow these words from the mouth of his father David, when, having all judgment committed to him, he shall say, "Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity," Lu. xiii. 27; and so teaches us to say so now, Ps. cxix. 115.

Secondly. He assures himself that God was, and would be, propitious to him, notwithstanding the present intimations of wrath which he was under. 1. He is confident of a gracious answer to this prayer which he is now making. While he is yet speaking, he is aware that God hears, as Isa. lxv. 24; Dan. ix. 20, and therefore speaks of it as a thing done, and repeats it with an air of triumph, "the Lord hath heard;" and again, "the Lord hath heard." By the workings of God's grace upon his heart, he knew his prayer was graciously accepted, and therefore did not doubt but it would in due time be effectually answered. His tears had a voice, a loud voice in the ears of the God of mercy; and "the Lord hath heard the voice of my weeping." Silent tears are not speechless ones. His prayers were cries to God; and "the Lord hath heard the voice of my supplications," has put his fiat to my petitions, and so it will appear shortly. 2. From thence he infers the like favourable audience of all his other prayers; he "has heard the voice of my supplication," and therefore he will receive my prayer; for he gives, and doth not upbraid with former grants.

Thirdly. He either prays for the conversion or predicts the destruction of his enemies and persecutors, ver. 10. 1. It may very well be taken as a prayer for their conversion. "Let them all be ashamed" of the opposition they have given me, and the censures they have passed upon me; let them be (as all true penitents are) vexed at themselves for their own folly; let them return to a better temper and disposition of mind, and let them be ashamed of what they have done against me, and take shame to themselves. 2. If they be not converted, it is a prediction of their confusion and ruin. They shall be ashamed, and sore vexed, so it may be read, and that justly; they rejoiced that David was vexed, ver. 2, 3, and therefore, as usually, it returns upon themselves; they also shall be sore vexed. They that will not give glory to God shall have their faces filled with everlasting shame.

In singing this, and praying over it, we must give glory to God, as a God ready to hear prayer, must own his goodness to us in hearing our prayers, and must encourage ourselves to wait upon him, and to trust in him in the greatest straits and difficulties.

PSALM VII.

It appears by the title that this psalm was penned upon a particular occasion, which was the malicious imputations that David was unjustly laid under by some of his enemies. Being thus wronged, I. He applies himself to God for favour, ver. 1, 2. II. He appeals to God concerning his innocency as to those things whereof he was accused, ver. 3—5. III. He prays to God to plead his cause, and judge for him against his persecutors, ver. 6—9. IV. He expresseth his confidence in God that he would do so, and would return the mischief upon the head of those that designed it against him, ver. 10—16. V. He promiseth to give God the glory of his deliverance, ver. 17. In this David was a type of Christ, who was himself, and still is in his members, thus injured, but will certainly be righted at last.

Shiggaion of David, which he sang unto the LORD, concerning the words of Cush the Benjamite.

O LORD my God, in thee do I put my trust:
Save me from all them that persecute me, and deliver
2 Lest he tear my soul like a lion, [me:
Rending it in pieces, while there is none to deliver.
3 O LORD my God, if I have done this;
If there be iniquity in my hands; [me;
4 If I have rewarded evil unto him that was at peace with (Yea, I have delivered him that without cause is mine enemy:)
5 Let the enemy persecute my soul, and take it;
Yea, let him tread down my life upon the earth,
And lay mine honour in the dust. Selah.
6 Arise, O LORD, in thine anger,
Lift up thyself because of the rage of mine enemies:
And awake for me to the judgment that thou hast commanded. [about:
7 So shall the congregation of the people compass thee
For their sakes therefore return thou on high.
8 The LORD shall judge the people:
Judge me, O LORD, according to my righteousness,
And according to mine integrity that is in me.
9 Oh let the wickedness of the wicked come to an end;
But establish the just:
For the righteous God trieth the hearts and reins.

Shiggaion is a song or psalm; the word is used so only here and Hab. iii. 1. A wandering song, so some; the matter and composure of the several parts being different, but artificially put together. A charming song, so others; very delightful. David not only penned it, but sang it himself in a devout religious manner unto the Lord, concerning the words or affairs of Cush the Benjamite; that is, of Saul himself, whose barbarous usage of David bespoke him rather a Cushite, or Ethiopian, than a trueborn Israelite. Or more likely it was some kinsman of Saul named Cush, who was an inveterate enemy to David, misrepresented him to Saul as a traitor, and (which needed not) exasperated Saul against him; one of those children of men, children of Belial indeed, whom David complains of, 1 Sam. xxvi. 19, that made mischief between him and Saul. David, thus basely abused, has recourse to the Lord. The injuries men do us should drive us to God, for to him we may commit our cause. Nay, he sings to the Lord; his spirit was not ruffled by it, nor cast down, but so composed and cheerful, that he was still in tune for sacred songs, and it did not occasion one jarring string of his harp. Thus let the injuries we receive from men, instead of provoking our passions, kindle and excite our devotions. In these verses,

First. He puts himself under God's protection, and flies to him for succour and shelter; ver. 1, "Lord, save me, and deliver me" from the power and malice of "all them that persecute me," that they may not have their will against me. He pleads, 1. His relation to God. Thou art my God, and therefore whither else should I go but to thee? Thou art my God, and therefore my shield, Gen. xv. 1; my God, and therefore I am one of thy servants who may expect to be protected. 2. His confidence in God. Lord, save me, for I depend upon thee; "in thee do I put my trust," and not in any arm of flesh. Men of honour will not fail those that repose a trust in them, especially if they themselves have encouraged them to do so; which is our case. 3. The rage and malice of his enemies, and the imminent danger he was in of being swallowed up by them. Lord, save me or I am gone; he will tear my soul like a lion tearing his prey, with so much pride, and pleasure, and power; so easily, so cruelly. St. Paul compares Nero to a lion, 2 Tim. iv. 17, as David here compares Saul. 4. The failure of all other helpers. Lord, be thou pleased to deliver me; for otherwise there is none to deliver, ver. 2. It is the glory of God to help the helpless.

Secondly. He makes a solemn protestation of his innocency, as to those things whereof he was accused, and by a dreadful imprecation appeals to God, the searcher of hearts, concerning it, ver. 3—5. Observe, in general, 1. When we are falsely accused by men, it is a great comfort if our own consciences acquit us.

Hic murus aheneus esto
Nil conscire sibi.
'Be this thy brazen bulwark of defence,
Still to preserve thy conscious innocence.'

Not only, that they cannot prove their calumnies, Acts xxiv. 13, but that our hearts can disprove them to our own satisfaction. 2. God is the patron of wronged innocency. David had no court on earth to appeal to; his prince, that should have righted him, was his sworn enemy; but he had the court of heaven to fly to, and a righteous judge there, whom he could call his God. And here see,

1st. What the indictment is which he pleads not guilty to. He was charged with a traitorous design against Saul's crown and life, that he compassed and imagined to depose and murder him, and in order to that levied war against him. This he utterly denies. He never did this; there was no iniquity of this kind in his hand, ver. 3; he abhorred the thought of it. He never rewarded evil to Saul when he was at peace with him, nor to any other, ver. 4; nay, as some think it should be rendered, he never rendered evil for evil, never did them mischief that had injured him.

2nd. What evidence he produceth of his innocency. It is hard to prove a negative, and yet this was a negative which David could produce very good proof of; "I have delivered him that without cause is mine enemy." By this it appeared beyond contradiction, that David had no design against Saul's life, that once and again Providence so ordered it that Saul lay at his mercy, and there were those about him that would soon have dispatched him, but David generously and conscientiously prevented it, when he cut off his skirt, 1 Sam. xxiv. 4; and afterwards, when he took away his spear, 1 Sam. xxvi. 12, to be witnesses for him what he could have done. Saul himself owned both these to be undeniable proofs of David's integrity and good affection to him. If we render good for evil, and deny ourselves the gratifications of our passion, it may turn to us for a testimony more than we think of another day.

3. What doom he would submit to if he were guilty; ver. 5, "Let the enemy persecute my soul" to the death, and my good name when I am gone; let him "lay my honour in the dust." This intimates, 1st. That if he had been indeed injurious to others, he had reason to expect that they would repay him in the same coin. He that hath his hand against every man, must count upon it that every man's hand will be against him. 2nd. That in that case he could not with any confidence go to God, and beg of him to deliver him or plead his cause. It is a presumptuous, dangerous thing for any that are guilty, and suffer justly, to appeal to God, as if they were innocent and suffered wrongfully; such must humble themselves, and accept the punishment of their iniquity, and not expect that the righteous God will patronise their unrighteousness. 3rd. That he was abundantly satisfied in himself concerning his innocency. It is natural to us to wish well to ourselves, and therefore a curse to ourselves if we swear falsely has been thought as awful a form of swearing as any other. With such an oath or imprecation David here ratifies the protestation of his innocency, which yet will not justify us in doing the like for every light and trivial cause; for the occasion here was important.

Thirdly. Having this testimony of his conscience concerning his innocency, he humbly prays to God to appear for him against his persecutors, and breaks every petition with a proper plea, as one that knew how to order his cause before God.

1. He prays that God would manifest his wrath against his enemies, and religion is now vested in kings, we may surely recognise the judicial prerogatives of the supreme.

vi. Title. The words "To the chief musician on Neginoth upon Sheminith" may be rendered "To the chief performer with Neginoth, over the eighth." The meaning will be that this sacred ode is directed to the president or leader of the eighth company, who performed upon the Neginoth. At the head of Psalm xii. the band only is mentioned, and the music is omitted.

vi. 5. "The grave," as it is here called by our translators, is sheol in the Hebrew; that is, the under world, or state of the dead. The Douay translators misunderstand it of the place of punishment, "in hell," say they, "nothing but blasphemy."

vii. Title. "Shiggaion" is another technical term, which some have understood to denote the irregular form of the composition. According to others, it means that the psalm is of an anxious and doleful character. Another suggestion is that the word means a pleads their wrath against him. Lord, they are unjustly angry at me, be thou justly angry with them, and let them know that thou art so; ver. 6, "in thine anger, lift up thyself" to the seat of judgment, and make thy power and justice conspicuous, "because of the rage," the furies, the outrages (the word is plural) "of mine enemies." Those need not fear men's wrath against them who have God's wrath for them. "Who knows the power of his anger?"

2. He prays that God would plead his cause; "Awake for me to judgment," that is, let my cause have a hearing, "to the judgment which thou hast commanded;" that speaks, 1st. The Divine power. As he blesseth effectually, and is therefore said to command the blessing, so he judgeth effectually, and is therefore said to command the judgment, which is such as none can countermand, for it certainly carries execution along with it. 2nd. The Divine purpose and promise. It is the judgment which thou hast determined to pass upon all the enemies of thy people. "Thou hast commanded" the princes and judges of the earth to right the injured, and vindicate the oppressed; Lord, awaken thyself to that judgment. He that loves righteousness, and requires it in others, will no doubt execute it himself; though he seem to connive at wrong as one asleep, he will awake in due time, Ps. lxxviii. 65; and will make it to appear that the delays were no neglects. He prays, ver. 7, "Return thou on high;" maintain thine own authority, resume thy royal throne which they have despised the sovereignty of, and the judgment-seat which they have despised the sentence of. "Return on high," that is, visibly, and in the sight of all, that it may be universally acknowledged, that Heaven itself owns and pleads David's cause. Some make this to point at the resurrection and ascension of Jesus Christ, who, when he returned to heaven, (returned on high in his exalted state,) had all judgment committed to him. Or it may refer to his second coming, when he shall return on high to this world to execute judgment upon all. This return his injured people wait for, and pray for; and to it they appeal from the unjust censures of men. He prays again, ver. 8, Judge me, judge for me, give sentence on my side.

To enforce this suit, First. He pleads that his cause was now brought into the proper court, "The Lord shall judge the people," ver. 8. It is his place, it is his promise, "God is the Judge," therefore, Lord, judge me. He is the Judge of all the earth, and therefore no doubt he shall do right; and all will be obliged to acquiesce in his judgment. Secondly. He insists upon his integrity as to all the matters in variance between him and Saul; and desires no other but to be judged in this matter "according to his righteousness," and the sincerity of his heart in all the steps he had taken towards his preferment. Thirdly. He foretells that it would be much for the glory of God, and the edification and comfort of his people, if God would appear for him. "So shall the congregation of the people compass thee about;" therefore do it for their sakes, that they may attend thee with their praises and services in the courts of thine house. 1*st.* They will do it of their own accord. God's appearing on David's behalf, and fulfilling his promise to him, would be such an instance of his righteousness, goodness, and faithfulness, as would greatly enlarge the hearts of all his faithful worshippers, and fill their mouths with praise. David was the darling of his country, especially of all the good people in it; and therefore when they saw him in a fair way to the throne they would greatly rejoice, and give thanks to God. Crowds of them would attend his footstool with their praises for such a blessing to their land. 2*nd.* If David come into power, as God had promised him, he would take care to bring people to church by his influence upon them, and the ark should not be neglected as it had been in the days of Saul, 1 Chr. xiii. 3.

3. He prays in general for the conversion of sinners, and the establishment of saints; ver. 9, "O let the wickedness," not only of my wicked enemies, but "of" all "the wicked come to an end; but establish the just." Here are two things which we every one of us must desire, and may hope for: 1st. The period of sin, that it may be brought to an end in ourselves and others. When corruption is mortified, when every wicked way and thought is forsaken, and the stream which ran violently towards the world and the flesh is driven back and runs towards God and heaven, then the wickedness of the wicked comes to an end:—when there is a general reformation of manners, when atheists and profane are convinced and converted; when a stop is put to the spreading of the infection of sin, so that evil men proceed no farther, their folly being made manifest;—when the wicked designs of the church's enemies are baffled and their power broken, and the man of sin is destroyed, then "the wickedness of the wicked comes to an end." And this is that which all that love God and for his sake hate evil, desire and pray for. 2nd. The perpetuity of righteousness: "But establish the just." As we pray that bad may be made good, so we pray that the good may be made better; that they may not be seduced by the wiles of the wicked, nor shocked by their malice; that they may be confirmed in their choice of the ways of God, and in their resolution to persevere therein; may be firm to the interests of God and religion, and zealous in their endeavours to bring "the wickedness of the wicked to an end." His plea to enforce this petition is, for "the righteous God trieth the hearts and the reins;" and therefore the secret wickedness of the wicked he knows, and knows how to bring to an end; and the secret sincerity of the just he is witness to, and has secret ways of establishing.

As far as we have the testimony of an unbiassed conscience for us, that in any instance we are wronged and injuriously reflected on, we may, in singing these verses, lodge our appeal with the righteous God, and be assured that he will own our righteous cause, and will one day, in the last day at farthest, bring forth our integrity as the light.

10 My defence is of God,
Which saveth the upright in heart.
11 God judgeth the righteous,
And God is angry with the wicked every day.
12 If he turn not, he will whet his sword;
He hath bent his bow, and made it ready.
13 He hath also prepared for him the instruments of death;
He ordaineth his arrows against the persecutors.
14 Behold, he travaileth with iniquity,
And hath conceived mischief,
And brought forth falsehood.
15 He made a pit, and digged it,
And is fallen into the ditch which he made.
16 His mischief shall return upon his own head, [pate.
And his violent dealing shall come down upon his own
17 I will praise the LORD according to his righteousness:
And will sing praise to the name of the LORD most high.

David having lodged his appeal with God by prayer, and a solemn profession of his integrity in the former part of the psalm, in this latter part doth as it were take out judgment upon the appeal, by faith in the Word of God, and the assurance it gives of the happiness and safety of the righteous, and the certain destruction of wicked people, that continue impenitent.

First. David is confident he shall find God his powerful protector and saviour, and the patron of his oppressed innocency; ver. 10, "My defence is of God." Not only God is my defender, and I shall find him so, but I look for defence and safety in no other; my hope for shelter in a time of danger is placed in God alone: if I have defence, it must be of God. 'My shield is upon God,' so some read it; there is that in God which hath an assurance of protection to all that are his; his name is a strong tower, Pr. xviii. 10. Two things David builds this confidence upon: 1. The particular favour God has for all that are sincere; "He saveth the upright in heart," saves them with an everlasting salvation, and therefore will preserve them to his heavenly kingdom; saves them out of their present troubles as far as is good for them; their integrity and uprightness will preserve them. The upright in heart are safe, and ought to think themselves so, under the Divine protection. 2. The general respect he has for justice and equity; "God judgeth the righteous;" that is, he owns every righteous cause, and will maintain it in every righteous man, and will protect him. God is a righteous Judge, so some read it; who not only doth righteousness himself, but will take care that righteousness be done by the children of men, and will avenge and punish all unrighteousness.

Secondly. He is no less confident of the destruction of all his wicked persecutors, even as many of them as would not repent to give glory to God. He reads their doom here, for their good if possible, that they might cease their enmity; or, however, for his own comfort, that he might not be afraid of them, nor aggrieved at their prosperity and success for a time. He goes into the sanctuary of God, and there understands, 1. That they are children of wrath; they are not to be envied, for "God is angry" with them "is angry with the wicked every day." They are every day doing that which is provoking to him, and he resents it, and treasures it up against the day of wrath; as his mercies are new every morning towards his people, so his anger is new every morning against the wicked, upon the fresh occasions given for it by their renewed transgressions. God is angry with the wicked even in the merriest and most prosperous of their days, even in the days of their devotion. For if they be suffered to prosper, it is in wrath; if they pray, their very prayers are an abomination. The wrath of God abides upon them, Jno. iii. 36; and continual additions are made to it. 2. That they are children of death, as all the children of wrath are; sons of perdition marked out for ruin. See their destruction.

1. God will destroy them. The destruction they are reserved for is, "destruction from the Almighty," which ought to be a terror to every one of us, for it comes from the wrath of God, ver. 13, 14. It is here intimated, 1st. That the destruction may be prevented by the conversion of the sinner, for it is threatened on that condition, "if he turn not" from his evil way, if he do not let fall his enmity against the people of God, then let him expect it will be his ruin; but, if he turn, it is implied that his sin shall be pardoned, and all shall be well. Thus even the threatenings of wrath are introduced with a gracious implication of mercy, enough to justify God for ever in the destruction of them that perish; they might have turned and lived, but they chose rather to go on and die, and their blood is therefore upon their own heads. 2nd. That if it be not thus prevented by the conversion of the sinner, it will be prepared for him by the justice of God. In general, ver. 13, "He hath prepared for him the instruments of death," of all that death which is the wages of sin; if God will slay, he will not want instruments of death, for any creature, even the least and weakest, may be made so when he pleaseth. First. Here is variety of instruments, all which breathe threatenings and slaughter; here is a sword which wounds and kills at hand, a bow and arrows which wound and kill at a distance those who think to get out of the reach of God's vindictive justice. If the sinner flees from the iron weapon, yet the bow of steel shall strike him through, Job xx. 24. Secondly. These instruments of death are all said to be made ready, God has them not to seek, but always at hand; "Judgments are prepared for scorners; Tophet is prepared of old." Thirdly. While God is preparing his instruments of death, he gives the sinners timely warning of their danger, and space to repent and prevent it. He is slow to punish, and "longsuffering to usward, not willing that any should perish." Fourthly. The longer the destruction is delayed, to give time for repentance, the sorer will it be, and the heavier will it light and lie for ever, if that time be not so improved; while God is waiting the sword is in the whetting and the bow in the drawing. Fifthly. The destruction of impenitent sinners, though it come slowly, yet it comes surely; for it is ordained, they are of old ordained to it. Sixthly. Of all sinners, persecutors are set up as the fairest marks of Divine wrath; against them more than any other God has ordained his arrows. They set God at defiance, but cannot set themselves out of the reach of his judgments.

2. They will destroy themselves, ver. 14—16. The sinner is here described taking a great deal of pains to ruin himself, more pains to damn his soul than if directed aright would save it. 1st. It is described by the pains of a labouring woman that brings forth a false conception, ver. 14. The sinner's head with its politics conceives mischief, contrives it with a great deal of art, lays his plot deep, and keeps it close; the sinner's heart with its passions travails with iniquity, and is in pain to be delivered of the malicious projects it is hatching against the people of God. But what doth it come to when it comes to the birth? It is a falsehood, it is a cheat upon himself, it is a lie in his right hand; he cannot compass what he intended, nor, if he gain his point, will he gain the satisfaction he promised himself; he brings forth wind, Isa. xxvi. 18; stubble, Isa. xxxiii. 11; death, Jas. i. 15; that is, falsehood. 2nd. By the pains of a labouring man that works hard to dig a pit, and then falls into it, and perishes in it. First. This is true in a sense of all sinners, they prepare destruction for themselves by preparing themselves for destruction; loading themselves with guilt, and submitting themselves to their corruptions. Secondly. It is often remarkably true of those who contrive mischief against the people of God, or against their neighbours. By the righteous hand of God it is made to return upon their own heads; what they designed for the shame and destruction of others proves to be their own confusion.

———Nec lex est justior ulla, Quam necis artifices arte perire sua.——

—'There is not a juster law than that the author of a murderous contrivance shall perish by it.' Some apply it to Saul, who fell upon his sword.

In singing this, we must do as David here doth; ver. 17, "praise the Lord according to his righteousness;" that is, give him the glory of that gracious protection under which he takes his afflicted people, and the just vengeance with which he will pursue them that afflict them. Thus we must sing to the praise of the Lord most high, who when his enemies deal proudly, shews that he is above them.

hymn or poem. The truth is we have no certain knowledge of the sense of the word, but the last-named proposal is the best. Equally obscure is the reference to "the words of Cush the Benjamite." No such person is named in the Biblical history, and therefore we may suppose, 1, that it points to an unknown person; or, 2, that the real name has been substituted by another; or, 3, that the word Cush is a sort of nickname. The reading must be very ancient, as it is represented in the Greek version.

vii. 7. The full force of this verse is lost in our translation: a "congregation of nations shall surround thee," clearly pointing to the homage of other peoples than Israel. Those who limit it to the tribes of Israel forget that they are not called "nations" nor "peoples."

vii. 8. The Hebrew word for "people" here is not the same as in verse 7, but it is also plural, and is commonly used in that form of Gentile nations, who are to be understood here.

PSALM VIII.

This psalm is a solemn meditation on, and admiration of, the glory and greatness of God, which we are all concerned to think highly and honourably of. It begins and ends with the same acknowledgment of the transcendent excellency of God's name. It is proposed to be proved, ver. 1, "How excellent is thy name in all the earth." And then it is repeated, as proved (with a quod erat demonstrandum,—'that which was to be proved,') in the last verse. For the proof of God's glory, he gives instances of his goodness to man; for God's goodness is his glory. God is to be glorified, I. For making known himself and his great name to us, ver. 1. II. For making use of the weakest of the children of men, by them to serve his own purposes, ver. 2. III. For making even the heavenly bodies useful to man, ver. 3, 4. IV. For making him to have dominion over the creatures in this lower world, and thereby placing him but a little lower than the angels, ver. 5—8. This psalm is, in the New Testament, applied to Christ and the work of our redemption which he wrought out; the honour given by the children of men to him, (compare ver. 2 with Mat. xxi. 16,) and the honour put upon the children of men by him, both in his humiliation, when he was made a little lower than the angels, and in his exaltation, when he was crowned with glory and honour: compare ver. 5, 6, with Heb. ii. 6—8; 1 Cor. xv. 27. When we are observing the glory of God in the kingdom of nature and providence, we should be led by that, and through that, to the contemplation of his glory in the kingdom of grace.

To the chief Musician upon Gittith, A Psalm of David.

O LORD our Lord,
How excellent is thy name in all the earth!
Who hast set thy glory above the heavens.
2 Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings
Hast thou ordained strength
Because of thine enemies,
That thou mightest still the enemy and the avenger.

The psalmist here sets himself to give unto God the glory due unto his name. Dr. Hammond grounds a conjecture upon the title of this psalm concerning the occasion of penning it. It is said to be upon Gittith, which is generally taken for the tune, or musical instrument with which this psalm was to be sung; but he renders it, 'upon the Gittite,' that is, Goliath the Gittite, whom he vanquished and slew, 1 Sam. xvii., and then by him, who was in comparison but a babe and suckling, was that enemy stilled. The conjecture would be probable enough, but that we find two other psalms with the same title, Ps. lxxxi. and lxxxiv. Two things David here admires:

First. How plainly God displays his glory himself, ver. 1. He addresses himself to God with all humility and reverence as the Lord, and his people's Lord, "O Lord, our Lord." If we believe that God is the Lord, we must avouch and acknowledge him to be ours; he is ours, for he made us, protects us, and takes special care of us. He must be ours, for we are bound to obey him and submit to him; we must own the relation, not only when we come to pray to God, as a plea with him to shew us mercy, but when we come to praise him, as an argument with ourselves to give him glory. And we shall never think we can do that with affection enough, if we consider,

1. How bright God's glory shines even in this lower world; "How excellent is thy name in all the earth!" The works of creation and providence evince and proclaim to all the world that there is an Infinite Being, the fountain of all being, power, and perfection, the Sovereign Ruler, powerful Protector, and bountiful Benefactor of all the creatures. How great, how illustrious, how magnificent is this name in all the earth: the light of it shines in men's faces everywhere, Rom. i. 20; if they shut their eyes against it, that is their fault. There is no speech or language but the voice of God's name either is heard in it or may be. But this looks farther, to the Gospel of Christ, by which the name of God as it is notified by Divine revelation, which before was great in Israel only, came to be so in all the earth, the utmost ends of which have thus been made to see God's great salvation, Mar. xvi. 16.

2. How much brighter it shines in the upper world; Thou "hast set thy glory above the heavens." 1st. God is infinitely more glorious and excellent than the noblest creatures, and those that shine brightest. 2nd. Whereas we on this earth only hear God's excellent name, and praise that, the angels and blessed spirits above see his glory and praise that, and yet he is exalted far above even their blessing and praise. 3rd. In the exaltation of the Lord Jesus to the right hand of God, who is the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person, God set his glory above the heavens, far above all principalities and powers.

Secondly. How powerfully he discovers it by the weakest of his creatures; ver. 2, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength," or perfected praise, the praise of thy strength, Mat. xxi. 16. This speaks the glory of God,

1. In the kingdom of nature. The care God takes of little children when they first come into the world, the most helpless of all animals, the special protection they are under, and the provision nature has made for them, ought to be acknowledged by every one of us to the glory of God, as a great instance of his power and goodness, and the more sensibly, because we have all had the benefit of it, for to this we owe it that we died not from the womb, that the knees then prevented us, and the breasts that we should suck; this is such an instance of thy goodness as may for ever put to silence the enemies of thy glory, who say, "There is no God." 2. In the kingdom of providence. In the government of this lower world, he makes much use of the children of men, some that know him, and others that do not, Isa. xlv. 4, and these such as have been babes and sucklings; nay, sometimes he is pleased to serve his own purposes by the ministry of such as are still, in wisdom and strength, little better than babes and sucklings. 3. In the kingdom of grace, the kingdom of the Messiah. It is here foretold, that by the apostles, who were looked upon but as babes, unlearned and ignorant men, Acts iv. 13, mean and despicable, and by the foolishness of their preaching, the devil's kingdom should be thrown down, as Jericho's walls were by the sound of ram's horns. The Gospel is called the arm of the Lord, and the rod of his strength. This was ordained to work wonders, not out of the mouth of philosophers or orators, politicians or statesmen, but of a company of poor fishermen, who lay under the greatest external disadvantages that could be and a specimen was given of this in the children's crying, Hosanna to the Son of David, when the chief priests and the Pharisees owned him not, but despised and rejected him; to that therefore our Saviour applies this, Mat. xxi. 16, and by it stilled the enemy. Sometimes the grace of God appears wonderfully in young children, and he "teacheth them knowledge, and maketh them to understand doctrine, who are but newly weaned from the milk, and drawn from the breasts," Isa. xxviii. 9. Sometimes the power of God brings to pass great things in his church by very weak and unlikely instruments, and confounds the noble, wise, and mighty, by the base, and weak, and foolish things of the world, that no flesh might glory in his presence, but the excellency of the power may the more evidently appear to be of God, and not of man, 1 Cor. i. 27, 28. This he doth because of his enemies, because they are insolent and haughty, that he may still them, may put them to silence, and put them to shame, and so be justly avenged on the avengers: see Acts iv. 14; vi. 10. The devil is the great enemy and avenger; and by the preaching of the Gospel he was in a great measure stilled, his oracles were silenced, the advocates of his cause were confounded, and unclean spirits themselves not suffered to speak.

In singing this let us give God the glory of his great name, and the great things he has done by the power of his Gospel, in the chariot of which the exalted Redeemer rides forth, conquering and to conquer, and ought to be attended not only with our praises, but with our best wishes; praise is perfected, that is, God is in the highest degree glorified, when strength is ordained out of the mouth of babes and sucklings.

3 When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers,
The moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained;
4 What is man, that thou art mindful of him?
And the son of man, that thou visitest him?
5 For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels,
And hast crowned him with glory and honour.
6 Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands;
Thou hast put all things under his feet:
7 All sheep and oxen,
Yea, and the beasts of the field;
8 The fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea,
And whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas.
9 O LORD our Lord,
How excellent is thy name in all the earth!

David here goes on to magnify the honour of God, by recounting the honours he has put upon man; especially the man Christ Jesus. The condescensions of the Divine grace call for our praises as much as the elevations of the Divine glory; how God has condescended in favour to man, the psalmist here observes with wonder and thankfulness, and recommends it to our thoughts. See here,

First. What it is that leads him to admire the condescending favour of God to man. It is his consideration of the lustre and influence of the heavenly bodies, which are within the view of sense; ver. 3, "I consider thy heavens," and there particularly "the moon and the stars." But why doth he not take notice of the sun, which much excelleth them all? Probably because it was in a night walk by moonlight that he entertained and instructed himself with this meditation, when the sun was not within view, but only the moon and the stars; which, though they are not altogether so serviceable to man as the sun is, yet are no less demonstrations of the wisdom, power, and goodness of the Creator. Observe, 1. It is our duty to consider the heavens. We see them, we cannot but see them; by this, among other things, man is distinguished from the beast, that while they are so framed as to look downwards to the earth, man is made erect, to look upward towards heaven. Os homini sublime dedit cœlumque tueri jussit,—'To man he gave an erect countenance, and bade him look towards heaven,' that thus he may be directed to set his affections on things above; for what we see has not its due influence upon us unless we consider it. 2. We must always consider the heavens as God's heavens, not only as all the world is his, even the earth, and the fulness thereof, but in a more peculiar manner, "the heavens, even the heavens are the Lord's," Ps. cxv. 16; they are the place of the residence of his glory, and we are taught to call him, Our Father in heaven. 3. They are therefore his, because they are the work of his fingers; he made them, he made them easily. The stretching out of the heavens needed not any outstretched arm, it was done with a word, it was but the work of his fingers. He made them with very great curiosity and fineness, like a nice piece of work, which the artist makes with his fingers. 4. Even the lesser lights, the moon and stars, shew the glory and power of the Father of lights, and furnish us with matter for praise. 5. The heavenly bodies are not only the creatures of the Divine power, but subjects to the Divine government. God not only made them, but ordained them; and the ordinances of heaven can never be altered. But how doth this come in here to magnify God's favour to man? 1st. When we consider how the glory of God shines in the upper world, we may well wonder he should take cognizance of such a mean creature as man: that he who is resident in and president over that bright and blessed part of the creation, should humble himself to behold the things done upon this earth: see Ps. cxiii. 5, 6. 2nd. When we consider of what great use the heavens are to men on earth, and how the lights of heaven are divided unto all nations, Deu. iv. 19, Gen. i. 15, we may well say, "Lord, what is man," that thou shouldst settle the ordinances of heaven with an eye to him, and to his benefit, and that his comfort and convenience should be so much consulted in the making of the lights of heaven, and directing their motions!

Secondly. How he expresseth this admiration; ver. 4, "Lord, what is man," Enosh, sinful, weak, miserable man, a creature so forgetful of thee, and his duty to thee, "that thou art" thus "mindful of him," that thou takest cognizance of him, and of his actions and affairs, that in the making of the world thou hadst a respect to him? What is "the son of man, that thou visitest him?" Dost not only feed him and clothe him, protect him and provide for him, in common with other creatures, but visitest him, as one friend visits another, art pleased to converse with him, and concern thyself for him? What is man, so mean a creature, that he should be thus honoured; so sinful a creature, that he should be thus countenanced and favoured? Now this refers,

1. To mankind in general. Though "man is a worm, and the son of man is a worm," Job xxv. 6, yet God puts a respect upon him, and shews him abundance of kindness. Man is above all the creatures in this lower world the favourite and darling of Providence. For,

1st. He is of a very honourable rank of beings. We may be sure he takes place of all the inhabitants of this lower world, for he is made but "a little lower than the angels," ver. 5; lower indeed, because by his body he is allied to the earth, and to the beasts that perish; and yet by his soul, which is spiritual and immortal, he is so near akin to the holy angels, that he may be truly said to be but a little lower than they, and is in order next to them. He is but for a little while lower than the angels, while his great soul is cooped up in a house of clay; but the children of the resurrection shall be ἰσάγγελοι,—'angels' peers,' Lu. xx. 36, and no longer lower than they.

2nd. He is endued with noble faculties and capacities; "Thou hast crowned him with glory and honour." He that gave him his being has distinguished him, and qualified him for a dominion over the inferior creatures; for having "made vii. 11. For some reason our translators have added to this verse the words "with the wicked." The psalmist says, "God is angry every day," and the words inserted are needless. Dr. Benisch's version is very good: "God judgeth him that is righteous, and God is indignant every day." The Syriac is remarkable: "God is a judge of truth; he is not angry every day, but turneth." The Greek is, "God is a just judge, and strong, and long-suffering; does he exhibit his anger every day?" The Latin is similar. It may therefore be fairly doubted whether the reading of the present Hebrew text is right. If it must be followed, the fact of such important variations should be made known. The explanation is easy. The Hebrew word for "God," in the second clause, is El, but the same letters with another pointing mean "not." The ancient translators have been followed by Horsley, Good, and a few others.

viii. Title. "The chief musician upon Gittith" is a phrase which has been differently understood. By most expositors Gittith is him wiser than the beasts of the earth, and the fowls of heaven," Job xxxv. 11, he has made him fit to rule them, and it is fit they should be ruled by him. Man's reason is his crown of glory; let him not profane that crown by disturbing the use of it, nor forfeit that crown by acting contrary to its dictates.

3rd He is invested with a sovereign dominion over the inferior creatures, under God, and is constituted their lord. He that made them, and knows them, and whose own they are, has "made man to have dominion over them," ver. 6. His charter, by which he holds this royalty, bears equal date with his creation, Gen. i. 28, and was renewed after the flood, Gen. ix. 2. God has put all things under man's feet, that he might serve himself not only of the labour, but of the products and lives, of the inferior creatures; they are all delivered into his hand, nay, they are all put under his feet. He instanceth in some of the inferior animals, ver. 7, 8; not only sheep and oxen, which man takes care of and provides for, but the beasts of the field, as well as those of the flood; yea, and those creatures which are most at a distance from man, as the fowl of the air, yea, and the fish of the sea, which live in another element, and pass unseen through the paths of the seas. Man has arts to take these; though many of them are much stronger, and many of them much swifter than he, yet one way or other he is too hard for them; Jas. iii. 7, "Every kind of beasts and birds and things in the sea is tamed, and hath been tamed;" he has likewise liberty to use them as he has occasion; "Rise, Peter, kill and eat," Acts x. 13. Every dish of fish and fowl that comes to our table is an instance of this dominion man has over the works of God's hands, and it is a reason for our subjection to God our chief Lord, and to his dominion over us.

2. But this refers in a particular manner to Jesus Christ; of him we are taught to expound it Heb. ii. 6—8, where the apostle, to prove the sovereign dominion of Christ, both in heaven and in earth, shews that he is that man, that Son of man, here spoken of, whom God has crowned with glory and honour, and made to have dominion over the works of his hands. And it is certain that the greatest favour that ever was shewed to the human race, and the greatest honour that ever was put upon the human nature, was by the incarnation and exaltation of the Lord Jesus, far beyond the favours and honours done us by creation and providence; though those also are great and far more than we deserve. We have reason humbly to value ourselves by it, and thankfully to admire the grace of God in it.

1st. That Jesus Christ assumed the nature of man, and in that nature humbled himself. He became the Son of man, a partaker of flesh and blood; being so, God visited him; which some apply to his sufferings for us, for it is said, Heb. ii. 9, by "the suffering of death," a visitation in wrath, "he was crowned with glory and honour." God visited him, that is, having laid upon him the iniquity of us all, he reckoned with him for it, visited him with a rod, and with stripes, that we by them might be healed. He was for a little while (so the apostle interprets it) made lower than the angels, when he took upon him the form of a servant, and made himself of no reputation.

2nd. That in that nature he is exalted to be Lord of all; God the Father exalted him because he had humbled himself; crowned him with glory and honour, the glory which he had with him before the worlds were; set him at his own right hand; constituted him not only the head of the church, but head over all things to the church; and gave all things into his hand, intrusted him with the administration of the kingdom of providence in conjunction with, and subserviency to the kingdom of grace. All the creatures are put under his feet, and even in the days of his flesh he gave some specimens of his power over them, as when he commanded the winds and the seas, and appointed a fish to pay his tribute.

With good reason therefore doth the psalmist conclude as he began, "Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth!" which has been honoured with the presence of the Redeemer, and is still enlightened by his Gospel, and governed by his wisdom and power. And in singing this, and praying over it, though we must not forget to acknowledge with suitable affections God's common favours to mankind, particularly in the serviceableness of the inferior creatures to us, yet we must especially set ourselves to give glory to our Lord Jesus, by confessing that he is Lord, and submitting to him as our Lord, and waiting till we see all things put under him, and all his enemies made his footstool.

PSALM IX.

In this psalm, I. David praiseth God for pleading his cause, and giving him victory over his enemies, and the enemies of his country, ver. 1—6, and calls upon others to join with him in his songs of praise, ver. 11, 12. II. He prays to God that he might still have farther occasion to praise him, for his own deliverances, and the confusion of his enemies, ver. 13, 14, 19, 20. III. He triumphs in the assurance he had of God's judging the world, ver. 7, 8; protecting his oppressed people, ver. 9, 10, 18; and bringing his and their implacable enemies to ruin, ver. 15—17. And this is very applicable to the kingdom of the Messiah, the enemies of which have been in part destroyed already, and shall be yet more and more, till they all be made his footstool, which we are to assure ourselves of, that God may have the glory, and we may take the comfort.

To the chief Musician upon Muth-labben, A Psalm of David.

I WILL praise thee, O LORD, with my whole heart;
I will shew forth all thy marvellous works.
2 I will be glad and rejoice in thee:
I will sing praise to thy name, O thou most High.
3 When mine enemies are turned back,
They shall fall and perish at thy presence.
4 For thou hast maintained my right and my cause;
Thou satest in the throne judging right.
5 Thou hast rebuked the heathen,
Thou hast destroyed the wicked,
Thou hast put out their name for ever and ever.
6 O thou enemy, destructions are come to a perpetual end:
And thou hast destroyed cities;
Their memorial is perished with them.
7 But the LORD shall endure for ever:
He hath prepared his throne for judgment.
8 And he shall judge the world in righteousness,
He shall minister judgment to the people in uprightness.
9 The LORD also will be a refuge for the oppressed
A refuge in times of trouble.
10 And they that know thy name will put their trust in thee:
For thou, LORD, hast not forsaken them that seek thee.

The title of this psalm gives a very uncertain sound concerning the occasion of penning it. It is upon Muthlabben, which some make to refer to the death of Goliath, others to Nabal, others of Absalom, but I incline to think it signifies only some tune or musical instrument to which this psalm was intended to be sung; and that the enemies he is here triumphing in the defeat of are the Philistines, and other the neighbour nations that opposed his settlement in the throne, whom he contested with, and subdued in the beginning of his reign, 2 Sam. v. and viii. In these verses,

First. David excites and engages himself to praise God for his mercies, and the great things he had of late done for him and his government, ver. 1, 2. Note, 1. God expects suitable returns of praise from those for whom he has done marvellous works. 2. If we would praise God acceptably, we must praise him in sincerity with our hearts, and not only with our lips, and be lively and fervent in the duty, with our whole heart. 3. When we give thanks for some one particular mercy, we should take occasion from thence to remember former mercies, and so to "shew forth all his marvellous works." 4. Holy joy is the life of thankful praise, as thankful praise is the language of holy joy; "I will be glad and rejoice in thee." 5. Whatever occurs to make us glad, our joy must pass through it, and terminate in God only; "I will be glad and rejoice in thee," not in the gift so much as in the Giver. 6. Joy and praise are properly expressed by singing of psalms. 7. When God has shewed himself to be above the proud enemies of the church, we must take occasion from thence to give glory to him as the Most High. 8. The triumphs of the Redeemer ought to be the triumphs of the redeemed: see Rev. xii. 10; xix. 5; xv. 3, 4.

Secondly. He acknowledges the almighty power of God, as that which the strongest and stoutest of his enemies were no way able to contest with or stand before, ver. 3. But, 1. They are forced to turn back, their policy and their courage fail them, so that they cannot, they dare not, push forward in their enterprises, but retire with precipitation. 2. When once they turn back, they fall and perish, even their retreat will be their ruin, and they will save themselves no more by flying than by fighting. If Haman begin to fall before Mordecai he is a gone man, and shall prevail no more: see Est. vi. 13. 3. The presence of the Lord, and the glory of his power, is sufficient for the destruction of his and his people's enemies. That is easily done which a man doth with his very presence; with that God confounds his enemies, such a presence has he. This was fulfilled when our Lord Jesus with one word, "I am he," made his enemies to fall back at his presence, Jno. xviii. 6, and at the same time could have made them perish. 4. When the enemies of God's church are put to confusion, we must ascribe it to the power, not of instruments, but of his presence, and give him all the glory.

Thirdly. He gives to God the glory of his righteousness in his appearing on his behalf; ver. 4, "Thou hast maintained my right and my cause;" that is, my righteous cause, when that came on, "thou satest in the throne judging right." Observe, 1. God sits in the throne of judgment. To him it belongs to decide controversies, determine appeals, to right the injured, and to punish the injurious; for he hath said, "Vengeance is mine." 2. We are sure that the judgment of God is according to truth, and with him there is no unrighteousness. Far be it from God that he should pervert justice. If there seem to us to be some irregularity in the present decisions of Providence, yet those instead of shaking our belief of God's justice, may seem to strengthen our belief of the judgment to come, which will set all to rights. 3. Whoever disown and desert a just and injured cause, we may be sure that the righteous God will maintain it, and plead it with jealousy, and will never suffer it to be run down.

Fourthly. He records with joy the triumphs of the God of heaven over all the powers of hell, and attends those triumphs with his praises, ver. 5. By three steps the power and justice of God had proceeded against the heathen and wicked people that were enemies to the king God had lately set up upon his holy hill of Zion. 1. He had checked them; "Thou hast rebuked the heathen;" that is, hast given them real proofs of thy displeasure against them. This he did before he destroyed them, that they might have taken warning by the rebukes of Providence, and so have prevented their own destruction. 2. He had cut them off; "Thou hast destroyed the wicked." The wicked are marked for destruction, and some are made monuments of God's vindictive justice and destructive power in this world. 3. He had buried them in oblivion and perpetual infamy: had "put out their name for ever," that they should never be remembered with any respect.

Fifthly. He insults over the enemy whom God thus appears against; ver. 6, "Thou hast destroyed cities." Either, thou, O enemy, hast destroyed our cities, at least in intention and imagination; or, thou, O God, hast destroyed their cities by the desolation brought upon their country. It may be taken either way, for the psalmist will have the enemy to know, 1. That their destruction is just; and God was but reckoning with them for all the mischief which they had done and designed against his people. The malicious and vexatious neighbours of Israel, as the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and Syrians, had made incursions upon them when there was no king in Israel to fight their battles, had destroyed their cities, and done what they could to make their memorial perish with them; but now the wheel was turned upon them, their destructions of Israel were come to a perpetual end, they shall now cease to spoil, and must themselves be spoiled, Isa. xxxiii. 1. 2. That it is total and final; such a destruction as should make a perpetual end of them, so that the very memorial of their cities should perish with them. So devouring a thing is time. And much more such desolations do the righteous judgments of God make upon sinners, that great and populous cities have been reduced to such ruins, that their very memorial is perished, and those that have sought them could not find where they stood. But we look for a city that has stronger foundations than so.

Sixthly. He comforts himself and others in God, and pleaseth himself with the thoughts of him.

1. With the thoughts of his eternity. On this earth we see nothing durable, even strong cities are buried in rubbish, and forgotten, "but the Lord shall endure for ever," ver. 7. There is no change of his being; his felicity, power, and perfection, are out of the reach of all the combined forces of hell and earth; they may put an end to our liberties, our privileges, our lives, but our God is still the same, and sits even upon the floods, unshaken, undisturbed, Ps. xxix. 10; xciii. 2.

2. With the thoughts of his sovereignty both in government and judgment. He hath prepared his throne, has fixed it by his infinite wisdom, has fixed it by his immutable counsel. It is the great support and comfort of good people when the power of the church's enemies is threatening, and the posture of its affairs melancholy and perplexed, that God doth now rule the world, and will shortly judge the world.

taken as a musical instrument, so called, perhaps, because invented at Gath or at Gath Rimmon, or taking its name from its popular use at vintage festivals. According to another view, the word Gittith means a division of Temple officers from Gath Rimmon, and then the sense will be "to the leader who is over the Gathite band." Dr. Good renders this title, "To the supreme at winepress-tide," which is fanciful, as his translations often are.

IV. Title. According to analogy, this psalm should be addressed to the leader of performers upon some instrument, or from some place, or occupying some specified position. Dr. Benisch gives, "To the director of Muth-labben," which leaves us without help. Dr. Good says, "To the supreme: on the death-blow." Some apply the word "Muth-labben" to the death of Goliath. Fürst thinks it is the designation of a band of singers who were called "Muth-labben," in consequence of the sudden death of their conductor. It will be observed that the word muth means "death."

3. With the thoughts of his justice and righteousness in all the administrations of his government. He doth all every day, he will do all at the last day, according to the eternal, unalterable rules of equity; ver. 8, "He shall judge the world," all persons, and all controversies; "shall minister judgment to the people," shall determine their lot both in this and in the future state, "in righteousness and in uprightness," so that there shall not be the least colour of exception against it.

4. With the thoughts of that peculiar favour which God bears to his own people, and the special protection which he takes them under. The Lord that endures for ever is their everlasting strength and protection. He that judgeth the world will be sure to judge for them, when at any time they are injured or distressed, ver. 9. He "will be a refuge for the oppressed;" a high place, a strong place, "for the oppressed in times of trouble." It is the lot of God's people to be oppressed in this world, and to have troublous times appointed to them. Perhaps God may not presently appear for them as their deliverer and avenger, but in the midst of their distresses they may by faith fly to him as their refuge, and may depend upon his power and promise for their safety, so that no real hurt shall be done them.

5. With the thoughts of that sweet satisfaction and repose of mind which they have that make God their refuge; ver. 10, "They that know thy name will put their trust in thee," as I have done, for the grace of God is the same in all the saints, and then they will find, as I have found, that "thou dost not forsake them that seek thee," for the favour of God is the same towards all the saints. Note, 1st. The better God is known, the more he is trusted. Those who know him to be a God of infinite wisdom will trust him farther than they can see him, Job xxxv. 14; to be a God of almighty power, will trust him when creature confidences fail, and they have nothing else to trust to, 2 Chr. xx. 12; and to be a God of infinite grace and goodness, will trust him though he slay them, Job xiii. 15. Those that know him to be a God of inviolable truth and faithfulness will rejoice in his word of promise and rest upon that, though the performance be deferred, and intermediate providences seem to contradict it. Those that know him to be the Father of spirits, and an everlasting Father, will trust him with their souls as their main care; and trust in him at all times, even to the end. 2nd. The more God is trusted, the more he is sought unto. If we trust God, we will seek him by faithful and fervent prayer, and by a constant care to approve ourselves to him in the whole course of our conversation. 3rd. God never did nor ever will disown or desert any that duly seek to him and trust in him. Though he afflict them he doth not leave them, he doth not leave them comfortless; though he seem to forsake them for a while, yet he will gather them with everlasting mercies.

11 Sing praises to the LORD, which dwelleth in Zion:
Declare among the people his doings. [them:
12 When he maketh inquisition for blood, he remembereth
He forgetteth not the cry of the humble.
13 Have mercy upon me, O LORD;
Consider my trouble which I suffer of them that hate me,
Thou that liftest me up from the gates of death:
14 That I may shew forth all thy praise in the gates of the
I will rejoice in thy salvation. [daughter of Zion:
15 The heathen are sunk down in the pit that they made:
In the net which they hid is their own foot taken.
16 The LORD is known by the judgment which he executeth: [Higgaion. Selah.
The wicked is snared in the work of his own hands.
17 The wicked shall be turned into hell,
And all the nations that forget God.
18 For the needy shall not alway be forgotten:
The expectation of the poor shall not perish for ever.
19 Arise, O LORD; let not man prevail:
Let the heathen be judged in thy sight.
20 Put them in fear, O LORD: [Selah
That the nations may know themselves to be but men.

In these verses,

First. David, having praised God himself, calls upon and invites others to praise him likewise, ver. 11. Those who believe God is greatly to be praised not only desire to do that work better themselves, but desire that others also may join with them in it, and would gladly be instrumental to bring them to it. "Sing praises to the Lord which dwelleth in Zion." As the special residence of his glory is in heaven, so the special residence of his grace is in his church, of which Zion was a type. There he meets his people with his promises and graces, and there he expects they should meet him with their praises and services. In all our praises we should have an eye to God as dwelling in Zion, in a special manner present in the assemblies of his people, as their protector and patron. He resolved himself to shew forth God's marvellous works, ver. 2, and here he called upon others to "declare among the people his doings;" he commands his own subjects to do it, for the honour of God, of their country, and of their holy religion; he courts his neighbours to do it; to sing praises, not as hitherto to their false gods, but to Jehovah who dwelleth in Zion, to the God of Israel, and to own among the heathen that the Lord has done great things for his people Israel, Ps. cxxvi. 3, 4. Let them particularly take notice of the justice of God in avenging the blood of his people Israel on the Philistines, and other their wicked neighbours, who had in making war upon them used them barbarously and given them no quarter, ver. 12. When God comes to make inquisition for blood, by his judgments on earth, before he comes to do it by the judgment of the great day, he remembereth them, remembers every drop of the innocent blood which they have shed, and will return it sevenfold upon the head of the bloodthirsty. He will give them blood to drink, for they are worthy. This assurance he might well build upon that word, Deu. xxxii. 43, "He will avenge the blood of his servants." Note, There is a day coming when God will make inquisition for blood, when he will discover what has been shed secretly, and revenge what has been shed unjustly: see Isa. xxvi. 21; Jer. li. 35. In that day it will appear how precious the blood of God's people is to him, Ps. lxxii. 14, when it must all be accounted for. It will then appear that he has not forgotten the cry of the humble, nor the cry of their blood, nor the cry of their prayers, but both are sealed up among his treasures.

Secondly. David, having praised God for former mercies and deliverances, earnestly prays that God would still appear for him; for he sees not yet all things put under him. He prays, 1. That God would be compassionate to him; ver. 13, "Have mercy upon me," who having misery only, and not merit, to speak for me, must depend upon mere mercy for relief. 2. That he would be concerned for him. He is not particular in his requests, lest he should seem to prescribe to God, but refers himself to the wisdom and will of God in this modest request, "Lord, consider my trouble," and do for me as thou thinkest fit. He pleads, 1st. The malice of his enemies, the trouble which he suffered of them that hated him; and hatred is a cruel passion. 2nd. The experience he had had of Divine succours, and the expectation he now had of the continuance of them, as the necessity of his case required. O thou that liftest me up, that canst do it, that hast done it, that wilt do it, whose prerogative it is to lift up thy people from the gates of death. We are never brought so low, so near to death, but God can raise us up. If he has saved us from spiritual and eternal death, we may from thence take encouragement to hope that in all our distresses he will be a very present help to us. 3rd. His sincere purpose to praise God when his victories shall be completed, ver. 14. Lord, save me, not that I may have the comfort and credit of it, but that thou mayest have the glory, "That I may shew forth all thy praise;" and that publicly, "in the gates of the daughter of Zion." There God was said to dwell, ver. 11, and there David would attend him, with joy in God's salvation, typical of the great salvation which was to be wrought out by the Son of David.

Thirdly. David by faith foresees and foretells the certain ruin of all wicked people both in this world and in that to come.

1. In this world, ver. 15, 16. God executeth judgment upon them when the measure of their iniquities is full, and doth it so as, 1st. To put shame upon them, and make their fall inglorious, for they sink into the pit which they themselves digged, Ps. vii. 15; they are taken in the net which they themselves laid for the ensnaring of God's people, and they are snared in the work of their own hands. In all the struggles David had with the Philistines they were the aggressors, 2 Sam. v. 22. And other nations were subdued by those wars in which they embroiled themselves. And many times the overruling providence of God so orders it, that their persecutors and oppressors are brought to ruin by those very projects which they intended to be destructive to the people of God. Drunkards kill themselves; prodigals beggar themselves; the contentious bring mischief upon themselves; and thus men's sins may be read in their punishment, and it becomes visible to all, that the destruction of sinners is not only meritoriously but efficiently of themselves, which will fill them with the utmost confusion. 2nd. So as to get honour to himself. "The Lord is known;" that is, he makes himself known "by these judgments which he executeth." It is known there is a God who judgeth in the earth; that he is a righteous God, and one that hates sin, and will punish it. In these the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men; and therefore the psalmist adds here a note extraordinary, commanding special regard, Higgaion; it is a thing to be carefully observed and meditated upon. What we see of present judgments, and what we believe of the judgment to come, ought to be the subject of our frequent and serious meditations.

2. In the other world, ver. 17. "The wicked shall be turned into hell," as captives into the prison-house, even "all the nations that forget God." Note, 1. That forgetfulness of God is the cause of all the wickedness of the wicked. 2. There are nations of those that forget God, multitudes that live without God in the world, many great and mighty nations who never regard him, nor desire the knowledge of his ways. 3. Hell will at last be the portion of such, a state of everlasting misery and torment; Sheol, a pit of destruction, in which they and all their comforts will be for ever lost and buried. Though there be nations of them, yet they shall be turned into hell, like sheep into the slaughter-house, Ps. xlix. 14; and their being so numerous will neither be any security or ease to them, nor any loss to God, or the least impeachment of his goodness.

Fourthly. David encourageth the people of God to wait for his salvation, though it should be long deferred, ver. 18. The needy may think themselves, and others may think them, forgotten for a while, and their expectation of help from God may seem to have perished, and to have been for ever frustrated; but he that believeth doth not make haste, the vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak. We may build upon it as undoubtedly true, that God's people, God's elect, shall not always be forgotten, nor shall they be disappointed of their hopes from the promise. God will not only remember them at last, but will make it appear that he never did forget them. It is impossible he should, though a woman may forget her sucking child.

Fifthly. He concludes with prayer that God would humble the pride, break the power, and blast the projects of all the wicked enemies of his church; "Arise, O Lord," ver. 19, stir up thyself, exert thy power, take thy seat, and deal with all these proud and daring enemies of thy name, and cause, and people. 1. Lord, restrain them, and set bounds to their malice. "Let not man prevail;" consult thine own honour, and let not weak and mortal men prevail against the kingdom and interest of the almighty and immortal God. "Shall mortal man be too hard for God, too strong for his Maker?" 2. Lord, reckon with them, "Let the heathen be judged in thy sight;" that is, let them be plainly called to an account for all the dishonour done to thee, and the mischief done to thy people. Impenitent sinners will be punished in God's sight, and when their day of grace is over the bowels even of infinite mercy will not relent towards them, Rev. xiv. 10. 3. Lord, frighten them; ver. 20, "Put them in fear, O Lord." Or, strike a terror upon them, make them afraid with thy judgments. God knows how to make the strongest and stoutest of men to tremble, and to flee when none pursues; and thereby he makes them know that they are but men, and own it; they are but weak men, unable to stand before the holy God; sinful men, the guilt of whose consciences makes them subject to frights. Note, It is a very desirable thing, much for the glory of God, and the peace and welfare of the universe, that men should know and consider themselves to be but men; depending creatures; mutable, mortal, and accountable.

In singing this, we must give to God the glory of his justice in pleading his people's cause against his and their enemies, and encourage ourselves to wait for the year of the redeemed, and the year of recompences for the controversy of Zion, even the final destruction of all antichristian powers and factions, to which many of the ancients apply this psalm.

PSALM X.

The Septuagint translation joins this psalm with the 9th, and makes them but one; but the Hebrew makes it a distinct psalm, and the scope and style is different. In this psalm, 1. David complains of the wickedness of the wicked, and describes the mighty pitch of impiety to which they were arrived, to the great dishonour of God, and the prejudice of his church and people, and the delay of God's appearing against them, ver. 1—11. II. He prays to God to appear against them for the relief of his people, and comforts himself with hopes that he would do so in due time, ver. 12—18.

ix. 16. The word Higgaion is one of those technical terms which have become obscure, because we have lost the knowledge of the minuter features of the old Hebrew worship as practised by the synagogue. The etymology of "Higgaion" suggests that it means "meditation," but it can be that only by an extension of the meaning, as in such musical terms as "recitative." It has been thought to mean a low, dull, muffled style.

ix. 17. The words rendered "The wicked shall be turned into hell," &c., are among the strongest that can possibly be alleged to prove that sheol sometimes means the place of future punishment. A more literal rendering would be, "Wicked men shall be sent back to sheol; all the heathen nations that forget God." The Douay, after the Vulgate, has, "Let sinners be turned into hell; all nations that forget God." It is tolerably clear that whatever sheol might usually mean, it was indicative of a state in which the wicked might be worse off than in this life.

PSALM X.

WHY standest thou afar off, O LORD?
Why hidest thou thyself in times of trouble?
2 The wicked in his pride doth persecute the poor:
Let them be taken in the devices that they have imagined.
3 For the wicked boasteth of his heart's desire,
And blesseth the covetous, whom the LORD abhorreth.
4 The wicked, through the pride of his countenance, will God is not in all his thoughts. [not seek after God:
5 His ways are always grievous;
Thy judgments are far above out of his sight:
As for all his enemies, he puffeth at them.
6 He hath said in his heart, I shall not be moved:
For I shall never be in adversity.
7 His mouth is full of cursing and deceit and fraud:
Under his tongue is mischief and vanity.
8 He sitteth in the lurking places of the villages:
In the secret places doth he murder the innocent:
His eyes are privily set against the poor.
9 He lieth in wait secretly as a lion in his den:
He lieth in wait to catch the poor:
He doth catch the poor, when he draweth him into his net.
10 He croucheth, and humbleth himself,
That the poor may fall by his strong ones.
11 He hath said in his heart, God hath forgotten:
He hideth his face; he will never see it.

David in these verses discovers,

First. A very great affection to God and his favour; for in the time of trouble that which he complains of most feelingly is, God's withdrawing his gracious presence; ver. 1, "Why standest thou afar off," as one unconcerned in the indignities done to thy name, and the injuries done to thy people? Note, God's withdrawings are very grievous to his people at any time, but especially "in times of trouble." Outward deliverance is afar off, and is hidden from us, and then we think God is afar off, and we therefore want inward comfort; but that is our own fault, it is because we judge by outward appearance; we stand afar off from God by our unbelief, and then we complain that God stands afar off from us.

Secondly. A very great indignation against sin, the sins that made the times perilous, 2 Tim. iii. 1. He beholds the transgressors, and is grieved, is amazed, and brings to his heavenly Father their evil report; not in a way of vainglory, boasting before God that he was not as these publicans, Lu. xviii. 11, much less venting any personal resentments, piques, or passions of his own; but as one that laid to heart that which is offensive to God and all good men, and earnestly desired a reformation of manners. Passionate and satirical invectives against bad men do more hurt than good; if we will speak of their badness, let it be to God in prayer, for he alone can make them better. This long remonstrance of the wickedness of the wicked is here summed up in the first words of it; ver. 2, "The wicked in his pride doth persecute the poor," where two things are laid to their charge, pride and persecution; the former the cause of the latter. Proud men will have all about them to be of their mind, of their religion, to say as they say, to submit to their dominion, and acquiesce in their dictates; and those that either eclipse them or will not yield to them, they malign, and are inveterate in their hatred of them. Tyranny both in state and church owes its original to pride. The psalmist, having begun this description, presently inserts a short prayer, a prayer in a parenthesis, which is an advantage, and no prejudice to the sense; "Let them be taken," as proud people often are "in the devices that they have imagined," ver. 2. Let their counsel be turned headlong, and let them fall headlong by them. These two heads of the charge are here enlarged upon.

1. They are proud, very proud, and extremely conceited of themselves; justly, therefore, did he wonder that God did not speedily appear against them, for he hates pride, and resists the proud.

1st. The sinner proudly glories in his power and success. He boasteth of his heart's desire, brags that he can do what he pleaseth, as if God himself could not control him; and that he hath all he wished for, and has carried his point. Ephraim said, "I am become rich, I have found me out substance," Hos. xii. 8. Now, Lord, is it for thy glory to suffer a sinful man thus to pretend to the sovereignty and felicity of a god?

2nd. He proudly contradicts the judgment of God, which we are sure is according to truth; for he "blesseth the covetous, whom the Lord abhors." See how God and men differ in their sentiments of persons. God abhors covetous worldlings, who make money their god, and idolize it; he looks upon them as his enemies, and will have no communion with them; "the friendship of the world is enmity to God." But proud persecutors bless them, and approve their saying, Ps. xlix. 13; they applaud them as wise whom God pronounceth foolish, Lu. xii. 20; they justify them as innocent whom God condemns as deeply guilty before him; and they admire them as happy in having their portion in this life whom God declares upon that account truly miserable; "Thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things."

3rd. He proudly casts off the thoughts of God, and all dependence upon him, and devotion to him; ver. 4, "The wicked, through the pride of his countenance," that pride of his heart which appears in his very countenance, Pr. vi. 17, "will not seek after God," nor entertain the thoughts of him; "God is not in all his thoughts," that is, not in any of them. "All his thoughts are that there is no God." See here, First. The nature of impiety and irreligion. It is, not seeking after God, and not having him in our thoughts. No inquiry after him, Job xxxv. 10; Jer. ii. 6; no desire towards him, no communion with him, and a secret wish to have no dependence upon him, and not to be beholden to him. Wicked people will not seek after God, that is, not call upon him; they live without prayer, and that is living without God. They have many thoughts, many projects and devices, but no eye to God in any of them, no submission to his will, nor aim at his glory. Secondly. The cause of this impiety and irreligion, and that is pride. Men will not seek after God, because they think they have no need of him, their own hands are sufficient for them; they think it a thing below them to be religious, because religious people are few, and mean, and despised, and the restraints of religion will be a disparagement to them.

4th. He proudly makes light of God's commandments and judgments; ver. 5, "His ways are always grievous;" that is, he is very daring and resolute in his sinful courses; he will have his way, though never so tiresome to himself and vexatious to others; he travails with pain in his wicked courses, and yet his pride makes him wilful and obstinate in them. God's judgments, that is, what he commands, and what he threatens for the breach of his commands, are far above, out of his sight; he is not sensible of his duty by the law of God, nor of his danger by the wrath and curse of God. Tell him of God's authority over him, he turns it off with this, he never saw God, and therefore doth not know that there is a God; he is in the height of heaven, and quæ supra nos nihil ad nos,—'we have nothing to do with things above us.' Tell him of God's judgments which will be executed upon those that go on still in their trespasses, and he will not be convinced that there is any reality in them; they are far above, out of his sight, and therefore he thinks they are mere bugbears.

5th. He proudly despiseth all his enemies, and looks upon them with the utmost disdain. He puffs at them, whom God is preparing to be a scourge and ruin to him, as if he could baffle them all, and was able to make his part good with them. But as it is impolitic to despise an enemy, so it is impious to despise any instrument of God's wrath.

6th. He proudly sets trouble at defiance, and is confident of the continuance of his own prosperity: ver. 6, "He hath said in his heart," and pleased himself with the thought, "I shall not be moved," my goods are laid up for many years, and "I shall never be in adversity." Like Babylon, that said, "I shall be a lady for ever," Isa. xlvii. 7; Rev. xviii. 7. Those are nearest ruin who thus set it farthest from them.

2. They are persecutors, cruel persecutors. For the gratifying of their pride, covetousness, and in opposition to God and religion, they are very oppressive to all within their reach. Observe concerning these persecutors,

1st. That they are very bitter and malicious; ver. 7, "His mouth is full of cursing." Those he cannot do a real mischief to, yet he will spit his venom at, and breathe out the slaughter which he cannot execute. Thus have God's faithful worshippers been anathematized, and cursed with bell, book, and candle. Where there is a heart full of malice, there is commonly a mouth full of curses.

2nd. That they are very false and treacherous. There is mischief designed, but it is hid under the tongue not to be discerned, for the mouth is full of deceit and vanity; he has learned of the devil to deceive, and so to destroy; with this his hatred is covered, Pr. xxvi. 26. He cares not what lies he tells, nor what oaths he breaks, nor what arts of dissimulation he useth to compass his ends.

3rd. That they are very cunning and crafty in carrying on their designs. They have ways and means to concert what they intend, that they may the more effectually accomplish it. Like Esau, that cunning hunter, he sits in the lurking places, in the secret places, and his eyes are privily set to do mischief, ver. 8, not because he is ashamed of what he doth, (if he blushed, there were some hopes he would repent,) nor because he is afraid of the wrath of God, for he imagines God will never call him to an account, ver. 11, but because he is afraid lest the discovery of his designs should be the breaking of them. Perhaps it refers particularly to robbers and highwaymen, who lie in wait for honest travellers, to make a prey of them and what they have.

4th. That they are very cruel and barbarous. Their malice is against the innocent, that never provoked them; against the poor, that cannot resist them, and that it will be no glory to them to triumph over. Those are perfectly lost to all honesty and honour, against whose mischievous designs neither innocence nor poverty will be any man's security. Those that have power ought to protect the innocent, and provide for the poor; yet he will be the destroyer of those whose guardian he ought to be. And what do they aim at? It is to catch the poor, and draw them into their net, that is, get them into their power, not to strip them only, but to murder them; they hunt for the precious life. They are God's poor people that they are persecuting, against whom they bear a mortal hatred, for his sake whose they are, and whose image they bear, and therefore they lie in wait to murder them; "He lies in wait as a lion" that thirsts after blood, and feeds with pleasure upon the prey. The devil, whose agent he is, is compared to a roaring lion that seeks not what, but whom, he may devour.

5th. That they are base and hypocritical, ver. 10. He "croucheth and humbleth himself," as beasts of prey do, that they may get their prey within their reach. This intimates that the sordid spirits of persecutors and oppressors will stoop to any thing, though never so mean, for the compassing of their wicked designs. Witness the scandalous practices of Saul when he hunted David. It intimates likewise, that they cover their malicious designs with the pretence of meekness and humility, and a show of kindness to those they design the greatest mischief to; they seem to humble themselves, to take cognizance of the poor, and concern themselves in their concernments, when it is in order to make them fall, to make a prey of them.

6th. That they are very impious and atheistical, ver. 11. They could not thus break through all the laws of justice and goodness towards man, if they had not first shaken off all sense of religion, and risen up in rebellion against the light of its most sacred and self-evident principles. "He hath said in his heart, God has forgotten." When his own conscience rebuked him for his wickedness, and threatened him with the consequences of it, and asked how he would answer it to the righteous Judge of heaven and earth, he turned it off with this, "God has forsaken the earth," Eze. viii. 12; ix. 9. This is a blasphemous reproach, First. Upon God's omniscience and providence, as if he could not or did not see what men do in this lower world. Secondly. Upon his holiness and the rectitude of his nature, as if, though he did see, yet he did not dislike, but was willing to connive at the most unnatural and inhuman villanies. Thirdly. Upon his justice and the equity of his government, as if, though he did see and dislike the wickedness of the wicked, yet he would never reckon with them, nor punish them for it, either because he could not, or durst not, or was not inclined to it. Let those that suffer by proud oppressors hope that God will in due time appear for them; for those that are abusive to them are abusive to God Almighty too.

In singing this, and praying over it, we should have our hearts much affected with a holy indignation at the wickedness of the oppressors, a tender compassion of the miseries of the oppressed, and a pious zeal for the glory and honour of God, with a firm belief that he will in due time right the injured, and reckon with the injurious.

12 Arise, O LORD; O God, lift up thine hand:
Forget not the humble.
13 Wherefore doth the wicked contemn God?

x. 1. It will be noted that this psalm has no title. In the Greek it forms a continuation of Psa. ix. The Vulgate mentions the Hebrew arrangement, which we follow, but goes on counting Psa. xi. as x., Psa. xii. as xi., and so forth. The old, barbarous Douay version of verse 1 is, "Why, Lord, hast thou departed far off, despisest in opportunities, in tribulation?" What is now called the Douay reads, "Why, O Lord, hast thou retired afar off? why dost thou slight us in our wants, in the time of trouble?"

x. 8. "The lurking-places of the villages" are the retired rural spots in which the robber lurks; and the clause might be explained, "He lurks in ambush in country places."

x. 10. The "strong ones" of a lion are his weapons of attack in general, and the "strong ones" of a bandit are the forces or arms at his disposal. But our version is doubtful, and various alterations have been proposed; among which we prefer that which follows: "The unfortunate is cast down, is bowed down, and falleth under his

17 LORD, thou hast heard the desire of the humble:
Thou wilt prepare their heart,
Thou wilt cause thine ear to hear:
18 To judge the fatherless and the oppressed,
That the man of the earth may no more oppress.

David here, upon the foregoing remonstrance of the inhumanity and impiety of the oppressors, grounds an address to God; wherein observe,

First. What he prays for. 1. That God would himself appear; ver. 12, "Arise, O Lord; O God, lift up thine hand." Manifest thy presence and providence in the affairs of this lower world; "Arise, O Lord," to the confusion of those who say thou hidest thy face. Manifest thy power, exert it for maintaining of thine own cause, lift up thine hand to give a fatal blow to these oppressors; let thine everlasting arm be made bare. 2. That he would appear for his people. "Forget not the humble, the afflicted," that are poor, that are made poorer, and are poor in spirit. Their oppressors in their presumption say, Thou hast forgotten them; and they in their despair are ready to say the same. Lord, make it to appear that they are both mistaken. 3. That he would appear against their persecutors, ver. 15. 1st. That he would disable them to do any farther mischief; "Break thou the arm of the wicked;" that is, take away his power, "that the hypocrite reign not, lest the people be ensnared," Job xxxiv. 30. We read of oppressors whose "dominion was taken away, but their lives were prolonged," Dan. vii. 12, that they might have time to repent. 2nd. That he would deal with them for the mischief they had done. "Seek out his wickedness;" let it all be brought to light, which he thought should for ever lie undiscovered; let it all be brought to account, which he thought should for ever go unpunished; bring it out "till thou find none," that is, till none of his evil deeds remain unreckoned for, none of his evil designs remain undefeated, and none of his partisans undestroyed.

Secondly. What he pleads, for the encouraging of his own faith, in these petitions.

1. He pleads the great affronts which these proud oppressors put upon God himself. Lord, it is thine own cause we beg thou wouldest appear in; the enemies have made it so, and therefore it is not for thy glory to let them go unpunished; ver. 13, "Wherefore do the wicked contemn God?" He doth so; for he saith, "Thou wilt not require it;" that is, thou wilt never call them to an account for what they do; than which they could not put a greater indignity upon the righteous God. The psalmist here speaks with admiration, 1st. At the wickedness of the wicked. Why do they speak so impiously, why so absurdly? It is a great trouble to good men to think what contempt is cast upon the holy God by the sin of sinners, upon his precepts, his promises, his threatenings, his favours, his judgments; all are despised and made light of. "Wherefore do the wicked thus contemn God?" It is because they do not know him. 2nd. At the patience and forbearance of God towards them. Why are they suffered thus to contemn God? Why doth he not presently vindicate himself and take vengeance on them? It is because the day of reckoning is yet to come, when the measure of their iniquity is full.

2. He pleads the notice God took of the impiety and iniquity of these oppressors, ver. 14. Do the persecutors encourage themselves with a groundless fancy that thou will never see it? Let the persecuted encourage themselves with a well-grounded faith, not only that thou hast seen it, but that thou dost behold it; even all the mischief that is done by the hands, and all the spite and malice that lurks in the hearts of these oppressors. It is all known to thee, and observed by thee; nay, not only thou hast seen it, and dost behold it, but thou wilt requite it, wilt recompense it into their bosoms, by thy just and avenging hand.

3. He pleads the dependence which the oppressed had upon him. "The poor committeth himself unto thee;" each of them doth so, poor I for one. They rely on thee as their Patron and Protector, they refer themselves to thee as their Judge, in whose determination they acquiesce, and at whose disposal they are willing to be. 'They leave themselves with thee,' so some read it; not prescribing, but subscribing to thy wisdom and will. They thus give thee honour as much as their oppressors dishonour thee. They are thy willing subjects, and put themselves under thy protection, therefore protect them.

4. He pleads the relation in which God is pleased to stand to us. 1st. As a great God. "He is king for ever and ever," ver. 16; and it is the office of a king to administer justice for the restraint and terror of evil-doers, and the protection and praise of them that do well. To whom should the injured subject appeal but to the sovereign; "Help, my Lord, O king;" "Avenge me of mine adversary." Lord, let all that pay homage and tribute to thee as their king have the benefit of thy government, and find thee their refuge. Thou art an everlasting king, which no earthly prince is, and therefore canst and wilt by an eternal judgment dispense rewards and punishments in an everlasting state, when time shall be no more; and to that judgment the poor refer themselves. 2nd. As a good God. "He is the helper of the fatherless," ver. 14; that is, of those who have no one else to help them, and have many to injure them. He has appointed kings to defend the poor and fatherless, Ps. lxxxii. 3; and therefore much more will he do it himself; for he has taken it among the titles of his honour, to be a Father to the fatherless, Ps. lxviii. 5; a Helper of the helpless.

5. He pleads the experience which God's church and people had had of God's readiness to appear for them. 1st. He had dispersed and extirpated their enemies; ver. 16, "The heathen are perished out of his land;" that is, the remainders of the Canaanites, the seven devoted nations, which have long been as thorns in the eyes and goads in the sides of Israel, are now at length utterly rooted out; and that is an encouragement to us to hope that God will in like manner break the arm of the oppressive Israelites, that were in some respects worse than heathens. 2nd. He had heard and answered their prayers; ver. 17, "Lord, thou hast" many a time "heard the desire of the humble," and never saidst to a distressed supplicant, Seek in vain. Why may not we hope for the continuance and repetition of the wonders, the favours, which our fathers told us of?

6. He pleads their expectations from God pursuant to their experiences of him. "Thou hast heard," therefore "thou wilt cause thine ear to hear," as Ps. vi. 9. Thou art the same, and thy power, and promise, and relation to thy people the same; and the work and workings of grace are the same in them, and therefore why may we not hope that He who has been will still be, will ever be, a God hearing prayer? But observe, 1st. In what method God hears prayer. He first prepares the heart of his people, and then gives them an answer of peace; nor may we expect his gracious answer but in this way; so that God's working upon us is the best earnest of his working for us. He prepares the heart for prayer by kindling holy desires, and strengthening our most holy faith, fixing the thoughts, and raising the affections, and then he graciously accepts the prayer; he prepares the heart for the mercy itself that is wanting and prayed for, makes us fit to receive it and use it well, and then gives it in to us. "The preparation of the heart is from the Lord," and we must seek unto him for it, Pr. xvi. 1, and take that as a leading favour. 2nd. What he will do in answer to prayer, ver. 18. First. He will plead the cause of the persecuted; will judge the fatherless and oppressed, will judge for them, clear up their innocency, restore their comforts, and recompense them for all the loss and damage they have sustained. Secondly. He will put an end to the fury of the persecutors. Hitherto they shall come, but no farther; here shall the proud waves of their malice be stayed; an effectual course shall be taken "that the man of the earth may no more oppress." See how light the psalmist now makes of the power of that proud persecutor whom he had been describing in this psalm, and how slightly he speaks of him, now he had been considering God's sovereignty. 1*st.* He is but a man of the earth, 'a man out of the earth,' so the word is; sprung out of the earth, and therefore mean and weak, and hastening to the earth again. Why then should we be afraid of the fury of the oppressor, when he is but man that shall die, a son of man that shall be as grass? Isa. li. 12. He that protects us is the Lord of heaven; he that persecutes us is but a man of the earth. 2*nd.* God has him in a chain, and can easily restrain the remainder of his wrath, so that he cannot do what he would. When God speaks the word, Satan shall by his instruments no more deceive, Rev. xx. 3; no more oppress.

In singing these verses, we must commit religion's just, but injured cause, to God, as those that are heartily concerned for its honour and interests, believing that he will in due time plead it with jealousy.

PSALM XI.

In this psalm we have David's struggles with, and triumphs over, a strong temptation to distrust God, and betake himself to indirect means for his own safety in a time of danger. It is supposed to have been penned when he began to feel the resentments of Saul's envy, and had had the javelin thrown at him once and again. He was then advised to run his country. 'No,' saith he, 'I trust in God, and therefore will keep my ground.' Observe, I. How he represents the temptation, and perhaps parleys with it, ver. 1—3. II. How he answers it, and puts it to silence, with the consideration of God's dominion and providence, ver. 4; his favour to the righteous, and the wrath which the wicked are reserved for, ver. 5—7. In time of public fears, when the insults of the church's enemies are daring and threatening, it will be profitable to meditate on this psalm.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

IN the LORD put I my trust:
How say ye to my soul, Flee as a bird to your mountain?
2 For, lo, the wicked bend their bow,
They make ready their arrow upon the string,
That they may privily shoot at the upright in heart.
3 If the foundations be destroyed,
What can the righteous do?

Here is, First. David's fixed resolution to make God his confidence. "In the Lord put I my trust," ver. 1. Those that truly fear God and serve him, are welcome to put their trust in him, and shall not be made ashamed of their doing so. And it is the character of the saints that, having taken God for their God, they make him their hope. Even when they have other things to stay themselves upon, yet they do not, they dare not, stay upon them, but on God only. Gold is not their hope, nor horses and chariots their confidence, but God only. And, therefore, when second causes frown, yet their hopes do not fail them, because the First Cause is still the same, is ever so. The psalmist, before he gives an account of the temptation he was in to distrust God, records his resolution to trust in him, as that which he was resolved to live and die by.

Secondly. His resentment of a temptation to the contrary. "How say ye to my soul," which hath thus returned to God as its rest, and reposeth in him, "Flee as a bird to your mountain," to be safe there out of the reach of the fowler? This may be taken either,

1. As the serious advice of his timorous friends; so many understand it, and with great probability. Some that were hearty well-wishers to David, when they saw how much Saul was exasperated against him, and how maliciously he sought his life, pressed him by all means to flee for the same to some place of shelter, and not to depend too much upon the anointing he had received; which they thought was more likely to lose him his head than to save it him. That which grieved him in this motion was, not that to flee now would savour of cowardice, and ill become a soldier, but that it would savour of unbelief, and would ill become a saint, who had so often said, "In the Lord put I my trust." Taking it thus, the two following verses are the reason with which these faint-hearted friends of David backed this advice. They would have him flee, 1st. Because he could not be safe where he was, ver. 2. Look, say they, how the wicked bend their bow; Saul and his instruments aim at thy life, and the uprightness of thine heart will not be thy security. See what an enmity there is in the wicked against the upright, in the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman, what pains they take, what preparations they make to do them a mischief. They privily shoot at them, or in darkness, that they may not see the evil designed, to avoid it, nor others to prevent it; no, nor God himself to punish it. 2nd. Because he could be no longer useful where he was; for, say they, "If the foundations be destroyed," as they were by Saul's maladministration, if the civil state and government be unhinged, and all out of course, Ps. lxxv. 3, lxxxii. 5, what canst thou do with thy righteousness to redress the grievances? Alas, it is to no purpose to attempt the saving of a kingdom so wretchedly shattered; whatever the righteous can do signifies nothing. Abi in cellum, et dic miserere mei Domine,—'Away to thy cell, and there cry, Pity me, O Lord.' Many are thus hindered from doing the service they might do to the public in difficult times by a despair of success.

2. It may be taken as a taunt wherewith his enemies bantered him, upbraiding him with the professions he used to make of confidence in God, and scornfully bidding him try what stead that would stand him in now. You say, God forces." The Prayer-Book version, as often, is quite speculative. Ancient and modern interpreters have alike stumbled at the verse. The Syriac is, "He will be humbled and shall fall, and in his bones (will be) afflictions and pains."

x. 15. "Arm" here is the symbol of lawless power, and, therefore, the prayer is that God will shatter the forces of the wicked.

x. 18. "The man of the earth" is of ignoble origin. The Hebrew is "out of the earth," and reminds us of Gen. iii. 19. It should be remarked that Psalms ix. and x. are generally constructed on the principle of an acrostic; but the structure is not uniform, and is not complete. Whether the arrangement was ever practically or metrically perfect is unknown. The plan of the psalms requires twenty-two stanzas of four lines each; of these seventeen are complete, and the rest imperfect.

xi. 1. We have no means of ascertaining the occasion on which David wrote this psalm.

is your mountain; flee to him now, and see what the better you will be. Thus they endeavoured to shame the counsel of the poor, saying, There is no help for them in God, Ps. xiv. 6; iii. 2. The confidence and comfort which the saints have in God, when all the hopes and joys in the creature fail them, is a riddle to a carnal world, and is ridiculed accordingly.

Taking it thus, the two following verses are David's answer to this sarcasm; in which, 1. He complains of the malice of those who did thus abuse him; ver. 2, "They bend their bow, and make ready their arrows;" and we are told, Ps. lxiv. 3, what they are, "even bitter words," such words as these, by which they endeavour to discourage their hope in God, which David felt as a sword in his bones. 2. He resists the temptation with a gracious abhorrence, ver. 3. He looks upon this suggestion as striking at the foundations which every Israelite builds upon. If you destroy the foundations, if you take good people off from their hope in God, if you can persuade them that their religion is a cheat and a jest, and can banter them out of that, you ruin them, and break their hearts indeed, and make them of all men the most miserable. The principles of religion are the foundations on which the faith and hope of the righteous are built. These we are concerned, in interest as well as duty, to hold fast against all temptations to infidelity; for, if these be destroyed, if we let these go, "What can the righteous do?" Good people would be undone if they had not a God to go to, a God to trust to, and a future bliss to hope for.

4 The LORD is in his holy temple,
The LORD'S throne is in heaven:
His eyes behold, his eyelids try, the children of men.
5 The LORD trieth the righteous: [hateth.
But the wicked and him that loveth violence his soul
6 Upon the wicked he shall rain snares,
Fire and brimstone, and an horrible tempest:
This shall be the portion of their cup.
7 For the righteous LORD loveth righteousness;
His countenance doth behold the upright.

The shaking of a tree, they say, makes it take the deeper and faster root. The attempt of David's enemies to discourage his confidence in God engageth him to cleave so much the closer to his first principles, and to review them; which he here doth abundantly to his own satisfaction, and the silencing of all temptations to infidelity. That which was shocking to his faith, and has been so to the faith of many, was the prosperity of wicked people in their wicked ways; and the straits and distresses which the best men are sometimes reduced to; from hence such an evil thought as this was apt to arise, Surely it is vain to serve God; and we may call the proud happy. But, to stifle and shame all such thoughts, we are here called to consider,

First. That there is a God, a God in heaven. "The Lord is in his holy temple" above, where, though he is out of our sight, yet we are not out of his. Let not the enemies of the saints insult over them, as if they were at a loss, and at their wit's end. No; they have a God, and they know where to find him, and how to direct their prayer unto him as their Father in heaven. Or, he is in his holy temple; that is, in his church. He is a God in covenant and communion with his people, through a Mediator, of whom the temple was a type. We need not say, Who shall go up to heaven to fetch us from thence a God to trust to? No, the word is nigh us, and God in the word. His Spirit is in his saints, those living temples, and "the Lord is that Spirit."

Secondly. That this God governs the world. The Lord has not only his residence but his throne in heaven, and he has set the dominion thereof in the earth, Job xxxviii. 33; for, having "prepared his throne in the heavens, his kingdom ruleth over all," Ps. ciii. 19. Hence the heavens are said to rule, Dan. iv. 26. Let us by faith see God on his throne; on his throne of glory, infinitely transcending the splendour and majesty of earthly princes; on his throne of government, giving law, giving motion, and giving aim to all the creatures; on his throne of judgment, rendering to every man according to his works; and on his throne of grace, to which his people may come boldly for mercy and grace; and we shall see no reason to be discouraged by the pride and power of oppressors, or any of the afflictions that attend the righteous.

Thirdly. That this God perfectly knows every man's true character. "His eyes behold, his eyelids try, the children of men." He not only sees them, but he sees through them; not only knows all they say and do, but knows what they think, what they design, and how they really stand affected, whatever they pretend. We may know what men seem to be, but he knows what they are; as the refiner knows what the value of the gold is when he has tried it. God is said to try with his eyes and his eyelids, because he knows men, not as earthly princes know men, by report and representation, but by his own strict inspection, which cannot err or be imposed upon. This may comfort us when we are deceived in men, even in men that we think we have tried, that God's judgment of men we are sure is according to truth.

Fourthly. That if he afflict good people it is for their trial, and therefore it is for their good, ver. 5. The Lord tries all the children of men, that he may do them justice; but he tries the righteous, that he may do them good in their latter end, Deu. viii. 16. Let not that, therefore, shake our foundations, or discourage our hope and trust in God.

Fifthly. That however persecutors and oppressors may prosper and prevail a while, they now lie under, and will for ever perish under, the wrath of God.

1. He is a holy God, and therefore hates them, and cannot endure to look upon them; "the wicked, and him that loveth violence, his soul hateth," for nothing is more contrary to the rectitude and goodness of his nature. Their prosperity is so far from being an evidence of God's love, that their abuse of it doth certainly make them the objects of his hatred. He that hates nothing that he has made yet hates those who have thus ill made themselves. Dr. Hammond offers another reading of this verse: 'The Lord trieth the righteous and the wicked;' that is, distinguisheth infallibly between them, which is more than we can do; and 'he that loveth violence hateth his own soul;' that is, persecutors bring certain ruin upon themselves, Pr. viii. 36, as follows here.

2. He is a righteous Judge, and therefore he will punish them, ver. 6. Their punishment will be, 1st. Inevitable. "Upon the wicked he shall rain snares." Here is a double metaphor, to speak the unavoidableness of the punishment of wicked men. It shall be rained upon them from heaven, Job xx. 23; against which there is no fence, and from which there is no escape: see Jos. x. 11; 1 Sam. ii. 10. It shall surprise them as a sudden shower sometimes surpriseth the traveller in a summer's day. It shall be as snares upon them, to hold them fast, and keep them prisoners, till the day of reckoning comes. 2nd. Very terrible. It is "fire and brimstone, and an horrible tempest," which plainly alludes to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah; and very fitly, for that destruction was intended for a figure of "the vengeance of eternal fire," Jude 7. The fire of God's wrath, fastening upon the brimstone of their own guilt, will burn certainly and furiously, will burn to the lowest hell, and to the utmost line of eternity. What a horrible tempest are the wicked hurried away in at death! What a lake of fire and brimstone must they make their bed in for ever, in the congregation of the dead and damned! That is it that is here meant; that is it that shall be "the portion of their cup, the heritage appointed them by the Almighty," and allotted to them, Job xx. 29. This is the cup of trembling which shall be put into their hands, which they must drink the dregs of, Ps. lxxv. 8. Every man has the portion of his cup assigned him. They that choose the Lord for the portion of their cup shall have what they choose, and be for ever happy in their choice, Ps. xvi. 5. But they who reject his grace shall be made to drink the cup of his fury, Jer. xxv. 15; Isa. li. 17; Hab. ii. 16.

Sixthly. That though honest, good people may be run down and trampled upon, yet God doth and will own them, and favour them, and smile upon them; and that is the reason why God will severely reckon with persecutors and oppressors, because those whom they oppress and persecute are dear to him, so that whosoever toucheth them, "toucheth the apple of his eye," ver. 7. 1. He loves them, and the work of his own grace in them. He is himself a righteous God, and therefore loves righteousness wherever he finds it, and pleads the cause of the righteous that are injured and oppressed; he delights to execute judgment for them, Ps. ciii. 6. We must herein be followers of God, must love righteousness, as he doth, that we may keep ourselves always in his love. 2. He looks graciously upon them. "His countenance doth behold the upright;" that is, he is not only at peace with them, but well pleased in them, and he comforts them, and puts gladness into their hearts by letting them know that he is so. He, like a tender father, looks upon them with pleasure; and they, like dutiful children, are pleased and abundantly satisfied with his smiles. They walk in the light of the Lord.

In singing this psalm we must encourage and engage ourselves to trust in God at all times, must depend upon him to protect our innocency, and make us happy; must dread his frowns as worse than death, and desire his favour as better than life.

PSALM XII.

It is supposed that David penned this psalm in Saul's reign, when there was a general decay of honesty and piety both in court and country, which he here complains of to God, and very feelingly, for he himself suffered by the treachery of his false friends, and the insolence of his sworn enemies. I. He begs help of God, because there was none among men whom he durst trust, ver. 1, 2. II. He foretells the destruction of his proud and threatening enemies, ver. 3, 4. III. He assures himself and others, that, how ill soever things went now, ver. 8, God would preserve and secure to himself his own people, ver. 5, 7, and would certainly make good his promises to them, ver. 6. Whether the psalm was penned in Saul's reign or no, it is certainly calculated for a bad reign; and perhaps David in spirit foresaw that some of his successors would bring things to as ill a pass as is here described, and treasured up this psalm for the use of the church then. O tempora! O mores!—'Oh the times! Oh the manners!'

To the chief Musician upon Sheminith, A Psalm of David.

HELP, LORD; for the godly man ceaseth;
For the faithful fail from among the children of men.
2 They speak vanity every one with his neighbour;
With flattering lips and with a double heart do they 3 The LORD shall cut off all flattering lips, [speak.
And the tongue that speaketh proud things:
4 Who have said, With our tongue will we prevail;
Our lips are our own: who is lord over us?
5 For the oppression of the poor, for the sighing of the Now will I arise, saith the LORD; [needy,
I will set him in safety from him that puffeth at him.
6 The words of the LORD are pure words;
As silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times.
7 Thou shalt keep them, O LORD,
Thou shalt preserve them from this generation for ever.
8 The wicked walk on every side,
When the vilest men are exalted.

This psalm furnisheth us with good thoughts for bad times, in which, though the prudent will keep silent, Amos v. 13, because a man may be made an offender for a word, yet a man may comfort himself with such suitable meditations and prayers as are here got ready to our hand in such a day.

First. Let us see here what it is that makes the times bad, and when it may be said to be so. Ask the children of this world, What it is in their account that makes the times bad? and they will tell you, Scarcity of money, and decay of trade, and the desolations of war make the times bad; but the Scripture lays the badness of the times upon causes of another nature, 2 Tim. iii. 1, "Perilous times shall come," for iniquity shall abound, and that is the thing David here complains of.

1. When there is a general decay of piety and honesty among men, the times are then truly bad; ver. 1, when "the godly man ceaseth, and the faithful fail." Observe, How these two characters are here put together, the godly and the faithful. As there is no true policy, so there is no true piety, without honesty. Godly men are faithful men, fast men, so they have sometimes been called; their word is as confirming as their oath, as obliging as their bond; they make conscience of being true both to God and man. They are here said to cease and fail either by death or desertion, or both. Those that were godly and faithful are taken away, and those that are left are sadly degenerated, and are not what they were, so that there are few or no good people that are Israelites indeed to be met with. Perhaps he means that there were no godly, faithful men among Saul's courtiers; if he mean there were few or none in Israel, we hope he was under the same mistake that Elijah was, who thought he only was left alone, when God had seven thousand who kept their integrity, Rom. xi. 3; or, he means there were few in comparison, there was a general decay of religion and virtue, and the times are bad, very bad, when it is so; not a man to be found that executes judgment, Jer. v. 1.

2. When dissimulation and flattery have corrupted and debauched all conversation, then the times are very bad, ver. 2; when men are generally so profligate that they make no conscience of a lie, are so spiteful as to design against xi. 6. The word translated "snares" should rather be rendered "flames" or "burning coals." Instead of the expression, "an horrible tempest," "a burning wind" is rather to be understood. The figures in this verse are drawn from the more destructive phenomena of Nature, and intimate that wickedness will be severely punished.

xii. Title. In accordance with the remarks on the title of Psa. vi. we translate this, "To the leader"—or president—"over the eighth company."

xii. 1. For "help" we must render "save" or "deliver." The psalmist prayed for more than help. "The godly man," as elsewhere, is the pious and true servant of God. The idea is that such men were almost extinct, and were rapidly disappearing. It was a time of general defection and apostacy.

xii. 6. The rude methods for purifying silver rendered it necessary that it should frequently pass through the fire.

xiii. 2. There is some difference of opinion as to the proper render-their neighbours the worst of mischiefs, and yet so base as to cover the design with the most specious and plausible pretences, and professions of friendship. Thus "they speak vanity," that is, falsehood and a lie, "every one to his neighbour;" with flattering lips and a double heart they will kiss and kill, (as Joab did Abner and Amasa, in David's own time,) smile in your face and cut your throat. This is the devil's image complete, a complication of malice and falsehood. The times are bad indeed when there is no such thing as sincerity to be met with; when an honest man knows not who to believe, nor who to trust, nor dares put confidence in a friend, in a guide, Mic. vii. 5, 6; Jer. ix. 4, 5. Woe to those who help to make the times thus perilous!

3. When the enemies of God, and religion, and religious people, are impudent and daring, and threaten to run down all that is just and sacred, then the times are very bad; when proud sinners are arrived to such a pitch of impiety as to say, "With our tongues will we prevail" against the cause of virtue, "our lips are our own," and we may say what we will; "Who is lord over us?" either to restrain us, or to call us to an account, ver. 4. This speaks, 1st. A proud conceit of themselves, and confidence in themselves, as if the point were indeed gained by eating forbidden fruit, and they were as gods, independent and self-sufficient, infallible in their knowledge of good and evil, and therefore fit to be oracles; irresistible in their power, and therefore fit to be lawgivers, that could prevail with their tongues, and, like God himself, speak, and it is done. 2nd. An insolent contempt of God's dominion; as if he had no propriety in them,—their lips are their own; an unjust pretension, for who made man's mouth? In whose hand is his breath, and whose is the air he breathes in? And, as if he had no authority either to command them or judge them, "Who is lord over us?" like Pharaoh, Ex. v. 2. And this is as absurd and unreasonable as the former; for He in whom we live, and move, and have our being, must needs be, by an indisputable title, Lord over us.

4. When the poor and needy are oppressed, and abused, and puffed at, then the times are very bad. This is implied, ver. 5, where God himself takes notice of the oppression of the poor, and the sighing of the needy; they are oppressed because they are poor, have all manner of wrong done them purely because they are not in a capacity to right themselves. Being thus oppressed, they dare not speak for themselves, lest their defence should be made their offence; but they sigh, secretly bemoaning their calamities, and pouring out their souls in sighs before God. If their oppressors be spoken to on their behalf, they puff at them, make light of their own sin, and the misery of the poor, and lay neither to heart: see Ps. x. 5.

5. When wickedness abounds, and goes barefaced under the protection and countenance of those in authority, then the times are very bad, ver. 7. When the vilest men are exalted to places of trust and power, that, instead of putting the laws in execution against vice and injustice, and punishing the wicked according to their merits, patronize and protect them, give them countenance, and support their reputation by their own example, then the wicked walk on every side, they swarm in all places, and go up and down seeking to deceive, and debauch, and destroy others; they are neither afraid nor ashamed to discover themselves; they declare their sin as Sodom, and there is none to check or control them. Bad men are base men, the vilest of men, and they are so, though they are never so highly exalted in this world. Antiochus the illustrious the Scripture calls a vile person, Dan. xi. 21. But it is bad with a kingdom when such are preferred; then no marvel if wickedness grow impudent and insolent. "When the wicked bear rule, the people mourn."

Secondly. Let us now see what good thoughts we are here furnished with for such bad times; and what times we may yet be reserved for we cannot tell. When times are thus bad, it is comfortable to think,

1. That we have a God to go to, from whom we may ask and expect the redress of all our grievances. This he begins with, ver. 1, "Help, Lord, for the godly man ceaseth." All other helps and helpers fail; even the godly and faithful, who should lend a helping hand to support the dying cause of religion, they are gone, and therefore whither shall we seek but to thee? Note, When godly, faithful people cease and fail, it is time to cry, Help, Lord! The abounding of iniquity threatens a deluge. Help, Lord, help the virtuous; few seek to hold fast their integrity, and to stand in the gap; help to save thine own interest in the world from sinking. "It is time for thee, Lord, to work."

2. That God will certainly reckon with false and proud men, and will punish and restrain their insolence. They are above the control of men, and set them at defiance. Men cannot discover the falsehood of flatterers, nor humble the haughtiness of those that speak proud things; but the righteous God will cut off all flattering lips that give the traitor's kiss, and speak words softer than oil, when war is in the heart; he will pluck out that tongue that speaks proud things against God and religion, ver. 3. Some translate it as a prayer, 'May God cut off those false and spiteful lips:' "Let lying lips be put to silence."

3. That God will, in due time, work deliverance for his oppressed people, and shelter them from the malicious designs of their persecutors; ver. 5, "Now will I arise, saith the Lord." This promise of God, which David here delivers by the Spirit of prophecy, is an answer to that petition which he put up to God by the Spirit of prayer. Help, Lord, saith he. I will, saith God; here I am with seasonable help, and effectual help. 1st. It is seasonable, now, in the fittest time. First. When the oppressors are in the height of their pride and insolence, when they say, "Who is lord over us?" then is God's time to let them know to their cost, that he is above them. Secondly. When the oppressed are in the depth of their distress and despondency; when they are sighing like Israel in Egypt, by reason of the cruel bondage, then is God's time to appear for them; as for Israel, when they were most dejected, and Pharaoh was most elevated. "Now will I arise." Note, There is a time fixed for the rescue of oppressed innocency; that time will come, and we may be sure it is of all other the fittest time, Ps. cii. 13. 2nd. It is effectual. "I will set him in safety;" or, in salvation; not only protect him, but restore him to his former prosperity, will bring him out into a wealthy place, Ps. lxvi. 12. So that upon the whole matter he shall lose nothing by his sufferings.

4. That, though men are false, God is faithful; though they are not to be trusted, God is. They speak vanity and flattery; but "the words of the Lord are pure words," ver. 6; not only all true, but all pure, "like silver tried in a furnace of earth," or crucible. It notes, 1st. The sincerity of God's word. Every thing is really as it is there represented, and not otherwise; it doth not jest with us, nor impose upon us, nor has it any other design upon us but our own good. 2nd. The preciousness of God's word. It is of great intrinsic value, like silver refined to the highest degree; it has nothing in it to depreciate it. 3rd. The many proofs that have been given of its power and truth. It has been often tried; all the saints in all ages have trusted it, and so tried it, and it never deceived them or frustrated their expectation; but they have all set to their seal that God's word is true, with an experta crede,—'trust one that has made trial;' they have found it so. Probably this refers especially to these promises of succouring and relieving the poor and distressed. Their friends put them in hopes they will do something for them, and yet prove a broken reed. But the words of God are what we may rely upon; and, the less confidence is to be put in men's words, let us, with the more assurance, trust in God's word.

5. That God will secure his chosen remnant to himself, how bad soever the times are; ver. 7, "Thou shalt preserve them from this generation for ever." This intimates that as long as the world stands there will be a generation of proud and wicked men in it, more or less, who will be in danger by their wretched arts of ruining religion, by "wearing out the saints of the Most High," Dan. vii. 25. But let God alone to maintain his own interest, and t preserve his own people. He will keep them from this generation; that is 1st. From being debauched by them, and drawn away from God, from mingling with them, and learning their works. In times of general apostacy the Lord knows them that are his, and they shall be enabled to keep their integrity. 2nd. From being destroyed and rooted out by them. The church is built upor a rock, and so well fortified that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. In the worst of times God has his remnant, and in every age will reserve tc himself a holy seed, and preserve that to his heavenly kingdom.

In singing this psalm and praying over it, we must bewail the general corruption of manners; thank God that things are not worse than they are, but pray and hope that they will be better in God's due time.

PSALM XIII.

This psalm is the deserted soul's case and cure. Whether it was penned upon any particular occasion doth not appear, but in general, I. David sadly complains that God had long withdrawn from him, and delayed to relieve him, ver. 1, 2. II. He earnestly prays God to consider his case, and comfort him, ver. 3, 4. III. He assures himself of an answer of peace, and therefore concludes the psalm with joy and triumph, because he concludes his deliverance as good as wrought, ver. 5, 6.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

HOW long wilt thou forget me, O LORD?
For ever? how long wilt thou hide thy face from me?
2 How long shall I take counsel in my soul,
Having sorrow in my heart daily?
How long shall mine enemy be exalted over me?
3 Consider and hear me, O LORD my God:
Lighten mine eyes, lest I sleep the sleep of death;
4 Lest mine enemy say, I have prevailed against him;
And those that trouble me rejoice when I am moved.
5 But I have trusted in thy mercy;
My heart shall rejoice in thy salvation.
6 I will sing unto the LORD,
Because he hath dealt bountifully with me.

David, in affliction, is here pouring out his soul before God. His address is short, but the method is very observable, and of use for direction and encouragement.

First. His troubles extort complaints, ver. 1, 2; and the afflicted have liberty to pour out their complaint before the Lord, Ps. cii. title. It is some ease to a troubled spirit to give vent to its griefs, especially to give vent to them at the throne of grace, where we are sure to find one who is afflicted in the afflictions of his people, and is troubled with the feeling of their infirmities; thither we have boldness of access by faith, and there we have 'freedom of speech,' παρρησία. Observe here,

1. What it is that David complains of. Three things:

1st. God's unkindness; so he construed it, and it was his infirmity. He thought God had forgotten him, had forgotten his promises to him, his covenant with him, his former lovingkindness which he had shewed him, and which he took to be an earnest of farther mercy; had forgotten that there was such a man in the world who needed and expected relief and succour from him. Thus "Zion said, My God has forgotten me," Isa. xlix. 14; "Israel said, My way is hid from the Lord," Isa. xl. 27. Not that any good man can doubt the omniscience, and goodness, and faithfulness of God; but it is a peevish expression of prevailing fear, which yet, when it ariseth from a high esteem and earnest desire of God's favour, though it be indecent and culpable, shall be passed by and pardoned, for the second thought will retract it, and repent of it. God hid his face from him; that is, he wanted that inward comfort in God which he used to have, and herein was a type of Christ upon the cross crying out, "My God, why hast thou forsaken me?" God sometimes hides his face from his own children, and leaves them in the dark concerning their interest in him. And this they lay to heart more than any outward trouble whatsoever.

2nd. His own uneasiness. First. He was racked with care, that filled his head. "I take counsel in my soul;" that is, I am at a loss, and am inops consilii,—'have no friend to advise with,' that I can put any confidence in, and therefore am myself continually projecting what to do to help myself; but none of my projects are likely to take effect. So that I am at my wit's end, and in a continual toss. Anxious cares are heavy burthens with which, many times, good people load themselves more than they need. Secondly. He was overwhelmed with sorrow that filled his heart; "I have sorrow in my heart daily." He had a constant disposition to sorrow, and it preyed upon his spirits; not only in the night, when he was silent and solitary, but by day too, when lighter griefs are diverted and dissipated by conversation and business; nay, every day brought with it fresh occasions of grief. The clouds returned after the rain. The bread of sorrows is sometimes the saint's daily bread. Our Master himself was a man of sorrows.

3rd. His enemies' insolence, which added to his grief. Saul, his great enemy, and others under him, were exalted over him, triumphed in his distress, pleased themselves with his grief, and promised themselves a complete victory over him. This he complained of as reflecting dishonour upon God, and his power and promise.

2. How he expostulates with God hereupon. How long shall it be thus? And shall it be thus for ever? Long afflictions try our patience, and often tire it; and it is a common temptation when trouble lasts long to think it will last always; and despondency then turns into despair, and those that have long been without joy begin at last to be without hope. Lord, tell me how long thou wilt hide thy face, and assure me that it shall not be for ever, but that thou wilt return at length in mercy to me, and then I shall the easier bear my present troubles.

Secondly. His complaints stir up his prayers, ver. 3, 4. We should never allow ourselves to make any complaints but what are fit to be offered up to God, and what drive us to our knees. Observe here,

1. What his petitions are. Consider my case, hear my complaints, and ing of the former part of this verse. Dr. Mason Good translates it, "How long shall I hold consultations for my life, pining away daily at my heart?" We do not think much alteration is needful, and would thus express the sense: "How long shall I take counsel with myself? shall sorrow be daily in my heart?" The Syriac version, which has been followed as showing the true reading, is: "How long wilt thou put affliction in my soul, and sorrow in my heart every day?"

xiii. 3. The words translated "lest I sleep the sleep of death" express the sense, but might be more tersely rendered "lest I sleep in death." At the same time it is probably true that the verb "to sleep" involves the noun "sleep," which therefore need not be inserted. The whole phrase, "lighten mine eyes, lest I sleep in death," is a prayer for restoration. When death is approaching, the eyes grow dim, and the recovery of sight and the brightness of the eyes is the averting of the fatal symptoms.

lighten mine eyes; that is, 1st. Strengthen my faith; for faith is the eye of the soul, with which it sees above, and sees through the things of sense. Lord, enable me to look beyond my present troubles, and to foresee a happy issue of them. 2nd. Guide my way; enable me to look about me, that I may avoid the snares which are laid for me. 3rd. Refresh my soul with the joy of thy salvation. That which revives the drooping spirits is said to enlighten the eyes, 1 Sam. xiv. 27; Ezra ix. 8. Lord, scatter the cloud of melancholy which darkens my eyes, and let my countenance be made pleasant.

2. What his pleas are. He mentions his relation to God, and interest in him, "O Lord, my God," and insists upon the greatness of the peril, which called for speedy relief and succour. If his eyes were not lightened quickly, 1st. He concludes that he must perish. I shall sleep the sleep of death, I cannot live under the weight of all this care and grief. Nothing more killing to a soul than the want of God's favour; nothing more reviving than the return of it. 2nd. That then his enemies would triumph; Lest mine enemy say, So would I have it; lest Saul, lest Satan, be gratified in my fall. It would gratify the pride of his enemy; he will say, I have prevailed, I have gotten the day, and been too hard for him and his God. It would gratify the malice of his enemies; they will rejoice when I am moved. And will it be for God's honour to suffer them thus to trample upon all that is sacred both in heaven and earth?

Thirdly. His prayers are soon turned into praises, ver. 5, 6. But "my heart shall rejoice, and I will sing to the Lord." What a surprising change is here in a few lines; in the beginning of the psalm we have him drooping and trembling, and ready to sink into melancholy and despair; but in the close of it, rejoicing in God, and elevated and enlarged in his praises. See the power of faith, the power of prayer, and how good it is to draw near to God. If we bring our cares and griefs to the throne of grace, and leave them there, we may go away, like Hannah, and our countenance be no more sad, 1 Sam. i. 18. And here observe the method of his comfort.

1. God's mercy is the support of his faith. My case is bad enough, and I am ready to think it deplorable, till I consider the infinite goodness of God; and finding I have that to trust to I am well enough, though I have no merit of my own. In former distresses I have trusted in the mercy of God, and I never found that it failed me; his mercy has in due time relieved me, and my confidence in it has in the meantime supported me. Even in the depth of this distress, when God hid his face from me, when without were fightings and within were fears, yet I trusted in the mercy of God, and that was as an anchor in a storm, by the help of which, though I was tossed, I was not overset. And still I do trust in thy mercy; so some read it. I refer myself to that, with an assurance that will do well for me at last. This he pleads with God, knowing what pleasure he takes in those that hope in his mercy, Ps. cxlvii. 11.

2. His faith in God's mercy filled his heart with joy in his salvation; for joy and peace come by believing, Rom. xv. 13; "Believing ye rejoice," 1 Pet. i. 8. Having put his trust in the mercy of God, he is fully assured of salvation, and that his heart, which was now daily grieving, should rejoice in that salvation. Though weeping endure long, joy will return.

3. His joy in God's salvation would fill his mouth with songs of praise; ver. 6, "I will sing unto the Lord;" sing in remembrance of what he has done formerly. Though I should never recover the peace I have had, I will die blessing God that ever I had it. He has dealt bountifully with me formerly, and he shall have the glory of that, however he is pleased to deal with me now. I will sing in hope of what he will do for me at last; being confident that all will end well, will end everlastingly well. But he speaks of it as a thing past, "He has dealt bountifully with me," because by faith he had received the earnest of the salvation, and he was as confident of it as if it had been done already.

In singing this psalm, and praying over it, if we have not the same complaints to make that David had, we must thank God that we have not, dread and deprecate his withdrawing, pity and sympathize with those that are troubled in mind, and encourage ourselves in our most holy faith and joy.

PSALM XIV.

It doth not appear upon what occasion this psalm was penned, nor whether upon any particular occasion. Some say David penned it when Saul persecuted him; others, when Absalom rebelled against him; but they are mere conjectures, which have not certainty enough to warrant us to expound the psalm by them. The apostle in quoting part of this psalm, Rom. iii. 10, &c., to prove that Jews and Gentiles are all under sin, ver. 9, and all the world is guilty before God, ver. 19, leads us to understand it in general as a description of the pravity of the human nature, and the sinfulness of the sin we are conceived and born in, and the deplorable corruption of a great part of mankind, even of the world that lies in wickedness, 1 Jno. v. 19. But as in those psalms which are designed to discover our remedy in Christ, there is commonly an allusion to David himself, yea, and some passages that are to be understood primarily of him, as in Ps. ii., xvi., xxii., and others; so in this psalm, which is designed to discover our wound by sin, there is an allusion to David's enemies and persecutors, and other the oppressors of good men at that time, to whom some passages have an immediate reference. In all the psalms from the 3rd to this, (except the 8th,) David had been complaining of those that hated and persecuted him, insulted him and abused him; now here he runs up all those bitter streams to the fountain, the general corruption of nature, and sees they were not his enemies only, but all the children of men that were thus corrupted. Here is, I. A charge exhibited against a wicked world, ver. 1. II. The proof of the charge, ver. 2, 3. III. A serious expostulation with sinners, especially with persecutors, upon it, ver. 4—6. IV. A believing prayer for the salvation of Israel, and a joyful expectation of it, ver. 7.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

THE fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.
They are corrupt, they have done abominable works,
There is none that doeth good.
2 The LORD looked down from heaven
Upon the children of men,
To see if there were any that did understand,
And seek God.
3 They are all gone aside,
They are all together become filthy:
There is none that doeth good, no, not one

If we apply our hearts as Solomon did, Eccl. vii. 26, "to search out the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness," these verses will assist us in the search, and will shew us sin exceeding sinful. Sin is the disease of mankind, and it appears here to be malignant and epidemical.

First. See how malignant it is, ver. 1, in two things:

1. The contempt it puts upon the honour of God; for there is something of practical atheism at the bottom of all sin; "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God." We are sometimes tempted to think, Sure there never was so much atheism and profaneness as there is in our days, but we see the former days were no better; even in David's time there were such as had arrived to such a height of impiety as to deny the very being of a God, and the first and self evident principles of religion. Observe, 1st. The sinner here described. He is one that saith in his heart "There is no God:" he is an atheist. There is no Elohim, no judge or governor of the world, no Providence presiding over the affairs of men. They cannot doubt of the being of God, but will question his dominion. He saith this in his heart; it is not his judgment, but his imagination. He cannot think there is none, but he wisheth there were none, and pleaseth himself with the fancy that it is possible there may be none; he cannot be sure there is one, and therefore he is willing to think there is none. He dares not speak it out lest he be confuted, and so undeceived; but he whispers it secretly in his heart, for the silencing of the clamours of his conscience, and the emboldening of himself in his evil ways. 2nd. The character of this sinner. He is a fool, he is simple and unwise; and this is an evidence of it: he is wicked and profane; and this is the cause of it. Note, Atheistical thoughts are very foolish, wicked thoughts, and they are at the bottom of a great deal of the wickedness that is in this world. The Word of God is a discerner of these thoughts, and puts a just brand on him that harbours them, "Nabal is his name, and folly is with him;" for he thinks against the clearest light, against his own knowledge and convictions, and the common sentiments of all the wise and sober part of mankind. And there is no man will say, "There is no God," till he is so hardened in sin, that it is become his interest there should be none to call him to an account.

2. The disgrace and debasement it puts upon the nature of man. Sinners are corrupt, quite degenerated from what man was in his innocent estate. "They are become filthy," ver. 3, putrid and stinking. All their faculties are so disordered, that they are become odious to their Maker, and utterly incapable to answer the ends of their creation. Corrupt indeed; for, 1st. They do no good, but are the unprofitable burthens of the earth; they do God no service, bring him no honour, nor do themselves any real kindness. 2nd. They do a great deal of hurt; "they have done abominable works," for such all sinful works are. Sin is an abomination to God; it is that abominable thing which he hates, Jer. xliv. 4, and sooner or later it will be so to the sinner. It will be found to be hateful, Ps. xxxvi. 2; an abomination of desolation, that is, making desolate, Mat. xxiv. 15. This follows upon their saying, "There is no God;" for they that "profess they know God, but in works deny him, are abominable, and to every good work reprobate," Tit. i. 16.

Secondly. See how epidemical this disease is; it has infected the whole race of mankind. To prove this, God himself is here brought in for a witness, and he is an eyewitness, ver. 2, 3. Observe, 1. His inquiry. "The Lord looked down from heaven," a place of prospect which commands this lower world; from thence with an all-seeing eye, he took a view of all the children of men; and the question was, Whether there were any among them that did understand themselves aright, their duty and interests, and did seek God, and set him before them. He that made this search was not only One that could find out a good man if he was to be found, though never so obscure; but One that would be glad to find out one, and would be sure to take notice of him, as of Noah in the old world. 2. The result of this inquiry, ver. 3. Upon search, upon his search, it appeared, "They are all gone aside;" the apostacy is universal, "there is none that doeth good, no, not one." Till the free and mighty grace of God has wrought a change, whatever good is in any of the children of men, or is done by them, it is not of themselves, it is God's work in them. When God had made the world, he looked upon his own work, and all was very good, Gen. i. 31; but, some time after, he looked upon man's work, and behold, all was very bad, Gen. vi. 5; every operation of the thought of man's heart was evil, only evil, and that continually. They are gone aside from the right way of their duty, the way that leads to happiness, and are turned into the paths of the destroyer.

In singing this, let us lament the corruption of our own nature, and see what need we have of the grace of God; and, since that which is born of the flesh is flesh, let us not marvel that we are told we must be born again.

4 Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge?
Who eat up my people as they eat bread,
And call not upon the LORD.
5 There were they in great fear:
For God is in the generation of the righteous
6 Ye have shamed the counsel of the poor,
Because the LORD is his refuge.
7 Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion!
When the LORD bringeth back the captivity of his people,
Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad.

In these verses the psalmist endeavours,

First. To convince sinners of the evil and danger of the way they are in, how secure soever they are in that way. Three things he shews them, which, it may be, they are not very willing to see,—their wickedness, their folly, and their danger; while they are apt to believe themselves very wise, and good, and safe. See here,

1. Their wickedness. This is described in four instances: 1st. They are themselves workers of iniquity; they design it, they practise it, and take as much pleasure in it as ever any man did in his business. 2nd. They eat up God's people with as much greediness as they eat bread; such an innate and inveterate enmity they have to them, and so heartily do they desire their ruin, because they really hate God, whose people they are. It is meat and drink to persecutors to be doing mischief: it is as agreeable to them as their necessary food. They eat up God's people easily, daily, securely, without either check of conscience when they do it, or remorse of conscience when they have done it; as Joseph's brethren cast him into a pit, and then sat down to eat bread. Gen. xxxvii. 24, 25: see Mic. iii. 2, 3. 3rd. They call not upon the Lord. Note, Those that care not for God's people, for God's poor, care not for God himself, but live in contempt of him; and the reason why people run into all manner of wickedness, even the worst, is, because they do not call upon God for his grace. What good can be expected from those that live without prayer? 4th. They shame the counsel of the poor, and upbraid them with making God their refuge, as David's enemies upbraided him, Ps. xi. 1. Note, Those are very wicked indeed, and have a great deal to answer for, who not only shake off religion, and live without it themselves, but say and do what they can to

xiv. 1. With a different title and a few verbal changes, this psalm occurs again as the 53rd. Both there and here it is ascribed to David, but it is exceedingly difficult to reconcile verse 7 with his authorship. The prayer for restoration from captivity seems to point to a later date, and consequently sundry interpreters, both Jewish and Christian, refer it to the period of the Babylonian captivity. We cannot decide the actual period of its composition. St. Paul quotes some of the verses, with other matter, in Rom. iii. 10, &c. The differences between his quotation and the contents of this psalm tempted some ancient copyists to write in the margin here what they found in St. Paul's extracts over and above what was written here. These marginal additions have actually been inserted into some copies of this psalm, and appear in the Prayer-Book translation, from which they ought to be excluded, as the evidence against their admission is all but universal. Only one recent Hebrew manuscript contains them.

put others out of conceit with it that are well inclined; with the duties of it, as if they were mean, melancholy, and unprofitable; and with the privileges of it, as if they were insufficient to make a man safe and happy. Those that banter religion, and religious people, will find, to their cost, it is ill jesting with edged tools, and dangerous persecuting those that make God their refuge. "Be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong." He shews them,

2. Their folly. They have no knowledge: so it is a sign; for if they had any knowledge of God, if they did rightly understand themselves, and would but consider things as men, they would not be so abusive and barbarous as they are to the people of God.

3. Their danger; ver. 5, "There were they in great fear." There, where they ate up God's people, their own consciences condemned what they did, and filled them with secret terrors. They sweetly sucked the blood of the saints; but in their bowels it is turned, and become the gall of asps. Many instances there have been of proud and cruel persecutors, who have been made, like Pashur, Magor-missabibs, terrors to themselves and all about them. They that will not fear God perhaps may be made to fear at the shaking of a leaf.

Secondly. He endeavours to comfort the people of God, 1. With what they have. They have God's presence; ver. 5, he "is in the generation of the righteous:" they have his protection; ver. 6, "The Lord is their refuge." This is as much their security as it is the terror of their enemies, who may jeer them for their confidence in God, but cannot jeer them out of it. In the judgment-day it will add to the terror and confusion of sinners to see God own the generation of the righteous, which they have hated and bantered. 2. With what they hope for; and that is the salvation of Israel, ver. 7. When David was driven out by Absalom and his rebellious accomplices, he comforted himself with an assurance that God would in due time turn again his captivity, to the joy of all his good subjects. But surely this pleasing prospect looks farther. He had, in the beginning of the psalm, lamented the general corruption of mankind; and, in the melancholy view of that, wishes for the salvation which, in the fulness of time, was to come out of Zion; salvation from sin, that great salvation which should be wrought out by the Redeemer, who was expected to come to Zion, to turn away ungodliness from Jacob, Rom. xi. 26. The world is bad; Oh that the Messiah would come and mend them! There is a universal corruption; Oh for the times of reformation! Those will be as joyful times as these are melancholy ones. Then shall God turn again the captivity of his people; for the Redeemer shall ascend up on high, and lead captivity captive, and Jacob shall in that rejoice. The triumphs of Zion's king will be the joys of Zion's children. The second coming of Christ, finally to extinguish the dominion of sin and Satan, will be the completing of this salvation, which is the hope, and will be the joy, of every Israelite indeed. And with the assurance of that we should, in singing this, comfort ourselves and one another, with reference to the present sins of sinners, and sufferings of saints.

PSALM XV.

The scope of this short but excellent psalm is to shew us the way to heaven, and to convince us that, if we would be happy, we must be holy and honest. Christ, who is himself the way, and in whom we must walk as our way, has also shewed us the same way that is here prescribed, Mat. xix. 17, "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments." In this psalm, I. By the question, ver. 1, we are directed and excited to inquire the way. II. By the answer to that question in the rest of the psalm, we are directed to walk in that way, ver. 2—5. III. By the assurance given in the close of the psalm, of the safety and happiness of those who answer these characters, we are encouraged to walk in that way, ver. 5.

A Psalm of David.

LORD, who shall abide in thy tabernacle?
Who shall dwell in thy holy hill?
2 He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness,
And speaketh the truth in his heart.
3 He that backbiteth not with his tongue,
Nor doeth evil to his neighbour,
Nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbour.
4 In whose eyes a vile person is contemned;
But he honoureth them that fear the LORD.
He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not.
5 He that putteth not out his money to usury,
Nor taketh reward against the innocent.
He that doeth these things shall never be moved.

Here is, First. A very serious and weighty question, concerning the characters of a citizen of Zion; ver. 1, "Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle?" that is, Let me know who shall go to heaven. Not who by name,—so the Lord only knows them that are his; but who by description, What kind of people are they whom thou wilt own, and crown with distinguishing and everlasting favours? This supposeth that it is a great privilege to be a citizen of Zion, an unspeakable honour and advantage; that all are not thus privileged, but a remnant only; and that men are not entitled to this privilege by their birth and blood; all shall not abide in God's tabernacle that have Abraham to their father, but according as men's hearts and lives are accordingly will their lot be. It concerns us all to put this question to ourselves, Lord, what shall I be, and do, that I may abide in thy tabernacle? Lu. xviii. 18; Acts xvi. 30. Observe,

1. Who this inquiry is addressed to; to God himself. Note, Those that would find the way to heaven must look up to God, must take direction from his word, and beg direction from his Spirit. It is fit he himself should give laws to his servants, and appoint the conditions of his favours, and tell who are his, and who not.

2. How it is expressed in Old Testament language. 1st. By the tabernacle we may understand the church militant, typified by Moses' tabernacle, fitted to a wilderness state, mean and moveable. There God manifests himself, and there he meets his people, as of old, in the tabernacle of the testimony, the tabernacle of meeting. Who shall dwell in this tabernacle? that is, Who shall be accounted a true, living member of God's church, admitted among the spiritual priests to lodge in the courts of this tabernacle? We are concerned to inquire this, because many pretend to a place in this tabernacle who really have no part nor lot in the matter. 2nd. By the holy hill we may understand the church triumphant, alluding to mount Zion, on which the temple was to be built by Solomon. It is the happiness of glorified saints that they dwell in that holy hill, they are at home there, they shall be for ever there. It concerns us to know who shall dwell there, that we make it sure to ourselves that we shall have a place among them, and may then take the comfort of it, and rejoice in prospect of that holy hill.

Secondly. A very plain and particular answer to this question. Those that desire to know their duty, with a resolution to do it, will find the Scripture a very faithful director, and conscience a faithful monitor. Let us see then the particular characters of a citizen of Zion.

1. He is one that is sincere and entire in his religion. "He walketh uprightly," according to the condition of the covenant, Gen. xvii. 1, "Walk before me, and be thou perfect," (it is the same word that is here used,) and then thou shalt find me a God all-sufficient. He is really what he professeth to be, is sound at heart, and can approve himself to God in his integrity in all he doth; his conversation is uniform, and he is of a piece with himself, and endeavours to stand complete in all the will of God. His eye perhaps is weak, but it is single; he has his spots indeed, but he doth not paint; "an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile," Jno. i. 47; 2 Cor. i. 12. I know no religion but sincerity.

2. He is one that is conscientiously honest and just in all his dealings, faithful and fair to all with whom he has to do. He "worketh righteousness;" that is, he walks in all the ordinances and commandments of the Lord, and takes care to give all their due; is just both to God and man; and in speaking to both he speaketh that which is the truth in his heart; his prayers, professions, and promises to God, come not out of feigned lips, nor dares he tell a lie, or so much as equivocate in his converse or commerce with men. He walks by the rules of righteousness and truth, and scorns and abhors the gains of injustice and fraud; and reckons that cannot be a good bargain, nor a saving one, which is made with a lie; and that he who wrongs his neighbour, though never so plausibly, will prove in the end to have done the greatest injury to himself.

3. He is one that contrives to do all the good he can to his neighbours; but is very careful to do hurt to no man, and is in a particular manner tender of his neighbour's reputation, ver. 3. He doth no evil at all to his neighbour willingly or designedly, nothing to offend and grieve his spirit, nothing to prejudice the health or ease of his body, nothing to injure him in his estate or secular interests, in his family or relations; but walks by that golden rule of equity,—to do as he would be done by. He is especially careful not to injure his neighbour in his good name, because many who would not otherwise wrong their neighbours make nothing of that; and he that in this matter bridles not his tongue, his religion is vain. He knows the worth of a good name, and therefore he backbiteth not, defames no man, speaks evil of no man, makes not others' faults the subject of his common talk, much less of his sport and ridicule, nor speaks of them with pleasure, nor at all but for edification; he makes the best of every body, and the worst of nobody. He doth not take up a reproach; that is, he neither raiseth it, nor receiveth it; he gives no credit nor countenance to a calumny, but frowns upon a backbiting tongue, and so silenceth it, Pr. xxv. 23. If an ill-natured character of his neighbour be given him, or an ill-natured story be told him, he will disprove it if he can: if not, it shall die with him, and go no farther. His charity will cover a multitude of sins.

4. He is one that values men by their virtue and piety, and not by the figure they make in the world, ver. 5. 1st. He thinks the better of no man's wickedness for his pomp and grandeur; "In his eyes a vile person is contemned." Wicked people are vile people, worthless, and good for nothing; so the word signifies, as dross, as chaff, as salt that has lost its savour; they are vile in their choices, Jer. ii. 13, in their practices, Isa. xxxii. 6. And for this wise and good men contemn them,—not denying them civil honour and respect as men, as men in authority and power perhaps, 1 Pet. ii. 17; Rom. xiii. 7,—but in their judgment of them, agreeing with the word of God. They are so far from envying them that they pity him; despise their gains, Isa. xxxiii. 15, as turning to no account; their dainties, Ps. cxli. 4; their pleasures, Heb. xi. 24, 25, as sapless and insipid. They despise their society, Ps. cxix. 115; 2 Kin. iii. 14, despise their taunts and threats, and are not moved by them, nor disturbed at them; they despise the feeble efforts of their impotent malice, Ps. ii. 1, 4, and will shortly triumph in their fall, Ps. lii. 6, 7. God despiseth them, and they are of his mind. 2nd. He thinks the worse of no man's piety for his poverty and meanness; "but he honours them that fear the Lord." He reckons that serious piety, wherever it is found, puts an honour upon a man, and makes his face to shine more than wealth or wit, or a great name among men doth or can. He honours such; that is, he esteems them very highly in love, desires their friendship and conversation, and an interest in their prayers; is glad of an opportunity to shew them respect, or do them a good office; pleads their cause, and speaks of them with veneration, rejoiceth when they prosper, grieves when they are removed, and their memory when they are gone is precious with him. By this we may judge of ourselves in some measure: What rules do we go by in judging of others?

5. He is one that always prefers a good conscience before any secular interest or advantage whatsoever; for if he has promised upon oath to do any thing, though afterwards it appear much to his damage and prejudice in his worldly estate, yet he sticks to it, and changeth not, ver. 4. See how weaksighted and shortsighted even wise and good men may be, they may swear to their own hurt, which they were not aware of when they took the oath; but see how strong the obligation of an oath is, that a man must rather suffer loss to himself and his family, than wrong his neighbour by breaking his oath. An oath is a sacred thing, which we must not think to play fast and loose with.

6. He is one that will not increase his estate by any unjust practices, ver. 5. 1st. Not by extortion. "He putteth not out his money to usury," that he may live at ease upon the labours of others, while he is in capacity of improving it by his own industry. Not that it is any breach of the law of justice or charity for the lender to share in the profit which the borrower makes of his money any more than for the owner of the land to demand rent from the occupant, money being by art and labour as improvable as land; but a citizen of Zion will freely lend to the poor, according to his ability, and not be rigorous and severe in recovering his right from those that are reduced by Providence. 2nd. Not by bribery. He will not "take a reward against the innocent;" that is, if he be any way employed in the administration of public justice, he will not for any gain, or hope of it to himself, do any thing to the prejudice of a righteous cause.

Thirdly. The psalm concludes with a ratification of this character of the citizen of Zion. He is like Zion-hill itself, which cannot be moved, but abideth for ever, Ps. cxxv. 1. Every true, living member of the church, like the church itself, is built upon a rock, which the gates of hell cannot prevail against. "He that doth these things shall never be moved;" shall not be moved for ever, so the word is. The grace of God shall always be sufficient for him to preserve him safe and blameless to the heavenly kingdom; temptations shall not overcome him, trouble shall not overwhelm him, nothing shall rob him of his present peace or his future bliss.

In singing this psalm we must teach and admonish ourselves and one another, to answer the characters here given of the citizen of Zion, that we may never be moved from God's tabernacle on earth, and may arrive at last at that holy hill, where we shall be for ever out of the reach of temptation and danger.

xiv. 6. As in many other cases, the word "poor" rather means "needy," or such as require aid. In this case the poor man is the afflicted godly soul, who has made the Lord his refuge, and is for that reason disgraced and reviled by the ungodly. The counsel of the needy man is not simply his advice, but the sentiment he cherishes.

xv. 1. The form of this suggests that this was certainly a psalm of David, as stated in the title. The tabernacle was then standing, and the Temple not yet built. But the tabernacle was upon the "holy hill," which is another appellation for Mount Zion. It is the usual opinion of expositors that this psalm was written by David when the ark was taken into the tabernacle on Zion. The elevated principles of this exquisite composition render it easy to give it an evangelical application.

xv. 3. For the words "nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbour," the Syriac has "nor taketh a gift against his neighbour," but the Hebrew text is preferable.

PSALM XVI.

This psalm has something of David in it, but much more of Christ. It begins with such expressions of devotion as may be applied to Christ, but concludes with such confidence of a resurrection (and so timely a one as to prevent corruption) as must be applied to Christ, to him only, and cannot be understood of David, as both St. Peter and St. Paul have observed. Acts ii. 24; xiii. 36; for David died and was buried, and saw corruption. I. David speaks of himself as a member of Christ, and so he speaks the language of all good Christians, professing his confidence in God, ver. 1; his consent to him, ver. 2; his affection to the people of God, ver. 3; his adherence to the true worship of God, ver. 4; and his entire complacency and satisfaction in God, and the interest he had in him, ver. 5—7. II. He speaks of himself as a type of Christ, and so he speaks the language of Christ himself, to whom all the rest of the psalm is expressly and at large applied, Acts ii. 25, &c., "David speaketh concerning him," (not concerning himself,) "I foresaw the Lord always before my face," &c.; and this he spake, being a prophet, ver 30, 31; spake, 1. Of the special presence of God with the Redeemer in his services and sufferings, ver. 8; 2. of the prospect which the Redeemer had of his own resurrection, and the glory that should follow, which carried him cheerfully through his undertaking, ver. 9—11.

Michtam of David.

PRESERVE me, O God:
For in thee do I put my trust. [my Lord:

3 But to the saints that are in the earth,
And to the excellent, in whom is all my delight.
4 Their sorrows shall be multiplied that hasten after ano-
Their drink offerings of blood will I not offer, [ther god:
Nor take up their names into my lips. [cup:
5 The LORD is the portion of mine inheritance and of my Thou maintainest my lot.
6 The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places;
Yea, I have a goodly heritage.
7 I will bless the LORD, who hath given me counsel:
My reins also instruct me in the night seasons.

This psalm is entitled Michtam, which some translate a golden psalm, a very precious one, more to be valued by us than gold, yea than much fine gold; because it speaks so plainly of Christ and his resurrection, who is the true treasure hid in the field of the Old Testament.

First. David here flies to God's protection with a cheerful, believing confidence in it; ver. 1, "Preserve me, O God," from the deaths, and especially from the sins, to which I am continually exposed; "for in thee," and thee only, "do I put my trust." Those that by faith commit themselves to the Divine care, and submit themselves to the Divine conduct, have reason to hope for the benefit of both. This is applicable to Christ, who prayed, "Father, save me from this hour," and "trusted in God that he would deliver him."

Secondly. He recogniseth his solemn dedication of himself to God as his God; ver. 2, "O my soul, thou hast said unto the Lord, Thou art my Lord," and therefore thou mayest venture to trust him. Note, 1. It is the duty and interest of every one of us to acknowledge the Lord for our Lord, to subject ourselves to him, and then to stay ourselves upon him. Adonai signifies 'my stayer,' the strength of my heart. 2. This must be done with our souls. "O my soul, thou hast said" it. Covenanting with God must be heart-work, all that is within us must be employed therein, and engaged thereby. 3. Those who have avouched the Lord for their Lord should be often putting themselves in mind of what they have done. Hast thou said unto the Lord, Thou art my Lord? say it again then, stand to it, abide by it, and never unsay it. Hast thou said it? take the comfort of it, and live up to it. "He is thy Lord, and worship thou him," and let thine eye be ever towards him.

Thirdly. He devotes himself to the honour of God, in the service of the saints; ver. 2, 3, "My goodness extendeth not to thee, but to the saints." Observe, 1. Those that have taken the Lord for their Lord, must, like him, be good, and do good; we do not expect happiness without goodness. 2. Whatever good there is in us, or is done by us, we must humbly acknowledge that it extendeth not to God; so that we cannot pretend to merit any thing by it. God has no need of our services, he is not benefited by them, nor can they add any thing to his infinite perfection and blessedness. The wisest, and best, and most useful men in the world, cannot be profitable to God, Job xxii. 2; xxxv. 7. God is infinitely above us, and happy without us, and whatever good we do it is all from him; so that we are indebted to him, not he to us. David owns it 1 Chr. xxix. 4, "Of thine own have we given thee." 3. If God be ours, we must for his sake extend our goodness to those that are his, to the saints in the earth; for what is done to them he is pleased to take as done to himself, having constituted them his receivers. Note, 1st. There are saints in the earth, and saints on earth we must all be, or we shall never be saints in heaven. Those that are renewed by the grace of God, and devoted to the glory of God, are saints on earth. 2nd. The saints in the earth are excellent ones, great, mighty, magnificent ones, and yet some of them so poor in the world, that they needed to have David's goodness extended to them. God makes them excellent by the grace he gives them. "The righteous is more excellent than his neighbour." And then he accounts them excellent; they are precious in his sight, and honourable; they are his jewels, his peculiar treasure. Their God is their glory, and a diadem of beauty to them. 3rd. All that have taken the Lord for their God delight in his saints as excellent ones, because they bear his image, and because he loves them. David, though a king, was a companion for all that feared God, Ps. cxix. 63, even the meanest, which was a sign that his delight was in them. 4th. It is not enough for us to delight in the saints; but, as there is occasion, our goodness must extend to them; we must be ready to shew them the kindness they need, distribute to their necessities, and abound in the labour of love to them. This is applicable to Christ. The salvation he wrought out for us was no gain to God, for our ruin would have been no loss to him; but the goodness and benefit of it extends to us men, in whom he delighted, Pr. viii. 31. "For their sakes," saith he, "I sanctify myself," Jno. xvii. 19. Christ delights even in the saints on earth, notwithstanding their weaknesses and manifold infirmities, which is a good reason why we should.

Fourthly. He disclaims the worship of all false gods, and all communion with their worshippers, ver. 4; where, 1. He reads the doom of idolaters, who "hasten after another god," being mad upon their idols, and pursuing them as eagerly as if they were afraid they would overgo them. "Their sorrows shall be multiplied," both by the judgments they bring upon themselves from the true God whom they forsake and by the disappointment they will meet with in the false gods they embrace. They that multiply gods multiply griefs to themselves; for whosoever thinks one god too little, will find two too many, and yet hundreds not enough. 2. He declares his resolution to have no fellowship with them, nor with their unfruitful works of darkness. "Their drink offerings of blood will I not offer," not only because the gods they are offered to are a lie, but because the offerings themselves are barbarous. At God's altar, because the blood made atonement, the drinking of it was most strictly prohibited, and the drink offerings were of wine; but the devil prescribed his worshippers to drink the blood of the sacrifices, to teach them cruelty. I will have nothing to do, saith David, with those bloody deities, nor so much as "take their names into my lips" with any delight in them, or respect to them. Thus must we hate idols and idolatry with a perfect hatred. Some make this also applicable to Christ and his undertaking, shewing the nature of the sacrifice he offered,—it was not "the blood of bulls and goats, which was offered according to the law," that was never named, nor did he ever make any mention of it, but his own blood—shewing also the multiplied sorrows of the unbelieving Jews, who hastened after another king, Cæsar, and are still hastening after another Messiah, whom they in vain look for.

Fifthly. He repeats the solemn choice he had made of God for his portion and happiness, ver. 5; takes to himself the comfort of the choice, ver. 6; and gives God the glory of it, ver. 7. This is very much the language of a devout and pious soul in its gracious exercises,

1. Choosing the Lord for its portion and happiness. The most of men take the world for their chief good, and place their felicity in the enjoyments of it; but this I say, "The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance, and of my cup;" the portion I make choice of, and will gladly take up with, how poor soever my condition is in this world. Let me have the love and favour of God, and be accepted of him; let me have the comfort of communion with God, and satisfaction in the communications of his graces and comforts. Let me have an interest in his promises, and a title by promise to everlasting life and happiness in the future state, and I have enough, I need no more, I desire no more to complete my felicity. Would we do well and wisely for ourselves, we must take God in Christ to be, 1st. The portion of our inheritance in the other world. Heaven is an inheritance, God himself is the inheritance of the saints there, whose everlasting bliss it is to enjoy him. We must take that for our inheritance, our home, our rest, our lasting, everlasting good, and look upon this world to be no more ours than the country is through which our road lies when we are in a journey. 2nd. The portion of our cup in this world with which I am nourished and refreshed, and kept from fainting. Those have not God for theirs who do not reckon his comforts the most reviving cordials, acquaint themselves with them, and make use of them as sufficient to balance all the grievances of this present time, and to sweeten the most bitter cup of affliction.

2. Confiding in him for the securing of this portion. "Thou maintainest my lot." Thou that hast by promise made over thyself to me to be mine wilt graciously make good what thou hast promised, and never leave me to myself to forfeit this happiness, nor leave it in the power of mine enemies to rob me of it. Nothing shall pluck me out of thy hands, nor separate me from thy love, and the sure mercies of David. The saints and their bliss are kept by the power of God.

3. Rejoicing in this portion, and taking a complacency in it; ver. 6, "The lines are fallen to me in pleasant places." Those have reason to say so that have God for their portion; they have a worthy portion, a goodly heritage. What can they have better? What can they desire more? "Return unto thy rest, O my soul," and look no farther. Note, Gracious souls, though they still covet more of God, never covet more than God; but, being satisfied of his lovingkindness, are abundantly satisfied with it, and envy not any their carnal mirth, and sensual pleasures and delights, but account themselves truly happy in what they have, and doubt not but to be completely happy in what they hope for. Those whose lot is cast, as David's was, in a land of light, a valley of vision, where God is known and worshipped, have upon that account reason to say the lines are fallen to them in pleasant places; much more they that have not only the means, but the end, not only Immanuel's land, but Immanuel's love.

4. Giving thanks to God for it, and for grace to make this wise and happy choice; ver. 7, "I will bless the Lord who hath given me counsel," this counsel to take him for my portion and happiness. So ignorant and foolish are we, that if we be left to ourselves our hearts will follow our eyes, and we shall choose our own delusions, and forsake our own mercies for lying vanities; and therefore, if we have indeed taken God for our portion, and preferred spiritual and eternal blessings before those that are sensible and temporal, we must thankfully acknowledge the power and goodness of Divine grace, directing and enabling us to make that choice. If we have the pleasure of it, let God have the praises of it.

5. Making a good use of it. God having given him counsel by his Word and Spirit, his own reins, that is, his own thoughts, also instructed him in the night season, when he was silent and solitary, and retired from the world. Then his own conscience (which is called the reins, Jer. xvii. 10) not only reflected with comfort upon the choice he had made, but instructed or admonished him concerning his duty, which he was obliged to by this choice; catechised him, and engaged and quickened him to live as one that had God for his portion, by faith to live upon him, and live to him. Those who have God for their portion, who will be faithful to them, must give their own consciences leave to deal thus faithfully and plainly with them.

All this may be applied to Christ, who made the Lord his portion, and was pleased with that portion, made his Father's glory his highest end, and made it his meat and drink to seek that and to do his will, and delighted to prosecute his undertaking, pursuant to his Father's counsel, depending upon him to maintain his lot, and to carry him through his undertaking. We may also apply it to ourselves in singing it, renewing our choice of God as ours, with a holy complacency and satisfaction.

8 I have set the LORD always before me:
Because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved.
9 Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth:
My flesh also shall rest in hope.
10 For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell;
Neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption 11 Thou wilt shew me the path of life:

xvi. Title. The word "Michtam," as observed by Mr. Henry, is often explained to mean "golden." There are, however, other explanations suggested, among which is that of Rosenmüller, namely, that "Michtam" means "written," and the whole title "written by David." The Greek, nearly in accordance with this view, has "an inscription by David," which the Latin follows, and also the Chaldee Targum.

xvi. 2, 3. It is not easy to decide the whole sense of these verses. Our translators have added words to help them. Some copies and versions read in verse 2, "I have said unto the Lord;" but probably this reading is incorrect, and our translation here a good rendering of the idea. The words "my goodness extendeth not to thee" are also to be questioned. Some understood the Hebrew to mean that God had no need of the good deeds of his servant. Some take it to mean that God is not bound to give good to his servant. Others understand the words to mean that the psalmist has no happiness

In thy presence is fulness of joy;
At thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore

All these verses are quoted by St. Peter, in his first sermon after the pouring ont of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, Acts ii. 25—28, and he tells us expressly, that David in them speaketh concerning Christ, and particularly of his resurrection. Something we may allow here of the workings of David's own pious and devout affections towards God, depending upon his grace to perfect every thing that concerned him, and looking for the blessed hope and a happy state on the other side death, in the enjoyment of God. But in these holy elevations towards God and heaven he was carried, by the spirit of prophecy, quite beyond the consideration of himself and his own case, to foretell the glory of the Messiah, in such expressions as were peculiar to that, and could not be understood of himself. The New Testament furnisheth us with a key to let us into the mystery of these lines.

First. These verses for certain must be applied to Christ. Of him speaketh the prophet this, as did many of the Old Testament prophets, who "testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow," 1 Pet. i. 11, and that is the subject of this prophecy here. It is foretold (as he himself shewed concerning this, no doubt, among other prophecies in this psalm, Lu. xxiv. 44, 46,) that Christ should suffer, and rise from the dead, 1 Cor. xv. 3, 4.

1. That he should suffer and die. This is implied here, when he saith, ver. 8, "I shall not be moved." He supposed that he should be struck at, and have a dreadful shock given him, as he had in his agony, when his soul was exceeding sorrowful, and he prayed that the cup might pass from him. When he saith, "my flesh shall rest," it is implied that he must put off the body, and therefore must go through the pains of death. It is likewise plainly intimated, that his soul must go into a state of separation from the body, and that his body so deserted would be in imminent danger of seeing corruption; that he should not only die, but be buried, and abide for some time under the power of death.

2. That he should be wonderfully borne up by the Divine power in suffering and dying. 1st. That he should not be moved nor driven off from his undertaking, nor sink under the weight of it; that he should not fail nor be discouraged, Isa. xlii. 4, but should proceed and persevere in it, till he could say, "It is finished." Though the service was hard, and the encounter hot, and he trod the winepress alone, yet he was not moved, did not give up the cause, but set his face as a flint, Isa. l. 7—9. "Here am I, let these go their way." Nay, 2nd. That his heart should rejoice, and his glory be glad; that he should go on with his undertaking, not only resolutely, but cheerfully, and with an unspeakable pleasure and satisfaction. Witness that saying, Jno. xvii. 11, "Now I am no more in the world, but I come to thee;" and that, Jno. xviii. 11, "The cup that my Father giveth me, shall I not drink it?" and many the like. By his glory is meant his tongue, as appears Acts ii. 26; for our tongue is our glory, and never more so than when it is employed in glorifying God.

Now there were three things which bore him up, and carried him on thus cheerfully. First. The respect he had to his Father's will and glory in what he did: "I have set the Lord always before me." He still had an eye to his Father's commandment, Jno. x. 18; xiv. 31; the will of him that sent him. He aimed at his Father's honour, and the restoring of the interests of his kingdom among men, and this kept him from being moved by the difficulties he met with; for he always did those things that pleased his Father. Secondly. The assurance he had of his Father's presence with him in his sufferings: "He is at my right hand;" a present help to me, nigh at hand in the time of need; Isa. l. 8, "He is near that justifieth me;" he is at my right hand, to direct and strengthen it, and hold it up, Ps. lxxxix. 21. When he was in his agony an angel was sent from heaven to strengthen him, Lu. xxii. 43. To this the victories and triumphs of the cross were all owing; it was the Lord at his right hand that struck through kings, Ps. cx. 5; Isa. xlii. 1, 2. Thirdly. The prospect he had of a glorious issue of his sufferings. It was for the joy set before him, that he endured the cross, Heb. xii. 2. He rested in hope, and that made his rest glorious, Isa. xi. 10. He knew he should be justified in the Spirit by his resurrection, and straightway glorified: see Jno. xiii. 31, 32.

3. That he should be brought through his sufferings, and brought from under the power of death by a glorious resurrection. 1st. That his soul should not be left in hell; that is, his human spirit should not be long left, as other men's spirits are, in a state of separation from the body, but should in a little time return and be re-united to it, never to part again. 2nd. That being God's Holy One in a peculiar manner, sanctified to the work of redemption, and perfectly free from sin, he should not see corruption, or feel it. This implies, that he should not only be raised from the grave, but raised so soon that his dead body should not so much as begin to corrupt, which in the course of nature it would have done, if it had not been raised the third day. We that have so much corruption in our souls must expect that our bodies also will corrupt, Job xxiv. 19. But that Holy One of God, who knew no sin, saw no corruption. Under the law it was strictly ordered that those parts of the sacrifices which were not burnt upon the altar yet should by no means be kept till the third day, lest they should putrefy, Lev. vii. 15, 18, which perhaps pointed at Christ's rising the third day, that he might not see corruption, as neither was a bone of him broken.

4. That he should be abundantly recompensed for his sufferings, with the joy set before him, ver. 11. He was well assured, 1st. That he should not miss of his glory. "Thou wilt shew me the path of life," and lead me to that life through this darksome valley. In confidence of this, when he gave up the ghost, he said, "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit;" and a little before, "Father, glorify thou me with thine own self." 2nd. That he should be received into the presence of God, to sit at his right hand. His being admitted into God's presence would be the acceptance of his service; and his being set at his right hand the recompence of it. 3rd. Thus, as a reward for the sorrows he underwent for our redemption, he should have a "fulness of joy, and pleasures for evermore;" not only the glory he had with God, as God before all worlds, but the joy and pleasure of a Mediator, in seeing his seed, and the success and prosperity of his undertaking, Isa. liii. 10, 11.

Secondly. Christ being the head of the body, the church, these verses may for the most part be applied to all good Christians, who are guided and animated by the Spirit of Christ; and in singing of them, when we have first given glory to Christ, in whom they have to our everlasting comfort had their accomplishment, we may then encourage and edify ourselves and one another with them, and may from hence learn,

1. That it is our wisdom and duty to set the Lord always before us, and to see him continually at our right hand, wherever we are; to eye him as our chief good and highest end, our owner, ruler, and judge, our gracious benefactor, our sure guide, and strict observer; and while we do thus we shall not be moved either from our duty or from our comfort. Blessed Paul set the Lord before him, when, though bonds and afflictions did abide him, he could bravely say, "None of these things move me," Acts xx. 24.

2. That if our eyes be ever towards God, our hearts and tongues may ever rejoice in him. It is our own fault if they do not; if the heart rejoice in God, out of the abundance of that let the mouth speak, to his glory and the edification of others.

3. That dying Christians, as well as a dying Christ, may cheerfully put off the body in a believing expectation of a joyful resurrection. "My flesh also shall rest in hope." Our bodies have little rest in this world, but in the grave they shall rest as in their beds, Isa. lvii. 2. We have little to hope for from this life, but we shall rest in hope of a better life; that is, we may put off the body in that hope. Death destroys the hope of man, Job xiv. 14, but not the hope of a good Christian, Pr. xiv. 32. He has hope in his death, living hopes in dying moments; hopes that the body shall not be left for ever in the grave; but, though it see corruption for a time, it shall at the end of time be raised to immortality. Christ's resurrection is an earnest of ours if we be his.

4. That those who live piously with God in their eye may die comfortably with heaven in their eye. In this world sorrow is our lot, but in heaven there is joy; all our joys here are empty and defective, but in heaven there is a fulness of joy. Our pleasures here are transient and momentary, and such is the nature of them that it is not fit they should last long; but those at God's right hand are pleasures for evermore; for they are the pleasures of immortal souls in the immediate vision and fruition of an eternal God.

PSALM XVII.

David, being in great distress and danger by the malice of his enemies, doth in this psalm, by prayer, address himself to God, his tried refuge, and seeks shelter in him. I. He appeals to God concerning his integrity, ver. 1—4. II. He prays to God still to be upheld in his integrity, and preserved from the malice of his enemies, ver. 5—8, 13. III. He gives a character of his enemies, using that as a plea with God for his preservation. ver. 9—12, 14. IV. He comforts himself with the hopes of his future happiness, ver. 15. And some make him in this a type of Christ, who was perfectly innocent, and yet was hated and persecuted; but, like David, committed himself and his cause to him that judgeth righteously.

A Prayer of David.

HEAR the right, O LORD,
Attend unto my cry, [lips.
Give ear unto my prayer, that goeth not out of feigned
2 Let my sentence come forth from thy presence;
Let thine eyes behold the things that are equal.
3 Thou hast proved mine heart;
Thou hast visited me in the night;
Thou hast tried me, and shalt find nothing;
I am purposed that my mouth shall not transgress.
4 Concerning the works of men,
By the word of thy lips I have kept me from the paths of the destroyer
5 Hold up my goings in thy paths,
That my footsteps slip not.
6 I have called upon thee, for thou wilt hear me, O God:
Incline thine ear unto me, and hear my speech
7 Shew thy marvellous lovingkindness,
O thou that savest by thy right hand
Them which put their trust in thee
From those that rise up against them.

This psalm is a prayer. As there is a time to weep, and a time to rejoice, so there is a time for praise, and a time for prayer. David was now persecuted, probably by Saul, who hunted him like a partridge on the mountains; without were fightings, within were fears, and both drove him to his prayers. He addresseth himself to God in these verses, both by way of appeal. "Hear the right, O Lord," that is, let my righteous cause have a hearing before thy tribunal, and give judgment upon it; and by way of petition, "Give ear unto my prayer," ver. 1; and again, ver. 6, "Incline thine ear unto me, and hear my speech." Not that God needs to be thus pressed with our importunity, but he gives us leave thus to express our earnest desires of his gracious answers to our prayers. These things he pleads with God for audience, 1. That he was sincere, and did not dissemble with God in his prayer; it "goeth not out of feigned lips." He meant as he spoke, and the impressions on his mind agreed with the expressions of his mouth. Feigned prayers are fruitless, but if our hearts lead our prayers God will meet them with his favour. 2. That he had been used to pray at other times, and it was not his distress and danger that now first brought nim to his duty. "I have called upon thee" formerly, ver. 6, therefore, Lord, hear me now. It will be a great comfort to us if trouble, when it comes, finds the wheels of prayer a going, for then may we come with the more boldness to the throne of grace. Tradesmen are willing to oblige those that have been long their customers. 3. That he was encouraged by his faith to expect God would take notice of his prayers. I know "thou wilt hear me," and therefore, "O God, incline thine ear unto me." Our believing dependence upon God is a good plea to enforce our desires towards him. Let us now see,

First. What his appeal is. And there observe,

1. What the court is to the cognizance and determination of which he doth appeal. It is the court of heaven. Lord, do thou "hear the right," for Saul is so passionate, so prejudiced, he will not hear it. Lord, "let my sentence come forth from thy presence," ver. 2. Men sentence me to be run down, and cut off as an evil-doer. Lord, I appeal from them to thee. This he did in a public remonstrance before Saul's face, 1 Sam. xxiv. 12, "The Lord judge between me and thee;" and he repeats it here in his private devotions. Note, 1st. The equity and extent of God's government and judgment is a very great support to injured innocency. If we are blackened and abused and misrepresented by unrighteous men, it is our comfort that we have a righteous God to go to, who will take our part, who is the patron of the oppressed, whose judgment is according to truth, by the discoveries of which every person and every cause will appear in a true light, stript of all false colours, and by the decisions of which all unrighteous dooms will be reversed, and to every man will be rendered according to his work. 2nd. Sincerity dreads no scrutiny, no, not that of God himself, according to the tenor of the covenant of grace. "Let thine eyes behold the things that are equal." God's omniscience is as much the joy of the upright as it is the terror of hypocrites, and is particularly except in God, or beyond Him. Others take it to mean, "I have no good without thee," or, "The good I have comes from thee." The idea that man's goodness is not equal to that of God is objectionable. The following words, which in the common version are, "But to the saints," &c., require a remark. In the former verse the writer has said that the Lord is his God, and in this he declares his views and sentiments in regard to the saints in whom he delights.

xvi. 6. The "lines" are the limits or bounds which have fallen to the lot of the psalmist; hence, the portion which he possesses. The phrase comes of the custom of measuring fields with lines or cords.

xvi. 7. The word "reins" was among the Hebrews used for thoughts and emotions, just as we speak of the heart. All such phrases are figurative, and due to the sensations men feel in the body when they are strongly moved to attend to some subject. Our version is very tame, and might be well altered: "Even by night my emotions admonish me."

comfortable to those who are falsely accused, and in any wise have wrong done them.

2. What the evidence is by which he hopes to make good his appeal. It is the trial God had made of him; ver. 3, "Thou hast proved mine heart." God's sentence is therefore right, because he always proceeds upon his own knowledge, which is more certain and infallible than that which men attain to by the closest views and the strictest searches. He knew God had tried him, 1st. By his own conscience, which is God's deputy in the soul. "The spirit of a man is the candle of the Lord;" with this God had searched him, and visited him in the night, when he communed with his own heart upon his bed. He had submitted to the search, and had seriously reviewed the actions of his life, to discover what was amiss; but could find nothing of that which his enemies charged him with. 2nd. By providence. God had tried him by the fair opportunity he had once and again to kill Saul; and tried him by the malice of Saul, the treachery of his friends, and the many provocations that were given him, so that if he had been the man he was represented to be, it would have appeared; but upon all these trials there was nothing found against him, no proof at all of the things whereof they accused him.

God tried his heart, and could witness to the integrity of that; but, for the farther proof of his integrity, he himself takes notice of two things, concerning which his conscience bore him record: First. That he had a fixed resolution against all tongue sins: "I am purposed," and fully determined, in the strength of God's grace, "that my mouth shall not transgress." He doth not say, I hope it shall not, or, I wish it may not; but, I am fully purposed that it shall not; with this bridle he kept his mouth, Ps. xxxix. 2. Note, Constant resolution and watchfulness against tongue sins will be a good evidence of our integrity. "If any offend not in word, the same is a perfect man," Jas. iii. 2. He doth not say, My mouth never shall transgress, for "in many things we all offend;" but, I am purposed that it shall not, and He that searcheth the heart knows whether the purpose be sincere. Secondly. That he had been as careful to refrain from sinful actions as from sinful words; ver. 4, "Concerning the" common "works of men," the actions and affairs of human life, "I have," by the direction of thy word, "kept me from the paths of the destroyer." Some understand it particularly, that he had not been himself a destroyer of Saul, when it lay in his power, nor had he permitted others to be so, but said to Abishai, "Destroy him not," 1 Sam. xxvi. 9. But it may be taken more generally, he kept himself from all evil works, and endeavoured, according to the duty of his place, to keep others from them too. Note, 1*st.* The ways of sin are paths of the destroyer, that is, of the devil, whose name is Abaddon and Apollyon, that is, a destroyer, and who ruins souls by decoying them into the paths of sin. 2*nd.* It concerns us all to keep out of the paths of the destroyer, for if we walk in those ways that lead to destruction, we must thank ourselves if destruction and misery be our portion at last. 3*rd.* It is by the word of God, as our guide and rule, that we must keep out of the paths of the destroyer, by observing the directions and admonitions of that, Ps. cxix. 9. 4*th.* If we carefully avoid all the paths of sin, it will be very comfortable in the reflection when we are in trouble. If we keep ourselves, that the wicked one touch us not with his temptations, 1 Jno. v. 18, we may hope he shall not be able to touch us with his terrors.

Secondly. What his petition is. It is in short this: that he might experience the good work of God in him, as an evidence of, and qualification for, the good will of God towards him. This is grace and peace from God the Father.

1. He prays for the work of God's grace in him; ver. 5, "Hold up my goings in thy paths." Lord, I have by thy grace "kept me from the paths of the destroyer," by the same grace let me be kept in thy paths; let me not only be restrained from doing that which is evil, but quickened to abound always in that which is good. Let my goings be held in thy paths, that I may not turn back from them, nor turn aside out of them; let them be held up in thy paths, that I may not stumble and fall into sin, that I may not trifle and neglect my duty. Lord, as thou hast kept me hitherto, so keep me still. Those that are through grace going in God's paths, have need to pray, and do pray, that their goings may be held up in those paths; for we stand no longer than he is pleased to hold us, we go no farther than he is pleased to lead us, bear up, and carry us. David had been kept in the way of his duty hitherto, and yet he doth not think that would be his security for the future, and therefore prays, 'Lord, still hold me up.' Those that would proceed and persevere in the way of God, must by faith and prayer fetch in daily fresh supplies of grace and strength from him. David was sensible that his way was slippery, that he himself was weak, and not so well fixed and furnished as he should be; that there were those who watched for his halting, and would improve the least slip against him, and therefore he prays, 'Lord, hold me up, that my foot slip not, that I may never say or do any thing that looks either dishonest or distrustful of thee and thy providence and promise.'

2. He prays for the tokens of God's favour to him, ver. 7. Observe here, 1st. How he eyes God as the protector and saviour of his people, so he calls him, and from that he takes his encouragement in prayer. "O thou that savest by thy right hand" (by thine own power, and needest not the agency of any other,) "them which put their trust in thee, from those that rise up against them." It is the character of God's people, that they trust in him; he is pleased to make them his confidants, for his secret is with the righteous; and they make him their confidence, for to him they commit themselves. Those that trust in God have many enemies, many that rise up against them, and seek their ruin; but they have one friend that is able to deal with them all, and if he be for them no matter who is against them. He reckons it his honour to be their Saviour. His almighty power is engaged for them, and they have all found him ready to save them. The margin reads it, 'O thou that savest them which trust in thee from those that rise up against thy right hand.' Those that are enemies to the saints are rebels against God and his right hand, and therefore no doubt he will in due time appear against them. 2nd. What he expects and desires from God: "Shew thy marvellous lovingkindness." The word signifies, First. Distinguishing favours. Set apart thy lovingkindnesses for me; put me not off with common mercies, but be gracious to me, "as thou usest to do to those who love thy name." Secondly. Wonderful favours. O make thy lovingkindness admirable; that is, Lord, testify thy favour to me in such a way as that I and others may wonder at it. God's lovingkindness is marvellous for the freeness and the fulness of it; in some instances it appears in a special manner marvellous, Ps. cxviii. 23, it will certainly appear so in the salvation of the saints, when Christ shall come "to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe."

8 Keep me as the apple of the eye,
Hide me under the shadow of thy wings,
9 From the wicked that oppress me,
From my deadly enemies, who compass me about.
10 They are inclosed in their own fat:
With their mouth they speak proudly.
11 They have now compassed us in our steps:
They have set their eyes bowing down to the earth;
12 Like as a lion that is greedy of his prey,
And as it were a young lion lurking in secret places
13 Arise, O LORD, disappoint him, cast him down:
Deliver my soul from the wicked, which is thy sword:
14 From men which are thy hand, O LORD, [life,
From men of the world, which have their portion in this
And whose belly thou fillest with thy hid treasure:
They are full of children, and leave the rest of their substance to their babes.
15 As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness:
I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness.

We may observe in these verses,

First. What David prays for. Being compassed about with enemies that sought his life, he prays to God to preserve him safe through all their attempts against him, to the crown to which he was anointed. And this prayer was both a prediction of the preservation of Christ through all the hardships and difficulties of his humiliation, to the glories and joys of his exalted state, and a pattern to Christians to commit the keeping of their souls to God, trusting him to preserve them to his heavenly kingdom. He prays,

1. That he himself might be protected, ver. 8. Keep me safe; hide me close, where I may not to be found, where I may not be come at. "Deliver my soul," not only my mortal life from death, but my immortal spirit from sin. Those who put themselves under God's protection may in faith implore the benefit of it. He prays that God would keep him, 1st. With as much care as a man keeps the apple of his eye, which nature has wonderfully fenced, and teaches us to guard. If we keep God's law as the apple of our eye, Pr. vii. 2, we may expect that God will so keep us; for it is said concerning his people, that whoso toucheth them toucheth the apple of his eye, Zec. ii. 8. 2nd. With as much tenderness as the hen gathers her young ones under her wings. Christ useth the similitude, Mat. xxiii. 37; "Hide me under the shadow of thy wings," where I may be both safe and warm. Or, perhaps, it rather alludes to the wings of the cherubims shadowing the mercy-seat. Let me be taken under the protection of that glorious grace which is peculiar to God's Israel. What David here prays for was performed to the Son of David our Lord Jesus, of whom it is said, Isa. xlix. 2, that God hid him in the shadow of his hand, hid him as a polished shaft in his quiver. David prays, Lord, keep me from the wicked, from men of the world; that is, First. From being and doing like them, from walking in their counsel, and standing in their way, and eating of their dainties. Secondly. From being destroyed and run down by them. Let them not have their will against me, let them not triumph over me.

2. That all the designs of his enemies to bring him either into sin or into trouble might be defeated; ver. 13, "Arise, O Lord," appear for me, "disappoint him," and cast him down in his own eyes by the disappointment. While Saul persecuted David, how often did he miss his prey, then when he thought he had him sure enough; and how were Christ's enemies disappointed by his resurrection, who thought they had gained their point when they had put him to death.

Secondly. What he pleads for the encouraging of his own faith in these petitions, and his hope of speeding. He pleads,

1. The malice and wickedness of his enemies. They are such as are not fit to be countenanced, such as, if I be not delivered from them by the special care of God himself, will be my ruin. Lord, see what wicked men they are that oppress me, and waste me, and run me down. 1st. They are very spiteful and malicious. They are my deadly enemies, that thirst after my blood, my heart's blood; 'enemies against the soul,' so the word is. David's enemies did what they could to drive him to sin, and drive him away from God; they bade him go serve other gods, 1 Sam. xxvi. 19; and therefore he had reason to pray against them. Note, Those are our worst enemies, and we ought so to account them, that are enemies to our souls. 2nd. They are very secure and sensual, insolent and haughty, ver. 10. "They are enclosed in their own fat," wrap themselves, hug themselves, in their own honour, and power, and plenty, and then make light of God, and set his judgments at defiance, Job xv. 26; Ps. lxxiii. 7. They wallow in pleasure, and promise themselves that to-morrow shall be as this day; and therefore, "with their mouth they speak proudly," glorying in themselves, blaspheming God, trampling upon his people, and insulting them: see Rev. xiii. 5, 6. Lord, are not such men as these fit to be mortified and humbled, and made to know themselves? Will it not be for thy glory to look upon these proud men, and abase them? 3rd. They are restless and unwearied in their attempts against me, they compass me about, ver. 9. "They have now" in a manner gained their point, they have surrounded us, "they have compassed us in our steps," they track us wherever we go, follow us as close as the hound doth the hare, and take all advantages against us, being both too many for us, and too quick for us; and yet they take on them to look another way, "they set their eyes bowing down to the earth," as if they were meditating, retired into themselves, and thinking of something else; or, as some think, they are watchful and intent upon it to do us a mischief; downlooked, and never slip an opportunity of compassing their design. 4th. The ringleader of them (that was Saul) is in a special manner bloody and barbarous, politic and projecting, ver. 12, like a lion that lives by prey, and is therefore greedy of it. It is as much the meat and drink of a wicked man to do mischief, as it is of a good man to do good. He is like "a young lion lurking in secret places," disguising his cruel designs. This is fitly applied to Saul, who sought David on the rocks of the wild goats, 1 Sam. xxiv. 2; and in the wilderness of Ziph, 1 Sam. xxvi. 2, where lions used to lurk for their prey.

2. The power God hath over them to control and restrain them. He pleads, 1st. Lord, they are thy sword, and will any father suffer his sword to be drawn against his own children? As this is a reason why we should patiently bear the injuries of men, that they are but the instruments of the trouble, it comes originally from God, to whose will we are bound to submit, so it is an encouragement to us to hope both that their wrath shall praise him, and that the remainder thereof he will restrain, that they are God's sword, which he can manage as he pleaseth, which cannot move without him, and which he will sheath when he has done his work with it. 2nd. They are thy hand, by which thou dost chastise thy people, and make them feel thy displeasure. He therefore expects deliverance from God's hand, because from God's hand the trouble came; una eademque manus vulnus opemque tulit,—'the same hand wounds and heals.' There is no flying from God's hand, but by flying to it.

xvi. 10. "Hell" here is not the place of punishment, but the unseen world. The passage is applied as prophetic to Christ, in Acts ii. 27.

xvii. 1. The first words are literally "Hear righteousness, O Lord." The Syriac is, "Hear, O Holy Lord; regard my petition, and listen to my prayer, which is not from deceitful lips." The Hebrew may be translated, "Hear me in righteousness, O Lord; give heed to my cry; listen to my prayer, which is not upon deceitful lips."

xvii. 2. Literally, "Let my judgment proceed from thy presence; may thine eyes behold the things that are right."

xvii. 3. "Thou hast proved" may here form part of a prayer, in which case the translation will be, "Prove my heart, visit me by night, and try me as with fire: thou wilt find nothing." The last clause is obscure, and is variously translated. Fürst has, "My thinking did not go beyond my mouth." Another explanation is, "In that which I designed my mouth did not transgress." The Vulgate and some

It is very comfortable, when we are in fear of the power of man, to see it dependent upon, and in subjection to, the power of God: see Isa. x. 6, 7, 15.

3. Their outward prosperity, ver. 14. Lord, appear against them; for, 1st. They are entirely devoted to the world, and care not for thee and thy favour. They are men of the world, acted by the spirit of the world, walking according to the course of this world, in love with the wealth and pleasure of this world, eager in the pursuits of it, and making them their business, and at ease in the enjoyments of it, and making them their bliss. They "have their portion in this life;" that is, they look upon the good things of this world as the best things, and sufficient to make them happy, and they choose them accordingly, place their felicity in them, aim at them as their chief good, rest satisfied with them, their souls take their ease in them, and they look no farther, nor are in any care to provide for another life. These things are their consolation, Lu. vi. 24; their good things, Lu. xvi. 25; their reward, Mat. vi. 5; the penny they agreed for, Mat. xx. 13. Now, Lord, shall men of this character be supported and countenanced against those that honour thee, by preferring thy favour before all the wealth in this world, and taking thee for their portion? Ps. xvi. 5. 2nd. They have abundance of the world. First. They have enlarged appetites, and a great deal wherewith to satisfy them; their "belly thou fillest with thy hid treasures." The things of this world are called treasures, because they are so accounted; otherwise to a soul, and in comparison with eternal blessings, they are but trash. They are hid in the several parts of the creation, and hid in the sovereign disposals of Providence. They are God's hid treasures, for the earth is his and the fulness thereof, though the men of the world think it is their own, and forget God's property in it. They that fare deliciously every day, have their bellies filled with these hid treasures, and they will but fill the belly, 1 Cor. vi. 13; they will not fill the soul, they are not bread for that, nor can they satisfy, Isa. lv. 2. They are husks, and ashes, and wind; yet the most of men, having no care for their souls, but all for their bellies, take up with them. Secondly. They have numerous families, and a great deal to leave to them. "They are full of children," and yet their pasture is not overstocked, they have enough for them all, "and leave the rest of their substance to their babes," that is, to their grand-children; and this is their heaven, it is their bliss, it is their all. Lord, saith David, Deliver me from them; that is, let not me have my portion with them; deliver me from their designs against me, for, they having so much wealth and power, I am not able to deal with them unless the Lord be on my side.

4. He pleads his own dependence upon God as his portion and happiness. They have their portion in this life, but as for me, ver. 15, I am none of them, I have but little of the world; nec habeo, nec careo, nec curo,—'I neither have, nor need, nor care for it.' It is the vision and fruition of God that I place my happiness in, that is it I hope for, and comfort myself with the hopes of, and thereby distinguish myself from those that "have their portion in this life." Beholding God's face with satisfaction may be considered, 1st. As our duty and comfort in this world. We must in righteousness (clothed with Christ's righteousness, having a good heart, and a good life,) by faith behold God's face, and set him always before us; entertain ourselves from day to day with the contemplation of the beauty of the Lord; and when we awake every morning we must be satisfied with his likeness set before us in his word, and with his likeness stamped upon us by his renewing grace. Our experience of God's favour to us, and our conformity to him, should yield us more satisfaction than they have whose belly is filled with the delights of sense. 2nd. As our recompence and happiness in the other world. With the prospect of that he concluded the foregoing psalm, and so this: that happiness is prepared and designed only for the righteous that are justified and sanctified. They shall be put in possession of it when they awake; when the soul awakes, at death, out of its slumber in the body, and when the body awakes, at the resurrection, out of its slumber in the grave. That blessedness will consist in three things: First. The immediate vision of God and his glory, "I shall behold thy face," not as in this world through a glass darkly. The knowledge of God will there be perfected, and the enlarged intellects filled with it. Secondly. The participations of his likeness; our holiness will there be perfect. This results from the former; 1 Jno. iii. 2, "when he shall appear we shall" therefore "be like him, for we shall see him as he is." Thirdly. A complete and full satisfaction resulting from this. "I shall be satisfied," abundantly satisfied with it. There is no satisfaction for a soul but in God, and in his face and likeness, his good-will towards us, and his good work in us; and even that satisfaction will not be perfect till we come to heaven.

PSALM XVIII.

This psalm we met with before in the history of David's life, 2 Sam. xxii. That was the first edition of it; here we have it revived, altered a little, and fitted for the service of the church. It is David's thanksgiving for the many deliverances God had wrought for him, which he desired always to preserve fresh in his own memory, and to diffuse and entail the knowledge of them. It is an admirable composure. The poetry is very fine, the images bold, the expressions lofty, and every word proper and significant. But the piety far exceeds the poetry; holy faith, and love, and joy, and praise, and hope, are here lively, active, and upon the wing. I. He triumphs in God, ver. 1—3. II. He magnifies the deliverances God had wrought for him, ver. 4—19. III. He takes the comfort of his integrity which God had thereby cleared up, ver. 20—28. IV. He gives to God the glory of all his achievements, ver. 29—42. V. He encourageth himself with the expectation of what God would farther do for him and his, ver. 43—50.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David, the servant of the LORD, who spake unto the LORD the words of this song in the day that the LORD delivered him from the hand of all his enemies, and from the hand of Saul: And he said,

I WILL love thee, O LORD, my strength.
2 The LORD is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer;
My God, my strength, in whom I will trust; [tower.
My buckler, and the horn of my salvation, and my high
3 I will call upon the LORD, who is worthy to be praised:
So shall I be saved from mine enemies.
4 The sorrows of death compassed me,
And the floods of ungodly men made me afraid.
5 The sorrows of hell compassed me about:
The snares of death prevented me [my God:
6 In my distress I called upon the LORD, and cried unto
He heard my voice out of his temple,
And my cry came before him, even into his ears.
7 Then the earth shook and trembled;
The foundations also of the hills moved and were shaken,
Because he was wroth.
8 There went up a smoke out of his nostrils,
And fire out of his mouth devoured:
Coals were kindled by it.
9 He bowed the heavens also, and came down:
And darkness was under his feet.
10 And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly:
Yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind.
11 He made darkness his secret place;
His pavilion round about him
Were dark waters and thick clouds of the skies.
12 At the brightness that was before him his thick clouds [passed,
Hail stones and coals of fire.
13 The LORD also thundered in the heavens,
And the Highest gave his voice;
Hail stones and coals of fire.
14 Yea, he sent out his arrows, and scattered them;
And he shot out lightnings, and discomfited them.
15 Then the channels of waters were seen,
And the foundations of the world were discovered
At thy rebuke, O LORD,
At the blast of the breath of thy nostrils.
16 He sent from above, he took me,
He drew me out of many waters.
17 He delivered me from my strong enemy,
And from them which hated me:
For they were too strong for me.
18 They prevented me in the day of my calamity:
But the LORD was my stay.
19 He brought me forth also into a large place;
He delivered me, because he delighted in me.

The title gives us the occasion of penning this psalm. We had it before 2 Sam. xxii. 1, only here we are told that the psalm was delivered "to the chief musician," or precentor in the temple songs. Note, The private composures of good men, designed by them for their own use, may be serviceable to the public, that others may not only borrow light from their candle, but heat from their fire. Examples sometimes teach better than rules; and David is here called "the servant of the Lord," as Moses was, not only as every good man is God's servant, but because with his sceptre, with his sword, and with his pen, he greatly promoted the interests of God's kingdom in Israel. It was more his honour that he was a servant of the Lord than that he was king of a great kingdom; and so he himself accounted it, Ps. cxvi. 16, "O Lord, truly I am thy servant." In these verses,

First. He triumphs in God, and his relation to him. The first words of the psalm, "I will love thee, O Lord, my strength," are here prefixed as the scope and contents of the whole. Love to God is the first and great commandment of the law, because it is the principle of all our acceptable praise and obedience; and this use we should make of all the mercies God bestows upon us, our hearts should thereby be enlarged in love to him. This he requires, and will accept; and we are very ungrateful if we grudge him so poor a return. An interest in the person loved is the lover's delight; this string therefore he touches, and on this he harps with a great deal of pleasure; ver. 2, The Lord, Jehovah, is my God; and then, he is my rock, my fortress, all that which I need and can desire in my present distress; for there is that in God which is suited to all the exigences and occasions of his people that trust in him. He is my rock, and strength, and fortress; that is, 1. I have found him so in the greatest dangers and difficulties. 2. I have chosen him to be so, disclaiming all others, and depending upon him alone to protect me. Those that truly love God may thus triumph in him as theirs; and may with confidence call upon him, ver. 3. This farther use we should make of our deliverances, we must not only love God the better, but love prayer the better. Call upon him as long as we live, especially in time of trouble, with an assurance that so we shall be saved; for thus it is written, that "whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved," Acts ii. 21.

Secondly. He sets himself to greaten the deliverances God had wrought for him, that he might be the more affected in his returns of praise. It is good for us to observe all the circumstances of a mercy, which magnify the power of God and his goodness to us in it.

1. The more imminent and threatening the danger was out of which we were delivered the greater is the mercy of the deliverance. David now remembered how the forces of his enemies poured in upon him, which he calls the floods of Belial, shoals of the children of Belial, likely to overpower him with numbers. They surrounded him, compassed him about; they surprised him, and by that means were very near seizing him; their snares prevented him; and when without were fightings within were fears and sorrows, ver. 4, 5. His spirit was overwhelmed, and he looked upon himself as a gone man: see Ps. cxvi. 2.

2. The more earnest we have been with God for deliverance, and the more direct answer it is to our prayers, the more we are obliged to be thankful. David's deliverances were so, ver. 6. David was found a praying man, and God was found a prayer-hearing God. If we pray as he did, we shall speed as he did. Though distress drive us to prayer, God will not therefore be deaf to us; nay, being a God of pity, he will be the more ready to succour us.

3. The more wonderful God's appearances are in any deliverance the others of the ancient authorities arrange the words differently, and with a different pointing in part; it is thus represented by the modern Komish version of verses 3 and 4:—"Thou hast proved my heart, and visited it by night; thou hast tried me by fire; and iniquity hath not been found in me: that my mouth may not speak the words of men; for the sake of the words of thy lips I have kept hard ways." "Hard ways" here are firm and solid paths; but the authorised version is better.

xvii. 10. The figurative phrase, "They are inclosed in their own fat," must be explained of the insensibility and want of commiseration which the enemies of the psalmist exhibited. Several other figures appear in the following verses, in which some of the old translations greatly vary, but the ordinary rendering is in the main correct.

xviii. Title. The composition of this psalm is also ascribed to David in 2 Sam. xxii., where there is another copy of it, with some greater it is. Such were the deliverances wrought for David, in which God's manifestation of his presence and glorious attributes is most magnificently described, ver. 7, &c. Little appeared of man, but much of God, in these deliverances. 1st. He appeared a God of almighty power; for he made the earth shake and tremble, and moved even the foundations of the hills, ver. 7, as of old at mount Sinai. When the men of the earth were struck with fear, then the earth might be said to tremble; when the great men of the earth were put into confusion, then the hills moved. 2nd. He shewed his anger and displeasure against the enemies and persecutors of his people. He was wroth, ver. 7. His wrath smoked, it burned, it was fire, it was devouring fire, ver. 8; and coals were kindled by it. Those that by their own sins make themselves as coals (that is, fuel) to this fire, will be consumed by it. He that "ordaineth his arrows against the persecutors, sendeth them forth" when he pleaseth, and they are sure to hit the mark, and do execution; for those arrows are lightnings, ver. 14. 3rd. He shewed his readiness to plead his people's cause, and work deliverance for them; for "he rode upon a cherub, and did fly," for the maintaining of right, and the relieving his distressed servants, ver. 10. No opposition, no obstruction, can be given to him "who rideth upon the wings of the wind, who rides on the heavens for the help of his people, and in his excellency on the skies." 4th. He shewed his condescension, in taking cognizance of David's case; "He bowed the heavens and came down," ver. 9; did not send an angel, but came himself, as one afflicted in the afflictions of his people. 5th. He wrapped himself in darkness, and yet commanded light to shine out of darkness for his people, Isa. xlv. 15. He is a God that hideth himself; for "he made darkness his pavilion," ver. 11. His glory is invisible, his counsels are unsearchable, and his proceedings unaccountable; and so, as to us, "clouds and darkness are round about him." We know not the way that he takes, even when he is coming towards us in ways of mercy; but when his designs are secret they are kind; for, though he hide himself, he is the God of Israel, the Saviour; and, at his brightness the thick clouds pass, ver. 12, comfort returns, the face of affairs is changed, and that which was gloomy and threatening becomes serene and pleasant.

4. The greater the difficulties are that lie in the way of deliverance the more glorious the deliverance is. For the rescuing of David, the waters were to be divided till the very channels were seen. The earth was to be cloven till the very foundations of it were discovered, ver. 15. There were waters deep and many, waters out of which he was to be drawn, ver. 16, as Moses, who from thence had his name, because he was drawn out of the water literally, so David figuratively. His enemies were strong, and they hated him; had he been left to himself, they had been too strong for him, ver. 17; and they were too quick for him, for they prevented him in the day of his calamity, ver. 18. But in the midst of his troubles the Lord was his stay, so that he did not sink. Note, God will not only deliver his people out of their troubles in due time, but he will sustain them, and bear them up under their troubles in the meantime.

5. That which especially magnified the deliverance was, that his comfort was the fruit of it, and God's favour was the root and fountain of it. 1st. It was an introduction to his preferment; ver. 19, "He brought me forth also" out of my straits "into a large place," where I had not only room to turn me, but room to thrive. 2nd. It was a token of God's favour to him, and that made it doubly sweet. "He delivered me because he delighted in me," not for my merit, but for his own grace and good-will: compare this with 2 Sam. xv. 25, "If he thus say, I have no delight in thee, here I am." We owe our salvation, that great deliverance, to the delight God had in the Son of David, in whom he has declared himself to be well pleased.

In singing this, we must triumph in God, and trust in him. And we may apply it to Christ, the Son of David. The sorrows of death surrounded him; in his distress he prayed, Heb. v. 7; God made the earth to shake and tremble, and the rocks to rend, and brought him out in his resurrection into a large place, because he delighted in him and his undertaking.

20 The LORD rewarded me according to my righteousness;
According to the cleanness of my hands hath he recom-
21 For I have kept the ways of the LORD, [pensed me.
And have not wickedly departed from my God.
22 For all his judgments were before me,
And I did not put away his statutes from me
23 I was also upright before him,
And I kept myself from mine iniquity.
24 Therefore hath the LORD recompensed me
According to my righteousness,
According to the cleanness of my hands in his eyesight.
25 With the merciful thou wilt shew thyself merciful;
With an upright man thou wilt shew thyself upright;
26 With the pure thou wilt shew thyself pure;
And with the froward thou wilt shew thyself froward.
27 For thou wilt save the afflicted people;
But wilt bring down high looks.
28 For thou wilt light my candle:
The LORD my God will enlighten my darkness.

Here, First. David reflects with comfort upon his own integrity, and rejoiceth in the testimony of his conscience, that he had had his conversation in godly sincerity, and not with fleshly wisdom, 2 Cor. i. 12. His deliverances were an evidence of this, and this was the great comfort of his deliverances. His enemies had misrepresented him, and perhaps when his troubles continued long, he began to suspect himself; but, when God visibly took his part, he had both the credit and the comfort of his righteousness. 1. His deliverances cleared his innocency before men, and acquitted him from those crimes which he was falsely accused of. This he calls rewarding him according to his righteousness, ver. 20, 24; that is, determining the controversy between him and his enemies, according to the justice of his cause, and the cleanness of his hands from that sedition, treason, and rebellion with which he was charged. He had often appealed to God concerning his innocency; and now God had given judgment upon the appeal, as he always will, according to equity. 2. They confirmed the testimony of his own conscience for him, which he here reviews with a great deal of pleasure, ver. 21—23. His own heart knows and is ready to attest it, 1st. That he had kept firm to his duty, and had not departed, not wickedly, not wilfully, departed from his God. They that forsake the ways of the Lord do in effect depart from their God, and it is a wicked thing to do so. But though we are conscious to ourselves of many a stumble, and many a false step taken, yet, if we recover ourselves by repentance, and go on in the way of our duty, it shall not be construed a departure, for it is not a wicked departure from our God. 2nd. That he had kept his eye upon the rule of God's commands; ver. 22, "All his judgments were before me," and I had a respect to them all, despised none as little, disliked none as hard, but made it my care and business to conform to them all. His statutes I did not put away from me, out of my sight, out of my mind, but kept my eye always upon them, and did not as those who, because they would quit the ways of the Lord, desire not the knowledge of those ways. 3rd. That he had kept himself from his iniquity, and thereby had approved himself upright before God. Constant care to abstain from that sin, whatever it be, which doth most easily beset us, and to mortify the habit of it, will be a good evidence for us that we are upright before God. As David's deliverances cleared his integrity, so did the exaltation of Christ clear his, and for ever roll away the reproach that was cast upon him; and therefore he is said to be "justified in the Spirit," 1 Tim. iii. 16.

Secondly. He takes occasion from thence to lay down the rules of God's government and judgment, that we may know not only what God expects from us, but what we may expect from him, ver. 25, 26. 1. Those that shew mercy to others (even they need mercy, and cannot depend upon the merit, no, not of their works of mercy, and they) shall find mercy with God, Mat. v. 7. 2. Those that are faithful to their covenants with God, and the relations wherein they stand to him, shall find him all that to them which he has promised to be. Wherever God finds an upright man he will be found an upright God. 3. Those that serve God with a pure conscience, shall find that the words of the Lord are pure words, that is, very sure to be depended on, and very sweet to be delighted in. 4. Those that resist God, and walk contrary to him, he will resist them, and walk contrary to them, Lev. xxvi. 21, 24.

Thirdly. From thence he speaks comfort to the humble; "Thou wilt save the afflicted people," that are wronged and bear it patiently. Terror to the proud; "Thou wilt bring down high looks," that aim high and expect great things for themselves, and look with scorn and disdain upon the poor and pious. And encouragement to himself; "Thou wilt light my candle," that is, thou wilt revive and comfort my sorrowful spirit, and not leave me melancholy; thou wilt recover me out of my troubles, and restore me to peace and prosperity; thou wilt make my honour bright, which is now eclipsed; thou wilt guide my way, and make it plain before me, that I may avoid the snares laid for me; thou wilt light my candle to work by, and give me an opportunity of serving thee and the interests of thy kingdom among men.

Let those that walk in darkness, and labour under many discouragements, in singing these verses, encourage themselves that God himself will be a light to them.

29 For by thee I have run through a troop;
And by my God have I leaped over a wall.
30 As for God, his way is perfect:
The word of the LORD is tried:
He is a buckler to all those that trust in him.
31 For who is God save the LORD?
Or who is a rock save our God?
32 It is God that girdeth me with strength,
And maketh my way perfect.
33 He maketh my feet like hinds' feet,
And setteth me upon my high places.
34 He teacheth my hands to war,
So that a bow of steel is broken by mine arms.
35 Thou hast also given me the shield of thy salvation:
And thy right hand hath holden me up,
And thy gentleness hath made me great.
36 Thou hast enlarged my steps under me,
That my feet did not slip.
37 I have pursued mine enemies, and overtaken them:
Neither did I turn again till they were consumed.
38 I have wounded them that they were not able to rise:
They are fallen under my feet.
39 For thou hast girded me with strength unto the battle:
Thou hast subdued under me those that rose up against me.
40 Thou hast also given me the necks of mine enemies;
That I might destroy them that hate me.
41 They cried, but there was none to save them:
Even unto the LORD, but he answered them not.
42 Then did I beat them small as the dust before the wind:
I did cast them out as the dirt in the streets.
43 Thou hast delivered me from the strivings of the people;
And thou hast made me the head of the heathen:
A people whom I have not known shall serve me.
44 As soon as they hear of me, they shall obey me:
The strangers shall submit themselves unto me.
45 The strangers shall fade away,
And be afraid out of their close places.

various readings, as the omission of the first verse and other less considerable differences. The comparison of the two copies as they stand in our translation will be useful and instructive. The grandeur and power of the composition will be manifest even to such as have little acquaintance with the peculiarities of Hebrew poetry. It is admitted that there are some expressions which are obscure and abrupt, and yet the general scope and drift of this sacred psalm may be readily perceived. From verse 4 and onward to verse 16 there is a succession of bold hyperbole, not describing a series of facts in literal terms, but by a number of metaphors. The records of the life of David will be remembered as setting forth wondrous dangers and wondrous deliverances. The "temple," in verse 6, is, of course, not the Temple at Jerusalem, which was not built till later. The word may, however, apply to the Tabernacle. It is simply impossible to judge verses 7, &c., by our ordinary modes of thought and utterance. Nor can we think that all this is not more far-

And subdueth the people unto me.
48 He delivereth me from mine enemies: [me:

And sheweth mercy to his anointed,
To David, and to his seed for evermore.

FROM SCULPTURES AT PERSEPOLIS.—ver. 40.

In these verses,

First. David looks back with thankfulness upon the great things which God had done for him. He had not only wrought deliverance for him, but had given him victory and success, and made him triumph over those who thought to have triumphed over him. When we set ourselves to praise God for one mercy, we must be led by that to observe the many more with which we have been compassed about and followed all our days. Many things had contributed to David's advancement, and he owns the hand of God in them all, to teach us to do likewise, in reviewing the several steps by which we have risen to our prosperity. 1. God had given him all his skill and understanding in military affairs, which he was not bred up to, nor designed for, his genius leading him more to music and poetry, and a contemplative life. "He teacheth my hands to war," ver. 34. 2. God had given him bodily strength to go through the business and fatigue of war; God girded him with strength, ver. 32, 39, to that degree, that he could break even a bow of steel, ver. 34. What service God designs men for he will be sure to fit them for. 3. God had likewise given him great swiftness, not to flee from the enemies, but to fly upon them; ver. 33, "He maketh my feet like hinds' feet;" ver. 36, "Thou hast enlarged my steps under me," but (whereas those that take large steps are apt to tread awry) "my feet did not slip." He was so swift that he pursued his enemies and overtook them, ver. 37. 4. God had made him very bold and daring in his enterprises, and given him spirit proportionable to his strength. If a troop stood in his way, he made nothing of running through them; if a wall, he made nothing of leaping over it, ver. 29; if ramparts and bulwarks, he soon mounted them, and, by Divine assistance, set his feet upon the high places of the enemy, ver. 33. 5. God had protected him, and kept him safe in the midst of the greatest perils. Many a time he put his life in his hand, and yet it was wonderfully preserved. "Thou hast given me the shield of thy salvation," ver. 35, and that has compassed me on every side. By that I have been "delivered from the strivings of the people," that aimed at my destruction, ver. 43, particularly from the violent man, ver. 48, namely, Saul, who more than once threw a javelin at him. 6. God had prospered and succeeded him in his designs. He it was that made his way perfect, ver. 32; and it was his right hand that held him up, ver. 35. 7. God had given him victory over his enemies, the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, and all that fought against Israel. Those especially he means, yet not excluding the house of Saul, which opposed his coming to the crown; and the partisans of Absalom and Sheba, that would have deposed him. He enlargeth much upon the goodness of God to him in defeating his enemies, attributing his victories not to his own sword or bow, or the valour of his mighty men, but to the favour of God. I pursued them, ver. 37, I wounded them, ver. 38, "for thou hast girded me with strength," ver. 39. else I could not have done it. All the praise is ascribed to God; Thou hast subdued them under me, ver. 39. Thou hast given me their necks, ver. 40, not only to trample upon them, as Jos. x. 24, but to cut them off. Even those that hated David whom God loved, and were enemies to the Israel of God, yet in their distress "cried unto the Lord," but in vain, "he answered them not." How could they expect he should, when it was he they fought against? And when he disowned them, (as he will all those that act against his people,) no other succours could stand them in stead, "there was none to save them," ver. 41. Those whom God has abandoned are easily vanquished: "Then did I beat them small as the dust," ver. 43; but those whose cause is just he avengeth, ver. 47; and those whom he favours will certainly be lifted up above those that rise up against them, ver. 42. 8. God had raised him to the throne, and not only delivered him and kept him alive, but dignified him, and made him great, ver. 35. 'Thy gentleness hath increased me;' thy discipline and instruction, so some. The good lessons David learned in his affliction prepared him for the dignity and power that were intended him; and the lessening of him helped very much to greaten him. God made him not only a great conqueror, but a great ruler; "Thou hast made me the head of the heathen," ver. 43. All the neighbour nations were tributaries to him: see 2 Sam. viii. 6, 11. In all this David was a type of Christ, whom the Father brought safely through his conflicts with the powers of darkness, and made victorious over them, and gave "to be head over all things to his church, which is his body."

Secondly. David looks up with humble and reverent adorations of the Divine glory and perfection. When God had by his providence magnified him, he endeavours with his praises to magnify God, to bless him, and exalt him, ver. 46. He gives honour to him, 1. As a living God: "The Lord liveth," ver. 46. We had our lives at first from, and we owe the continuance of them to, that God who has life in himself, and therefore is fitly called, the living God. The gods of the heathen were dead gods; the best friends we have among men are dying friends; but God lives, lives for ever, and will not fail those that trust in him, but, because he lives, they shall live also, for he is their life. 2. As a finishing God: "As for God," he is not only perfect himself, but "his way is perfect," ver. 30. He is known by his name Jehovah, Ex. vi. 3, a God performing and perfecting what he begins, in providence as well as creation, Gen. ii. 1. If it was God that made David's way perfect, ver. 32, much more is his own so. There is no flaw in God's works, nor any fault to be found with what he doth, Eccl. iii. 14. And what he undertakes he will go through with, whatever difficulties lie in the way. What God begins to build, he is able to finish. 3. As a faithful God: "The word of the Lord is tried." I have tried it, saith David, and it has not failed me. All the saints in all ages have tried it, and it never failed any that trusted in it. It is tried as silver is tried, refined from all such mixture and alloy as lessen the value of men's words. David, in God's providences concerning him, takes notice of the performance of his promises to him, which, as it puts sweetness into the providence, so it puts honour upon the promise. 4. As the protector and defender of his people. David had found him so to him: He is "the God of my salvation," ver. 46, by whose power and grace I am and hope to be saved. But not of mine only, "He is a buckler to all those that trust in him," ver. 30. He shelters and protects them all; is both able and ready to do so. 5. As a nonsuch in all this, ver. 31. There is a God, and "Who is God, save Jehovah?" That God is a rock for the support and shelter of his faithful worshippers, and "Who is a rock, save our God?" Thus he not only gives glory to God, but encourages his own faith in him. Note, 1st. Whoever pretend to be deities, it is certain there is no God save the Lord, all others are counterfeits, Isa. xliv. 8; Jer. x. 10. 2nd. Whoever pretend to be our felicities, there is no Rock save our God; none that we can depend upon to make us happy.

Thirdly. David looks forward with a believing hope that God would still do him good. He promiseth himself, 1. That his enemies should be completely subdued, and those of them that yet remain should be made his footstool. That his government should be extensive, so that even a people whom he had not known should serve him, ver. 43. That his conquests, and consequently his acquests, should be easy; "As soon as they hear of me they shall obey me," ver. 44; and that his enemies should be convinced that it was to no purpose to oppose him. Even those that are retired to their fastnesses shall not trust to them, but "be afraid out of their close places," having seen so much of David's wisdom, courage, and success. Thus the Son of David, though he sees not yet all things put under him, yet knows he shall reign till all opposing rule, principality, and power shall be quite put down. 2. That his seed should be for ever continued in the Messiah, who he foresaw should come from his loins, ver. 50. He "sheweth mercy to his Anointed," his Messiah, to David himself, the Anointed of the God of Jacob in the type, "and to his seed for evermore." "He saith not unto seeds, as of many, but to his seed, as of one, that is Christ," Gal. iii. 16. It is he only that shall "reign for ever, and of the increase of whose government and peace there shall be no end." Christ is called David, Hos. iii. 5. God has called him his king, Ps. ii. 6. "Great deliverance doth God give," and will give "to him, and to" his church and people, here called "his seed, for evermore."

And in singing these verses we must give God the glory of the victories of Christ and his church hitherto, and all the deliverances and advancements of the gospel kingdom; and encourage ourselves and one another with an assurance that the church militant will shortly be triumphant, will be eternally so.

PSALM XIX.

There are two excellent books which the great God hath published for the instruction and edification of the children of men, and this psalm treats of them both, and recommends them both to our diligent study. I. The book of the creatures, in which we may easily read the power and godhead of the Creator, ver. 1—6. II. The book of the Scriptures, which makes known to us the will of God concerning our duty. He shews the excellency and usefulness of that book, ver. 7—11; and then teacheth us how to improve it, ver. 12—14.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

THE heavens declare the glory of God;
And the firmament sheweth his handywork.
2 Day unto day uttereth speech,
And night unto night sheweth knowledge.
3 There is no speech nor language,
Where their voice is not heard.
4 Their line is gone out through all the earth,
And their words to the end of the world.
In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun,
5 Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber,
And rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race.
6 His going forth is from the end of the heaven,
And his circuit unto the ends of it:
And there is nothing hid from the heat thereof.

From the things that are seen every day by all the world the Psalmist, in these verses, leads us to the consideration of the invisible things of God, whose being appears incontestably evident, and whose glory shines transcendently bright in the visible heavens, the structure and beauty of them, and the order and influence of the heavenly bodies. This instance of the Divine power serves not only to shew the folly of atheists, who see there is a heaven, and yet say there is no God; who see the effect, and yet say there is no cause; but to shew the folly of idolaters also, and the vanity of their imaginations who, though "the heavens declare the glory of God," yet gave that glory to the lights of heaven, which those very lights directed them to give to God only, the Father of lights. Now observe here, reaching than the experience of David, in whose life no parallel events appear to have occurred.

xviii. 49. The goyim, here called "heathen," were such, no doubt, but the allusion is to Gentiles, and not idolaters as such.

xviii. 50. Literally it is, "He magnifieth the deliverance of his king, and doeth kindness to his anointed one, to David, and to his seed for ever."

xix. 3. Other explanations have been given, as "Without speech, without words, without their voice being heard;" or, "There is no speech, there are no words, their voice is not heard." It seems necessary to understand a visible but silent witness to God, and the "speech" of verse 2 and the "words" of verse 4 must be viewed accordingly.

xix. 5. Translate, "And he as a bridegroom cometh out of his chamber; he rejoiceth as a mighty man to run on his way"—that is, his daily course.

First. What that is which the creatures notify to us. They are many ways useful and serviceable to us, but in nothing so much as in this, that they declare the glory of God, by shewing his handywork, ver. 1. They plainly speak themselves to be God's handyworks; for they could not exist from eternity. All succession and motion must have had a beginning; they could not make themselves, that is a contradiction; they could not be produced by a casual hit of atoms, that is an absurdity, fit rather to be bantered than reasoned with; therefore they must have a creator, who can be no other than an eternal mind, infinitely wise, powerful, and good. Thus it appears they are God's works, the work of his fingers, Ps. viii. 2, and therefore they declare his glory. From the excellency of the work we may easily infer the infinite perfection of its great Author. From the brightness of the heavens we may collect that the Creator is light; their vastness of extent speaks his immensity; their height, his transcendency and sovereignty; their influence upon this earth, his dominion, and providence, and universal beneficence; and all declare his almighty power, by which they were at first made, and continue to this day, according to the ordinances that were then settled.

Secondly. What are some of those things which do notify this?

1. The heavens and the firmament. The vast expanse of air and ether, and the spheres of the planets, and fixed stars. Man has this advantage above the beasts in the structure of his body, that, whereas they are made to look downward, as their spirits must go, he is made erect to look upwards, because upwards his spirit must shortly go, and his thoughts should now rise.

2. The constant and regular succession of day and night, ver. 2. Day unto day, and night unto night, speak the glory of that God who first divided between the light and the darkness, and has from the beginning to this day preserved that established order without variation, according to God's covenant with Noah, Gen. viii. 22, that "while the earth remains, day and night shall not cease," to which covenant of providence the covenant of grace is compared for its stability, Jer. xxxiii. 20; xxxi. 35. The counterchanging of day and night in so exact a method is a great instance of the power of God, and calls us to observe that, as in the kingdom of nature, so in that of providence, he forms the light and creates the darkness, Isa. xlv. 7, and sets the one over against the other. It is likewise an instance of his goodness to man, for he makes the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice, Ps. lxv. 8. Not only glorifies himself, but gratifies us by this constant revolution; for, as the light of the morning befriends the business of the day, so the shadows of the evening befriend the repose of the night. Every day and every night speaks the goodness of God, and, when it has finished its testimony, leaves it to the next day, to the next night, to say the same.

3. The light and influence of the sun doth in a special manner declare the glory of God; for, of all the heavenly bodies, that is the most conspicuous in itself, and most useful to this lower world, which would be all dungeon and all desert without it. It is not an improbable conjecture, that David penned this psalm when he had the rising sun in view, and from the brightness of it took occasion to declare the glory of God. Concerning the sun, observe here, 1st. The place appointed him. In the heavens God hath set a tabernacle for the sun. The heavenly bodies are called hosts of heaven, and therefore are fitly said to dwell in tents, as soldiers in their encampments. The sun is said to have a tabernacle set him, not only because he is in continual motion, and never has a fixed residence; but because the mansion he has will, at the end of time, be taken down like a tent, when the heavens shall be rolled together like a scroll, and the sun shall be turned into darkness. 2nd. The course assigned him. That glorious creature was not made to be idle, but his going forth (at least as it appears to our eye) is from one point of the heavens, and his circuit from thence to the opposite point, and thence, to complete his diurnal revolution, to the same point again; and this with such steadiness and constancy, that we can certainly foretell what hour and what minute the sun will rise at such a place any day to come. 3rd. The brightness wherein he appears. He "is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber," richly dressed up and adorned, as fine as hands can make him, looking pleasantly himself, and making all about him pleasant; for "the friend of the bridegroom rejoiceth greatly to hear the bridegroom's voice," Jno. iii. 29. 4th. The cheerfulness wherewith he makes his tour. Though it seems a vast round he has to walk, and he has not a moment's rest, yet, in obedience to the law of his creation, and for the service of man, he not only doth it, but doth it with a great deal of pleasure, and "rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race." With such satisfaction did Christ, the Sun of Righteousness, finish the work that was given him to do. 5th. His universal influence on this earth: "There is nothing hid from the heat thereof," no, not metals in the bowels of the earth, which the sun has an influence upon.

Thirdly. To whom this declaration is made of the glory of God. It is made to all parts of the world; ver. 3, 4, "there is no speech nor language," (that is, no nation, for the nations were divided after their tongues, Gen. x. 32,) "where their voice is not heard. Their line is gone through all the earth," (the equinoctial line, suppose,) "and" with it "their words to the end of the world," proclaiming the eternal power of the God of nature, ver. 4. The apostle useth this as a reason why the Jews should not be angry with him and others for preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles, because God had already made himself known to the Gentile world by the works of creation, and left not himself without witness among them, Rom. x. 18; so that they were without excuse if they were idolaters, Rom. i. 20, 21. And those were without blame that by preaching the Gospel to them endeavoured to turn them from their idolatry. If God used these means to prevent their apostacy, and they proved ineffectual, the apostles did well to use other means to recover them from it. 'They have no speech or language,' (so some read it,) 'and yet their voice is heard.' All people may hear these natural, immortal preachers speak to them in their own tongue the wonderful works of God.

And in singing these verses we must give God the glory of all the comfort and benefit we have by the lights of heaven, still looking above and beyond them to the Sun of Righteousness.

7 The law of the LORD is perfect, converting the soul:
The testimony of the LORD is sure, making wise the simple.
8 The statutes of the LORD are right, rejoicing the heart:
The commandment of the LORD is pure, enlightening the eyes.
9 The fear of the LORD is clean, enduring for ever:
The judgments of the LORD are true and righteous altogether.
10 More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold:
Sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb.
11 Moreover by them is thy servant warned:
And in keeping of them there is great reward.
12 Who can understand his errors?
Cleanse thou me from secret faults.
13 Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins;
Let them not have dominion over me:
Then shall I be upright,
And I shall be innocent from the great transgression.
14 Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart,
Be acceptable in thy sight,
O LORD, my strength, and my redeemer.

God's glory, that is, his goodness to man, appears much in the works of creation, but much more in and by Divine revelation. The holy Scripture, as it is a rule both of our duty to God and of our expectation from him, is of much greater use and benefit to us than day or night, than the air we breathe in, or the light of the sun. The discoveries made of God by his works might have served if man had retained his integrity; but to recover him out of his fallen state another course must be taken, that must be done by the Word of God. And here,

First. The Psalmist gives an account of the excellent properties and uses of the Word of God, in six sentences, ver. 7—9, in each of which the name Jehovah is repeated, and no vain repetition, for the law has its authority and all its excellency from the lawmaker. Here are six several titles of the Word of God, to take in the whole of Divine revelation, precepts and promises, and especially the Gospel. Here are several good properties of it which prove its Divine original, which recommend it to our affection, and which extol it above all other laws whatsoever. And here are several good effects of the law upon the minds of men, which shew what it is designed for, what use we are to make of it, and how wonderful the efficacy of Divine grace is, going along with it, and working by it.

1. "The law of the Lord is perfect." It is perfectly free from all corruption, perfectly filled with all good, and perfectly fitted for the end for which it is designed. It will make the man of God perfect, 2 Tim. iii. 17. Nothing is to be added to it, or taken from it. It is of use to convert the soul, to bring us back to ourselves, to our God, to our duty; for it shews us our sinfulness and misery in our departures from God, and the indispensable necessity of our return to him.

2. "The testimony of the Lord" (which witnesseth for him to us) "is sure," incontestably and inviolably sure, what we may give credit to, may rely upon, and may be confident it will not deceive us. It is a sure discovery of Divine truth, a sure direction in the way of duty. It is a sure fountain of living comforts, and a sure foundation of lasting hopes. It is of use to make us wise, wise to salvation, 2 Tim. iii. 15. It will give us an insight into things Divine, and a foresight of things to come. It will employ us in the best work, and secure to us our true interests. It will make even the simple wise, for their souls and eternity, who yet are no conjurers (as we say) for this world. Those that are humbly simple, that is, sensible of their own folly, and willing to be taught, those shall be made wise by the Word of God, Ps. xxv. 9.

3. "The statutes of the Lord," (enacted by his authority, and binding to all, wherever they come,) they "are right," exactly agreeing with the eternal rules and principles of good and evil; that is, with the right reason of man, and the right counsels of God. All God's precepts concerning all things are right, Ps. cxix. 128, just as they should be, and they will set us to rights if we receive them, and submit to them; and, because they are right, they rejoice the heart. The law, as we see it in the hands of Christ, gives cause for joy; and when it is written in our hearts it lays a foundation for lasting joy, by restoring us to our right mind.

4. "The commandment of the Lord is pure." It is clear without darkness, it is clean without dross and defilement; it is itself purified from all alloy, and is purifying to those that receive and embrace it; it is the ordinary means which the Spirit useth in "enlightening the eyes;" it brings us to a sight and sense of our sin and misery, and directs us in the way of duty.

5. "The fear of the Lord," that is, true religion and godliness prescribed in the Word, reigning in the heart, and practised in the life, "is clean," clean itself, and it will make us clean, Jno. xv. 3; it will cleanse our way, Ps. cxix. 9; and it "endureth for ever," that is, it is of perpetual obligation, and can never be repealed. The ceremonial law is long since done away, but the law concerning the fear of God is ever the same. Time will not alter the nature of moral good and evil.

6. "The judgments of the Lord," all his precepts, which are framed in infinite wisdom, they "are true." They are grounded upon the most sacred and unquestionable truths; they are righteous, all consonant to natural equity; and they are so altogether, there is no unrighteousness in any of them, but they are all of a piece.

Secondly. He expresseth the great value he had for the Word of God, and the great advantage he had and hoped to have by it, ver. 10, 11.

1. See how highly he prized the commandments of God. It is the character of all good people that they prefer their religion and the Word of God, 1st. Far before all the wealth of the world. It is more desirable than gold, than fine gold, than much fine gold. Gold is of the earth, earthly; but grace is the image of the heavenly. Gold is only for the body, and the concerns of time; but grace is for the soul, and the concerns of eternity. 2nd. Far before all the pleasures and delights of sense. The Word of God, received by faith, is sweet to the soul, "sweeter than honey, and the honeycomb." The pleasures of sense are the delight of brutes, and therefore debase the great soul of man; the pleasures of religion are the delight of angels, and exalt the soul. The pleasures of sense are deceitful, will soon surfeit, and yet never satisfy; but those of religion are substantial and satisfying, and there is no danger of exceeding in them.

2. See what use he made of the precepts of God's Word; "By them is thy servant warned." The Word of God is a word of warning to the children of men; it warns us of the duty we are to do, the dangers we are to avoid, and the deluge we are to prepare for, Eze. iii. 17; xxxiii. 7; it warns the wicked not to go on in his wicked way, and warns the righteous not to turn from his good way. And all that are indeed God's servants take this warning.

3. See what advantages he promised himself by his obedience to God's precepts; "In keeping of them there is great reward." Those that make conscience of their duty will not only be no losers by it, but unspeakable gainers. There is a reward not only after keeping, but in keeping; God's commandments; a present great reward of obedience in obedience. Religion is health and honour, xix. 7—9. In these verses the words rendered "law," "testimony," "statutes," "commandment," "fear," and "judgments" may be regarded as exhibiting the precepts of God's revelation in divers aspects. "The law" is a general term, and may be taken as including all the rest, although it is the special designation for the whole Pentateuch, which the Jews still call the "Torah," or law. This law brings back and turns to God the wandering soul. "The testimony" or witness which the Lord has given is true, and makes the simple wise. "The precepts" of God, the things which he enjoins, are right and rejoice the heart; and his pure "command" enlightens men's eyes, by pointing to duties which they could not see. The reverence or "fear" which he requires is spotless, and endures perpetually. Perhaps "fear" may mean the religion or worship of God generally. His "judgments" are his decrees and decisions, and are based invariably on truth and rectitude. There is no valid objection against applying all this to the Scriptures.

it is peace and pleasure; it will make our comforts sweet, and our crosses easy; life truly valuable, and death itself truly desirable.

Thirdly. He draws some good inferences from this pious meditation upon the excellency of the Word of God. Such thoughts as these should excite in us devout affections, and then they are to good purpose.

1. He takes occasion from hence to make a penitent reflection upon his sins; for "by the law is the knowledge of sin." Is the commandment thus holy, just, and good? then "who can understand his errors?" I cannot, whoever can. From the rectitude of the Divine law he learns to call his sins his errors; if the commandment be true and righteous, every transgression of the commandment is an error, as grounded upon a mistake; every wicked practice takes rise from some corrupt principle, it is a deviation from the rule we are to work by, the way we are to walk in. From the extent, and strictness, and spiritual nature of the Divine law, he learns that his sins are so many that he cannot understand the number of them; and so exceeding sinful that he cannot understand the heinousness and malignity of them. We are guilty of many sins, which, through our carelessness and partiality to ourselves, we are not aware of; many we have been guilty of which we have forgotten; so that, when we have been never so particular in the confession of sin, we must conclude with an et cætera,—'and such like:' for God knows a great deal more evil by us than we do by ourselves. In many things we all offend, and who can tell how often he offends? It is well we are under grace, and not under the law, else we were undone.

2. He takes occasion from hence to pray against sin. All the discoveries of sin made us by the law should drive us to the throne of grace, there to pray, as David doth here,

1st. For mercy to pardon. Finding himself unable to instance in all the particulars of his transgressions, he cries out, "Lord, cleanse me from my secret faults;" not secret to God, so none are; nor only such as are secret to the world, but such as were hid from his own observation of himself. The best of men have reason to suspect themselves guilty of many secret faults, and to pray to God to cleanse them from that guilt, and not to lay it to their charge; for even our sins of infirmity and inadvertency, and our secret sins, would be our ruin, if God should deal with us according to the desert of them. Even secret faults are defiling, and render us unfit for communion with God; but when they are pardoned we are cleansed from them, 1 Jno. i. 7.

2nd. For grace to help in time of need. Having prayed that his sins of infirmity might be pardoned, he prays that presumptuous sins might be prevented, ver. 13. All that truly repent of their sins, and have them pardoned, are in care not to relapse into sin, nor to return again to folly, as appears by their prayers, which concur with David's here; where observe, First. His petition; "Keep me from" ever being guilty of a wilful, "presumptuous sin." We ought to pray that we may be kept from sins of infirmity, but especially from presumptuous sins, which most offend God, and wound conscience; which wither our comforts and shock our hopes. However, let none such have dominion over me, let me not be at the command of any such sin, nor be captive by it. Secondly. His plea; "So shall I be upright," that is, I shall appear upright; I shall preserve the evidence and comfort of my uprightness; "and I shall be innocent from the great transgression," so he calls a presumptuous sin, because no sacrifice was accepted for it, Num. xv. 28—30. Note, 1*st.* Presumptuous sins are very heinous and dangerous. Those that sin against the habitual convictions and actual admonitions of their own consciences, in contempt and defiance of the law and its sanctions, that sin with a high hand, they sin presumptuously, and it is a great transgression. 2*nd.* Even good men ought to be jealous of themselves, and afraid of sinning presumptuously, yea, though through the grace of God they have hitherto been kept from them. Let none be high-minded, but fear. 3*rd.* Being so much exposed, we have great need to pray to God, when we are pushing forward towards a presumptuous sin, to keep us back from it, either by his providence preventing the temptation, or by his grace giving us victory over it.

3. He takes occasion humbly to beg the Divine acceptance of those his pious thoughts and affections, ver. 14. Observe the connexion of this with what goes before: he prays to God to keep him from sin, and then begs he would accept his performances; for, if we favour our sins, we cannot expect God should favour us or our services, Ps. lxvi. 18. Observe, 1st. What his services were; the words of his mouth, and the meditations of his heart, that is, his holy affections offered up to God. The pious meditations of the heart must not be smothered, but expressed in the words of our mouth, for God's glory and the edification of others; and the words of our mouth in prayer and praise must not be formal, but arising from the meditation of the heart, Ps. xlv. 1. 2nd. What was his care concerning these services, that they might be acceptable with God, else what do they avail us? Gracious souls have all they aim at if they be accepted of God, for that is their bliss. 3rd. What encouragement he had to hope for this; because God was his strength and his redeemer. If we seek assistance from God, as our strength, in our religious duties, we may hope to find acceptance with God of our duties; for by his strength we have power with him.

In singing this we should get our hearts much affected with the excellency of the Word of God and delivered into it, and much affected with the evil of sin, the danger we are in of it, and the danger we are in by it, and fetch in help from Heaven against it.

PSALM XX.

It is the will of God that prayers, intercessions, and thanksgiving should be made, in a special manner, for kings and all in authority. This psalm is a prayer, and the next a thanksgiving, for the king. David was a martial prince, much in war. Either this psalm was penned upon occasion of some particular expedition of his, or in general, as a form to be used in the daily service of the church for him. In this psalm we may observe, I. What it is they beg of God for the king, ver. 1—4. II. With what assurance they beg it. The people triumph, ver. 5; the prince, ver. 6; both together, ver. 7, 8; and so he concludes with a prayer to God for audience, ver. 9. In this David may well be looked upon as a type of Christ, to whose kingdom, and its interests among men, the church was in every age a hearty well-wisher.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

THE LORD hear thee in the day of trouble;
The name of the God of Jacob defend thee;
2 Send thee help from the sanctuary,
And strengthen thee out of Zion.
3 Remember all thy offerings,
And accept thy burnt sacrifice; Selah.
4 Grant thee according to thine own heart,
And fulfil all thy counsel.
5 We will rejoice in thy salvation,
And in the name of our God we will set up our banners:
The LORD fulfil all thy petitions.

This prayer for David is entitled, a Psalm of David; nor was it any absurdity at all for him, who was divinely inspired, to draw up a directory, or form of prayer, to be used in the congregation for himself and those in authority under him; nay, it is very proper for those who desire the prayers of their friends to tell them particularly what they would have to be asked of God for them. Note, Even great and good men, and those that know never so well how to pray for themselves, yet must not despise, but earnestly desire, the prayers of others for them, even those that are their inferiors in all respects. Paul often begged of his friends to pray for him. Magistrates, and those in power, ought to esteem and encourage praying people, to reckon them their strength, Zec. xii. 5, 10, and to do what they can for them, that they may have an interest in their prayers, and may do nothing to forfeit it. Now observe here,

First. What it is that they are taught to ask of God for the king.

1. That God would answer his prayers. "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble," ver. 1, and "the Lord fulfil all thy petitions," ver. 5. Note, 1st. Even the greatest of men may be much in trouble. It was often a day of trouble with David himself, of disappointment and distress, of treading down, and of perplexity. Neither the crown on his head nor the grace in his heart would exempt him from trouble. 2nd. Even the greatest of men must be much in prayer. David, though a man of business, a man of war, yet was constant to his devotions. Though he had prophets and priests, and many good people among his subjects, to pray for him, yet he did not think that excused him from praying for himself. Let none expect benefit by the prayers of the church, or of their ministers or friends for them, who are capable of praying for themselves, and yet neglect it. The prayers of others for us must be desired, not to supersede, but to second our own for ourselves. Happy the people that have praying princes, to whose prayers they may thus say, Amen.

2. That God would protect his person, and preserve his life in the perils of war. "The name of the God of Jacob defend thee," and set thee out of the reach of the enemies. 1st. Let God by his providence keep thee safe, even the God who preserved Jacob in the days of his trouble. David had mighty men for his guards, but he commits himself, and his people commit him, to the care of the Almighty God. 2nd. Let God by his grace keep thee easy from the fear of evil; Pr. xviii. 10, "The name of the Lord is a strong tower," into which the righteous run by faith, and are safe; let David be enabled to shelter himself in that strong tower, as he has done many a time.

3. That God would enable him to go on in his undertakings for the public good; that in the day of battle he would "send him help out of the sanctuary, and strength out of Zion;" not from common providence, but from the ark of the covenant, and the peculiar favour God bears to his chosen people Israel; that he would help him in performance of the promises, and in answer to the prayers made in the sanctuary. Mercies out of the sanctuary are the sweetest mercies, such as are the token of God's peculiar love; the blessing of God even our own God. "Strength out of Zion" is spiritual strength, strength in the soul, in the inward man, and that is it we should most desire both for ourselves and others, in services and sufferings.

4. That God would testify his gracious acceptance of the sacrifices he offered with his prayers, according to the law of that time, before he went out on this dangerous expedition. "The Lord remember all thy offerings, and accept thy burnt sacrifices," ver. 3, or, 'turn them to ashes;' that is, the Lord give thee the victory and success which thou didst by prayer with sacrifices ask of him, and thereby give as full proof of his acceptance of the sacrifice, as ever he did by kindling it with fire from heaven. By this we may now know that God accepts our spiritual sacrifices, if by his Spirit he kindles in our souls a holy fire of pious and Divine affection, and with that makes our hearts burn within us.

5. That God would crown all his enterprises and noble designs for the public welfare with the desired success; ver. 4, "The Lord grant thee according to thine own heart." This they might in faith pray for, because they knew David was "a man after God's own heart," and would design nothing but what was pleasing to him. Those who make it their business to glorify God, may expect that God will, one way or other, gratify them; and they who walk in his counsel may promise themselves that he will fulfil theirs. "Thou shalt devise a thing and it shall be established unto thee."

Secondly. What confidence they had of an answer of peace to these petitions for themselves and their good king; ver. 5, "We will rejoice in thy salvation." We that are subjects will rejoice in the preservation and prosperity of our prince; or rather, 'In thy salvation, O God,' in thy power and promise to save, 'will we rejoice;' that is it we depend upon now, and which in the issue we shall have occasion greatly to rejoice in. Those that have their eye still upon the salvation of the Lord shall have their hearts filled with the joy of that salvation. "In the name of our God will we set up our banners." 1. We will wage war in his name, we will see that our cause be good, and make his glory our end in every expedition; we will ask counsel at his mouth, and take him along with us; we will follow his conduct, implore his aid, and depend upon it, and refer the issue to him. David went against Goliath, in the name of the Lord of hosts, 1 Sam. xvii. 45. 2. We will celebrate our victories in his name. When we lift up our banners in triumph, and set up our trophies, it shall be in the name of our God; he shall have all the glory of our success, and no instrument shall have any part of the honour that is due to him.

In singing this we ought to offer up to God our hearty good wishes for the good government we are under, and to the prosperity of it. But we may look farther; these prayers for David are prophecies concerning Christ the Son of David; and in him they were abundantly answered: he undertook the work of our redemption, and made war upon the powers of darkness; in the day of trouble, when his soul was exceeding sorrowful, the Lord heard him, heard him in that he feared, Heb. v. 7; sent him help out of the sanctuary, sent an angel from heaven to strengthen him, took cognizance of his offering, when he made his soul an offering for sin, and accepted his burnt sacrifice, turned it to ashes; the fire that should have fastened upon the sinner, fastening upon the sacrifice, with which God was well pleased. And he granted him according to his own heart, made him to see of the travail of his soul to his satisfaction, prospered his good pleasure in his hand, fulfilled all his petitions for himself and us, for him the Father heareth always, and his intercession is ever prevailing.

6 Now know I that the LORD saveth his anointed;
He will hear him from his holy heaven
With the saving strength of his right hand.

xix. 12. "Secret faults" are less faults committed in secret than faults which are thoughtlessly committed, and unnoticed when done—the "little sins" of life. In the next verse, therefore, sins which are deliberately and knowingly done are meant.

xix. 13. Translate the last clause, "I shall be innocent from great transgression." The preceding word "upright" probably refers to the unnoticed sins, and this clause to the presumptuous offences.

xx. 1—5. These verses are the people's prayer for the king. Verse 6 is the utterance of the king's own trust; and the remaining verses are a combined expression of confidence in God and desire to be heard. For "The Lord hear thee," it would be more exact to put "The Lord answer thee." "The name of God," that is, "God Himself," is a reverential form of speech in verse 1, and, of course, different in sense from the same in verse 5, where it has the same meaning as in ordinary language.

xx. 6. The anointed one of the Lord in this verse is the king, who

7 Some trust in chariots, and some in horses:
But we will remember the name of the LORD our God.
8 They are brought down and fallen:
But we are risen, and stand upright.
9 Save, LORD:
Let the king hear us when we call.

EGYPTIAN CHARIOTS AND HORSES.—ver. 7.

Here is, First. Holy David himself triumphing in the interest he had in the prayers of good people; ver. 6, "Now know I" (I that pen the psalm know it,) "that the Lord saveth his anointed," because he hath stirred up the hearts of the seed of Jacob to pray for him. Note, It bodes well to any prince and people, and may justly be taken as a happy presage, when God pours upon them a spirit of prayer. If he see us seeking him, he will be found of us; if he cause us to hope in his word, he will establish his word to us. Now so many that have an interest in heaven are praying for him, he doubts not but that God will hear him, and grant him an answer of peace; which will, 1. Take its rise from above. He will hear him from his holy heaven, of which the sanctuary was a type, Heb. ix. 23; from the throne he hath prepared in heaven, of which the mercy-seat was a type. 2. It shall take its effect here below. He will hear him with the saving strength of his right hand; that is, he will give a real answer to his prayer, and the prayers of his friends for him, not by letter, or by word of mouth, but, which is much better, by his right hand, by "the saving strength of his right hand." He will make it to appear he hears him by what he doth for him.

Secondly. His people triumphing in God, and their relation to him, and his revelation of himself to them, by which they distinguish themselves from those that live without God in the world. 1. See the difference between worldly people and godly people in their confidences, ver. 7. The children of this world trust in second causes, and think all is well if those do but smile upon them. They "trust in chariots and in horses;" and the more of them they can bring into the field the more sure they are of success in their wars. Probably David has here an eye to the Syrians, whose forces consisted much of chariots and horsemen, as we find in the history of David's victories over them, 2 Sam. viii. 4; x. 18. But, say the Israelites, we neither have chariots and horses to trust to, nor do we want them, nor if we had them would we build our hopes of success upon that; but we will remember, and rely upon, the name of the Lord our God, upon the relation we stand in to him as the Lord our God, and the knowledge we have of him by his name, that is, all that whereby he makes himself known; this we will remember, and upon every remembrance of it will be encouraged. Note, Those who make God and his name their praise may make God and his name their trust. 2. See the difference in the issue of their confidences, and by that we are to judge of the wisdom of the choice. Things are as they prove: see who will be ashamed of their confidence and who not; ver. 8, They that trust in their chariots and horses are brought down and fallen; and their chariots and horses were so far from saving them that they helped to sink them, and made them the easier and the richer prey to the conqueror, 2 Sam. viii. 4. But we that trust in the name of the Lord our God, not only stand upright and keep our ground, but are risen and have got ground against the enemy, and have triumphed over them. Note, A believing, obedient trust in God and his name, is the surest way both to preferment and to establishment, to rise and to stand upright; and this will stand us in stead when creature confidences fail those that depend upon them.

Thirdly. They conclude their prayer for the king with an Hosanna; Save now we beseech thee, O Lord! ver. 9. As we read this verse it may be taken as a prayer that God would not only bless the king, "Save, Lord," give him success, but that he would make him a blessing to them, "Let the king hear us, when we call" to him for justice and mercy. Those that would have good of their magistrates must thus pray for them; for they, as all other creatures, are that to us, and no more, that God makes them to be. Or it may refer to the Messiah, that King, that King of kings; Let him hear us when we call; let him come to us, according to the promise, in the time appointed; let him, as the great Master of requests, receive all our petitions, and present them to his Father. But many interpreters give another reading of this verse, by altering the pause; "Lord, save the king, and hear us when we call;" and so it is a summary of the whole psalm, and is taken into our English Liturgy, 'O Lord, save the king, and mercifully hear us when we call upon thee.'

In singing these verses, we should encourage ourselves to trust in God, and stir up ourselves to pray earnestly, as we are in duty bound, for those in authority over us, that under them we may lead quiet and peaceable lives, in all godliness and honesty.

PSALM XXI.

As the foregoing psalm was a prayer for the king, that God would protect and prosper him, so this is a thanksgiving for the success God had blessed him with. Those whom we have prayed for we ought to give thanks for, and particularly for kings in whose prosperity we share. They are here taught, I. To congratulate his victories, and the honour he had achieved, ver. 1—6. II. To confide in the power of God for the completing of the ruin of the enemies of his kingdom, ver. 7—13. And in this there is an eye to the Messiah, the prince and the glory of his kingdom; for to him divers passages in this psalm are more applicable than to David himself.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

1 THE king shall joy in thy strength, O LORD;
And in thy salvation how greatly shall he rejoice!
2 Thou hast given him his heart's desire,
And hast not withholden the request of his lips. Selah.
3 For thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness:
Thou settest a crown of pure gold on his head.

EASTERN CROWNS.

4 He asked life of thee, and thou gavest it him,
Even length of days for ever and ever.
5 His glory is great in thy salvation:
Honour and majesty hast thou laid upon him.
6 For thou hast made him most blessed for ever: [nance.
Thou hast made him exceeding glad with thy counte-

David here speaks for himself in the first place, professing that his joy was in God's strength, and in his salvation, and not in the strength or success of his armies. He also directs his subjects herein to rejoice with him, and to give God all the glory of the victories he had obtained; and all with an eye to Christ, of whose triumphs over the powers of darkness David's victories were but shadows.

First. They here congratulate the king's joys, and concur with him in them, ver. 1. The king doth rejoice; he useth to rejoice in thy strength, and so do we: what pleaseth the king pleaseth us, 2 Sam. iii. 36. Happy the people the character of whose king it is that he makes God's strength his confidence, and God's salvation his joy; that is pleased with all the advancements of God's kingdom, and trusts God to bear him out in all he doth for the service of it. Our Lord Jesus in his great undertaking relied upon help from Heaven, and pleased himself with the prospect of that great salvation which he was thereby to work out.

Secondly. They give God all the praise of those things which were the matter of their king's rejoicing.

1. That God had heard his prayers; ver. 2, "Thou hast given him his heart's desire," (and there is no prayer accepted but what is the heart's desire,) the very thing they begged of God for him, Ps. xx. 4. Note, God's gracious returns of prayer do in a special manner require our humble returns of praise. When God gives to Christ the heathen for his inheritance, gives him to see his seed, and accepts his intercession for all believers, he gives him his heart's desire.

2. That God had surprised him with favours, and much outdone his expectations; ver. 3, "Thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness." All our blessings are blessings of goodness; and are owing not at all to any merit of ours, but purely and only to God's goodness. But the psalmist here reckons it in a special manner obliging, that these blessings were given in a preventing way. This fixed his eye, enlarged his soul, and endeared his God, as one expresseth it. When God's blessings come sooner, and prove richer, than we imagine,—when they are given before we prayed for them, before we were ready for them, nay, when we feared the contrary,—then it may be truly said, that he prevented us with them. Nothing indeed prevented Christ; but to mankind never was any favour more preventing than our redemption by Christ, and all the blessed fruits of his mediation.

3. That God had advanced him to the highest honour, and the most extensive power; "Thou hast set a crown of pure gold upon his head," and kept it there when his enemies attempted to throw it off. Note, Crowns are at God's dispose; no head wears them but God sets them there; whether in judgment to his land, or for mercy, the event will shew. On the head of Christ God never set a crown of gold, but of thorns first and then of glory.

4. That God had assured him of the perpetuity of his kingdom, and therein had done more for him than he was able either to ask or think, ver. 4. When he went forth upon a perilous expedition he asked his life of thee, which he then put into his hand, and thou not only gavest him that, but withal gavest him length of days for ever and ever; didst not only prolong his life far beyond his expectation, but didst assure him of a blessed immortality in a future state, and of the continuance of his kingdom in the Messiah, that should come of his loins. See how God's grants often exceed our petitions and hopes, and infer from thence how rich he is in mercy to those that call upon him. See also, and rejoice, in the length of the days of Christ's kingdom. He was dead indeed, that we might live through him; but he is alive, and lives for evermore; and of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end; and because he thus lives we shall thus live also.

5. That God had advanced him to the highest honour and dignity; ver. 5, "His glory is great," far transcending that of all the neighbouring princes, "in the salvation" thou hast wrought for him and wrought by him. The glory which every good man is ambitious of, is to see the salvation of the Lord; "Honour and majesty hast thou laid upon him," as a burthen which he must bear, as a charge which he must account for. Jesus Christ "received from God the Father honour and glory," 2 Pet. i. 17; the glory which he had with him before the worlds were, Jno. xvii. 5. And on him is laid the charge of an universal government, and to him all power in heaven and earth is committed.

6. That God had given him the satisfaction of being the author of all bliss to mankind, ver. 6. 'Thou hast set him to be blessings for ever,' so the margin reads it; thou hast made him to be a universal, everlasting blessing to the world, in whom the families of the earth are and shall be blessed; and so "thou hast made him exceeding glad," with the countenance thou hast given to his undertaking, and to him in the prosecution of it. See how the Spirit now takes up the strain in alternation with the people. That the psalm was sung as a responsive one can hardly be doubted. The custom of responsive singing was adopted by the early Church.

XX. 9. Several versions and explanations of this verse have been proposed. The one above may be justified by the Hebrew text as now pointed. The Prayer-Book version is very free, and is, "Save, Lord, and hear us, O King of Heaven, when we call upon thee." The Greek is, "Lord, save the king, and hear us in what day we call upon thee." With this the Latin agrees. The Syriac is, "The Lord will save us, and our king will answer us when we call upon him." The Jews say we should translate, "Lord, save us; let the king hear us when we call upon him;" in order, adds Rosenmüller, that David may signify that not he, but the Lord, is the true king of the people, who had wrought victory for them. But consistency requires that this should be a prayer for the king, and therefore the sense conveyed by the Greek is most probably the correct one in general. We would of prophecy gradually riseth here to that which is peculiar to Christ, for none but he is blessed for ever, much less a blessing for ever; to that eminency that the expression speaks. And of him it is said, that "God made him full of joy with his countenance."

And, in singing this, we should rejoice in his joy, and triumph in his exaltation.

7 For the king trusteth in the LORD, [be moved.
And through the mercy of the most High he shall not 8 Thine hand shall find out all thine enemies:
Thy right hand shall find out those that hate thee.
9 Thou shalt make them as a fiery oven in the time of thine anger:
The LORD shall swallow them up in his wrath,
And the fire shall devour them.
10 Their fruit shalt thou destroy from the earth,
And their seed from among the children of men
11 For they intended evil against thee:
They imagined a mischievous device,
Which they are not able to perform.
12 Therefore shalt thou make them turn their back,
When thou shalt make ready thine arrows upon thy strings against the face of them.
13 Be thou exalted, LORD, in thine own strength:
So will we sing and praise thy power.

The psalmist, having taught his people to look back with joy and praise on what God had done for him and them, here teacheth them to look forward with faith, and hope, and prayer upon what God would farther do for them. "The king rejoiceth in God," ver. 1, and therefore we will be thankful; "The king trusteth in God," ver. 7, therefore will we be encouraged. The joy and confidence of Christ our King is the ground of all our joy and confidence.

First. They are confident of the stability of David's kingdom; "Through the mercy of the Most High," and not through his own merit or strength, "he shall not be moved." His prosperous state shall not be disturbed; his faith and hope in God, which is the stay of his spirit, shall not be shaken. "The mercy of the Most High," the Divine goodness, power, and dominion, is enough to secure our happiness, and therefore our trust in that mercy should be enough to silence all our fears. God being at Christ's right hand in his suffering, Ps. xvi. 8, and he being at God's right hand in his glory, we may be sure he shall not, he cannot, be moved, but continueth ever.

Secondly. They are confident of the destruction of all the impenitent, implacable enemies of David's kingdom. The success with which God had blessed David's arms hitherto was an earnest of the rest which God would give him from all his enemies round about, and a type of the total overthrow of all Christ's enemies, that would not have him to reign over them. Observe, 1. The description of his enemies. They are such as hate him, ver. 8. They hated David because God had set him apart for himself; hated Christ because they hated the light; but both were hated without any just cause, and in both God was hated, Jno. xv. 23, 25. 2. The designs of his enemies; ver. 11, "They intended evil against thee, and imagined a mischievous device." They pretended to fight against David only, but their enmity was against God himself. They that aimed to unking David, aimed in effect to ungod Jehovah. What is devised and designed against religion, and against the instruments God raiseth up to support and advance it, is very evil and mischievous; and God takes it as devised and designed against himself, and will so reckon for it. 3. The disappointment of them. They devise what they are not able to perform, ver. 11. Their malice is impotent, and they imagine a vain thing, Ps. ii. 1. 4. The discovery of them; ver. 8, "Thy hand shall find them out," though never so artfully disguised by the pretences and professions of friendship; though mingled with the faithful subjects of this kingdom, and hardly to be distinguished from them; though flying from justice, and absconding in their close places, yet thy hand shall find them out wherever they are. There is no escaping God's avenging eye, no going out of the reach of his hand; rocks and mountains will be no better shelter at last than fig leaves were at first. 5. The destruction of them. It will be an utter destruction, Lu. xix. 27; they shall be swallowed up and devoured, ver. 9. Hell, the portion of all Christ's enemies, is the complete misery both of body and soul. Their fruit and their seed shall be destroyed, ver. 10. The enemies of God's kingdom in every age shall fall under the same doom; and the whole generation of them will at last be rooted out, and all opposing rule, principality and power, shall be put down. The arrows of God's wrath shall confound them, and put them to flight, being levelled at the face of them, ver. 12: that will be the lot of daring enemies that face God. The fire of God's wrath will consume them, ver. 9; they shall not only be cast into a furnace of fire, (Mat. xiii. 42,) but he shall make them themselves as a fiery oven or furnace; they shall be their own tormentors,—the reflections and terrors of their own consciences will be their hell. Those that might have had Christ to rule and save them, but rejected him, and fought against him, even the remembrance of that will be enough to make them, to eternity, a fiery oven to themselves. It is the worm that dies not.

Thirdly. In this confidence they beg of God that he would still appear for his anointed, ver. 13; that he would act for him in his own strength, by the immediate operations of his power as Lord of hosts, and Father of spirits; making little use of means and instruments. And, 1. Hereby he would exalt himself, and glorify his own name. We have but little strength, and are not so active for thee as we should be, which is our shame. Lord, take the work into thine own hands; do it without us, and it will be thy glory. 2. Hereupon they would exalt him: "So will we sing and praise thy power" the more triumphantly. The less God has of our service when a deliverance is in the working, the more he must have of our praises when it is wrought without us.

PSALM XXII.

The Spirit of Christ, which was in the prophets, testifies in this psalm, as clearly and fully as anywhere else in all the Old Testament, "the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow," 1 Pet. i. 11; of him, no doubt, David here speaks, and not of himself, or of any other man. Much of it is expressly applied to Christ in the New Testament, all of it may be applied to him, and some of it must be understood of him only. The providences of God concerning David were so very extraordinary, that we may suppose there were some wise and good men who then could not but look upon him as a figure of him that was to come. But the composure of his psalms especially, in which he found himself wonderfully carried out by the spirit of prophecy, far beyond his own thought and intention, was, we may suppose, an abundant satisfaction to himself, that he was not only a father of the Messiah, but a figure of him. In this psalm he speaks, 1. Of the humiliation of Christ, ver. 1—21; where David, as a type of Christ, complains of the very calamitous condition he was in upon many accounts: 1. He complains, and mixeth comforts with his complaints. Complains, ver. 1, 2; but comforts himself, ver. 3—5. Complains again, ver. 6—8; but comforts himself again, ver. 9, 10. 2. He complains, and mixeth prayers with his complaints. Complains of the power and rage of his enemies, ver. 12, 13, 16, 18; of his own bodily weakness and decay, ver. 14, 15, 17; but prays that God would not be far from him, ver. 11, 19; that he would save and deliver him, ver. 19—21. II. Of the exaltation of Christ, that his undertaking should be for the glory of God, ver. 22—25: for the salvation and joy of his people, ver. 26—29; and for the perpetuating of his own kingdom, ver. 30, 31. In singing this psalm, we must keep our thoughts fixed upon Christ, and be so affected with his sufferings as to experience the fellowship of them, and so affected with his grace as to experience the power and influence of it.

To the chief Musician upon Aijeleth Shahar, A Psalm of David.

MY God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?
Why art thou so far from helping me, and from the words of my roaring?
2 O my God, I cry in the daytime, but thou hearest not:
And in the night season, and am not silent.
3 But thou art holy,
O thou that inhabitest the praises of Israel.
4 Our fathers trusted in thee:
They trusted, and thou didst deliver them
5 They cried unto thee, and were delivered:
They trusted in thee, and were not confounded.
6 But I am a worm, and no man;
A reproach of men, and despised of the people.
7 All they that see me laugh me to scorn:
They shoot out the lip, they shake the head, saying,
8 He trusted on the LORD that he would deliver him:
Let him deliver him, seeing he delighted in him.
9 But thou art he that took me out of the womb:
Thou didst make me hope when I was upon my mother's 10 I was cast upon thee from the womb: [breasts.
Thou art my God from my mother's belly.

Some think they find Christ in the title of this psalm "upon Aijeleth Shahar,"—'the hind of the morning.' Christ is as the swift hind upon the mountains of spices, Cant. viii. 14; as the loving hind, and the pleasant roe, to all believers, Pr. v. 19; giveth goodly words, like Naphtali, who is compared to a hind let loose, Gen. xlix. 21. He is the hind of the morning, marked out by the counsels of God from eternity, to be run down by those dogs that compassed him, ver. 16. But others think it notes only the tune to which the psalm was set. In these verses we have,

First. A sad complaint of God's withdrawings, ver. 1, 2. This may be applied to David, or any other child of God, in the want of the tokens of his favour, and pressed with the burthen of his displeasure, roaring under it, as one overwhelmed with grief and terror, and crying earnestly for relief, and in this case apprehending himself forsaken of God, unhelped, unheard, yet calling him again and again, My God, and continuing to cry day and night to him, and earnestly desiring his gracious returns. Note, 1. Spiritual desertions are the saints' sorest afflictions. When their evidences are clouded, Divine consolations suspended, their communion with God interrupted, and the terrors of God set themselves in array against them, how sad are their spirits, and how sapless all their comforts! 2. Even their complaint of these burthens is a good sign of spiritual life, and spiritual senses exercised. To cry out, My God, why am I sick? why am I poor? would give cause to suspect discontent and worldliness. But, "why hast thou forsaken me?" is the language of a heart binding up its happiness in God's favour. 3. When we are lamenting God's withdrawings, yet still we must call him our God, and continue to call upon him as ours. When we want the faith of assurance, we must live by a faith of adherence; however it be, yet God is good, and he is mine; and though he slay me, yet will I trust in him; though he do not answer me presently, I will continue praying and waiting; though he be silent, I will not be silent.

But it must be applied to Christ; for in the first words of this complaint he poured out his soul before God when he was upon the cross, Mat. xxvi. 46. Probably, he proceeded to the following words, and, some think, repeated the whole psalm, if not aloud, because they cavilled at the first words, yet to himself. Note, 1st. Christ in his sufferings cried earnestly to his Father for his favour and presence with him. He cried in the daytime upon the cross, and "in the night season," when he was in his agony in the garden, he offered up "strong crying and tears to him that was able to save him," and with some fear too, Heb. v. 7. 2nd. Yet God forsook him, was far from helping him, and did not hear him, and this was it which he complains of more than all his sufferings. God delivered him into the hands of his enemies; it was by his determinate counsel that he was crucified and slain, and he did not give in sensible comforts; but Christ having made himself sin for us, in conformity thereunto, the Father laid him under the present impressions of his wrath and displeasure against sin. "It pleased the Lord to bruise him, and to put him to grief," Isa. liii. 10. But even then he kept fast hold of his relation to his Father as his God, by whom he was now employed, whom he was now serving, and with whom he should shortly be glorified.

Secondly. Encouragement taken in reference hereunto, ver. 3—5. Though God did not hear him, did not help him, yet, 1. He will think well of God. "But thou art holy;" not unjust, or untrue, or unkind in any of thy dispensations; though thou dost not presently come in to the relief of thine afflicted people, yet thou lovest them, art true to thy covenant with them, and dost not countenance the iniquity of their persecutors, Hab. i. 13; and, as thou art render thus: "Lord, save the king, and answer us when we call." That there is a defect in the present text is certain, and it would be better to give the obvious sense in a popular version, than slavishly to follow the letter, and convey a false impression.

xxi. 1. This psalm is closely connected with the preceding. It has been generally taken as a celebration of some victory; but, owing to the difficulty of limiting its application to David or any of his successors, it was early viewed by the Hebrews as Messianic. The Chaldee translates the first verse thus: "O Lord, in thy strength shall the King Messiah rejoice, and in thy deliverance how greatly shall he exult for joy!"

xxi. 7. Here again the Targum introduces the name of King Messiah:—"Because the King Messiah hopes in the Lord and in the favour of the Most High, he shall not be moved." The rest of the paraphrase is in harmony with this.

xxi. 12. For "Therefore shalt thou make them turn their back," infinitely pure and upright thyself, so thou delightest in the services of thine upright people. "Thou inhabitest the praises of Israel;" that is, thou art pleased to manifest thy glory, and grace, and special presence with thy people, in the sanctuary where they attend thee with their praises; there thou art always ready to receive their homage, and of the tabernacle of meeting hast said, "This is my rest for ever." This speaks God's wonderful condescension to his faithful worshippers, that, though he is attended with the praises of angels, yet he is pleased to inhabit the praises of Israel. And it may comfort us in all our complaints that, though God seem for a while to turn a deaf ear to them, yet he is so pleased with his people's praises that he will in due time give them cause to change their note. "Hope in God, for I shall yet praise him." Our Lord Jesus in his sufferings had an eye to the holiness of God, to preserve and advance the honour of that, and of his grace in inhabiting the praises of Israel, notwithstanding the iniquities of their holy things. 2. He will take comfort from the experiences which the saints in former ages had of the benefit of faith and prayer; ver. 4, 5, "Our fathers trusted in thee; cried unto thee, and thou didst deliver them;" therefore thou wilt in due time deliver me, for never any that hoped in thee were made ashamed of their hope; never any that sought thee sought thee in vain. And thou art still the same in thyself, and the same to thy people that ever thou wast. They were our fathers, and thy people are beloved for the fathers' sakes, Rom. xi. 28. The entail of the covenant is designed for the support of the seed of the faithful; he that was our fathers' God must be ours, and therefore will be ours. Our Lord Jesus in his sufferings supported himself with this, that all the fathers who were types of him in his sufferings, Noah, Joseph, David, Jonah, and others, were in due time delivered, and were types of his exaltation too; therefore he knows he also shall not be confounded, Isa. l. 7.

Thirdly. The complaint renewed of another grievance, and that is the contempt and reproach of men. This complaint is nothing so bitter as that before, God's withdrawings; but, as that touches a gracious soul, so this a generous soul, in a very tender part, ver. 6—8. Our fathers were honoured; the patriarchs in their day, first or last, appeared great in the eye of the world, Abraham, Moses, David; but Christ is a worm, and no man. It was great condescension that he became man, a step downwards that is and will be the wonder of angels; yet as if it were too much, too great to be a man, he becomes a worm, and no man. He was Adam, 'a mean man,' and Enosh, 'a man of sorrow;' but lo Ish, 'not a considerable man;' for he took upon him the form of a servant, and his visage was marred more than any man's, Isa. lii. 14. Man at the best is a worm, but he became a worm and no man; and if he had not made himself a worm he could not have been trampled upon as he was. The word signifies such a worm as was used in dyeing scarlet or purple, whence some make it an allusion to his bloody sufferings. See what abuses were put upon him: 1. He was reproached as an ill man, as a blasphemer, a sabbath breaker, a winebibber, a false prophet, an enemy to Cæsar, a confederate with the prince of the devils. 2. He was despised of the people as a mean contemptible man, not worth taking notice of; his country in an ill name, his relations poor mechanics, his followers none of the rulers or the Pharisees, but the mob. 3. He was ridiculed as a foolish man, and one that not only deceived others, but himself too. They that saw him hanging on the cross laughed him to scorn. So far were they from pitying him, or concerning themselves for him, that they added to his afflictions with all the gestures and expressions of insolence, upbraiding him with his fall; they make mouths at him, make merry over him, and make a jest of his sufferings; they shoot out the lip, they shake their head, saying, This was he that said he trusted God would deliver him; now let him deliver him. David was sometimes taunted for his confidence in God; but in the sufferings of Christ this was literally and exactly fulfilled, those very gestures were used by those that reviled him, Mat. xxvii. 39, they wagged their heads; nay, and so far did their malice make them forget themselves, that they used the very words, ver. 43, "He trusted in God; let him deliver him." Our Lord Jesus, having undertaken to satisfy for the dishonour we had done to God by our sins, did it by submitting to the highest instance of ignominy and disgrace that could be.

Fourthly. Encouragement taken as to this also; ver. 9, 10, Men despise me, "but thou art he that took me out of the womb." David, and other good men, have often, for direction to us, encouraged themselves with this, that God was not only the God of their fathers, as before, ver. 1, but the God of their infancy, who began betimes to take care of them, as soon as they had a being, and therefore they hope will never cast them off. He that did so well for us in that helpless, useless state, will not leave us when he has reared us, and nursed us up into some capacity of serving him. See the early instances of God's providential care for us, 1. In the birth. He took us also out of the womb, else we had died there, or been stifled in the birth. Every man's particular time begins with this pregnant proof of God's providence, as time in general began with the creation, that pregnant proof of his being. 2. At the breast. "Then didst thou make me hope;" that is, thou didst that for me in providing sustenance for me, and protecting me from the dangers to which I was exposed, which encourages me to hope in thee all my days. The blessings of the breasts, as they crown the blessings of the womb, so they are earnests of the blessings of our whole lives; sure he that fed us then, will never starve us, Job iii. 12. 3. In our early dedication to him. "I was cast upon thee from the womb," which perhaps refers to his circumcision on the eighth day; he was then by his parents committed and given up to God as his God in covenant,—for circumcision was a seal of the covenant,—and this encouraged him to trust in God. Those have reason to think themselves safe who were so soon, so solemnly, gathered under the wings of the Divine majesty. 4. In the experience we have had of God's goodness to us all along ever since, drawn out in a constant, uninterrupted series of preservations and supplies. "Thou art my God," providing for me, and watching over me for good, "from my mother's belly;" that is, from my coming into the world, unto this day. And if, as soon as we became capable of exercising reason, we put our confidence in God, and committed ourselves and our way to him, we need not doubt but he will always remember the kindness of our youth, and the love of our espousals, Jer. ii. 2. This is applicable to our Lord Jesus, over whose incarnation and birth the Divine providence watched with a peculiar care, when he was born in a stable, laid in a manger, and immediately exposed to the malice of Herod, and forced to flee into Egypt; "when he was a child, God loved him and called him thence," Hos. xi. 1, and the remembrance of this comforted him in his sufferings. Men reproached him, and discouraged his confidence in God; but God had honoured him, and encouraged his confidence in him.

11 Be not far from me; for trouble is near;
For there is none to help.
12 Many bulls have compassed me:
Strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round.
13 They gaped upon me with their mouths,
As a ravening and a roaring lion
14 I am poured out like water,
And all my bones are out of joint
My heart is like wax;
It is melted in the midst of my bowels
15 My strength is dried up like a potsherd,
And my tongue cleaveth to my jaws;
And thou hast brought me into the dust of death.
16 For dogs have compassed me:
The assembly of the wicked have inclosed me:
They pierced my hands and my feet.

DOGS OF PALESTINE.

17 I may tell all my bones:
They look and stare upon me
18 They part my garments among them,
And cast lots upon my vesture.
19 But be not thou far from me, O LORD:
O my strength, haste thee to help me.
20 Deliver my soul from the sword,
My darling from the power of the dog.
21 Save me from the lion's mouth:
For thou hast heard me from the horns of the unicorns.

PERSIAN BULL, FROM PERSEPOLIS.—ver. 12.

In these verses we have Christ suffering, and Christ praying, by which we are directed to look for crosses and to look up to God under them.

First. Here is Christ suffering. David indeed was often in trouble, and beset with enemies; but many of the particulars here instanced in are such as were never true of David, and therefore must be appropriated to Christ in the depth of his humiliation.

1. He is here deserted by his friends. "Trouble" and distress "is near, and there is none to help," none to uphold, ver. 11. He trod the winepress alone; for all his disciples forsook him and fled. It is God's honour to help when all other helps and succours fail.

2. He is here insulted and surrounded by his enemies, such as were of a higher rank, who, for their strength and fury, are compared to bulls, strong bulls of Bashan, ver. 12, fat and fed to the full, haughty and sour; such were the chief priests and elders that persecuted Christ; and others of a lower rank, who are compared to dogs, ver. 16, filthy and greedy, and unwearied in running him down. There is an assembly of the wicked plotting against him, ver. 16 for the the margin suggests, "Thou shalt set them as a butt." The words are literally, "For thou shalt set them a shoulder," an idiomatic phrase for putting to flight. The other idea is favoured by Gill, Boothroyd, Horsley, and others, but it is by no means well supported. Good, who is often eccentric, has, "Therefore shalt thou assign them a reward," which is certainly wrong. The best popular version of the words is in the Prayer-Book, where the figure is hidden: "Therefore shalt thou put them to flight," which is the true sense.

xxii. Title. The words, "upon Aijeleth Shahar," do not convey any distinct idea when translated, according to the rendering of the margin, "To the chief musician upon the hind of the morning." Clearly we must look for something more. Rosenmüller renders, "according to the hind of the morning," or "early dawn," which he supposes to be the name of a composition commencing with those words, and having a proper tune. The ancient versions do not explain the words properly. Fürst says Aijeleth Shahar is the name chief priests sat in council to consult of ways and means to take Christ. These enemies were numerous and unanimous; many, and those of different and clashing interests among themselves, as Herod and Pilate, yet have agreed to compass me. They have carried their plot far, and seem to have gained their point, for they have beset me round, ver. 12; they have inclosed me, ver. 16. They are formidable and threatening; ver. 13, "they gaped upon me with their mouths," to show me that they would swallow me up; and this with as much strength and fierceness as a roaring ravening lion leaps upon his prey.

3. He is here crucified. The very manner of his death is described, though never in use among the Jews; "They pierced my hands and my feet," ver. 16, which were nailed to the accursed tree, and the whole body left so to hang, the effect of which must needs be the most exquisite pain and torture. There is no one passage in all the Old Testament which the Jews have so industriously corrupted as this, because it is such an eminent prediction of the death of Christ, and was so exactly fulfilled.
